Aug. 6: Theater program at 8:30 p.m. in the West Barn. Premiere of Robert Selig's "Chocorua," scenario by Leo Bonfanti, text by Richard Moore; and Brecht-Weill's "The Yes Man."

Aug. 7: Program by Collage at 8:30 p.m. in the Theater-Concert Hall. Foss's "Time Cycle" (chamber version), Druckman's "Valentine," Crumb's "Madrigals," Pusztai's "Nocturnes" and Davidovsky's "Synchronisms" No. 2.

Aug. 8: Bruno Maderna and Gunther Schuller conducting the Berkshire Music Center Chamber Ensemble at 8:30 p.m. in the Theater-Concert Hall. Berio's "Circles," Carter's Double Concerto, and premieres of Schuller's "Tre Invenzione" and Maderna's "Giardino Reliquoso."

Aug. 9: Chamber music at 8:30 p.m. in the Theater-Concert Hall. Works by Imbrie, Kim, Mather and Erb.

Aug. 10: Bruno Maderna conducts the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. Webern's Variations for Orchestra, Shinohara's "Piece for Orchestra," premiere of Lerdahl's "Chromorhytmos" and Druckman's "Windows."

OF COURSE the Berkshire Festival in Lenox, Mass. has a regular schedule of traditional concerts. Aldo Ceccato conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, a program that includes Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 3, with John Browning; Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 1; and Dvorak's "New World" Symphony.

And next Sunday after he has performed and conducted evocative contemporary rites, Michael Tilson Thomas will lead the BSO in Mahler's Fifth Symphony, and, with Ralph Gomberg, an oboe concerto by Haydn (at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed).

Thomas and Ceccato Will Conduct BSO

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts two concerts by the orchestra as part of the sixth week end Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Friday, Saturday and Sunday.

The concerts Friday evening are part of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music), and the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, which this year is celebrating its 20th anniversary.

The Weekend Prelude Friday at 7 p.m. in the shed is devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, chairman emeritus of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. The Prelude opens with "Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson" with soprano Phyllis Curtin, and the composer at the piano. Next is "Piano variations" with Michael Tilson Thomas, pianist. The Prelude closes with a performance of "Vitebsk, study of a Jewish Theme," with Boston Symphony Chamber Players members Joseph Silverstein violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with the composer at the piano.

The 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Music Shed is conducted by Thomas with violin soloist Paul Zukovsky. This concert opens with Ruggles' "Evocations for Orchestra," and Copland's "Eight Poems of Emily Dickinson" with soprano Phyllis Curtin. Both works are performed for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Next is the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin, and orchestra with soloist Zukofsky. The concert concludes with a performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

The season's sixth Saturday Open Rehearsal takes place at 10:30 a.m. Tickets go on sale at the Festival Ticket Office two hours before the beginning of the rehearsal. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefits the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund.

Aldo Ceccato, recently appointed principal conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Soloist is pianist John Browning. The concert opens with Mendelssohn's Symphony no. 1, followed by a performance of Prokofiev's Third piano concerto with soloist Browning. The concert concludes with Dvorak's Symphony no. 9, the "New World."

Sunday at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, Thomas again conducts the Boston Symphony with soloist Ralph Gomberg, principal oboeist of the Boston Symphony. The concert is Haydn's Oboe concerto, and Mahler's Symphony no. 5.

Ralph Gomberg

Phyllis Curtin

Tanglewood

Modern music and classics to share Lenox weekend

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor, will conduct two concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood Aug. 4 and 6.

Aldo Ceccato, recently appointed conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, will conduct Aug. 5.

The two Friday evening concerts will be part of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored by the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, this year celebrating its 20th anniversary, and the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for advanced study of music.

The Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. Friday will be devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, chairman emeritus of the Berkshire Music Center faculty. The Prelude will open with Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson with Phyllis Curtin, soprano, and the composer at the piano. Next, Michael Tilson Thomas will play Piano Variations. The Prelude will close with a performance of Vitebsk, Study on a Jewish Theme, with Boston Symphony Chamber Players members Joseph Silverstein, violin, Jules Eskin, cello, and Copland, piano.

With Thomas conducting, the Boston Symphony will open the 9 p.m. concert with Carl Ruggles' Evocations for Orchestra and Copland's Eight Poems of Emily Dickinson with Miss Curtin. The orchestra will perform both works for the first time.

Paul Zukofsky will be the soloist next in the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for Amplified Violin and Orchestra. The Fromm Foundation commissioned the Wuorinen concerto as part of its anniversary celebration. A performance of Stravinsky's Rite of Spring will conclude the concert. [See article by Franklin Coleman on the Fromm festivals, past and present, on Page 25 of this issue.]

The open rehearsals take place at 10:30 a.m. Saturdays. Proceeds from the $2.50 tickets, on sale at the Tanglewood box office two hours before rehearsals, benefit the B.S.O. pension fund. Thomas will rehearse the orchestra Aug. 5 for the Sunday afternoon concert. [See photographs, by Warren Fowler, of a 1971 Tanglewood rehearsal conducted by Thomas on Page 9.]

The Aug. 5 concert, conducted by Ceccato, will open at 8:30 p.m. with Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 1. John Browning will be the soloist in a performance of Prokofiev's Third Piano Concerto. Dvorak's Symphony No. 9, the "New World," will end the concert.

Not a well known Mendelssohn work, the C minor symphony was written when the composer was 15 and reflects Beethoven's influence. Prokofiev's masterpiece concerto, though written in 1921, has been established as a "classic." The Dvorak work records the Czeck composer's impression of America made on a visit in 1893 and owes a debt to American Negro and Czeck folk music.

Thomas will again conduct the orchestra at 2:30 p.m. Sunday, Aug. 6. Ralph Gomberg, principal B.S.O. oboist, will be the soloist in the performance of an early 19th Century oboe concerto attributed to Haydn. Mahler's Symphony No. 5 will end the concert. Mahler completed the Fifth in the summer of 1902, months after his marriage to Alma Maria Schindler.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405
AUG 3 1972
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

Thomas To Direct Boston Symphony

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts two concerts by the orchestra as part of the sixth weekend Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Aug. 4, 5 and 6.

The Weekend Prelude Friday evening, Aug. 4 at 7 p.m. in the Shed is devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, Chairman Emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. The Prelude opens with Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson with soprano Phyllis Curtin, and the composer at the piano. Next is Piano variations with Michael Tilson Thomas, pianist. The Prelude closes with a performance of Vitebsk, Study on a Jewish Theme, with Boston Symphony Chamber Players members Joseph Silverstein violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with the composer at the piano.

The 9:00 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Music Shed is conducted by Mr. Thomas with violin soloist Paul Zukovsky. This opening orchestral concert of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music opens with Ruggles' Evocations for orchestra, and Copland's Eight poems of Emily Dickinson with soprano Phyllis Curtin. Both works are performed for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Next is the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin and orchestra with soloist Paul Zukofsky. The concerto was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation as part of its 20th Anniversary celebration. The concert concludes with a performance of Stravinsky's Rite of Spring.

The season's sixth Saturday morning Open Rehearsal takes place at 10:30 a.m. Aug. 5.

Aldo Ceccato, recently appointed Principal Conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Saturday evening, Aug. 5 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist for this evening's concert is pianist John Browning. The concert opens with Mendelssohn's Symphony no. 1, followed by a performance of Prokofiev's Third piano concerto with soloist John Browning. The concert concludes with Dvorak's Symphony no. 9, the "New World."

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct on three occasions this coming weekend at Tanglewood. — Photo from Tanglewood

Sunday afternoon, Aug. 6 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, Mr. Thomas again conducts the Boston Symphony with soloist Ralph Gomberg, principal oboeist of the Boston Symphony. The concert is Haydn's Oboe concerto, and Mahler's Symphony no. 5.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500
JUL 27 1972
New England Newsclip

Thomas To Conduct BSO At Tanglewood

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct two concerts by the orchestra as part of the sixth weekend Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Aug. 4-6.

The concerts are part of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music) and the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, which this year is celebrating its 20th anniversary.

The weekend prelude on Aug. 4 at 7 p.m. in the Shed will be devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, chairman emeritus of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. The Prelude will open with "Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson" with soprano Phyllis Curtin, and the composer at the piano. Next is "Piano variations" with Michael Tilson Thomas, pianist. The Prelude closes with a performance of "Vitebsk, study on a Jewish Theme", with Boston Symphony Chamber Players members Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with the composer at the piano.

The 9 p.m. concert will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas with violin soloist Paul Zukovsky. It will open with Ruggles' "Evocations for orchestra", and Copland's "Eight poems of Emily Dickinson" with soprano Phyllis Curtin. Both works are performed for the first time by the BSO. Next is the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin and orchestra with soloist Paul Zukofsky. The concert concludes with a performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring".

The season's sixth Saturday morning Open Rehearsal takes place at 10:30 a.m. Aug. 5. Tickets are $2.50 each, one sale at the Festival Ticket Office two hours before the beginning of the rehearsal. Proceeds benefit the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund.

Aldo Ceccato, recently appointed principal conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the Boston Symphony Saturday evening, Aug. 5, at 8:30 p.m. Soloist is pianist John Browning. The concert opens with Mendelssohn's Symphony no. 1, followed by a performance of Prokofiev's Third piano concerto. The concert concludes with Dvorak's Symphony no. 9, the "New World".

Sunday afternoon, Aug. 6 at 2:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas again conducts with soloist Ralph Gomberg, principal oboeist of the Boston Symphony. The program is Haydn's Oboe concerto and Mahler's Symphony no. 5.

Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Pops at Tanglewood Tuesday evening, Aug. 1, at 8:30 p.m. The annual Boston Pops Pension Fund concert features the music of Lerner and Loewe.

HUDSON, N. Y.
REGISTER STAR
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
D. 10,500
AUG 1 1972

Thomas Conducts At Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS. -- Michael Tilson, Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts two concerts by the orchestra as part of the sixth weekend Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Aug. 4, 5 and 6.

The concerts Friday evening, Aug 4, are part of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music), and the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, which is celebrating its 20th anniversary.

The Weekend Prelude Friday evening at 7:00 p.m. in the Shed is devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, chairman emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. The Prelude opens with Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson with soprano Phyllis Curtin, and the composer at the piano.

Next is Piano variations with Michael Tilson Thomas, pianist. The Prelude closes with a performance of Vitebsk, study on a Jewish Theme, with Boston Symphony Chamber Players members Joseph Silverstein violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with the composer at the piano.

The 9:00 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra, con in the Music Shed is conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas with violin soloist Paul Zukovsky.

The opening orchestral concert of the Festival includes the world premier of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin, and orchestra with soloist Paul Zykofky. It concludes with Stravinsky's Rite of Spring.

The season's sixth Saturday morning open rehearsal takes place at 10:30 a.m. Aug. 5. Tickets are $2.50 each, one sale at the Festival Ticket Office two hours before the beginning of the open rehearsal.

Aldo Ceccato, recently appointed principal conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Saturday Aug. 5 at 8:30 p.m.

Soloist is pianist John Browning.

Sunday, Aug. 6 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, Michael Tilson Thomas again conducts the Boston Symphony, with soloist Ralph Gomberg, principal oboeist of the Boston Symphony.

Arthur Fielder conducts the Boston Pops Tuesday 1 Aug. 1 at 8:30 p.m. the annual Boston Pops Pension Fund concert features the music of Lerner and Loewe with soloists Louis Russell soprano, Corinne Curry mezzo-soprano, Vahan Khanzadian tenor, Richard Fredricks baritone, with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director.

Thomas to Take Podium for Tanglewood Concert

By THOMAS PUTNAM

OH TO BE in the Berkshires . . . now that the contemporary music festival is taking place at Tanglewood.

The festival opens Friday with a special weekend prelude of music by Aaron Copland and an evening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas.

Sponsor for the festival is the Berkshire Music Center, summer music academy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation.

COPLAND, chairman emeritus of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, will perform on the program of his music. He and soprano Phyllis Curtin will perform "Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson." Also, he will be joined by violinist Joseph Silverstein and cellist Jules Eskin in a performance of Vitebsk, Study on a Jewish Theme."

Thomas, in addition to conducting the orchestra in the 9 p.m. program, will perform Copland's Piano Variations on the 7 p.m. prelude.

The Boston Symphony concert will include the premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin and orchestra, with Paul Zukofsky as soloist. Other works are Carl Ruggles's "Evocations" for orchestra, "Copland's "Eight Poems of Emily Dickinson" (with Miss Curtin and Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring."

THE FESTIVAL continues through Aug. 10 and includes vocal and chamber music programs, a theater program, and a program by Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Here is the schedule:

Friday: Copland program at 7 p.m. in the Shed . . . Boston Symphony Orchestra program, conducted by Thomas, at 9 p.m. in the Shed.

Saturday: Vocal recital at 2:30 p.m. in the Theater-Concert Hall. Music by Druckman, Kim, Powell and Carter.

Aug. 6: Theater program at 8:30 p.m. in the West Barn. Premiere of Robert Selig's "Chocorua," scenario by Leo Bonfanti, text by Richard Moore; and Brecht-Weill's "The Yes Man."

Aug. 7: Program by Collage at 8:30 p.m. in the Theater-Concert Hall. Foss's "Time Cycle" (chamber version), Druckman's "Valentine," Crumb's "Madrigals," Pusztai's "Nocturnes" and Davidovsky's "Synchronisms" No. 2.

Aug. 8: Bruno Maderna and Gunther Schuller conducting the Berkshire Music Center Chamber Ensemble at 8:30 p.m. in the Theater-Concert Hall. Berio's "Circles," Carter's Double Concerto, and premieres of Schuller's "Tre Invenzione" and Maderna's "Giardino Reliquoso."

Aug. 9: Chamber music at 8:30 p.m. in the Theater-Concert Hall. Works by Imbrie, Kim, Mather and Erb.

Aug. 10: Bruno Maderna conducts the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. Webern's Variations for Orchestra, Shinohara's "Piece for Orchestra," premiere of Lerdahl's "Chromorhytmos" and Druckman's "Windows."

OF COURSE the Berkshire Festival in Lenox, Mass. has a regular schedule of traditional concerts. Aldo Ceccato conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, a program that includes Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 3, with John Browning; Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 1; and Dvorak's "New World" Symphony.

And next Sunday after he has performed and conducted evocative contemporary rites, Michael Tilson Thomas will lead the BSO in Mahler's Fifth Symphony, and, with Ralph Gomberg, an oboe concerto by Haydn (at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed).

Thomas and Ceccato Will Conduct BSO

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts two concerts by the orchestra as part of the sixth week end Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Friday, Saturday and Sunday.

The concerts Friday evening are part of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music), and the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, which this year is celebrating its 20th anniversary.

The Weekend Prelude Friday at 7 p.m. in the shed is devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, chairman emeritus of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. The Prelude opens with "Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson" with soprano Phyllis Curtin, and the composer at the piano. Next is "Piano variations" with Michael Tilson Thomas, pianist. The Prelude closes with a performance of "Vitebsk, study of a Jewish Theme," with Boston Symphony Chamber Players members Joseph Silverstein violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with the composer at the piano.

The 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Music Shed is conducted by Thomas with violin soloist Paul Zukovsky. This concert opens with Ruggles' "Evocations for Orchestra," and Copland's "Eight Poems of Emily Dickinson" with soprano Phyllis Curtin. Both works are performed for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Next is the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin, and orchestra with soloist Zukofsky. The concert concludes with a performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

The season's sixth Saturday Open Rehearsal takes place at 10:30 a.m. Tickets go on sale at the Festival Ticket Office two hours before the beginning of the rehearsal. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefits the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund.

Aldo Ceccato, recently appointed principal conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Soloist is pianist John Browning. The concert opens with Mendelssohn's Symphony no. 1, followed by a performance of Prokofiev's Third piano concerto with soloist Browning. The concert concludes with Dvorak's Symphony no. 9, the "New World."

Sunday at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, Thomas again conducts the Boston Symphony with soloist Ralph Gomberg, principal oboeist of the Boston Symphony. The concert is Haydn's Oboe concerto, and Mahler's Symphony no. 5.

Ralph Gomberg

Phyllis Curtin

Tanglewood

Modern music and classics to share Lenox weekend

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor, will conduct two concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood Aug. 4 and 6.

Aldo Ceccato, recently appointed conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, will conduct Aug. 5.

The two Friday evening concerts will be part of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored by the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, this year celebrating its 20th anniversary, and the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for advanced study of music.

The Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. Friday will be devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, chairman emeritus of the Berkshire Music Center faculty. The Prelude will open with Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson with Phyllis Curtin, soprano, and the composer at the piano. Next, Michael Tilson Thomas will play Piano Variations. The Prelude will close with a performance of Vitebsk, Study on a Jewish Theme, with Boston Symphony Chamber Players members Joseph Silverstein, violin, Jules Eskin, cello, and Copland, piano.

With Thomas conducting, the Boston Symphony will open the 9 p.m. concert with Carl Ruggles' Evocations for Orchestra and Copland's Eight Poems of Emily Dickinson with Miss Curtin. The orchestra will perform both works for the first time.

Paul Zukofsky will be the soloist next in the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for Amplified Violin and Orchestra. The Fromm Foundation commissioned the Wuorinen concerto as part of its anniversary celebration. A performance of Stravinsky's Rite of Spring will conclude the concert. [See article by Franklin Coleman on the Fromm festivals, past and present, on Page 25 of this issue.]

The open rehearsals take place at 10:30 a.m. Saturdays. Proceeds from the $2.50 tickets, on sale at the Tanglewood box office two hours before rehearsals, benefit the B.S.O. pension fund. Thomas will rehearse the orchestra Aug. 5 for the Sunday afternoon concert. [See photographs, by Warren Fowler, of a 1971 Tanglewood rehearsal conducted by Thomas on Page 9.]

The Aug. 5 concert, conducted by Ceccato, will open at 8:30 p.m. with Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 1. John Browning will be the soloist in a performance of Prokofiev's Third Piano Concerto. Dvorak's Symphony No. 9, the "New World," will end the concert.

Not a well known Mendelssohn work, the C minor symphony was written when the composer was 15 and reflects Beethoven's influence. Prokofiev's masterpiece concerto, though written in 1921, has been established as a "classic." The Dvorak work records the Czeck composer's impression of America made on a visit in 1893 and owes a debt to American Negro and Czeck folk music.

Thomas will again conduct the orchestra at 2:30 p.m. Sunday, Aug. 6. Ralph Gomberg, principal B.S.O. oboist, will be the soloist in the performance of an early 19th Century oboe concerto attributed to Haydn. Mahler's Symphony No. 5 will end the concert. Mahler completed the Fifth in the summer of 1902, months after his marriage to Alma Maria Schindler.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405
AUG 3 1972
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

Thomas To Direct Boston Symphony

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts two concerts by the orchestra as part of the sixth weekend Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Aug. 4, 5 and 6.

The Weekend Prelude Friday evening, Aug. 4 at 7 p.m. in the Shed is devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, Chairman Emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. The Prelude opens with Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson with soprano Phyllis Curtin, and the composer at the piano. Next is Piano variations with Michael Tilson Thomas, pianist. The Prelude closes with a performance of Vitebsk, Study on a Jewish Theme, with Boston Symphony Chamber Players members Joseph Silverstein violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with the composer at the piano.

The 9:00 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Music Shed is conducted by Mr. Thomas with violin soloist Paul Zukovsky. This opening orchestral concert of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music opens with Ruggles' Evocations for orchestra, and Copland's Eight poems of Emily Dickinson with soprano Phyllis Curtin. Both works are performed for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Next is the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin and orchestra with soloist Paul Zukofsky. The concerto was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation as part of its 20th Anniversary celebration. The concert concludes with a performance of Stravinsky's Rite of Spring.

The season's sixth Saturday morning Open Rehearsal takes place at 10:30 a.m. Aug. 5.

Aldo Ceccato, recently appointed Principal Conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Saturday evening, Aug. 5 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist for this evening's concert is pianist John Browning. The concert opens with Mendelssohn's Symphony no. 1, followed by a performance of Prokofiev's Third piano concerto with soloist John Browning. The concert concludes with Dvorak's Symphony no. 9, the "New World."

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct on three occasions this coming weekend at Tanglewood. — Photo from Tanglewood

Sunday afternoon, Aug. 6 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, Mr. Thomas again conducts the Boston Symphony with soloist Ralph Gomberg, principal oboeist of the Boston Symphony. The concert is Haydn's Oboe concerto, and Mahler's Symphony no. 5.

HUDSON, N. Y.
REGISTER STAR
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
D. 10,500
AUG 1 1972

Thomas Conducts At Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS. -- Michael Tilson, Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts two concerts by the orchestra as part of the sixth weekend Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Aug. 4, 5 and 6.

The concerts Friday evening, Aug 4, are part of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music), and the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, which is celebrating its 20th anniversary.

The Weekend Prelude Friday evening at 7:00 p.m. in the Shed is devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, chairman emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. The Prelude opens with Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson with soprano Phyllis Curtin, and the composer at the piano.

Next is Piano variations with Michael Tilson Thomas, pianist. The Prelude closes with a performance of Vitebsk, study on a Jewish Theme, with Boston Symphony Chamber Players members Joseph Silverstein violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with the composer at the piano.

The 9:00 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra, con- in the Music Shed is conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas with violin soloist Paul Zukovsky.

The opening orchestral concert of the Festival includes the world premier of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin, and orchestra with soloist Paul Zykofky. It concludes with Stravinsky's Rite of Spring.

The season's sixth Saturday morning open rehearsal takes place at 10:30 a.m. Aug. 5. Tickets are $2.50 each, one sale at the Festival Ticket Office two hours before the beginning of the open rehearsal.

Aldo Ceccato, recently appointed principal conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Saturday Aug. 5 at 8:30 p.m.

Soloist is pianist John Browning.

Sunday, Aug. 6 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, Michael Tilson Thomas again conducts the Boston Symphony, with soloist Ralph Gomberg, principal oboeist of the Boston Symphony.

Arthur Fielder conducts the Boston Pops Tuesday 1 Aug. 1 at 8:30 p.m. the annual Boston Pops Pension Fund concert features the music of Lerner and Loewe with soloists Louis Russell soprano, Corinne Curry mezzo-soprano, Vahan Khanzadian tenor, Richard Fredricks baritone, with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500
JUL 27 1972
New England Newsclip

Thomas To Conduct BSO At Tanglewood

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct two concerts by the orchestra as part of the sixth weekend Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Aug. 4-6.

The concerts are part of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music) and the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, which this year is celebrating its 20th anniversary.

The weekend prelude on Aug. 4 at 7 p.m. in the Shed will be devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, chairman emeritus of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. The Prelude will open with "Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson" with soprano Phyllis Curtin, and the composer at the piano. Next is "Piano variations" with Michael Tilson Thomas, pianist. The Prelude closes with a performance of "Vitebsk, study on a Jewish Theme", with Boston Symphony Chamber Players members Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with the composer at the piano.

The 9 p.m. concert will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas with violin soloist Paul Zukovsky. It will open with Ruggles' "Evocations for orchestra", and Copland's "Eight poems of Emily Dickinson" with soprano Phyllis Curtin. Both works are performed for the first time by the BSO. Next is the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin and orchestra with soloist Paul Zukofsky. The concert concludes with a performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring".

The season's sixth Saturday morning Open Rehearsal takes place at 10:30 a.m. Aug. 5. Tickets are $2.50 each, one sale at the Festival Ticket Office two hours before the beginning of the rehearsal. Proceeds benefit the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund.

Aldo Ceccato, recently appointed principal conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the Boston Symphony Saturday evening, Aug. 5, at 8:30 p.m. Soloist is pianist John Browning. The concert opens with Mendelssohn's Symphony no. 1, followed by a performance of Prokofiev's Third piano concerto. The concert concludes with Dvorak's Symphony no. 9, the "New World".

Sunday afternoon, Aug. 6 at 2:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas again conducts with soloist Ralph Gomberg, principal oboeist of the Boston Symphony. The program is Haydn's Oboe concerto and Mahler's Symphony no. 5.

Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Pops at Tanglewood Tuesday evening, Aug. 1, at 8:30 p.m. The annual Boston Pops Pension Fund concert features the music of Lerner and Loewe.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
AUG 7 1972
New England Newsclip

Copland accompanies

Tanglewood offers American works

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — Interesting songs by American composers at Tanglewood Friday evening and Saturday afternoon: Friday's Weekend Prelude was all Copland performed with great distinction, the composer himself accompanying Phyllis Curtin in his Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson, joining Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin in "Vitbsk." The program also included the Piano Variations, played by Michael Tilson Thomas.

Saturday afternoon in the Chamber Music Hall, as part of the Fromm Foundation Festival of Contemporary Music, the Berkshire Music Center Vocal Department gave a program with works by Kim, Carter, Powell, Ives and Druckman.

What made Friday especially interesting was that the Boston Symphony concert later that evening provided an opportunity to hear the orchestral versions Copland made off and on between 1958 and 1970 of eight of his Dickinson settings. Three things happened in translation. two of them intrinsic, one perhaps just local.

Orchestrated, the songs go softer, a difference most palpable when what you have fresh in your ear is the tough line drawing of Copland's own superb piano playing. To me it also seemed that with everything realized rather than suggested, the accompaniment moved just a step in the direction of the obvious, a comment which may be nothing more than silly bias in favor of what I knew first.

The second thing I noticed is that in orchestrating the songs, Copland really brought out the Mahler in them. Mahler is in the vocal lines themselves, in the suggestive accompaniments, but most of all in texture the two make together. When you now add orchestral color — Copland's scoring with just nine winds, harp, and string, suggests the delicate Mahler of "Ich atmet" einen Linden Duft" — the subtle and fully repaid indebtedness becomes openly apparent.

The third point: from farther back in the Shed, although in an acoustically excellent spot, I found I could no longer distinguish words, nor even hear the voice itself clearly at all times (the soprano was again Phyllis Curtin, and Michael Tilson Thomas conducted). Voice and orchestra on stage rather than in the pit is a develish combination; it was my impression, though, that Copland's scoring was in itself impeccably transparent, and the trouble lay in a somewhat thick, imprecise performance.

The principal work Saturday was Jacob Druckman's "Dark Upon the Harp." Druckman, in his early 40s, won the Pultizer Prize this year for an orchestral piece, "Windows" (to be performed here Thursday), and "Dark upon the Harp," written in 1962, is a solo cantata, a series of six psalm settings brass quintet and percussion.

It is energetic, concentrated, dramatic music, open, accessible and effective, almost like an updated chamber version of Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast," whose evocative accompaniments and interludes contain more vital invention than the efficient vocal line. A strong piece, and it had a stunning performance by D'Anna Fortunato with the composer conducting an impressive group of Berkshire Music Center students.

That program began with Earl Kim's "Letters Found Near a Suicide" and two Robert Frost settings by Elliott Carter, both early and rather thin, impersonal statements by composers who were soon to develop into figures of powerful originality and strength of musical character. I have actually been more touched by Kim's "Letters" in the past, and my reaction this time may be the response to an unconvinced and unconvincing performance.

Then came Mel Powell's clever and engaging Haiku Settings (1961), but it was only with the subsequent group of six songs by Charles Ives that we got what by then we were all hungry for: firm, even aggressive assertion of an unmistakably personal individuality. There were the usual Ives hazards some corn, some confusion, some sense that he couldn't quite finish working the piece out, but it was strong and fresh music like nothing else all afternoon. Special praise and thanks to soprano Karen Komar (Powell), tenor Alexander Stevenson (Ives), and to Dennis Helmrich, who accompanied both.

HERALD
MANCHESTER, CONN.
D. 16,095
AUG 15 1972
New England Newsclip

THE YOUNG CONDUCTOR: Michael Tilson Thomas At Tanglewood.

Photographed By Sylvian Ofiara

SANTA BARBARA, CALIF.
NEWS-PRESS
D. 38,000 S. 41,000
AUG 20 1972

LETTER FROM NEW ENGLAND

Some memorable Tanglewood Hours

By Leighton Rollins

AT TANGLEWOOD we went to the Weekend Prelude which commences at 7 p.m., lasts an hour, and then there is an interval until nine, when the major concert commences.

The Prelude was dedicated to the music of Aaron Copland, first his setting for 12 poems of Emily Dickinson. Copland was at the piano, Phyllis Curtin, soprano, was the singer.

Miss Curtin looks like a young Queen Mother, beautiful to behold, dressed in a white gown. It was obvious that the composer entrusted his songs to Miss Curtin because he believed in her interpretation of his music. As she sang; "There Came a Wind Like a Bugle;" "Dear March, Come In;" "Going to Heaven!" and "The Chariot," it was evident that she has an extraordinary understanding of the Dickinson poems and the Copland settings for them. It takes a most perceptive singer to understand the spirit and enchantment of Dickinson. Phyllis Curtin achieved the dual role of courting the poet on her own terms and meeting, at the same time, the demands of the composer.

THE BERKSHIRE weather is unpredictable. The temperature had fallen to 59 when the major concert began.

Michael Tilson Thomas proceeded to conduct a challenging program:

Carl Ruggles' "Evocations" for Orchestra, Aaron Copland's "Eight poems of Emily Dickinson," Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for Amplified Violin and Orchestra, and Igor Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring."

It was a memorable experience to hear within the space of an hour Copland's Emily Dickinson poems for a second time. The first time it was Copland at the piano. The second time it was the full orchestra. Phyllis Curtin took on an added grandeur with no less perception, but one must admit that often the orchestra in full tone made it impossible to hear "The Queen Mother."

The Concerto for Amplified Violins was too loud and too long.

It was difficult to follow an amplified violin with Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." Anything amplified, a nasty word, tends to dull the mind and dismiss the heart. Thomas jumped up and down on the podium, clutched the air with articulate fingers, drove the orchestra into a frenzy of Vachel Lindsay tom-toms. In spite of this seeming orgiastic splendor, the "Rite of Spring" took on, for me, a way-out Victorian entanglement.

I first heard and saw the "Rite of Spring" at the Metropolitan Opera with Martha Graham. As I remember, all the Red Cross nurses within shouting distance were summoned to remove the many who had fainted. No one fainted at Tanglewood, but the audience roared its approval in many bravos, shouted and screamed and uttered words not understood by me.

I HAVE BEEN to a concert conducted by Aldo Ceccato, a name unknown to me. He recently has been named Conductor of the Detroit Symphony. Ceccato appears with the Philadelphia Orchestra at the Robin Hood Dell, and at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, and conducts at the Hollywood Bowl and at concerts of the Chicago Symphony. He made his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last December. His Berkshire program did not particularly appeal to me: Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 1 in C Major, Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 3 in C with John Browning as soloist, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 9 in E Minor (New World).

I primarily went to the concert to hear John Browning. The Mendelssohn put a good many of the audience to sleep.

With the arrival of John Browning the orchestra shook itself and prepared to be cooperative. I remember with glowing pleasure when Browning played a Chopin concerto for the Pacific Coast Music Festival. But Browning brought no glow or spirit to the Prokofiev. It was a pedestrian rendition of a not unexacting concerto.

Ceccato came into his glory with the New World of Dvorak. This was the number I had dreaded. It was gratifying, as it was amazing, to hear Dvorak's Symphony as if it had never been played before. It was indeed like the first day of a new world. Ceccato beat the Boston Symphony Orchestra into a great performance.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528
AUG 5 1972
New England Newsclip

Concert Series Hits Flat Note

By RICHARD CONWAY

The 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, sponsored in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation, opened its week-long series of concerts last night. Put quite simply, if yours is an ear attuned to the extreme dissonances, pervasive percussiveness, rhythmic complexities, jagged melodic lines, massive densities, polyphonic intricacies, and sheer volumes of sound that characterize so much of 20th century composition, you would have found last night's concert amply rewarding.

The Weekend Prelude was devoted to the music of Aaron Copland. Copland himself participated in two of the performances.

First came his settings of "Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson. Phyllis Curtin was the soprano soloist, with the composer accompanying at the piano. Miss Curtin sang most expressively, showing great sensitivity to musical and poetic meaning. Unfortunately, one had to follow the printed sheet of words in order to understand them. So many singers — and especially is it true of sopranos — fail to make their words clear. Many an otherwise truly fine performance is diminished because of this.

In yet another instance of interesting and informative programming there have been several of these this season — eight of the songs to Dickinson poems were sung again by Miss Curtin during the regular evening concert, this time to orchestral accompaniment. There are so many more color possibilities in the orchestra, of course. But are the songs more satisfying this way? I think it takes a good deal more artistry to make them work with just voice and piano. But each brings its own insights into the poems, creates its own atmospheres. Each is satisfying in its own way.

Copland's 1930 "Piano Variations" was given an excellent interpretation by Michael Tilson Thomas. Thomas has the power and dynamic range for a primarily percussive work like this. Yet, he allows the tone row its lyrical moments

Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, joined Copland for an incisive performance of "Vietbsk, Study on a Jewish Theme."

Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas opened the concert with Carl Ruggles' "Evocations". Being given its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, "Evocations" was originally written for solo piano. The orchestration used last night was by Avram David.

Ruggles, who died last year at the age of 95, was what many people consider to be a typical New Englander. He was strongly individualistic, choosing his own means of expression. The fourth movement of the work is dedicated to yet another New England iconoclast, Charles Ives.

The "Evocations," while containing many of the devices mentioned in the opening paragraph, are not at all difficult to listen to. Time has mellowed some of the shocks that might once have disturbed audiences. I found the fourth movement to be particularly satisfying.

And Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," which closed the concert, and which created one of the greatest furors in music history at its first performance, came as an old friend. Thomas gave it an exciting reading.

But one must hear and decide about a work which had its world premiere last night — Charles Wuorinen's "Concerto for amplified violin and orchestra." The 34 year old composer's work is in three movements, supposed to be continuous. (There was a pause last night.) The piece runs about fifteen minutes. It is polyphonic and is described by the composer as "a progress from slow to fast, and the disjunctive to the continuous. . . ."

Guest artist Paul Zukofsky gave it a strong performance. As far as I could tell fro m one hearing, the work seems to be well-constructed and solid in musical terms. If one can take the inevitable piling up of dissonances, the complex rhythms, the volumes of sound, I suppose it is intellectually satisfying. The reader will undoubtedly infer that I did not like it. The reader is right.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
AUG 7 1972
New England Newsclip

BSO—amplified Wuorinen

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

There was sharp, clear, northern-lights weather in the Berkshires on the weekend, but if nature was cold-shouldering the opening of Tanglewood's Festival of Contemporary Music, there was at least one event that served to warm the atmosphere.

This was the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for Amplified Violin and Orchestra — Paul Zukofsky the violinist, Michael Tilson Thomas the conductor, and the Boston Symphony, of course, the performing body. The work was a commission by Fromm Music Foundation, marking its 20th anniversary with these concerts, and for the 10th summer cosponsor with the Berkshire Music Center of this "festival within a festival."

Hitheto Mr. Wuorinen has not been known for large-scale works — he is not a contemporary composer who writes for the bureau drawer — so that the Fromm-ordered piece, which employs what he describes as "a continuous polyphonic fabric," has given him an opportunity to magnify, and in so doing, more definitely articulate the compositional pattern with which he is identified.

To do this in concerto form, he and Mr. Zukofsky have chosen an amplification device — the Barcus-Berry bridge — which the soloist defined as a "regular violin bridge with a transducer built into it." This is connected to a preamplifier which in turn carries it by electronic means to loudspeakers.

Thus Mr. Wuorinen's concerto is not, as has been thought, a work for "electric violin," but for a normal instrument amplified to a degree of equality in its single musical voice with the three-voiced orchestral texture which has been written to compliment it. On Friday evening, the electronic device achieved remarkable fidelity, with none of the slurps and sputters that so often mar serious consideration of music with electronic helpmates.

The concerto, in three movements played without break, gives the impression, the first time experienced, of a massive architectural structure jointed and beamed with the most solid of musical materials. Its sonorities are uncompromising and its effects — amplification of percussion passages, for instance — designed to occupy a vital place in an overall plan.

The amplified violin sound, really startling at first in its magnitude and grandeur, is quickly established as an equal partner with the orchestra. Thanks perhaps to the smooth handling of technical details on this occasion, there was a welcome absence of electronic gimmickry, and instead an introduction to what must be the largest volume of individual string tone ever heard in the Tanglewood Shed. Mr. Zukofsky played the almost continuous solo part superbly, Mr. Thomas bound the whole together with energy and expertise, and one was left with the breathless sensation of having had a glowing ball of fire land at one's feet. Not a bad idea, with the temperature in the low 50's at least.

There was applause, quite warm, and some boos, as might have been expected for anything unfamiliar. But for its power to involve, the Wuorinen concerto (particularly with Mr. Zukofsky, Mr. Thomas, and the BSO) seems to represent a major breakthrough for the mood and materials of today's music.

To begin the program was Carl Ruggles's "Evocations for Orchestra" and to end it, Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," both performed in memory of their composers.

Preceding the world premiere were Aaron Copland's orchestrations of eight of his 12 "Poems of Emily Dickinson," which Mr. Thomas had also conducted when they were first done in this context in New York in 1970. On Friday evening, in the weekly prelude concert to the BSO concert, Phyllis Curtin sang all 12 with the composer playing the piano accompaniment as originally written, and even in the vast spaces of the open-air shed, they touched the ear and the heart with equal poignance.

Later, with Miss Curtin, of course, again the singer of eight of the songs with instrumental backing, the effect was lost. As mesmeric as the Copland orchestral texture can be, and as deceivingly simple-sounding, the lovely Dickinson words that prompted them were virtually smothered. After all, in one of the verses not orchestrated, the poetess herself admits to singing, "a little minor, timid as a bird." Overelaboration hardly becomes her.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549
AUG 6 1972

Electric-Violin Concerto Shocks Some

By DONAL HENAHAN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 5 — The very idea of writing a violin concerto in which the solo instrument is electronically amplified is a natural blood-pressure raiser. Outrageous on the face of it to many listeners and musicians, it seems a vulgar denial of at least the last 300 years of Western music.

So, not surprisingly, there was considerable booing mingled with the applause here at the Berkshire Festival last night when Charles Wuorinen's Violin Concerto received its first performance at the opening concert of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music.

The program, with Michael Tilson Thomas conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, commemorated the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, which commissioned the concerto and which sponsors this annual modern-music bazaar in connection with the Berkshire Music Center.

Mr. Wuorinen's concerto, completed this year, turned out to be a peculiar mixture of the shocking and the conventional. A sizable work lasting about 25 minutes in three uninterrupted movements, it is rigorously, even rigidly, concerned with serial pitch progressions and other formal problems. Except for its amplification, the work might comfortably fall in the best neo-Schoenberg tradition despite an overlay of taped sounds and Varèse sonorities.

But Mr. Wuorinen breaks with classical tradition sharply in his decision to use the amplified solo instrument. This was probably the first such use of the solo violin in connection with a major symphony orchestra, but that would be merely one more first in an art long since gone mad with novelty; the concerto also thumbs its nose at convention by putting the composer himself in direct control of the solo instrument.

Composer at the Wheel

Paul Zukofsky, who fiddled dazzlingly in the solo role, performed on a traditional violin that had been fitted with a bridge into which a transducer or pickup had been built. The sounds he produced, however, were subject to modification by the bearded Mr. Wuorinen himself, stationed like some mad scientist at the center of the Tanglewood Music Shed at an electronic command post.

In a way, it might be argued, Mr. Wuorinen goes back to the time when composers such as Paganini and Mozart were their own soloists and interpreters. At most, the Wuorinen method (previously experimented with by Karlheinz Stockhausen and others) merely adds one more conductor to the performance, and that is not an idea to shock anyone who is aware of Charles Ives.

Mr. Wuorinen's concerto is merely the biggest gun so far in the amplified-instrument skirmish. George Crumb has a work for amplified string quartet. Out on the West Coast, Daniell Revenaugh has formed an entire Electric Symphony Orchestra. And, of course, rock and jazz musicians have been amplifying for years.

The question is not whether amplification is workable; we need to ask now in what contexts it is legitimate. Mr. Wuorinen's concerto asks the right questions, even if he may not have found all the right answers.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525
AUG 9 1972
New England Newsclip

In Concert

Victory at Sea

By David Noble
Patriot Ledger Correspondent

Tanglewood's 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music made a striking beginning Friday night when violinist Paul Zukofsky played the premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Violin Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The new work, composed by the former New England Conservatory teacher who won the Pulitzer Prize for music two years ago, created controversy both in rehearsal and at the concert, but proved to be quite a bit more interesting than all the things said about it.

Written in the deeply woven serial manner that has become the mainstream of American composing in recent years, the concerto begins with striking thematic materials and shattering sonorities, moves through a gripping stream of variants and recombinations, and accumulates speed to end in a whirlwind of far-reaching harmonic and orchestral allusion.

While not often openly pretty — the harmonic density lay a little to the left of middle-period Schoenberg — Wuorinen's work does use many shapes and surface devices closely derived from the traditional violin concerto. (As the work progressed I sometimes heard distant reminders of Bartok's Violin Concerto, as well as 19th century ones).

In order to let the solo violin dominate the orchestra in some places, the instrument was amplified, and its sound came from two large speakers placed at the rear corners of the orchestra. A newly designed bridge pickup was used to feed the sound of Zukofsky's instrument into the speaker system, and resonance and echoes were very effectively added to its tone at specified points.

Some of the textures Wuorinen wrote for the orchestra had complex internal structures reminiscent of his Pulitzer Prize-winning electronic composition "Time's Encomium," a passage which the solo instrument slid through such sounds in long, slow glissandos was very reminiscent of that work. By contrast, the magnificent climax of the concerto had much of the sound of an old-fashioned whirlwind orchestral peroration, though the harmonic materials involved were not quite the usual. The layer of unearthly chime sounds woven into that passage recalled some Ives works in which the same device is used.

Violinist Zukofsky, a new music specialist, tossed the piece off as if he were playing Mendelssohn — he was comfortable with it. The BSO seemed less accustomed to the idiom, but put the performance together without apparent strain, though without much dynamic profile. Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas had his hands full getting the players through the work, and thus didn't achieve a definable interpretation, but, if one can judge from the rumors that filtered out of the rehearsals, did a good job on the whole.

A lady sitting near me tried to find Wuorinen in the audience when Thomas called for his bow; she wanted to tell him that while she didn't think his concerto was "music," she found it interesting and enjoyed listening to it.

Thomas had more opportunity for interpretation when he conducted two other 20th century works in the same program: Copland's Dickinson Poems and an orchestration of Carl Ruggles' "Evocations" were "modern" rather than "contemporary" in style and weren't nearly so difficult. Thomas took advantage of this opportunity to pile on pleasant sonorities and liquid phrasing — both quite inappropriate to the music involved. The Ruggles arrangement, done nicely in the late composer's style by Avram David, was changed from an orchestral extension of a craggy piano piece to a bad symphony that sounded as if it had been written by someone at Juilliard in 1948. The Copland work, also an orchestral version of a work first conceived for piano, was given the same treatment and enough elbow grease to cover soprano Phyllis Curtin.

After intermission, the BSO gave more evidence of its stature in a performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." It was getting bitter cold at the shed, and everyone was still vibrating from the Wuorinen, but the somewhat casual run-through of the Stravinsky somehow revealed the depth of the grasp Thomas and the orchestra have gained of Stravinsky's great score. The brief, interior melodies of the preludes to the ballet's two section were played more clearly and musically than I had heard before, and a number of other points were clarified equally well.

Before the concert, Copland appeared in the shed's "Prelude" concert to accompany Miss Curtin in the original version of the Dickinson Poems, written around 1950, 20 years before he completed his orchestral cycle of eight of them. In this earlier performance, Miss Curtin and the composer achieved a dazzling, lyrical statement of Copland's granitic but expressive cycle (in the orchestra version the music is more finely textured). Copland also joined BSO concertmaster Joseph Silverstein and principal cellist Jules Eskin in a vigorous performance of "Vitebsk," a quarter-tonish treatment of Jewish folk melody the composer wrote in 1929.

Thomas appeared as pianist in the chamber concert to play Copland's Piano Variations, the most rugged work the composer ever wrote, in a curiously smooth, measured way. If Friday was an indication, Thomas is turning into a Bernstein-type popularizer of modern music — I hope I'm wrong.

The contemporary festival continues through tomorrow with chamber, opera, and student orchestra performances — a very good student orchestra, by all reports. Tonight, a chamber concert will feature music by Kim, Imbrie, Erb and Mather; tomorrow the student orchestra will play music by Webern, Shinohara, Lerdahl and Druckman under Maderna's direction.

Composer Charles Wuorinen Reflects On The Nature Of His Craft

BY MARTHA deB. BEAVER

The opening orchestral concert of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, sponsored in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, induced disparate comments from audience and composer concerning the permiere performance of the Concerto for Amplified Violin and Orchestra by Pulitzer prize winner Charles Wuorinen.

"It should be very interesting" commented a middle-aged couple before the [illegible], and during the hearing a staid older twosome ventured "that sounds awful ... it must be the Stravinsky," hurriedly consulting their programs only to find that it was in fact Wuorinen's work.

The concert included first performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of two other contemporary composers' pieces, Ruggles "Evocations for Orchestra" of rather thin content, and Copland's orchestrated "Eighth Poems of Emily Dickinson," heard to better advantage with piano accompaniment (played by Copland) at the preceding Prelude at 7, plus Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," all directed by Michael Tilson Thomas.

As a young woman remarked with joyful ebullience when she met Wuorinen later "Oh, but yours was the best piece! I could see all sorts of things in it, all kinds of planes and colors. It was great!"

Most of the audience agreed, but the composer did not appear onstage to acknowledge their enthusiasm, for reasons he later expressed in a local interview.

Comments, Reactions

These comments and reactions emphasize the point that too often audiences are tempted to reject a contemporary work because it doesn't appeal to their particular tastes.

But, just as classic and romantic music from the 17th century on offers a variety of musical styles and temperaments, so modern music (20th century) contributes its own differences for the listener's choice.

Some composers combine these; or like Barber emphasizing the emotional, Copland the traditional, Sessions, Ussachevsky and Wuorinen cerebral-scientific expositions with electronic or instrumental exploitation, to name but a few.

That term "cerebral" was rejected by Wuorinen, during our talk, in relation to his composition, which he stated is "so complex that it would be impossible to operate in a purely intuitive way."

"You can speak perfectly well" he continued "of the rational approach and attempt to achieve a balanced existence through those means ... so long as you don't make it seem as if the rational influence exerts itself at the expense of the non-rational (intuitive) ... it's not true, even in the process of composition.

In Fashion

"It's been a journalistic fashion to speak of certain kinds of contemporary music as cerebral, as if uninvolved with other things" he stated. "I reject the term but I also understand what is meant by applying it to certain composers."

But what is a good term? "There just isn't any, and you have to understand the compositional processes more fully first to even apply the term," he chided.

"When you hear a work of some disciple say of, Schoenberg or Milton Babbitt, which seems lacking in whatever other music does not seem to lack, the tendency is to say that one is cerebral, the other something else ... but what is actually the case in my view is far different ... it is simply that the music that seems cerebral is just not finished ... the process of composition has been abandoned before the final ornate and largely intuitivley composed surface has been added.

Lack Cohesiveness

"The underlying relations cannot be intuitively conceived or the whole work will lack cohesiveness." Here Wuorinen pointed out "I'm saying this not as a universal truth but rather as a fact in contemporary music. The reverse is true in certain older, traditional 18th century music.

"Very Important and a kind of basic point to draw since there is that tendency to simplify, isn't that the issue or the two kinds don't exist, but to mean something it has to be correctly framed. Terms must be put in their proper context."

This is extremely difficult, of course, Wuorinen agreed. "Because most composers take an anti-ideological position toward this and most refuse to acknowledge the existence of the issue to begin with," he enlarged. "I have no stake in either acknowledging or not acknowledging it, therefore I see no reason to disguise what I regard as the truth.

The concerto itself is a departure from the usual intricacy of Wuorinen's former works, which seem to be aimed at displaying the complexity of his mind. Time's Encomium, for instance, heard at Amherst's Buckley Hall a few years ago, which produced an almost infinite pull and thrust among the percussive voices so tense one was exhausted from the mental and kinesthetic reaction.

Instead of the traditional relationship of soloist and orchestra, the concerto's solo instrument becomes an entity in itself, amplified to match the timbre and sound range of, and equal to, each of the orchestral choirs, with neigher obligated to be sonically subordinate to the other.

The continuously polyphonic work begins with one tremendous vertical sheet of full orchestral sound out of which the amplified violin is heard in swift and authorative exposition.

It was immediately obvious that absolute technical perfection is required, even demanded, and Paul Zukovsky was eminently qualified for his unique position.

Third Movement

The third movement seemed the most complex, but the whole powerfully dramatic work allows frequent moments of free sound, for example the amplified violin with a magnificent burst of octaves and double-stops, the orchestral strings divisi, brilliant brass and percussion (including piano), without superimposing other layers of activity.

The performance, a reading admitted one BSO musician, was a disappointment to the composer, a moral and musical perfectionist. It followed a series of three rehearsals during which comparable artists observed "the entire string section scrambling all over their instruments as if confronted with something entirely new, and not a score they should have at least read, if not practiced, beforehand!" Not so, the winds and percussion.

We were present at one of these rehearsals and heard hissing and laughter onstage, an incredible reaction from such supposedly seasoned and respected, if not respectful, musicians. The only explanation seemed to be that the Concerto presented a challenge which they could not admittedly meet with any other reaction, of the young conductor had little control over them.

It must be said that conductor Michael Tilson Thomas seemed not to know how to use his rehearsal time to the best effect. "Simple basic things, like that one burst of sound at the beginning, during which the lower bass winds always came in late, should have been immediately corrected" according to Wuorinen (himself a conductor of note), perhaps ignored on the premise that to say one word at this moment would waste time. "But of course," the composer pointed out, "if you don't dorrect that first mistake you'll never correct any other."

"And that's the trouble with a lot of conductors who think they are being efficient. They do no real rehearsing, just slither through without saying anything. That's completely false economy because it means you're never communicating anything about the piece, whereas if you take the first dozen measures and rehearse them thoroughly, at least you penetrate below the surface, and get an idea of how a small chunk of the work is more or less supposed to sound, and everything else is thus infinitely better."

No Criticism

Here Wuorinen noted that he does not criticize performances because he realizes they cannot be perfect. But what does concern him is "the deplorable attitude "unionized arrogance" is his term) without reason" that was afforded his work. "I had no contact with the players (or conductor); there was no confrontation, outside of the fact that my music was placed in front of them."

Wuorinen does not allow any of his deeply felt reactions to surface in an emotional display. Words, backed by unshakeable integrity, are his only release.

Miserable

"The whole reason why such a miserable atmosphere exists is that people are resigned to it, and say oh that's the way it is, as if these were natural conditions like the existence of gravity over which no influence could be wielded whatever!"

He was not alone in his impressions. Paul Fromm, co-sponsor of the Contemporary Music Festival, had also observed the disrespectful, unwarranted attitude and treatment accorded the composer's work.

Speaking with an older established composer after the concert, Wuorinen, considered foremost among his peers, was appalled to hear him say that he had become completely hardened to the musicians' attitude.

All of this was a far cry from the young (34) composer's feelings when commissioned to do the work. "I had been looking forward to having it played by the BSO. They are full of integrity, I thought and will receive it with the proper respect!"

is the concerto a 12-tone piece? "In spite of what we heard one could identify the work as 12-tone in a very extended way," the composer replied.

False Notion

"There is a popular and false notion that the 12-tone system is a rather rigid and highly detailed set of procedures people follow automatically, and then they get music at the other end. And somehow there are always composers who do just that," he admitted.

"Actually the 12-tone system is as ramified as the tonal (diatonic) system..a network of very complex relations within which you move when you operate it. Thus it becomes an organic and living part of the historical musical continuity, and as such is subject to change and development' Wuorinen explained.

"Speaking of my work in this highly generalized sense means that it has gone beyond the original principles first laid down by Schoenberg, then subsequently developed and detailed by Babbitt (as formulators not composers)"

Big Influence

"It is also highly influenced by the late 12-tone works of Stravinsky, procedurally and sonically too in some respects," Wuorinen continued. "But it has gone beyond all of those in the sense of staking out new territory..applying these general relationships in new ways..attempting to extend these methods into a reunification with certain aspects of the past. So there is presumably both a forward looking attitude here and a backward looking one as well because I believe it to be an historical function of composition at this moment.

CONDUCTOR Michael Tilson Thomas (left) and composer Charles Wuorinen get together after the Tanglewood performance of Wuorinen's Concerto for "Amplified violin and orchestra."

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398
AUG 5 1972
New England Newsclip

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
AUG 8 1972
New England Newsclip

Modern Composers Served Valiantly

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Composers of the 20th Century were served valiantly last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor, at Tanglewood.

It was the opening night of this year's Festival of Contemporary Music coinciding with this season's 16th Berkshire Festival Concert.

The composers were Ruggles, Copland, Wjorinen and Stravinsky, and most of the music was not new. Ruggles' "Evocations" for orchestra was written between 1936 and 1943, Copland's eight poems of Emily Dickinson in 1949 and 1950 and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" in 1912.

The new piece on the program was Wjorinen's "Concerto for Amplified Violin and Orchestra in Three Continuous Movements." It was commissioned for this performance and received its world premiere. Paul Zukofsky was soloist.

Off hand, I would say the best thing about the piece was the efficiency and accuracy of Zukofsky's special Barcus-Berry bridge, which is a regular violin bridge with a built-in transducer wired directly to a preamplifier feeding into a series of amplificrs.

The giant speakers at the back of the stage projected Zukofsky's fiddle with wondrous fidelity.

Wjorinen's music, however, appeared to be little different from that which he was producing 10 or more years ago, i.e., unbelievably complex constructions evolving out of 12-tone rows.

The concerto last night opened with a horrendous passage of discord and ended with several minutes of the same kind of sound. Between them was about 30 minutes of dissonance of varying density, all apparently very carefully organized to sound frequently screechy and occasionally painful.

Here is a quote from the program notes contributed by the composer:

"The whole work is basically a progress from the slow to the fast, and the disjunctive to the continuous—all achieved, of course, in an indirect, non-linear fashion."

The Copland songs, in comparison, seemed almost bland. They were repeats with orchestra of eight of the 12 sung with piano during the prelude program. They are songs that take an open mind and repeated hearings to find liktble, perhaps because the accompaniment is more interesting than the vocal line.

The Ruggles piece, which opened the program, also seemed mild in retrospect, although while it was happening it sounded like a lumbering giant who paused only occasionally to gaze serenly about him.

Stravinsky's great "Rite of Spring" came after intermission and sounded almost comfortably old-fashioned. It is, of course, one of the famous demonstrations of orchestral brilliance, and Boston's orchestra has played it many, many times under a wide variety of conductors.

It is a tremendous experience.

The 7 o'clock prelude concert offered an all-Copland program with the composer at the piano for two of the offerings, the settings were of 12 poems by Emily Dickinson and a study on a Jewish theme for violin, cello and piano.

The middle piece, "Piano Variations," was played with a percussive intensity by Michael Tilson Thomas.

It must be said that I am not one of Copland's strongest fans; I find his music almost totally lacking in warmth, even the popular works written for film and ballet.

The trio which ended the 60 - minute program was graced by the mellow tones of Joseph Silverstein's violin and Jiles Eskin's cello, but the music was as austere and forbidding as the solo piano that preceded it.

That (the "Piano Variations") was a stern skeleton of hard notes, a cold, unforgiving 11 minutes. There is, near the end, a few passages of glitter and flurry, which Thomas played with great skill, but otherwise, the piece is as chilly as they come.

The 12 settings of Emily Dickinson poems were heard here a couple of years ago sung by Miss Curtin, and Connecticut Valley voice fans heard them sung in 1962 at Mount Holyoke College by Adele Addison, also with Copland at the piano.

Tonight Aldo Ceccato, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, will lead the orchestra through Mendelssohn's First Symphony, Dvorak's Ninth (New World) and Prokofiev's Third Piano Concerto with John Browning as soloist.

Tomorrow Thomas will again conduct, his program being Mahler's Fifth Symphony and Haydn's Oboe Concerto in C with Ralph Gomberg as soloist.

Tanglewood: some dissonance

MICHAEL STEINBERG

LENOX—Taking over the directorship of the Berkshire Music Center two summer's ago, Gunther Schuller promised that there would be more of a continuum between the Center's activities and those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Actually, the Center has always helped itself liberally to the teaching talent of BSO players and conductors. Schuller hoped, however, to establish two-way traffic across the Tanglewood lawns.

Most of the distinguished composers who have served on the Center's faculty have never had a work played at a Boston Symphony Berkshire Festival concert, and that, if I read him right, is the sort of thing Schuller wanted to see changed.

This summer, the change came, and a mess along with it. The Fesitval of Contemporary Music, sponsored annually by the Fromm Music Foundation, has in the past been strictly a BMC affair. This year, partly in fulfillment of Schuller's promise, partly because something special seemed in order for the Fromm Foundation's 20th anniversary, the opening of the "festival within a festival" took place at one of the regular BSO concerts, the one conducted Friday night by Michael Tilson Thomas.

The big event of that concert was the world premier of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for Amplified Violin and Orchestra, commissioned for the occasion by the Fromm Foundation, and, to say it plainly, Wuroinen would have had a better performance if the premier had been left to the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony is, of course, a more accomplished orchestra than this year's uncommonly brilliant student group at the BMC. The point is that enough people in the BSO —not all, let me emphasize — did not want to play the piece and, by dragging their feet, held the performance down to a level where it could convey only the most generalized, blurred impression of what Wuorinen had written.

The intrinsic difficulties of the 20-minute concerto are real, and they are aggravated by Wuorinen's idiosyncratic notations (an example: no octaves signs, hence incredible ladders of leger lines). Rehearsal time at Tanglewood is always tight, and it was unrealistic planning to put this premiere into a week in which the orchestra also had to re-polish Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" and the Mahler 5th, as well as prepare pieces by Ruggles and Copland that were altogether new to it. Wurionen's Concerto had no complete beginning-to-end run-through before the performance.

There is more to the story, though. The Boston Symphony has played almost no music of the rhythmic, harmonic and textural character and difficulty of Wuorinen, is therefore not used to it, and for the most part dislikes it. No, hates it. I suspect that the orchestra also dislikes Wuorinen himself, who has been so tactless, not to say reckless, as to speak his mind very openly on the subject of the American orchestral establishment, and what's wrong with it (the BSO is not the only major orchestra to have given him a hard time).

The players respect for and willingness to cooperate with Michael Tilson Thomas also seemed to be at a low level.

It was a bad combination. Some of its components were merely unfortunate, but those parts of it that can be described only as unprofessional behavior were shameful. The once-over-more-or-less at the concert produced a mixture of enthusiasm — unambiguous, that part of it that was directed at the superb soloist, Paul Zeukofsky — with some sitting on hands and a bit of vocal disapproval. Wuorinen refused a bow, presumably not considering what had been played as sufficiently his, presumably also not curious to see if the orchestra would boo him again in front of 5000 people as they had in front of 100 at the dress rehearsal.

I'm not going to write a review of the work until I have heard it in an adequate performance. Here, however, are a few descriptive remarks: it is a punchy piece that gets aggressively quicker and denser, full of interesting, Carterian rhythmic tensions between things that happen on beats and things that happen just on one side or the other of them, and full of rich, eruptive, inner detail (the element that was most obscured Friday).

The solo violin amplification involves a few special effects such as shuddery electronic reverberations around a pizzicato, but mostly it is simply functional, meant to let the solo carry one voice in the polyphonic web of Wuorinen's buoyantly violent discourse. The amplification is done with a violin bridge that has a transfuser built into it leading directly to a preamplifier, and it works well, reproducing violin tones at great volume, but with no extraneous noise and minimal distortion.

Finally a not-so-reckless prediction: when we hear it properly, Wuorinen's new concerto will prove an exciting work.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,225

JUL 28 1972

New England Newsclip

John Browning will be performing with the Boston Symphony Sat., Aug. 5 at Tanglewood under the baton of Aldo Ceccato. He made debut with the orchestra 10 years ago and has performed with orchestra many times since.

John Browning

NEWS
WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS.
W. 1,289

AUG 10 1972

New England Newsclip

Mostly Music

BY WILLIAM P. MERRILL

Browning featured in Prokofiev Third

The BSO was led Saturday night by Aldo Ceccato, who began his conducting career not long ago in his native Milan, and was recently engaged as Principal Conductor of the Detroit Symphony. His style came over as sensitive as expressive, but not in the least colored by excessive emotion. He was generally rewarded with playing of the highest calibre. Before taking up conducting in his early twenties, Aldo Ceccato was a concert pianist. But from the particular attention he gave to the strings, and from a habit he has of making a vibrato motion with his left hand while at work, one would have thought he was a string player from way back, calling to mind Toscannini, who would at times play an imaginary cello.

The first work on the program was the Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 11, by Felix Mendelssohn. The work was composed in 1824 in Mendelssohn's fifteenth year. The symphony is based on classical models, and really its only surprise is the ending in C major. The work does contain considerable originality in its pleasing melodies, which point to Mendelssohn's later artistry. Ceccato led the piece at a spirited pace; at the outset one was worried that details might be left out in the haste. This, however was not the case, and the fugato of the finale was truly exciting.

The highlight of the evening was the appearance of pianist John Browning as soloist in Prokofiev's Third piano concerto. This electric piece is characterized by a percussiveness especially in the part of the solo instrument. Torrents of octaves poured forth from the piano like driving rain. Browning's attack was relentless; the orchestra excelled, giving all that Ceccato asked of it. It is difficult to find sentimentality in Prokofiev. Perhaps the Lieutenant Kije music reflects the composer at his juciest, but nothing like this is found in the second movement here, where the theme is constructed with wide, unsettling intervals: the pace slows, the intensity remains.

They record these concerts for rebroadcast over FM during the winter. I suggest you have your tape recorder ready when the Prokofiev comes up.

The final work was Dvorak's New World Symphony. One has the impression that as this symphony is so often played that the orchestra could do it in its sleep or by automatic pilot, and that a conductor is not necessary. Ceccato did his best to give the New World a fresh and vigorous rendition, but the BSO was not terribly responsive. Nonetheless, the conductor's efforts were not entirely unsuccessful, as attested by the lengthy ovation he received at the end.

TANGLEWOOD 1972

SEIJI OZAWA Artistic Director, Berkshire Festival
GUNTHER SCHULLER Artistic Director, Berkshire Music Center
LEONARD BERNSTEIN Adviser

Saturday August 5 1972 at 8.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

ALDO CECCATO conductor

MENDELSSOHN Symphony no. 1 in C minor op. 11

Allegro di molto
Andante
Menuetto: allegro molto
Allegro con fuoco

first performance at the Berkshire Festival

*PROKOFIEV Piano concerto no. 3 in C op. 26

Andante – allegro
Theme and variations
Finale: allegro ma non troppo

JOHN BROWNING

intermission

*DVOŘÁK Symphony no. 9 in E minor op. 95
'New world'

Adagio – allegro molto
Largo
Scherzo: molto vivace
Allegro con fuoco

John Browning plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for this evening's concert begin on page 29

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECORDS EXCLUSIVELY FOR DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON

BALDWIN PIANO
DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON AND *RCA RECORDS

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638

AUG 7 1972

At the Concert

Browning Dazzles Tanglewood Audience

By EDWARD FRENCH

That the maestro of the one of teh most compelling realizations we have hear

cally deft projection of this virtuoso piece.

THE HIGH POINT of the sixth Tanglewood weekend was John Browing's dazzling performance of the solo part in Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto in C.

This frankly virtuosic piece is not for the faint hearted or anyone without a Lisztian command of the keyboard.

This was the first time we have clearly heard the piano throughout this heavily scored opus. Part of the credit should be given the conductor, Aldo Ceccato for a marvelously controlled orchestral accompaniment.

Part of the excitement was engendered by Mr. Browning's choice of tempi. The speed in the fast movements was such that we were on the edge of our seats most of the time. However our anxiety was groundless as the pianist's ironclad control, ringing tone, commad of every facet of virtuosity and biting rhythm made this a performance in the Rachmaninoff piano grandeur.

The remainder of the program included a straightforward rendition of Mendelssohn's rather uninspired Symphony No. 1. Dvorak's "New World" Symphony closed the program.

Sunday afternoon Haydn's Concerto for Oboe and orchestra received a performance from soloist Ralph Gomberg and the orchestra that crystallized its eighteenth century charm and grace. It was delightful music making.

A sharp contrast to the formal symetry of the Haydn piece was the sprawling Mahler Symphony No. 5. This is the epitome of post Wagnerian romanticism with all of its virtues and faults. Mahler has had enough thematic material for half a dozen symphonies, so the form is somewhat untidy and it is far too long for sustained interest.

The melodies are expressive, at times cloyingly sweet, rhythms are complex and the orchestration is luxuriant. The orchestra's playing was first class as the maestro of the day, Michael Tilson Thomas proved to be a master of Mahler's grandiose rhetoric.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,225

JUL 28 1972 New England Newsclip

John Browning will be performing with the Boston Symphony Sat., Aug. 5 at Tanglewood under the baton of Aldo Ceccato. He made debut with the orchestra 10 years ago and has performed with orchestra many times since.

NEWS
WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS.
W. 1,289

AUG 10 1972 New England Newsclip

Mostly Music

BY WILLIAM P. MERRILL

Browning featured in Prokofiev Third

The BSO was led Saturday night by Aldo Ceccato, who began his conducting career not long ago in his native Milan, and was recently engaged as Principal Conductor of the Detroit Symphony. His style came over as sensitive as expressive, but not in the least colored by excessive emotion. He was generally rewarded with playing of the highest calibre. Before taking up conducting in his early twenties, Aldo Ceccato was a concert pianist. But from the particular attention he gave to the strings, and from a habit he has of making a vibrato motion with his left hand while at work, one would have thought he was a string player from way back, calling to mind Toscannini, who would at times play an imaginary cello.

The first work on the program was the Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 11, by Felix Mendelssohn. The work was composed in 1824 in Mendelssohn's fifteenth year. The symphony is based on classical models, and really its only surprise is the ending in C major. The work does contain considerable originality in its pleasing melodies, which point to Mendelssohn's later artistry. Ceccato led the piece at a spirited pace; at the outset one was worried that details might be left out in the haste. This, however was not the case, and the fugato of the finale was truly exciting.

The highlight of the evening was the appearance of pianist John Browning as soloist in Prokofiev's Third piano concerto. This electric piece is characterized by a percussiveness especially in the part of the solo instrument. Torrents of octaves poured forth from the piano like driving rain. Browning's attack was relentless; the orchestra excelled, giving all that Ceccato asked of it. It is difficult to find sentimentality in Prokofiev. Perhaps the Lieutenant Kije music reflects the composer at his juciest, but nothing like this is found in the second movement here, where the theme is constructed with wide, unsettling intervals: the pace slows, the intensity remains.

They record these concerts for rebroadcast over FM during the winter. I suggest you have your tape recorder ready when the Prokofiev comes up.

The final work was Dvorak's New World Symphony. One has the impression that as this symphony is so often played that the orchestra could do it in its sleep or by automatic pilot, and that a conductor is not necessary. Ceccato did his best to give the New World a fresh and vigorous rendition, but the BSO was not terribly responsive. Nonetheless, the conductor's efforts were not entirely unsuccessful, as attested by the lengthy ovation he received at the end.

John Browning

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638

AUG 7 1972

At the Concert

Browning Dazzles Tanglewood Audience

By EDWARD FRENCH

That the maestro of the [illegible] one of teh most compelling realizations we have hear[illegible] anyone without a Lisztian command of the keyboard.

This was the first time we have clearly heard the piano throughout this heavily scored opus. Part of the credit should be given the conductor, Aldo Ceccato for a marvelously controlled orchestral accompaniment.

Part of the excitement was engendered by Mr. Browning's choice of tempi. The speed in the fast movements was such that we were on the edge of our seats most of the time. However our anxiety was groundless as the pianist's ironclad control, ringing tone, commad of every facet of virtuosity and biting rhythm made this a performance in the Rachmanpiano grandeur.

The remainder of the program included a straightforward rendition of Mendelssohn's rather uninspired Symphony No. 1. Dvorak's "New World" Symphony closed the program.

Sunday afternoon Haydn's Concerto for Oboe and orchestra received a performance from soloist Ralph Gomberg and the orchestra that crystallized its eighteenth century charm and grace. It was delightful music making.

A sharp contrast to the formal symetry of the Haydn piece was the sprawling Mahler Symphony No. 5. This is the epitome of post Wagnerian romanticism with all of its virtues and faults. Mahler has had enough thematic material for half a dozen symphonies, so the form is somewhat untidy and it is far too long for sustained interest.

The melodies are expressive, at times cloyingly sweet, rhythms are complex and the orchestration is luxuriant. The orchestra's playing was first class as the maestro of the day, Michael Tilson Thomas proved to be a master of Mahler's grandiose rhetoric.

cally deft projection of this virtuoso piece.

THE HIGH POINT of the sixth Tanglewood weekend was John Browing's dazzling performance of the solo part in Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto in C.

This frankly virtuosic piece is not for the faint hearted or

TANGLEWOOD 1972

SEIJI OZAWA Artistic Director, Berkshire Festival
GUNTHER SCHULLER Artistic Director, Berkshire Music Center
LEONARD BERNSTEIN Adviser

Saturday August 5 1972 at 8.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

ALDO CECCATO conductor

MENDELSSOHN Symphony no. 1 in C minor op. 11

Allegro di molto
Andante
Menuetto: allegro molto
Allegro con fuoco

first performance at the Berkshire Festival

*PROKOFIEV Piano concerto no. 3 in C op. 26

Andante – allegro
Theme and variations
Finale: allegro ma non troppo

JOHN BROWNING

intermission

*DVOŘÁK Symphony no. 9 in E minor op. 95
'New world'

Adagio – allegro molto
Largo
Scherzo: molto vivace
Allegro con fuoco

John Browning plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for this evening's concert begin on page 29

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECORDS EXCLUSIVELY FOR DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON

BALDWIN PIANO
DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON AND *RCA RECORDS

Music review

Ceccato debuts at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

Whitestone

Aldo Ceccato

MICHAEL TILSON Thomas closed the sixth Tanglewood weekend yesterday afternoon with a serious reading of the Mahler Fifth Symphony, a more than hour-long work of great contrasts and resourcefulness in five movements. The fourth movement is the ineffable adagietto for the strings and harp only, which Leonard Bernstein played with a small complement of musicians from the New York Philharmonic at the funeral of Robert Kennedy in St. Patrick's Cathedral in 1968. It is sublimely touching.

The whole symphony reveals Mahler's exceptional sense of tonal textures. It is one thing to "hear" certain themes and certain harmonic progressions, but to which instruments they should be given requires a sixth sense which Mahler proved he had abundantly. The gorgeous sonorities which are allotted the violins several times on their lowest registers were partially obscured by Thomas' apparent unawareness that he was calling on the supporting voices for excessive volume, but his observance of Mahler's sudden pianos were dramatically effective. It didn't seem absolutely necessary that he give the French horn a beat in that instrument's solos in the scherzo, but when required he did give the sections reliable signals so that the whole work proceeded with contrast and continuity.

* * *

IT IS an irrevocable tradition in orchestral concerts that the conductor convey his thanks to the musicians for their participation and response by shaking hands with the concert-master, thereby implying that any approbation, meager or enthusiastic, is due to be shared equally by the players and conductor. Yesterday's conductor conspicuously neglected shaking hands with the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concertmaster. He did motion to the French horn, Charles Yancich, and to trumpet Armando Ghitalla to stand to be noticed for the distinction of their contributions.

The program began with the Haydn Oboe Concerto in C, in which Ralph Gomberg was the soloist. He played with refinement, but the concerto, not positively identified as authentic Haydn, is a predictable work of scanty interest, hardly worthy of even a time-filling purposes.

* * *

SATURDAY NIGHT a new, young conductor, Aldo Ceccato, made his Tanglewood debut and proved himself a stimulating leader in a program far removed from the emotional Mahler of yesterday and the coagulated half of Friday's program which apparently had been inspissated in midnight oil.

An early Mendelssohn Symphony, No. 1 in C Minor, Opus 11, is a rarity for sure. Superficial but gay, volatile but leaving a good humor, its banality pardonable only because of the composer's age, it still was a valuable and even necessary antidote for the weal of any members of the musical third party among us.

The Dvorak Symphony No. 9 in E Minor, Opus 95, is from the same pharmacopoeial shelf, but its effects are far more assured and lasting. Because it was one of the three now immutably accepted works of the repertory which the composer wrote while he was here in the 1890s, the E Minor has become known as the "New World." Authorities still argue about whether there is any suspicion fo American derivation in its themes, but no one argues about its universal appeal and naive beauty.

Dvorak, every biographer notes, was evidently the plain, sincere, unpretentious and lovable man that shows up in his music. Another of his "American" compositions was the piano quintet, which was played with the composer in the audience by the Dannreuther Quartet and a pianist who later became for nearly a half-century the lodestar of Pittsfield music, the late, venerated Ulysse Buhler.

* * *

CECCATO USED a reduced orchestra for the Mendelssohn but called upon the entire corps of musicians for the Dvorak, handling both with consummate authority and skill. Where the rhythm was obvious and foolproof, he desisted from giving redundant gestures and thereby showed by his obvious respect that he did not consider the men at his beck and baton musical babes in the wood. The musicians' response disclosed a reciprocal respect.

The soloist of the evening was John Browning in the Prokofieff Third Piano Concerto in C, Opus 26. The composer in this part of his career, in his third decade and while in America, used thematic material that was square cut and clearly defined. His idiom was hard, dry and percussive, his forms angular and symmetrical. Browning caught the spirit of the thrust perfectly and conveyed the impression of physical energy and sureness of purpose with galvanic panache. It is of interest to notice what "enlightened" music could still be written in that generation, using what in some quarters were considered shopworn utensils and effete materials.

* * *

THERE WAS special significance to the Friday evening concert as it was the opening event of the 1972 festival of contemporary music sponsored in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation.

A fortunate sequence in the usual Friday evening Preludes allowed the audience first to hear 12 poems of Emily Dickinson set to music by Aaron Copland and sung by soprano Phyllis Curtin, with the composer at the piano, and later in the symphonic program to hear Miss Curtin in eight of the same songs which Copland had expanded to orchestral dimensions.

First, let it be said that Miss Curtin, in addition to her vocal maturity, sings with extraordinary musical intelligence, a factor which would be more noticeable if a lesser singer were to attempt such a task.

Copland is an excellent pianist, but the voluted arabesques which serve as background for Miss Dickinson's "Nature, the gentlest mother," lie much more naturally in the reeds, where Copland placed them in the orchestral version, than in the keyboard, where he presided so ably.

* * *

AND IN "There came a wind like a bugle," a real bugle call in the orchestra was more realistic than an attempt on the piano, and the elements of nature Copland portrayed were more graphic in the larger ensemble than on the single instrument. One might go on — the gentleness of "the timid bird," the effective use of the harp in so many instances.

Miss Curtin was outstandingly moody in "Sleep is supposed to be." Copland there gave the voice the most rewarding fragment, and the artist grasped it with remarkable spirit.

* * *

THE LATER Friday program was conducted by Thomas. In addition to the Copland, he played Ruggles, Wuorinen and Stravinsky, a trio of distant relativity, yet of a common background in terms of antiromanticism or crudity of energy and compulsive rhythms.

The Wuorinen concerto for amplified violin and orchestra featured Paul Zukofsky, who did an heroic job battling the flood of sound which the composer released. It is assumed that Thomas was following the composer's directions and intentions faithfully, but the concerto, in three consecutive movements, makes incredible demands on an auditor's ears and only a slightly lesser degree of comprehension on his perceptive apparatus. The final straw was the ascending and descending glissandi for the solo instrument which in magnification became nauseating.

* * *

RUGGLES WRITES for densities of sound, using an impasto of mixed colors resulting in overweight and turgidity, and his harmonic materials seem to crowd each other into uncomfortably close quarters. He, with Wuorinen, seems to write as though there is a race in which more competitors are entered than the track provides room and thus all are crowded out. Yet there is a surge in Ruggles which unmistakably reaches through with passion and sincerity.

Wuorinen has contrived an electrical device which is attached to the violin soloist's bridge and gives the instrument the power of an Alpenhorn. The reason and justification remain questionable. It was not convincing that the message was any more impressive raised to such a degree than it might have been in the violin's normal strength.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
AUG 7 1972
New England Newsclip

Aldo Ceccato Conducts Boston Symphony at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — Judging by Saturday night's Boston Symphony concert at Tanglewood, conductor Aldo Ceccato will be well received if and when he conducts the Detroit Symphony Orchestra at the Worcester Festival.

The young Italian conductor was recently appointed to the Detroit beginning with the 1973-1974 season.

His Saturday night audience was 9.328, largest of the weekend for the Berkshire Muxic Festival's sixth week. Total weekend attendance was 27,020.

John Browning was soloist Saturday night in Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto.

Conductor Thomas

Yesterday afternoon's concert was conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas with the Boston Symphony's first oboeist, Ralph Gomberg as soloist in the C major Concerto, attributed to Haydn.

The big work yesterday was Mahler's Symphony No. 5 in C sharp minor.

Ceccato's program consisted of Mendelssohn's neglected Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Opus 11 (actually the composer's 13th), and Dvorak's Symphony No. 9 in E minor, Opus 95, "New World," usually listed as No. 5.

Music Review

Since the Prokofieff Third Piano Concerto (premiered in 1921) is already "old hat," Ceccato put his craft on the line with a traditional program.

His most impressive work was accomplished in the Dvorak symphony. Some of the credit goes to Laurence Thorstenberg for his gorgeous English horn solo in the second movement.

Fine Polish

Ceccato rubbed the work to a fine polish, being quite satisfied to play it as written without benefit of extra-curricular machination.

It was well supplied with drama but just as attentive to thin, tuneful materials. As expected, the brasses carried the burden of broad oratory.

Ceccato's discerning style and respect for detail carried the Mendelssohn Symphony a couple of steps above its true value.

The rapid opening and closing movements had a kind if dutiful energy, making much of their restless progress along with moments of calm. Ceccato gave the singing slow movement good lineal continuity. The minuet was stimulating and tunefully pleasing — even the naive trio.

PROGRAMS

Saturday Night
Aldo Ceccato, conductor
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Opus 11 — Mendelssohn
Piano Concerto No. 3 in C major, Opus 26 — Prokifieff

John Browning, pianist
Symphony No. 9 in E minor, Opus 95, "New World" — Dvorak

Sunday Afternoon
Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor
Oboe Concerto in C major (attributed) — Haydn

Ralph Gomberg, Obeist
Symphony No. 5 in C sharp Minor — Mahler

All was not well in the Prokofieff Piano Concerto. Browning set out to make it glitter, which it did. There were some technical blotches, but most of the playing was brilliant, brittle and fiery.

Except for the slow movement, however, some of the performance was a minor tug of war between keyboard and podium over rhythm, tempo and even style.

No matter how obliging Ceccato was in adjusting to the soloist's caprices, problems persisted. In spite of a few brief separations, the finale was real razzle-dazzle and Browning was rewarded with several curtain calls.

Thomas took advantage of Mahler' sweeping edicts in the Fifth Symphony to display the more picturesque aspects of his podium style.

Mahler's Fifth abounds at great length in orchestral swells, thread-thin interludes and passionate speeches.

The opening portentious funeral march yielded at long last to typical stormy Mahler episodes, large-scale scherzo and mercifully rollicking finale.

The Symphony has few peers as a test of endurance during which the composer goes on and on with his philosophical doctrines.

All of which means major difficulty in keeping this flood of sound under control and rising time and again to its extravagant demands.

Thomas not only held a firm grip on the reins but brought objectiveness to the work's spirit. The physical labor was impressive enough but it became a super-feat of young Thomas' demonstrative style.

Musicianship

Gomberg's playing of the Haydn (?) Oboe Concerto was a gem of fine musicianship, expressive tone and comprehensive technique.

The oboeist played the opening march movement with firmly completed phrases, despite the fact that he seemed to be experiencing some problem with his instrument.

A singing tone permeated the andante and was richly supported by the orchestra. The closing rondo, with its ornamental variations, was the ultimate in good cheer and gave an unusual demonstration of the instrument's range.

Gomberg could have asked for no better cooperation from orchestra and conductor.

Photo for the Telegram by Whitestone

Aldo Ceccato at Tanglewood.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,977
AUG 7 1972
New England Newsclip

HOUR
NORWALK, CONN.
D. 23,000
AUG 9 1972
New England Newsclip

Reviewer Finds Baton Of Conductor Ceccato Stimulates Symphony

At Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony, under the baton of Aldo Ceccato, principal conductor of the Detroit Symphony, came alive on Saturday night with an ambitious and well-balanced program, which also featured John Browning as soloist in the technically difficult, but powerfully great Prokofiev piano concerto no. 3 in C op. 26. Not that the orchestra has not been very much alive all season. It has been a summer of many conductors on the podium, and one veteran member of the string section was overheard on Saturday to say that Ceccato was great to work with. He seemed to draw from the orchestral body a unified performance, revealing a studied control, and a commanding leadership, tempered with a warmth and appreciation for the players themselves . . . Opening with a nicely modulated Symphony no. 1. in C. Minor, of Felix Mendelssohn, the program closed with the Dvorak's Ninth, The New World, with the Prokofiev between. Actually, Mendolssohn's first was by count, his 13th the remainder of which until recent years were in manuscript only. Several of them have been performed during this century. His very successful piano concerto for two pianos and the overture to A Midsummer night's dream are only a part of the reason we know he was a youthful prodigy. For the C Minor, musicologists have gleaned his styles have come from varied sources—Beethoven in the first movement, An Allegro di Molto, a rather more feminine character in the second theme, which was used a great deal in the 19th Century, and the Andante inn E flat, as a bit of Mozart's slow movements, or the lively minuet in C. minor also quite of the Mozartian influence, but with a distinct melodic Mendelssohn as in the Allegro con fuoco, the final movement.

If Prokofiev was known as the best salesman for his own piano concerti, and a titan of the keyboard, as James Lyon, program annotater feels, he most surely would have revelled in hearing his third under the keyboard mastery of John Browning on Saturday. It is a demon to accomplish with some of the most rapid of cadenzas humanly possible, and it is work . . . The sound comes forth with prodigious accuracy and power, and the orchestra was inspired to match his demands. Bravos of spontaneous outburst and many curtain calls were automatic—there was no holding back. Without exception, for this reviewer it was the best performance of that masterpiece to date.

Dvorak, who by his own statement felt that this country's musical destiny was to grow from its folk music, proved then and surely now, how much of a prophet he was as well as great composer. His New World was first performed in 1893, receiving instantaneous and loud applause. It is known as one of his most melodious and most brilliant works, and comprises a looking, longing, bright hope, though sometimes haunting with sadness, but all in equisite beauty and strength.

Ceccato, a great pianist in his teens, with a wide background of experience throughout Europe, made his American debut with the Chicago Lyric Opera in 1969, and has conducted America's major orchestras since, and in recordings. His experience and a achievement brought and wrapped up a memorable gift to the Tanglewood audience on Saturday.—ROXIE E. HOUGHTON

113

THE LAWNS AT TANGLEWOOD are a great place for music and people-watching, as this view last Sunday from rear of Shed attests. Richard Woodworth gives a lawn's-eye view of the Boston Symphony concert in News and Views below.

NEWS ... and views

BY RICHARD WOODWORTH

All he knew was that we had been to a "concert" – which you'd think would be anathema to his restless young mind – in the "woods" somewhere.

"I want to go to Tanglewood, too," said the 5-year-old upon his return Monday from a week with his grandparents in Montreal.

And he may go soon, for there's something magic about Tanglewood. There's magic in the name that draws youngsters and tourists from near and far, and magic in the mood that draws music afficionados year after year.

Sunday dawned cool and clear, a perfect day for the quickly planned excursion to Lenox (the parents suddenly found themselves "childless" for a day for the first time in nine years, with No. 1 son just off to YMCA Camp Jewell in Colebrook and No. 2 son in Canada).

Recalling incredible traffic tie-ups from a similar Sunday outing last year, we left earlier (10:30 a.m.) and shunned the Massachusetts Turnpike for the equally fast and more pleasant Route 8 north from Winsted.

The substitute worked, for we breezed into and through Lenox at 12:15, managed to park in the main parking lot just 100 feet from the Main Gate, paid $3 each, and planted ourselves on the lawn under a tree front and center outside the Shed. Only a few hundred souls were there ahead of us, and for more than an hour we wondered if we had the right day. But by concert's start at 2:30, the shed and lawns were filled as usual.

Killing two hours or so was no problem, with sightseeing on the grounds and in the shed, magazines to read, conversation with early arrivals and a gourmet picnic preceded by gin and tonics.

The lawn is where the action is, and it's paradise for people-watchers. An elderly couple sat hand-in-hand on lawn chairs ahead of us. Two college girls sprawled nearby on sleeping bags. Three long-haired youths lolled shirtless on a blanket (until a stern official tapped them on the back and told them to put their shirts on). A New Jersey family with three young children did puzzles and read comic books. A party of 16 (with eight young children) cracked open a Mexican pinata filled toys.

These scenes were multiplied countless times over. Wine and cheese picnics were everywhere, with a sprinkling of more exotic fare. People passed the time by partying, snoozing or reading the Sunday newspaper (The New York Times "beat" the Boston Globe, hands down).

Silence fell as the Boston Symphony played Mozart's Violin Concerto No. 4 and later Mahler's Sixth Symphony. Infants and young children were never better behaved, nor were the hippies. Lawnspeople tiptoed up front to the shed to peek inside and share the 5,000 full-paying customers' view.

The concert over, we explored Pittsfield (only the Berkshire Common is worth visiting), Lenox and Stockbridge, happening on back roads that were duly noted to avoid traffic jams in the future.

After a stop at Orpheus Ascending, which appears to be the immediate area's most intriguing restaurant, we settled instead on Alice's Take Out, run by the Alice of Alice's Restaurant fame (about which more next week).

With a number of delicacies and a bottle of chablis at hand, we picnicked at dusk along the upper Farmington River south of Otis – a pleasant conclusion to an unusual day that can be enjoyed by everyone.

NEWS
WEST HARTFORD, CONN.
W. 6,795
AUG 8 1972
New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD 1972

SEIJI OZAWA Artistic Director, Berkshire Festival
GUNTHER SCHULLER Artistic Director, Berkshire Music Center
LEONARD BERNSTEIN Adviser

Sunday August 6 1972 at 2.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

HAYDN — Oboe concerto in C (attributed)

Allegro spiritoso
Andante
Rondo: allegretto

RALPH GOMBERG

first performance at the Berkshire Festival

intermission

*MAHLER — Symphony no. 5 in C sharp minor

Part 1 Trauermarsch (funeral march)
Stürmisch bewegt (with stormy movement)

Part 2 Scherzo
(French horn obbligato — CHARLES YANCICH)

Part 3 Adagietto
Rondo – Finale

The program notes for this afternoon's concert begin on page 32

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECORDS EXCLUSIVELY FOR DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON

BALDWIN PIANO
DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON AND *RCA RECORDS

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169
AUG 8 1972

Good Things in Life Savored By 27,000 at Tanglewood

BY RICHARD VINCENT
Music Critic

Tanglewood had another gratifying weekend, gratifying from the point of view of the gate anyhow, with about 27,000 paid for the three symphony concerts.

Sunday afternoon, as usual, there were a lot of picnickers on the lawn, many of whom were lolling in front of boards that included avocado stuffed with crab, golden fried chicken parmigiana, cold salmon loaf with cucumber sauce, herring in cream sauce, ratatouille, fresh peas in sour cream and stuffed egg plant. And, cold chablis in silver buckets, linen nappery and crystal goblets.

PERHAPS YOU ARE asking what this exercise in sybaritic self-indulgence has to do with a symphony concert? Let me assure you there is no more felicitous manner in which one can assuage the inner man, body and soul than with this emminently civilized approach to the good things in life.

Beautiful Tanglewood dappled by a bright sun, cooled by a New England breeze, a creative and delicate feast, a great orchestra in full cry; one could expire happy, it is the compleat experience.

One of the reasons for this digression fromt he high and pure plane of music criticism in the traditional manner is a reluctance to come to grips with Mahler's Fifth Symphony, the second work on Sunday's concert of the BSO conducted by 28-year-old Michel Tilson Thomas.

I flogged Mahler recently in these pages and am about to do it again, but still one dislikes exposing too often a severe bias in a calling that should be as objective as possible.

HIS ASSETS as a writer are extremely sound. He is a master of harmony and theory, he orchestrates with considerable ability and he certainly knows the terrain in which he functions. So what is wrong?

He overwrites to a distressing degree and in spite of all the colors and texture of the music, very little seems to happen in terms of musical character or personality. The dynamics are slight, the music becomes a montonous crush of thick and over-rich sound. It must be noted that during the performance a stream of people got up and went, not in anger, but in mind.

Ralph Gomberg, that fine player, was the soloist in the Haydn Oboe Concerto. It says Haydn, but none is really certain if he or one of his students wrote it.

113

THE LAWNS AT TANGLEWOOD are a great place for music and people-watching, as this view last Sunday from rear of Shed attests. Richard Woodworth gives a lawn's-eye view of the Boston Symphony concert in News and Views below.

NEWS ...and views

BY RICHARD WOODWORTH

All he knew was that we had been to a "concert" -- which you'd think would be anathema to his restless young mind -- in the "woods" somewhere.

"I want to go to Tanglewood, too," said the 5-year-old upon his return Monday from a week with his grandparents in Montreal.

And he may go soon, for there's something magic about Tanglewood. There's magic in the name that draws youngsters and tourists from near and far, and magic in the mood that draws music afficionados year after year.

Sunday dawned cool and clear, a perfect day for the quickly planned excursion to Lenox (the parents suddenly found themselves "childless" for a day for the first time in nine years, with No. 1 son just off to YMCA Camp Jewell in Colebrook and No. 2 son in Canada).

Recalling incredible traffic tie-ups from a similar Sunday outing last year, we left earlier (10:30 a.m.) and shunned the Massachusetts Turnpike for the equally fast and more pleasant Route 8 north from Winsted.

The substitute worked, for we breezed into and through Lenox at 12:15, managed to park in the main parking lot just 100 feet from the Main Gate, paid $3 each, and planted ourselves on the lawn under a tree front and center outside the Shed. Only a few hundred souls were there ahead of us, and for more than an hour we wondered if we had the right day. But by concert's start at 2:30, the shed and lawns were filled as usual.

Killing two hours or so was no problem, with sightseeing on the grounds and in the shed, magazines to read, conversation with early arrivals and a gourmet picnic preceded by gin and tonics.

The lawn is where the action is, and it's paradise for people-watchers. An elderly couple sat hand-in-hand on lawn chairs ahead of us. Two college girls sprawled nearby on sleeping bags. Three long-haired youths lolled shirtless on a blanket (until a stern official tapped them on the back and told them to put their shirts on). A New Jersey family with three young children did puzzles and read comic books. A party of 16 (with eight young children) cracked open a Mexican pinata filled toys.

These scenes were multiplied countless times over. Wine and cheese picnics were everywhere, with a sprinkling of more exotic fare. People passed the time by partying, snoozing or reading the Sunday newspaper (The New York Times "beat" the Boston Globe, hands down).

Silence fell as the Boston Symphony played Mozart's Violin Concerto No. 4 and later Mahler's Sixth Symphony. Infants and young children were never better behaved, nor were the hippies. Lawnspeople tiptoed up front to the shed to peek inside and share the 5,000 full-paying customers' view.

The concert over, we explored Pittsfield (only the Berkshire Common is worth visiting), Lenox and Stockbridge, happening on back roads that were duly noted to avoid traffic jams in the future.

After a stop at Orpheus Ascending, which appears to be the immediate area's most intriguing restaurant, we settled instead on Alice's Take Out, run by the Alice of Alice's Restaurant fame (about which more next week).

With a number of delicacies and a bottle of chablis at hand, we picnicked at dusk along the upper Farmington River south of Otis -- a pleasant conclusion to an unusual day that can be enjoyed by everyone.

NEWS
WEST HARTFORD, CONN.
W. 6,795

AUG 8 1972

New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD 1972

SEIJI OZAWA Artistic Director, Berkshire Festival
GUNTHER SCHULLER Artistic Director, Berkshire Music Center
LEONARD BERNSTEIN Adviser

Sunday August 6 1972 at 2.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

HAYDN — Oboe concerto in C (attributed)

Allegro spiritoso
Andante
Rondo: allegretto

RALPH GOMBERG

first performance at the Berkshire Festival

intermission

*MAHLER — Symphony no. 5 in C sharp minor

Part 1 Trauermarsch (funeral march)
Stürmisch bewegt (with stormy movement)

Part 2 Scherzo
(French horn obbligato — CHARLES YANCICH)

Part 3 Adagietto
Rondo – Finale

The program notes for this afternoon's concert begin on page 32

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECORDS EXCLUSIVELY FOR DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON

BALDWIN PIANO
DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON AND *RCA RECORDS

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

AUG 8 1972

Good Things in Life Savored By 27,000 at Tanglewood

BY RICHARD VINCENT
Music Critic

Tanglewood had another gratifying weekend, gratifying from the point of view of the gate anyhow, with about 27,000 paid for the three symphony concerts.

Sunday afternoon, as usual, there were a lot of picnickers on the lawn, many of whom were lolling in front of boards that included avocado stuffed with crab, golden fried chicken parmigiana, cold salmon loaf with cucumber sauce, herring in cream sauce, ratatouille, fresh peas in sour cream and stuffed egg plant. And, cold chablis in silver buckets, linen nappery and crystal goblets.

PERHAPS YOU ARE asking what this exercise in sybaritic self-indulgence has to do with a symphony concert? Let me assure you there is no more felicitous manner in which one can assuage the inner man, body and soul than with this emminently civilized approach to the good things in life.

Beautiful Tanglewood dappled by a bright sun, cooled by a New England breeze, a creative and delicate feast, a great orchestra in full cry; one could expire happy, it is the compleat experience.

One of the reasons for this digression fromt he high and pure plane of music criticism in the traditional manner is a reluctance to come to grips with Mahler's Fifth Symphony, the second work on Sunday's concert of the BSO conducted by 28-year-old Michel Tilson Thomas.

I flogged Mahler recently in these pages and am about to do it again, but still one dislikes exposing too often a severe bias in a calling that should be as objective as possible.

HIS ASSETS as a writer are extremely sound. He is a master of harmony and theory, he orchestrates with considerable ability and he certainly knows the terrain in which he functions. So what is wrong?

He overwrites to a distressing degree and in spite of all the colors and texture of the music, very little seems to happen in terms of musical character or personality. The dynamics are slight, the music becomes a montonous crush of thick and over-rich sound. It must be noted that during the performance a stream of people got up and went, not in anger, but in mind.

Ralph Gomberg, that fine player, was the soloist in the Haydn Oboe Concerto. It says Haydn, but none is really certain if he or one of his students wrote it.

LETTER FROM NEW ENGLAND

Music Festival's Power and Glory

By Leighton Rollins

I arrived in the Berkshires accompanied by a crashing thunder and lightning storm. The next morning it was cool and clear, the air filled with the scent of pine trees. That evening I went to a concert of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, which is to say, 110 students. This concert was in memory of Serge Koussevitsky, 1874-1951.

As I hurried along to the Theater Concert Hall, a cheerful voice greeted me, and there was Margaret Mallory. So many people, and most of them young, wanted to attend this concert, that it was switched to the immense Music Shed, seating around 6,000.

First, the "student" conductors, one from Philadelphia and the other from Rio de Janeiro, led the orchestra in Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony and "Don Juan," the tone poem by Strauss.

The student orchestra is so good, so electrifying in its enthusiasm and joy, it is no wonder that Leonard Bernstein bounded on the stage with every hair on his head standing upright, ready for the experience of sharing again his love for music with young musicians.

THERE IS NO QUESTION whatever about the enormous talents Bernstein brings to

SANTA BARBARA, CALIF.
NEWS-PRESS
D. 38,000 S. 41,000

AUG 13 1972

MUSIC FESTIVALS

Continued from Page C-8

conducting assignments but, I suppose I am being niggardly, I wish he wouldn't jump two feet off the floor to accent a fortissimo or bend his baton back of his head and then bring it smashing down to the floor. That's tennis!

He was conducting the III and IV Movements of the Mahler 9th Symphony which was dedicated to the memory of Goeran Gentele, from whom the Metropolitan Opera had expected so much. The young orchestra played like angels. The great audience rose and cheered, and the sleepy sparrows in the rafters of the Music Shed flew away.

In the intermission I saw Madame Koussevitsky, dressed in white and looking a good deal less frail than she used to. As a matter of fact, the last time I saw her was when Munch conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert in Paris in memory of Koussevitsky, and that was years ago.

TANGLEWOOD, 1972 lists Seji Ozawa as artistic director of the Berkshire Festival, Gunther Schuler as artistic director of the Berkshire Music Center (the distinguished students enrolled in an informal summer music school which makes them work to a happy exhaustion). Leonard Bernstein is listed as Adviser.

Tanglewood now gives a Weekend Prelude, which commences on Fridays at 7. On this night the Boston Symphony Chamber Players played the String Trio in G, Op. 9, No. 1, by Beethoven, and the Brahms Piano Quartet in C-Minor, Op. 60. The Music Shed was almost full and the audience was obviously delighted by this program.

I must pause to comment on the audience. It is now 75 percent young people — cheerful, eager, interested. What is worn by this large group of the young is somewhat "travel-worn" but not gaudy, and they behave so well that I only have praise and rejoicing to offer.

Ormandy, the magician, without the true touch of greatness, greatly conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brahms Tragic Overture, Op. 81, Sibelius Symphony No. 5 in E Flat, Op. 82, and after the intermission, Bartok — Concerto for Orchestra.

Douglas Moore, an American composer of note, was chairman of the music department at Columbia University when he rescued Bartok. Bartok was without money; Moore arranged a place for him, a paying place, in the Columbia Music Department. Bartok was born in 1881 and died in 1945.

Shortly after he became the member of the Columbia Music Department he was sent to the Doctors Hospital. His physicians and he were in despair. It was leukemia. Then, on a scorching day in 1943, there arrived an unannounced caller, the great Koussevitsky. He invited Bartok to compose a special work for the Koussevitsky Foundation, which, of course, meant that money would be available.

A miracle happened. Bartok was released from the hospital. He wrote Concerto for Orchestra, and he was present when Koussevitsky conducted it in Boston.

THE SUNDAY AFTERNOON CONCERT was a study in contrasts. James Levine was the conductor. I was present last April when he conducted the Berkshire Symphony Orchestra for the first time in Boston. He is the principal conductor-elect of the Metropolitan Opera. He has a mop of dark hair and a body which suggests he enjoys gourmet cooking. He is a husky gent of 28.

Levine, in a blue sport shirt, received the adulation of the throng, seven thunderous "curtain calls" which he shared with the orchestra.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405

AUG 3 1972 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

Friday, July 28

This concert left both audience and orchestra applauding Eugene Ormandy with a standing ovation, shouts of "Bravo!" and four "curtain calls." It was a remarkable concert.

In this age of the young conductor, Eugene Ormandy is one of the few great old men left on the podium.

The Tragic Overture, which opened the concert, received a controlled, restrained, but powerful performance. It was dynamic, not gushy; its soft sections were starkly beautiful, not sappy. It was excellent Brahms. Ormandy's conducting was flawless, Ormandy and the orchestra working together beautifully. One could complain about the woodwind intonation in a few places, but in general, the many difficult problems of ensemble playing found in this work were handled with ease. The audience showed its approval was very economic in motion. He avoided the temptation of flamboyance, which can only get in the way of a great orchestra.

The second work on the program was the Sym. No. 5 of the Finnish Post-Romantic composer Jean Sibelius. The work of four years and three complete rewrites, this symphony was written in a highly individualized style, avoiding traditional symphonic forms. Rather than using lengthy themes with development and transition sections, it works with short motifs, extending them in an almost improvisational manner.

I must admit that I never liked Sibelius very much before Friday night, but this performance was so superb, so convincing that I really enjoyed it. The phrasing with a thunderous standing ovation.

The great twentieth-century Hungarian Bela Bartok wrote the Concerto for Orchestra at a time when he was one of the least performed contemporary composers of importance.

The performance was in keeping with the rest of the program. The second movement was wonderfully playful. The fourth movement, with its huge contrasts of mood, was gorgeous at times and riotously funny at others. The Finale was brilliant. The house exploded with applause at the conclusion.

This was a great, exciting concert in a beautiful setting. It was the kind of concert I shall not soon forget.

Robert Havery

Saturday, July 29

Conductor Eugene Ormandy creates enjoyable experiences for orchestra musicians. His programs tend toward the dramatic and his interpretations demand large quantities of sound and some fury from the players. And so Saturday night, with considerable gusto the B.S.O. gave him sound, until it flowed up the aisles and seeped into the cracks of the shed's earthen floor.

It nearly worked in Strauss's tone poem, Ein Heldenleben, where lush chromaticism ranging from the cacophony of the adversaries' themes to the breadth of the triumph over them suited the sonic boom. But not entirely. This was surface Strauss without an awareness of his contrapuntal skill, his range of expressiveness, or the richness of his colors. It was fleeting thrills instead of continual involvement.

The Beethoven Lenore no. 3 overture came off less well. Gradual dynamics were accomplished too quickly, tempi ranged from too breathless to downright stodgy, and nuances were glossed over. The sound of the piece was lovely (except for the winds which have failed to be in tune for two weeks) but the spirit was lacking.

Hindemith's symphony, Mathis der Maler, suffered the most. Paul Hindemith took more pride in the quality of his musical craftsmanship than just about any other twentieth-century composer. The fact that this piece is highly dramatic Hindemith does not mean that the drama in it can be milked at the expense of its musical content. The work, although tightly woven, is difficult to hold together in performance. When treated as a series of dramatic episodes, as it was Saturday night, it appears disjointed and sparse in detail.

John Hinners

Sunday, July 30

Sunday's program, directed by the brilliant young American conductor James Levine, consisted of but two works: the Mozart Violin Concerto, K. 218, with BSO Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist, and the Mahler Sixth Symphony.

Mr. Silverstein's performance of the Mozart was excellent in every respect: his playing was clean, well-defined and stylistically accurate, and he used some very fine cadenzas of his own. Mr. Levine's accompaniment was sensitive and tasteful.

The real excitement of the afternoon, however, was Mr. Levine's high-powered reading of the Mahler. It was truly first-rate. (Our goose pimples appeared early in the first movement and remained throughout!) Particularly we noticed the steady drive of the "tragic" themes, and could see why Mrs. Mahler, in her writings, compared the scherzo movement's Trio to ". . . the irregular games of children." We were shown virtually every color in the orchestral spectrum in this work, and the BSO played magnificently, with gorgeous, lush string tone and hair-raising fortissimos.

This work is a heavy, complex one for a warm Sunday afternoon, and the truly appreciative audience gave Mr. Levine and the orchestra some well-deserved cheers!

Franklin G. Coleman

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

AUG 16 1972 New England Newsclip

Overtones

By RICHARD CONWAY

Jack Cousin, a double-bass player from Springfield, is spending the summer at Tanglewood as a member of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra.

Jack won his fully-paid fellowship through audition at Symphony Hall, Boston. Henry Portnoi, principal double-bassist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the judge.

Jack said that he played one of the cello suites by Bach, and that the audition included a great deal of sight-reading.

His summer has been spent largely in rehearsals and performances. A typical day runs from 8 in the morning to 10 at night. But Jack is obviously having a grand time. "Excellent" is the word he uses to describe his experience.

Although he has had the opportunity of working under several conductors, one gets the impression that Seiji Ozawa is his favorite. Jack cannot really verbalize why. "It's just that Ozawa knows so much about music. He hears everything."

* * *

For various reasons, the Boston Symphony Orchestra first chair players have had opportunities to solo this season at Tanglewood. As a result, we have heard music that is not part of the ordinary fare; for example a bassoon concerto, an oboe concerto, and a suite that is close to being a flute concerto.

Including the chamber programs that have preceded each Friday night concert, we had heard Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola, Jules Eskin, celio, Ann Hobson, harp; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Sherman Walt, bassoon, Armand Ghitalla and Roger Voisin, trumpets.

These artists have made for a particularly interesting season at the Berkshire Music Festival.

* * *

So far, in the six weeks of the Tanglewood season, the Boston Symphony has played eight pieces of music new to its repertoire. Five additional pieces were being given their first performances at Tanglewood. There has been one World Premiere.

They certainly can't be accused of standing still with the same old stuff. Such imaginative programming makes the weekly trips to the Berkshires very worthwhile.

Martinique St. Thomas. From $430 to $950.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
S. 106,767

JUL 30 1972

New England Newsclip

Maderna, an Innovator in Music

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Bruno Maderna is 52, short and stocky. His smile covers his face completely. So can his scowl.

He is one of the world's most famous composer-conductors and feels that the two professions are pretty inseparable. His recent article in the New York Times made that clear. It stirred up a lot of controversy. Not many conductors are composers.

It doesn't, therefore, come as a surprise that Maderna's idol is Gustav Mahler who wrote an immense amount of music and conducted orchestras all over the world, including the New York Philharmonic from 1909 to 1911.

Maderna is teaching this summer at the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's academy for advanced studies at Tanglewood. He conducted the Boston Symphony in the July 8 and July 21 concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival.

Bruno Maderna

Summer Residence

As the "celebrity in residence," Maderna is occupying the composer's cottage and studio at Seranak, summer home of Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky (widow of the late conductor of the Boston Symphony and founder of Tanglewood) — which covers 180 acres within sound of Tanglewood.

The complex was completed in 1966 and provides its occupants with the ultimate in privacy and atmosphere.

Maderna is one of a triumvirate of contemporary composers who have blazed a trail of innovation, with some ensuing protest.

The others are Luigi Nono and Luciano Berio.

A rare combination of talents was utilized in February, 1965, when Maderna conducted the Opera Company of Boston in Nono's controversial, anti-totalitarian opera, "Intolleranza."

Berio became known to Worcester personally in 1967 when he presented a taped performance of his "Laborintus," with commentary at the Art Museum.

"We worked together closely from 1956 to 1960," says Maderna. "Our paths have separated in recent years, but Nono, Berio and I remain good friends. When I return to direct the Studio di Fonologia in Milan, I will invite them again to participate."

Something New

Berio's Tanglewood concert of July 8 caused some audience discontent. It included works by Charles Ives that were quite well received.

The program also contained "Available Forms I" by Earle Brown, native of Lunenburg and currently "artist in residence" at the Berkshire Music Center.

Six unbound pages "with either four or five events on each page" were distributed to the orchestra.

Maderna was "at liberty to begin with any event on any page, and go from there to any other event on that or any other page, making repetitions or omissions at will."

Therefore, the conductor assembled the materials at will, and there could hardly be two identical performances of the work.

combination of applause and booing. Maderna seemed to extend his arms to the audience as if encouraging more of the candid reaction.

"That was not my purpose," he explained. "Brown was in the audience and I was urging him to come onstage for a bow." Brown did not accept the invitation.

Conductor's Choice

"Available Forms means exactly what it says," Maderna explains. "The materials are available and it's up to the conductor to use them as he feels."

Significantly, "Available Forms" was world premiered in 1961 at Darmstad, Germany, which happens to be Maderna's permanent home.

"This kind of music must be reacted to," says Maderna. "I would have been disappointed if the reaction had been entirely favorable. The audience response was the truth.

"It's an excellent work that combined improvisation with aleatoric forms (composing with a degree of option). It is a postive aspect of American music."

Composers have all kinds of suggestions to make audiences and critics more favorably responsive to new music. They are such platitudes as "listen again," "keep an open mind," and "learn as much as you can about the piece itself."

Program Notes

Andrew Raeburn writes program notes for the Boston Symphony concerts. His own writing can be profitably read by the layman because it doesn't sound like a course in advanced musicology.

"When we program a work by a contemporary composer, we feel we owe him the courtesy of explaining his own music," says Raeburn. "We're sometimes dismayed at what we receive, but what can we do?"

Maderna isn't content with obvious advice. He feels that audiences should do their share to adjust and judge the new idioms.

"New music began after World War II," he says. Webern put a stamp on what had come before. The new horizon was discovered by Bartok.

"To hear the new music compatibly, one should prepare channels if listening by absorbing the music of Debussy, Stravinsky, Bartok — and Ives is very important.

"Perhaps one could begin with Mahler on one side, Debussy and Bartok on the other."

Critics' Role

Maderna also feels that the critic has a real responsibility to new music.

"The critic's goal should be to inform and educate," he says. "It's a socially important task, and should be accomplished with words that people can understand.

Perhaps the starting point substitute for instruments and voices," he says. By "prepared" music he means artificial' alterations of instruments magnetic tapes, "chance' music, or maybe even "happenings."

"None of these can be compared to the richness of the human product," he adds. "Electronic music is in a primitive state. Mechanics cannot replace human emotions."

"To make a theatrical comparative, electronic music adds something in another dimension, like stereophonic sound. Many composers work in both mediums — live and electronic — if they feel the necessity."

Maderna has made a fusion of the old and new in his transcriptions of music by the 17th century composer, Giovanni Gabrieli. Two were played at Tanglewood this summer, "Ricercare" and "Motet."

For the Young

In such works Maderna finds the reasons for the young audience's equal passion for baroque and contemporary music. "Gabrieli even wrote on his scores, 'use whatever instruments you like' — in a way, the same king of freedom that Brown offered in 'Available Forms'.

"Both are entertainment music. Same as Mozart's music, such as the divertimentos and serenades. The young audience wants freedom, without pretension.

"The young audience protests the dictation that all modern music must be sweet, and Beethoven's music must sound angry and hysterical.

"Times have changed. We must not set our estimates of familiar works by what the great maestros of the past did with them. They were right in their day, but must the music of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven remain academic?"

That brought us to a delicate point. Maderna has sometimes been criticized for being "unorthodox" in his tempos.

"The other day, when I rehearsed the Boston Symphony in Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, I saw disapproval among some of the players over my tempos. They gradually accepted my thoughts.

"I have a large collection of books about Mozart and his music. From study I have learned that what Mozart sometimes called a minuet — because he was expected to — was more in the character of a folia. If it's played as a stately minuet, Mozart's intention is missed."

The "folia" was originally a wild and abandoned Portuguese dance.

"My study also proves that an "andante" in Mozart can mean anywhere from 66 to 72 on a metronome," he explains. "So there should be no set tempo, as used by some eminent conductors of the past.

"Sometimes," Maderna admits, "I lack the courage to interject my own personality in a great work."

Likes Chicago

Maderna is particularly enthusiastic about the Chicago Symphony Orchestra which he has conducted in Chicago and at its summer home, Ravinia.

He obviously admires the Boston Symphony but believes it has been "in trouble" during the past few seasons because of frequent changes in conductors.

"It is not by any means a crisis," he says, "but I believe Seiji Ozawa will bring it to a higher level in about two seasons.

"The other day I watched him rehearse the Berkshire Center Orchestra and I was amazed at his understanding of the spiritual and philosophical aspects of Mahler's First Symphony."

Maderna was born in Venice in 1920. A leading member of the Italian avant-garde, he specializes in new music and pre-classical works.

He has conducted in Japan and South America, as well as in Europe where he has led many of the major orchestras, among them the Berlin and Vienna Philharmonics, Orchestra of La Scala, and L'Orchestre Nationale de Paris.

Maderna made his New York debut in 1970 conducting Mercante's "Il Guiramento" for the Juilliard American Opera Center.

This summer, in addition to Tanglewood, he is conducting at Ravina, Meadow Brook (Detroit Symphony) and Blossom Center (Cleveland Orchestra).

He and his wife Christina have three children — Caterina, age 17; Claudia, 12; and Andreas, 6.

Boston Globe
7/28/72

UPTEMPO — Boston Symphony bassoonist Sherman Walt takes Mrs. George Lee Sargent of Dover on motorcycle tour of Tanglewood. Mrs. Sargent was high bidder for the ride in the Symphony's Musical Marathon which raised nearly $60,000 for the Boston Orchestra.

UPI

BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra's recent musical marathon to raise funds included auction of tour of the Berkshires with motorcyclist Sherman Walt, who is also BSO's principal bassoonist. High bidder, Mrs. George Lee Sargent of Dover, chairman of the Friends of Tanglewood, and Walt begin tour at Red Lion, Stockbridge.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885

JUL 28 1972

New England Newsclip

OFF TO TANGLEWOOD — Sherman Walt, principal bassoonist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. George Lee Sargent of Dover, chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony, depart from Stockbridge for a tour of the Berkshires and Tanglewood. Mrs. Sargent bid and won the opportunity to have a tour of the Berkshires on Walt's motorcycle during a benefit which raised nearly $60,000 for the orchestra.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
S. 106,767

JUL 30 1972

New England Newsclip

Maderna, an Innovator in Music

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Bruno Maderna is 52, short and stocky. His smile covers his face completely. So can his scowl.

He is one of the world's most famous composer-conductors and feels that the two professions are pretty inseparable. His recent article in the New York Times made that clear. It stirred up a lot of controversy. Not many conductors are composers.

It doesn't, therefore, come as a surprise that Maderna's idol is Gustav Mahler who wrote an immense amount of music and conducted orchestras all over the world, including the New York Philharmonic from 1909 to 1911.

Maderna is teaching this summer at the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's academy for advanced studies at Tanglewood. He conducted the Boston Symphony in the July 8 and July 21 concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival.

Bruno Maderna

Summer Residence

As the "celebrity in residence," Maderna is occupying the composer's cottage and studio at Seranak, summer home of Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky (widow of the late conductor of the Boston Symphony and founder of Tanglewood) — which covers 180 acres within sound of Tanglewood.

The complex was completed in 1966 and provides its occupants with the ultimate in privacy and atmosphere.

Maderna is one of a triumvirate of contemporary composers who have blazed a trail of innovation, with some ensuing protest.

The others are Luigi Nono and Luciano Berio.

A rare combination of talents was utilized in February, 1965, when Maderna conducted the Opera Company of Boston in Nono's controversial, anti-totalitarian opera, "Intolleranza."

Berio became known to Worcester personally in 1967 when he presented a taped performance of his "Laborintus," with commentary at the Art Museum.

"We worked together closely from 1956 to 1960," says Maderna. "Our paths have separated in recent years, but Nono, Berio and I remain good friends. When I return to direct the Studio di Fonologia in Milan, I will invite them again to participate."

Something New

Berio's Tanglewood concert of July 8 caused some audience discontent. It included works by Charles Ives that were quite well received.

The program also contained "Available Forms I" by Earle Brown, native of Lunenburg and currently "artist in residence" at the Berkshire Music Center.

Six unbound pages "with either four or five events on each page" were distributed to the orchestra.

Maderna was "at liberty to begin with any event on any page, and go from there to any other event on that or any other page, making repetitions or omissions at will."

Therefore, the conductor assembled the materials at will, and there could hardly be two identical performances of the work.

combination of applause and booing. Maderna seemed to extend his arms to the audience as if encouraging more of the candid reaction.

"That was not my purpose," he explained. "Brown was in the audience and I was urging him to come onstage for a bow." Brown did not accept the invitation.

Conductor's Choice

"Available Forms means exactly what it says," Maderna explains. "The materials are available and it's up to the conductor to use them as he feels."

Significantly, "Available Forms" was world premiered in 1961 at Darmstad, Germany, which happens to be Maderna's permanent home.

"This kind of music must be reacted to," says Maderna. "I would have been disappointed if the reaction had been entirely favorable. The audience response was the truth.

"It's an excellent work that combined improvisation with aleatoric forms (composing with a degree of option). It is a postive aspect of American music."

Composers have all kinds of suggestions to make audiences and critics more favorably responsive to new music. They are such platitudes as "listen again," "keep an open mind," and "learn as much as you can about the piece itself."

Program Notes

Andrew Raeburn writes program notes for the Boston Symphony concerts. His own writing can be profitably read by the layman because it doesn't sound like a course in advanced musicology.

for the critic would be a work ravel the maze of complexities that the composer himself offers as "explanation" for his music.

Maderna is one of the world's foremost exponents of electronic music. His views about this medium are unexpected and revolutionary in themselves.

"A short time ago, I lectured on electronic music for two weeks in Buenos Aires," he recalls. "I spent the first week trying to persuade my listeners that they need electronic music — like a salesman trying to sell television.

"Prepared music can never substitute for instruments and voices," he says. By "prepared" music he means artificial' alterations of instruments magnetic tapes, "chance' music, or maybe even "happenings."

"None of these can be compared to the richness of the human product," he adds. "Electronic music is in a primitive state. Mechanics cannot replace human emotions."

"To make a theatrical comparative, electronic music adds something in another dimension, like stereophonic sound. Many composers work in both mediums — live and electronic — if they feel the necessity."

Maderna has made a fusion of the old and new in his transcriptions of music by the 17th century composer, Giovanni Gabrieli. Two were played at Tanglewood this summer, "Ricercare" and "Motet."

For the Young

In such works Maderna finds the reasons for the young audience's equal passion for baroque and contemporary music. "Gabrieli even wrote on his scores, 'use whatever instruments you like' — in a way, the same king of freedom that Brown offered in 'Available Forms'.

"Both are entertainment music. Same as Mozart's music, such as the divertimentos and serenades. The young audience wants freedom, without pretension.

"The young audience protests the dictation that all modern music must be sweet, and Beethoven's music must sund angry and hysterical.

"Times have changed. We must not set our estimates of familiar works by what the great maestros of the past did with them. They were right in their day, but must the music of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven remain academic?"

That brought us to a delicate point. Maderna has sometimes been criticized for being "unorthodox" in his tempos.

"The other day, when I rehearsed the Boston Symphony in Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, I saw disapproval among some of the players over my tempos. They gradually accepted my thoughts.

"I have a large collection of books about Mozart and his music. From study I have learned that what Mozart sometimes called a minuet — because he was expected to — was more in the character of a folia. If it's played as a stately minuet, Mozart's intention is missed."

The "folia" was originally a wild and abandoned Portuguese dance.

"My study also proves that an "andante" in Mozart can mean anywhere from 66 to 72 on a metronome," he explains. "So there should be no set tempo, as used by some eminent conductors of the past.

"Sometimes," Maderna admits, "I lack the courage to interject my own personality in a great work."

Likes Chicago

Maderna is particularly enthusiastic about the Chicago Symphony Orchestra which he has conducted in Chicago and at its summer home, Ravinia.

He obviously admires the Boston Symphony but believes it has been "in trouble" during the past few seasons because of frequent changes in conductors.

"It is not by any means a crisis," he says, "but I believe Seiji Ozawa will bring it to a higher level in about two seasons.

"The other day I watched him rehearse the Berkshire Center Orchestra and I was amazed at his understanding of the spiritual and philosophical aspects of Mahler's First Symphony."

Maderna was born in Venice in 1920. A leading member of the Italian avant-garde, he specializes in new music and pre-classical works.

He has conducted in Japan and South America, as well as in Europe where he has led many of the major orchestras, among them the Berlin and Vienna Philharmonics, Orchestra of La Scala, and L'Orchestre Nationale de Paris.

Maderna made his New York debut in 1970 conducting Mercante's "Il Guiramento" for the Juilliard American Opera Center.

This summer, in addition to Tanglewood, he is conducting at Ravina, Meadow Brook (Detroit Symphony) and Blossom Center (Cleveland Orchestra).

He and his wife Christina have three children — Caterina, age 17; Claudia, 12; and Andreas, 6.

Boston Globe
7/28/72

UPTEMPO — Boston Symphony bassoonist Sherman Walt takes Mrs. George Lee Sargent of Dover on motorcycle tour of Tanglewood. Mrs. Sargent was high bidder for the ride in the Symphony's Musical Marathon which raised nearly $60,000 for the Boston Orchestra.

UPI

BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra's recent musical marathon to raise funds included auction of tour of the Berkshires with motorcyclist Sherman Walt, who is also BSO's principal bassoonist. High bidder, Mrs. George Lee Sargent of Dover, chairman of the Friends of Tanglewood, and Walt begin tour at Red Lion, Stockbridge.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885

JUL 28 1972

New England Newsclip

OFF TO TANGLEWOOD — Sherman Walt, principal bassoonist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. George Lee Sargent of Dover, chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony, depart from Stockbridge for a tour of the Berkshires and Tanglewood. Mrs. Sargent bid and won the opportunity to have a tour of the Berkshires on Walt's motorcycle during a benefit which raised nearly $60,000 for the orchestra.

MILLERTON, N. Y.
NEWS
W. 1,500

AUG 10 1972

Tanglewood

Sunday, Aug. 6

Ralph Gomberg, principal oboe of the Boston Symphony, was featured as soloist in the Oboe Concerto in C which is attributed to Haydn. (The original score does not bear a signature.) Gomberg played with a beautifully clear tone which was full and rich. A troublesome reed marred a few phrases for him but, in general, the performance was excellent on his part.

Twenty-eight-year-old Michael Tilson Thomas, guest conductor, is Music Director of the Buffalo Symphony Orchestra and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony. He seems to excel in jerky motion. While this kind of conducting can be very effective at times, it does have its limitations. In the Haydn concerto the orchestra lacked the precision one might expect of it because Thomas's motions were often so animated that they lost the clarity which this piece requires.

Thomas seemed to be much more at home with the Mahler Fifth Symphony. Thomas is at his best when the music reaches a driving intensity or becomes rhythmically charged. At such moments he is very good, even excellent. Moments of delicacy are not there, or at least they weren't on Sunday.

Thomas is talented — he obviously knows his scores thoroughly and he never misses giving a cue. One can only hope that he will retain his feeling for bravado and add to it an understanding of the rest of music.

The orchestra in the Mahler was superb. Mahler brings out the individuality of each instrument of the orchestra, and the players of the BSO are up to all the demands of this exciting, beautiful music.

Robert Havery

2 Young Conductors Tanglewood Success

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Two bright, up-and-coming young conductors were the focus of attention at Tanglewood over the weekend at performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Both Pleasing

It's difficult to say which made the greater impression, Aldo Ceccato Saturday night with his clean and crisp "New World" symphony, or Michael Tilson Thomas yesterday afternoon with his thoughtful Mahler fifth symphony.

Thomas is well-known to Tanglewood audiences, so let's deal with Ceccato first.

He is about 30, a native of Milan, has wide experience over the world as a guest conductor and was appointed recently as principal conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra.

His program Saturday night, heard by 9328, began with Mendelssohn's first symphony, a seldom-heard, lightweight tidbit with a few nice little melodies and an 18th-century atmosphere.

Flowery Manner

That was followed by a real showpiece, Prokofieff's third piano concerto with John Browning as soloist and, after intermission, Dvorak's symphony No. 9 ("New World").

Ceccato is a handsome fellow of middle size, slender, graceful, black-haired. He works without moving about, but has very busy hands, his right setting the meter in an unadorned, businesslike way, and his left sending out entry cues and hundreds of messages to increase and decrease volume with a flowery manner, much of it superfluous.

But baton technique is of no consequence except that it helps to produce satisfactory music. Which is what Ceccato does.

Distant Drummer?

His pacing and phrasing of the Dvorak symphony seemed entirely right; there was a crispness in the delivery as well as a liquid flow of continuity and an orderliness of structure, all of which is proper responsibility of the conductor.

There were moments during the first movement of the Prokofieff concerto when it seemed as if the orchestra and pianist were following different drummers, but the concerto is a brilliantly percussive piece and its rhythmic atmosphere is slightly off-beat and seemingly syncopated, anyway.

It was performed brilliantly, too as it should be: that is, the style is shiny and glittering, jittery and nervous and it generates an electric tension that permeates any audience when it is done as Browning and Ceccato and the Bostonians did it.

Warm Oboe

Yesterday afternoon the staff hero was Ralph Gomberg, the orchestra's first - chair oboeist. He was soloist for the 18th-century concerto in C discovered in 1926 and tentatively attributed to Haydn.

RALPH GOMBERG

Gomberg, like his brother, Harold, who plays first oboe for the New York Philharmonic, is one of the nation's leading orchestral oboeists. It is always a pleasure to hear him because of the warmth of tone he draws from an instrument that is usually dry and reedy.

Ordinarily it is difficult to find him in his usual seat deep in the innards of the orchestra, but the sound of his oboe is familiar because a great many symphonic works call for short passages of solo oboe, perhaps more than any other single instrument.

The other work on Michael Tilson Thomas' program yesterday was the monumental Mahler Symphony No. 5, a piece that has all the symptoms of giantism.

It is, or was yesterday, an hour and 11 minutes long, and four of its five movements exhibit, with soul-satisfying frequency, those great, sonorous, thundering chord sequences that shake the backbone with the vibrations of massed brasses and kettledrums. (There were five trumpets, four trombones and seven French horns lined up across the back of the orchestra.)

The Mahler fifth is a rambling, discursive loosely-structured monster of occasional magnificence, tempered by a tranquil fourth movement.

Thomas helped the orchestra give it a surprisingly well-knit and pleasingly mature performance.

Weekend attendance was 27,020; there were 5345 Friday, 3839 Saturday morning, 9328 Saturday night and 8508 Sunday afternoon.

Arthur Fiedler and the pops drew 13,235 last Tuesday.

Next weekend Colin Davis of London will conduct all three programs; soloists will be Jessye Norman, Gina Bachauer and Richard Lewis; the Festival Chorus will sing Friday and Sunday. Programs include music by Wagner, Verdi, Berlioz, Beethoven and Brahms.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

AUG 7 1972

New England Newsclip

Mahler's Music Given Rich Performance by BSO

By RICHARD CONWAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played Mahler again Sunday afternoon, and this time Mahler's music won. The hour and ten minute "Fifth Symphony in C sharp minor" was given a rich performance under the baton of Michael Tilson Thomas.

Thomas, who is music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a young man of 28. James Levine, who conducted the rather controversial performance of the Mahler Sixth Symphony last Sunday, is also a young man in his twenties. But, whereas Levine chose to impress his own personal stamp on Mahler's work, Thomas allowed the composer's music to speak for itself. The results, I think, were far more satisfying.

Both men, Levine and Thomas, got the big, opulent sounds that are in Mahler's score. Levine, though, overplayed to the extent that the brasses, for example, had a blaring, blasting quality. Only once yesterday did Thomas get that kind of a sound from his brass section. The rest of the time, he played his orchestra so well, getting beautiful pianissimo work, that when the forte passages came there was no need to blast.

Thomas knew how to play his tempos, too. The lovely song that opens the third section of the symphony was given time to linger so that the listener could respond to its warmth. Where the music became agitated and excited, Thomas generated the orchestra without a sense of pushing and rushing. In other words, he had given himself room to move because he had carefully prepared for it.

To open the concert, Thomas chose an "Oboe Concerto in C" attributed to Joseph Haydn. Whether he actually wrote it or not is not known for certain. Stylistically it could well be his. It could well be the work of a dozen other composers of that period. Whoever wrote it, it is a delightful, happy little work that is just fun to sit back and listen to.

Soloist Ralph Gomberg, principal oboe of the BSO, was just superb. The rapid scale passages and arpeggio figures were clearly and cleanly articulated, and the difficult intervallic leaps easily made. Gomberg beautifully controlled the line and phrase of the song that is the second movement of the work.

Conductor Thomas kept his orchestra, reduced to appropriate size for this work, nicely balanced with the soloist, emphasizing the forte passages following the oboe's line. Thomas took care to give Gomberg the time he needed. The results were just fine.

117

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 130,857
AUG 10 1972
New England Newsclip

This Weekend At Tanglewood

BS Sym

The seventh weekend of Tanglewood performances at the Berkshire Music Festival in Lenox, Mass., features the spectacular English conductor Colin Davis and on Sunday Berlioz' dramatic choral work, "Te Deum."

TOMORROW — 7 p.m., weekend prelude, Gina Bachauer, pianist; 9 p.m., Davis conducting Wagner's Wesendonck Songs, and Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde."

SATURDAY — 10:30 a.m., open rehearsal; 8:30 p.m., Davis conducting Berlioz' Overture "Les Francs-Juges." Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 with Gina Bachauer soloist and Brahms' Sym. No. 3.

SUNDAY — 2:30 pm., Davis conducting Beethoven's Sym. No. 3 "Eroica," and Berlioz' "Te Deum," featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
S. 207,211
AUG 13 1972
New England Newsclip

MUSIC

LENOX (Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood) —Colin Davis conducts Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 "Eroica" and Berlioz' Te Deum today at 2:30 p.m. Richard Leiws is the guest soloist.

LENOX (Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood) —The Berkshire Music Center offers a concert Tuesday afternoon beginning at 2:30 p.m. That same evening Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony, the Berkshire Music Center and the Boston University Young Artists Orchestras in an 8:30 p.m. concert.

LENOX (Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood) — The Boston Symphony Chamber Players Woodwind Quintet offers a weekend prelude at 7 p.m., Friday. Seiji Ozawa conducts Ligeti's Melodien for Orchestra and Alexis Weissenberg is the soloist in Chopin's Piano Concerto No. 1 beginning at 9 p.m.

LENOX (Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood) —Mozart's Paris Symphony and Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 with Misha Dichter soloist are on the program as Michael Tilson Thomas conducts Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
AUG 11 1972
New England Newsclip

Concert music is highlighted by the Tanglewood program in Lenox, offering works by Wagner and Verdi, Mozart, Brahms, and Berlioz. Colin Davis, musical director for the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, will conduct three concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this weekend.

BANNER
BENNINGTON, VT.
D. 6,000
AUG 11 1972
New England Newsclip

7th Tanglewood weekend features Wagner, Verdi

LENOX, Mass. — Colin Davis, music director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, conducts three concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood as part of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts tonight, Saturday and Sunday.

Tonight at 9 p.m. in the shed, Davis conducts the orchestra in music of Wagner and Verdi, including Wagner's "Funf Gedichte von Mathilde Wesendonk" ("Wesendonk songs") and the "Prelude and Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde." Soprano Jessye Norman is soloist in the "Wesendonk songs" and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde." Following intermission, Davis conducts the Boston Symphony and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus in a performance of Verdi's "Quattro Pezzi Sacri" (Four Sacred Pieces).

The Weekend Prelude, at 7 p.m. in the Shed and free to ticket-holders of the 9 p.m. concert, features pianist Gina Bachauer in a piano recital playing Mozart's Piano sonata in F, K. 332, Ravel's "Gaspard de la nuit," and Brahms' Variations on a theme by Paganini, set 2, op. 35.

Saturday morning at 10:30, Colin Davis leads the season's seventh open rehearsal. Tickets go on sale two hours before the beginning of the rehearsal at the Festival Ticket Office and are priced at $2.50 each. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund. The Saturday morning Open Rehearsals offer the public the opportunity to observe the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conductors, and soloists preparing music for the Berkshire Festival Concerts in a relaxed and informal atmosphere.

Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m., Davis conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Berlioz' overture to "Les francs-juges" (the first performance at the Berkshire Festival), Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 4 with soloist Gina Bachauer, and Brahms' Symphony no. 3.

Works of Beethoven and Berlioz will be featured at the Sunday afternoon Berkshire Festival concert, Aug. 13, at 2:30 p.m. The concert opens with Beethoven's Symphony no. 3 "Eroica," followed by a performance of Berlioz' exciting "Te Deum" with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, and Boston Symphony Orchestra organist Berj Zamkochian.

On Tuesday, Aug. 15 Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony conducts the annual Gala Benefit Concert for the Berkshire Music Center, at 8:30 p.m. in Tanglewood's music shed.

The concert, featuring the combined Boston Symphony, Berkshire Music Center and Boston University Young Artist Orchestras (the first concert ever to involve three orchestras in the Shed), includes Tchaikovsky's "1812 Overture" with cannons, Handel's "Royal Fireworks Music," Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" by Wagner.

Other Tanglewood-on-Parade events include an afternoon of "mini-concerts" given by members of the Berkshire Music Center beginning at 2:30 p.m. at various locations on the Tanglewood grounds. Vocal, instrumental, and chamber music programs, illustrative of the advanced work that takes place during the intense eight-week session of the Berkshire Music Center, highlight the afternoon's activities.

Call or write the Festival Ticket Office at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240. Tel (423) 637-1600 for reservations and further information.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
S. 106,767
AUG 13 1972
New England Newsclip

Summer Festivals Continue

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Much stirring music remains to be heard as the music festivals in the northeast approach the end of their summer seasons.

Five more concerts by the Boston Symphony remain for the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, including Tanglewood-on-Parade, Tuesday from 2 p.m. to approximately 11 p.m.

Today at 2:30 p.m., Colin Davis conducts the Boston Symphony in Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, "Eroica," and Berlioz' "Te Deum," with the Festival Chorus and Berj Zamgochian, organist.

Final Tanglewood concerts are Friday, Weekend Prelude, 7 p.m.; regular concert, 9 p.m. — Saturday at 8:30 p.m.; and Sunday at 2:30 p.m.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169
AUG 6 1972

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA — Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Today, 2:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducting Haydn and Mahler; Friday, 9 p.m., Cloin Davis conducting Wagner and Verdi; Saturday, 8:30 p.m., Colin Davis conducting Berlioz, Beethoven, and Brahms; next Sunday, 2:30 p.m. conlin Davis will conduct Beethoven and Berlioz.

At Tanglewood

CITIZEN
WINSTED, CONN.
D. 4,600
AUG 11 1972

Jessye Norman, will make her first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood at 9 p.m. Friday. She has sung with major opera companies in Europe including La Scala in Milan and Royal Opera House at Covet Garden.

Linda Phillips appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time on Aug. 20 at 2:30 p.m. She has appeared with the Philadelphia Orchestra, the American National Company and Boston Ballet Company.

Herald American
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
S. 251,094
AUG 6 1972

SOLOIST. Jessye Norman makes her first appearance with the Boston Symphony when Colins Davis conducts the orchestra in concert Friday at 9 p.m. at the Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. The program will be: Wagner's "Wesendonck Songs" and Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde" and Verdi's Four Sacred Pieces with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
AUG 6 1972
New England Newsclip

JESSYE NORMAN make her first appearance with the Boston Symphony Friday at 9. She has sung La Scala and Covent Garden.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
AUG 7 1972
New England Newsclip

Jessye Norman

. . . will make her first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening, Aug. 11, at 9. She has sung with major opera companies in Europe including La Scala, Milan, and the Royal Opera House at Covent Garden.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169
AUG 13 1972

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA— Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Berkshire Festival. Today, 2:30 p.m. Colin Davis conducting Beethoven and Berlioz with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus; Friday, 9 p.m. Seiji Ozawa conducting Ligeti, Chopin and Bartok; Saturday, 8:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducting Mozart, Messiaen and Brahms.

REVIEW
DARIEN, CONN.
W. 4,162
AUG 10 1972
New England Newsclip

Concerts At Tanglewood

BS

Friday evening August 11 at 9:00 p.m in the Shed, Mr. Davis conducts the Orchestra in music of Wagner and Verdi.

The Weekend Prelude, at 7 p.m. in the Shed and free to ticket-holders of the 9 p.m. concert, features pianist Gina Bachauer in a piano recital playing Mozart's Piano sonata in F, K. 332, Ravel's Gaspard de la nuit, and Brahms' Variations on a theme by Paganini, set 2, op. 35.

Saturday morning at 10:30, Colin Davis leads the season's seventh Open Rehearsal. Tickets go on sale two hours before the beginning of the rehearsal at the Festival Ticket Office. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund. The Saturday morning Open Rehearsals offer the public the opportunity to observe the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conductors, and soloists preparing music for the Berkshire Festival Concerts in a relaxed and informal atmosphere.

Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m., Mr. Davis conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Berlioz' overture to Le francs-juges (the first performance at the Berkshire Festival, Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 4 with soloist Gina Bachauer, and Brahms' Symphony no. 3.

Works of Beethoven and Berlioz will be featured at the Sunday afternoon Berkshire Festival concert, August 13, 1972 at 2:30 p.m. The concert opens with Beethoven's Symphony no. 3 "Eroica," followed by a performance of Berlioz' exciting Te Deum with the Tangle wood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, and Boston Symphony Orchestra organist Berj Zamkochian.

Tickets for these concerts, and all other Berkshire Festival concerts are now on sale at the Berkshire Festival Ticket Office in Lenox, Massachusetts 01240, area code 413, 637-1600, and at all Ticketron locations in New York and New England.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 130,857

AUG 10 1972 New England Newsclip

This Weekend At Tanglewood

The seventh weekend of Tanglewood performances at the Berkshire Music Festival in Lenox, Mass., features the spectacular English conductor Colin Davis and on Sunday Berlioz' dramatic choral work, "Te Deum."

TOMORROW — 7 p.m., weekend prelude, Gina Bachauer, pianist; 9 p.m., Davis conducting Wagner's Wesendonck Songs, and Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde."

SATURDAY — 10:30 a.m., noon rehearsal; 8:30 p.m., Davis conducting Berlioz' Overture "Les Francs-Juges," Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 with Gina Bachauer soloist, and Brahms' Sym. No. 3.

SUNDAY — 2:30 pm., Davis conducting Beethoven's Sym. No. 3 "Eroica," and Berlioz' "Te Deum," featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
S. 207,211

AUG 13 1972 New England Newsclip

MUSIC

LENOX (Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood) —Colin Davis conducts Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 "Eroica" and Berlioz' Te Deum today at 2:30 p.m. Richard Leiws is the guest soloist.

LENOX (Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood) —The Berkshire Music Center offers a concert Tuesday afternoon beginning at 2:30 p.m. That same evening Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony, the Berkshire Music Center and the Boston University Young Artists Orchestras in an 8:30 p.m. concert.

LENOX (Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood) — The Boston Symphony Chamber Players Woodwind Quintet offers a weekend prelude at 7 p.m., Friday. Seiji Ozawa conducts Ligeti's Melodien for Orchestra and Alexis Weissenberg is the soloist in Chopin's Piano Concerto No. 1 beginning at 9 p.m.

LENOX (Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood) —Mozart's Paris Symphony and Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 with Misha Dichter soloist are on the program as Michael Tilson Thomas conducts Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

AUG 11 1972 New England Newsclip

Concert music is highlighted by the Tanglewood program in Lenox, offering works by Wagner and Verdi, Mozart, Brahms, and Berlioz. Colin Davis, musical director for the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, will conduct three concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this weekend.

BANNER
BENNINGTON, VT.
D. 6,000

AUG 11 1972 New England Newsclip

7th Tanglewood weekend features Wagner, Verdi

LENOX, Mass. — Colin Davis, music director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, conducts three concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood as part of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts tonight, Saturday and Sunday.

Tonight at 9 p.m. in the shed, Davis conducts the orchestra in music of Wagner and Verdi, including Wagner's "Funf Gedichte von Mathilde Wesendonk" ("Wesendonk songs") and the "Prelude and Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde." Soprano Jessye Norman is soloist in the "Wesendonk songs" and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde." Following intermission, Davis conducts the Boston Symphony and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus in a performance of Verdi's "Quattro Pezzi Sacri" (Four Sacred Pieces).

The Weekend Prelude, at 7 p.m. in the Shed and free to ticket-holders of the 9 p.m. concert, features pianist Gina Bachauer in a piano recital playing Mozart's Piano sonata in F, K. 332, Ravel's "Gaspard de la nuit," and Brahms' Variations on a theme by Paganini, set 2, op. 35.

Saturday morning at 10:30, Colin Davis leads the season's seventh open rehearsal. Tickets go on sale two hours before the beginning of the rehearsal at the Festival Ticket Office and are priced at $2.50 each. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund. The Saturday morning Open Rehearsals offer the public the opportunity to observe the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conductors, and soloists preparing music for the Berkshire Festival Concerts in a relaxed and informal atmosphere.

Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m., Davis conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Berlioz' overture to "Les francs-juges" (the first performance at the Berkshire Festival), Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 4 with soloist Gina Bachauer, and Brahms' Symphony no. 3.

Works of Beethoven and Berlioz will be featured at the Sunday afternoon Berkshire Festival concert, Aug. 13, at 2:30 p.m. The concert opens with Beethoven's Symphony no. 3 "Eroica," followed by a performance of Berlioz' exciting "Te Deum" with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, and Boston Symphony Orchestra organist Berj Zamkochian.

On Tuesday, Aug. 15 Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony conducts the annual Gala Benefit Concert for the Berkshire Music Center, at 8:30 p.m. in Tanglewood's music shed.

The concert, featuring the combined Boston Symphony, Berkshire Music Center and Boston University Young Artist Orchestras (the first concert ever to involve three orchestras in the Shed), includes Tchaikovsky's "1812 Overture" with cannons, Handel's "Royal Fireworks Music," Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" by Wagner.

Other Tanglewood-on-Parade events include an afternoon of "mini-concerts" given by members of the Berkshire Music Center beginning at 2:30 p.m. at various locations on the Tanglewood grounds. Vocal, instrumental, and chamber music programs, illustrative of the advanced work that takes place during the intense eight-week session of the Berkshire Music Center, highlight the afternoon's activities.

Call or write the Festival Ticket Office at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240. Tel (423) 637-1600 for reservations and further information.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
S. 105,767

AUG 13 1972 New England Newsclip

Summer Festivals Continue

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Much stirring music remains to be heard as the music festivals in the northeast approach the end of their summer seasons.

Five more concerts by the Boston Symphony remain for the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, including Tanglewood-on-Parade, Tuesday from 2 p.m. to approximately 11 p.m.

Today at 2:30 p.m., Colin Davis conducts the Boston Symphony in Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, "Eroica," and Berlioz' "Te Deum," with the Festival Chorus and Berj Zamgochian, organist.

Final Tanglewood concerts are Friday, Weekend Prelude, 7 p.m.; regular concert, 9 p.m. — Saturday at 8:30 p.m.; and Sunday at 2:30 p.m.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

AUG 6 1972

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA — Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Today, 2:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducting Haydn and Mahler; Friday, 9 p.m., Cloin Davis conducting Wagner and Verdi; Saturday, 8:30 p.m., Colin Davis conducting Berlioz, Beethoven, and Brahms; next Sunday, 2:30 p.m. conlin Davis will conduct Beethoven and Berlioz.

At Tanglewood

CITIZEN
WINSTED, CONN.
D. 4,600

AUG 11 1972

Jessye Norman, will make her first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood at 9 p.m. Friday. She has sung with major opera companies in Europe including La Scala in Milan and Royal Opera House at Covet Garden.

Linda Phillips appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time on Aug. 20 at 2:30 p.m. She has appeared with the Philadelphia Orchestra, the American National Company and Boston Ballet Company.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

AUG 6 1972 New England Newsclip

Herald American
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
S. 251,094

AUG 6 1972

SOLOIST. Jessye Norman makes her first appearance with the Boston Symphony when Colins Davis conducts the orchestra in concert Friday at 9 p.m. at the Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. The program will be: Wagner's "Wesendonck Songs" and Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde" and Verdi's Four Sacred Pieces with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

JESSYE NORMAN make her first appearance with the Boston Symphony Fr day at 9. She has sung La Scala and Covent G den.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

AUG 7 1972 New England Newsclip

Jessye Norman

. . . will make her first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening, Aug. 11, at 9. She has sung with major opera companies in Europe including La Scala, Milan, and the Royal Opera House at Covent Garden.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

AUG 13 1972

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA— Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Berkshire Festival. Today, 2:30 p.m. Colin Davis conducting Beethoven and Berlioz with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus; Friday, 9 p.m. Seiji Ozawa conducting Ligeti, Chopin and Bartok; Saturday, 8:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducting Mozart, Messiaen and Brahms.

REVIEW
DARIEN, CONN.
W. 4,162

AUG 10 1972 New England Newsclip

Concerts At Tanglewood

Friday evening August 11 at 9:00 p.m in the Shed, Mr. Davis conducts the Orchestra in music of Wagner and Verdi.

The Weekend Prelude, at 7 p.m. in the Shed and free to ticket-holders of the 9 p.m. concert, features pianist Gina Bachauer in a piano recital playing Mozart's Piano sonata in F, K. 332, Ravel's Gaspard de la nuit, and Brahms' Variations on a theme by Paganini, set 2, op. 35.

Saturday morning at 10:30, Colin Davis leads the season's seventh Open Rehearsal. Tickets go on sale two hours before the beginning of the rehearsal at the Festival Ticket Office. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund. The Saturday morning Open Rehearsals offer the public the opportunity to observe the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conductors, and soloists preparing music for the Berkshire Festival Concerts in a relaxed and informal atmosphere.

Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m., Mr. Davis conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Berlioz' overture to Le francs-juges (the first performance at the Berkshire Festival, Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 4 with soloist Gina Bachauer, and Brahms' Symphony no. 3.

Works of Beethoven and Berlioz will be featured at the Sunday afternoon Berkshire Festival concert, August 13, 1972 at 2:30 p.m. The concert opens with Beethoven's Symphony no. 3 "Eroica," followed by a performance of Berlioz' exciting Te Deum with the Tangle wood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, and Boston Symphony Orchestra organist Berj Zamkochian.

Tickets for these concerts, and all other Berkshire Festival concerts are now on sale at the Berkshire Festival Ticket Office in Lenox, Massachusetts 01240, area code 413, 637-1600, and at all Ticketron locations in New York and New England.

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
S. 40,129

AUG 8 1972

New England Newsclip

Outstanding soloists to perform at Berkshire

By ALFRED W. BURKE
Sun Music Critic

Music

WILLIAM STEINBERG

LOWELL — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, William Steinberg, Music Director, will present two outstanding solo artists during the coming week's activities at the Berkshire Festival.

To perform will be the world renown pianist, Gina Bachauer, and the distinguished American organist, Berj Zamkochian.

For the weekend concerts which start Friday evening with a Prelude Concert (7 p.m.) in the Shed, Colin Davis who is music director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, will conduct. Among the program highlights will be Verdi's Quattro Pezzi Sacri (four sacred pieces) and Berlioz's Te Deum with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus under the direction of John Oliver.

The Weekend Prelude which is free to ticket-holders of the 9 p.m., concert, will feature Gina Bachauer in a piano recital playing Mozart's Piano Sonata in F, K. 332, Ravel's Gaspard de la nuit and Brahms' Variations on a theme by Paganini, set 2, op. 35.

At the 9 p.m., concert Mr. Davis will conduct the Boston Symphony in music of Wagner and Verdi. The Wagner pieces will include Funf Gedichte von Mathilde Wesendonk (Wesendonk songs), and the "Prelude anl Liebstod" from "Tristan und Isolde. Soprano Jessye Norma will be the soloist in the Wagner selections. Following intermission Mr. Davis will conduct the Boston Symphony and Tanglewood Festival Chorus in a performance of Verdi's "Four Sacred Pieces."

ON Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m., Colin Davis will lead the season's seventh Open Rehearsal. The Saturday morning Open Rehearsals offer the public the opportunity to observe the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conductors and soloists preparing music for the Berkshire Festival concerts in a relaxed and informal atmosphere.

Saturday evening at 8:30 p. m., Mr. Davis will conduct the initial performance at the Berkshire Festival of Berlioz's Overture to Les francsjuges, and Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 with soloist Gina Bachauer, and Brahms' Symphony No. 3.

Works of Beethoven and Berlioz will be featured at the Sunday afternoon Berkshire Festival concert (Aug. 13). The program will open with Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 "Eroica", followed by a performance of Berlioz' exciting Te Deum with the Festival Chorus. Guest artist will be organist Berj Zamkochian.

Berj Zamkochian is widely known in this city having performed here on several occasions. He is organist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and one of the most noted artists in his field throughout the music world. He has been a recitalist for many years.

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 129,656

AUG 8 1972

TWO AT TANGLEWOOD. Gina Bachauer joins the Boston Symphony for concerts Friday at 7 and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. at the Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Friday's performance will feature the pianist in selections by Mozart, Ravel and Brahms. Saturday, she will play Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4. Both concerts will be conducted by Colin Davis, who becomes principal conductor of the BSO this fall.

Gina Bachauer, Queen of the Concert Pianists

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

"An artist does not play for his audience. He plays for himself and must not betray his art."

That is the creed by which the Greek pianist, Gina Bachauer, has lived her musical life since her debut in Athens at the age of 25.

It has maintained her position as "Queen of Pianists" in the keyboard hierarchy.

Born in Athens, May 21, 1913, Miss Bachauer is descended of Austrian forebears who had settled in Greece. Bachauer is an Austrian name and the family traces its lineage back to the 17th century.

The family has lived in Greece for four generations and Miss Bachauer feels that she is Greek.

Worcester Performances

Miss Bachauer first played in Worcester on the Civic Music series in 1951, about one year after her sensational New York debut.

She returned to Civic Music in 1953, and played with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Paul Paray, at the 1960 Worcester Festival.

A couple of weeks ago, Miss Bachauer received a standing ovation at her Tanglewood recital on the Friday night Weekend Prelude. The following night, she played Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto with the Boston Symphony conducted by Colin Davis.

It was nothing unusual for Miss Bachauer.

Following her American debut in 1950, she played 11 different concertos in England in six weeks. In Israel she made 15 appearances with the Israel Philharmonic in 19 days.

Miss Bachauer and her husband, Alec Sherman, arrived at Lenox on Monday preceding her weekend Tanglewood appearances.

They occupied a private wing at Wheatleigh, a residential hotel within sound of Tanglewood. The lower room had an out-of-tune spinet. Sleeping quarters upstairs were reached by an iron spiral staircase.

Prisoner of Piano

"As always, I was a prisoner with my piano," she says. "It wasn't until Wednesday that I ventured out of doors and saw the beautiful grounds."

This has been Miss Bachauer's life since her days at Athens University where she studied law and practiced the piano far into the night.

After two years at the university, her father faced the inevitable and allowed her to go to Paris to study with the eminent pianist, Alfred Cortot at the Ecole Normale. Later, she worked with Sergei Rachmaninoff — one of his few students.

"Cortot impressed upon me that most of the work must be done before one began to concertize," she says. Actually, she "coached" rather than "took lessons" with Cortot and Rachmaninoff.

When Miss Bachauer made her Athens debut in Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto (which she played at the Worcester Festival), she knew at least 15 piano concertos and as many recital programs.

Repertoire Needed

"Before Cortot considered a pianist ready to embark on a career, he was expected to know the entire Well-Tempered Clavichord by Bach, all of the piano sonatas by Beethoven and Mozart, a sizable repertory of Scarlatti and Haydn," says Miss Bachauer, "plus, of course, the romantics and a good knowledge of French music."

Incidentally, it was Wademar Freeman, her teacher at the Athens Conservatory, who sent her to Cortot "to learn about French music which he didn't feel qualified to teach."

Gina Bachauer at the keyboard.

And it was Freeman who later introduced her to Rachmaninoff.

"For a typical lesson with Cortot," she recalls, "I would be prepared to play both Chopin sonatas, Ravel's 'Gaspard de la Nuit,' and Debussy's 'Pour le Piano.'"

"One time Cortot said that I was to be ready with Chopin's F minor Concerto, in 10 days. I was too frightened to tell him that I didn't know it. But I knew it from memory when the time came."

Miss Bachauer has toured the world constantly during the past 34 years, traveling more than two million miles.

She is much impressed with the growth of American audiences since the early part of her career.

Tastes Improved

"Concerts have grown here," she says. "There are now large halls. University orchestras have improved enormously. Taste has improved and an artist can play just about anything he wishes for an American audience."

Miss Bachauer does not agree with the claim that orchestral standards are deteriorating because of frequent changes in conductors.

"As a wonderful instrument, an orchestra will always respond to a skilled musician," she says, "just like a fine piano."

Miss Bachauer is alarmed and saddened by young artists who are catapulted (her own term) into professional careers before they are ready.

"The young want a career as fast as possible," she says. "It takes years to build a career. Some years ago, it was easier for a European to accomplish this in America. But America has produced its own artists and heard the best."

"Talent means work!" she declares. "It means the sacrifice of everything else. An artist isn't even allowed to be sick. No matter what, he must be totally involved with his music.

"It is a great mistake for a young artist to set out with a small repertory and try to learn new music while he's concertizing. It just doesn't work that way."

Miss Bachaeur reflects greatness by her very stage appearance. She enters slowly, head high, and looks fixedly at the audience before bowing. She then nods to several segments of the audience.

What does Miss Bachauer think about when she comes onstage and faces a huge audience?

"I must feel that I have done everything possible to make this my best concert," she reveals. "If it doesn't come out that way, I can become reconciled to it because my conscience is clear."

Miss Bachauer feels freer interpretively with some conductors. She cites Davis as one of her favorites.

What qualifications does Miss Bacheur feel are necessary for an artist to be successful — besides the ability to create sensations on the concert platform?

"First, a general music education," she says. "I mean harmony, counterpoint, history, chamber music. Those are the bare essentials. Then, the young artist should speak several languages because he will be traveling in many countries.

"In addition, he should be well-read. He must know poetry because poetry and music are closely related. He should accompany singers. They will teach him where he should breathe in his own playing, how to finish a phrase and start another."

Sophistication Needed

"As I travel about the world, I meet many persons who do not always talk to me about music," she explains. "They might ask me about the latest translation of a Greek text, or books, architecture. They expect me to know about all kinds of current events that interest them. They even talk to me about cooking."

Miss Bachauer is managed by Sol Hurok and takes great satisfaction in the freedom she has in selecting her own recital programs.

The exception, of course, is concertos. An orchestra may have eight or more pianists appearing the same season. Naturally, the same concerto can't be played by two pianists. So, she submits a list of a dozen or more from which they may select what fits into the schedule. At the time, they are all ready to be played.

Miss Bachauer keeps a large volume that her husband calls "Gina's bible." It gives a complete list of every recital and orchestral appearance she has made throughout her career.

Doesn't Repeat

She explains, "If I am booked to play in Holland, for example, I check in the 'bible' to see what I played there before, so that I won't repeat."

In spite of her gargantuan repertory, Miss Bachauer is still learning new music.

She never studies a new work at the piano.

"I practice it with my eyes away from the piano for about 15 days," she says. "I like to do this studying while sitting up in bed. At the end of two weeks, I decide whether it interests me or not. If it does, I already know the notes and how I want them to sound when I take the work to the keyboard."

Last season, Miss Bachauer made a series of appearances with the New York Philharmonic.

"In New York, where I have played so often, I must continually change my programs, so I must always learn new music."

Miss Bachauer feels that "avant-garde" music is purely experimental at the present. She is tolerant of it and agrees that it deserves to be heard.

"But, I don't play avant-garde music," she says bluntly.

Thoughts on Women's Lib

The women's liberation movement.

"Women's advantage is that they have more stamina than men," she states. "They should be given more opportunity as composers and performers in symphony orchestras."

Then, looking at her husband, she added:

"But, being a Greek woman, I like protection from a man."

Mr. and Mrs. Sherman have homes in London, Athens, and maintain an apartment in New York City. London is their "most permanent" home.

How much time do they have "at home?"

"Last year I added up our occasional two or three days at home in London," says Sherman. "It came to about four-and-a-half weeks."

The rest of the time, Miss Bachauer and her husband are world residents.

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
S. 40,129

AUG 8 1972

New England Newsclip

Outstanding soloists to perform at Berkshire

By ALFRED W. BURKE
Sun Music Critic

Music

LOWELL — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, William Steinberg, Music Director, will present two outstanding solo artists during the coming week's activities at the Berkshire Festival.

To perform will be the world renown pianist. Gina Bachauer, and the distinguished American organist, Berj Zamkochian.

For the weekend concerts which start Friday evening with a Prelude Concert (7 p.m.) in the Shed, Colin Davis who is music director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, will conduct. Among the program highlights will be Verdi's Quattro Pezzi Sacri (four sacred pieces) and Berlioz's Te Deum with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus under the direction of John Oliver.

The Weekend Prelude which is free to ticket-holders of the 9 p.m., concert, will feature Gina Bachauer in a piano recital playing Mozart's Piano Sonata in F, K. 332, Ravel's Gaspard de la nuit and Brahms' Variations on a theme by Paganini, set 2, op. 35.

At the 9 p.m., concert Mr. Davis will conduct the Boston Symphony in music of Wagner and Verdi. The Wagner pieces will include Funf Gedichte von Mathilde Wesendonk (Wesendonk songs), and the "Prelude anl Liebstod" from "Tristan und Isolde. Soprano Jessye Norma will be the soloist in the Wagner selections. Following intermission Mr. Davis will conduct the Boston Symphony and Tanglewood Festival Chorus in a performance of Verdi's "Four Sacred Pieces."

ON Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m., Colin Davis will lead the season's seventh Open Rehearsal. The Saturday morning Open Rehearsals offer the public the opportunity to observe the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conductors and soloists preparing music for the Berkshire Festival concerts in a relaxed and informal atmosphere.

Saturday evening at 8:30 p. m., Mr. Davis will conduct the initial performance at the Berkshire Festival of Berlioz's Overture to Les francsjuges, and Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 with soloist Gina Bachauer, and Brahms' Symphony No. 3.

Works of Beethoven and Berlioz will be featured at the Sunday afternoon Berkshire Festival concert (Aug. 13). The program will open with Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 "Eroica", followed by a performance of Berlioz' exciting Te Deum with the Festival Chorus. Guest artist will be organist Berj Zamkochian.

Berj Zamkochian is widely known in this city having performed here on several occasions. He is organist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and one of the most noted artists in his field throughout the music world. He has been a recitalist for many years.

WILLIAM STEINBERG

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 129,656

AUG 8 1972

TWO AT TANGLEWOOD. Gina Bachauer joins the Boston Symphony for concerts Friday at 7 and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. at the Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Friday's performance will feature the pianist in selections by Mozart, Ravel and Brahms. Saturday, she will play Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4. Both concerts will be conducted by Colin Davis, who becomes principal conductor of the BSO this fall.

Gina Bachauer, Queen of the Concert Pianists

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

"An artist does not play for his audience. He plays for himself and must not betray his art."

That is the creed by which the Greek pianist, Gina Bachauer, has lived her musical life since her debut in Athens at the age of 25.

It has maintained her position as "Queen of Pianists" in the keyboard hierarchy.

Born in Athens, May 21, 1913, Miss Bachauer is descended of Austrian forebears who had settled in Greece. Bachauer is an Austrian name and the family traces its lineage back to the 17th century.

The family has lived in Greece for four generations and Miss Bachauer feels that she is Greek.

Worcester Performances

Miss Bachauer first played in Worcester on the Civic Music series in 1951, about one year after her sensational New York debut.

She returned to Civic Music in 1953, and played with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Paul Paray, at the 1960 Worcester Festival.

A couple of weeks ago, Miss Bachauer received a standing ovation at her Tanglewood recital on the Friday night Weekend Prelude. The following night, she played Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto with the Boston Symphony, conducted by Colin Davis.

It was nothing unusual for Miss Bachauer.

Following her American debut in 1950, she played 11 different concertos in England in six weeks. In Israel she made 15 appearances with the Israel Philharmonic in 19 days.

Miss Bachauer and her husband, Alec Sherman, arrived at Lenox on Monday preceding her weekend Tanglewood appearances.

They occupied a private wing at Wheatleigh, a residential hotel within sound of Tanglewood. The lower room had an out-of-tune spinet. Sleeping quarters upstairs were reached by an iron spiral staircase.

Prisoner of Piano

"As always, I was a prisoner with my piano," she says. "It wasn't until Wednesday that I ventured out of doors and saw the beautiful grounds."

This has been Miss Bachauer's life since her days at Athens University where she studied law and practiced the piano far into the night.

After two years at the university, her father faced the inevitable and allowed her to go to Paris to study with the eminent pianist, Alfred Cortot at the Ecole Normale. Later, she worked with Sergei Rachmaninoff — one of his few students.

"Cortot impressed upon me that most of the work must be done before one began to concertize," she says. Actually, she "coached" rather than "took lessons" with Cortot and Rachmaninoff.

When Miss Bachauer made her Athens debut in Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto (which she played at the Worcester Festival), she knew at least 15 piano concertos and as many recital programs.

Repertoire Needed

"Before Cortot considered a pianist ready to embark on a career, he was expected to know the entire Well-Tempered Clavichord by Bach, all of the piano sonatas by Beethoven and Mozart, a sizable repertory of Scarlatti and Haydn," says Miss Bachauer, "plus, of course, the romantics and a good knowledge of French music."

Incidentally, it was Wademar Freeman, her teacher at the Athens Conservatory, who sent her to Cortot "to learn about French music which he didn't feel qualified to teach."

Gina Bachauer at the keyboard.

And it was Freeman who later introduced her to Rachmaninoff.

"For a typical lesson with Cortot," she recalls, "I would be prepared to play both Chopin sonatas, Ravel's 'Gaspard de la Nuit,' and Debussy's 'Pour le Piano.' "

"One time Cortot said that I was to be ready with Chopin's F minor Concerto, in 10 days. I was too frightened to tell him that I didn't know it. But I knew it from memory when the time came."

Miss Bachauer has toured the world constantly during the past 34 years, traveling more than two million miles.

She is much impressed with the growth of American audiences since the early part of her career.

Tastes Improved

"Concerts have grown here," she says. "There are now large halls. University orchestras have improved enormously. Taste has improved and an artist can play just about anything he wishes for an American audience."

Miss Bachauer does not agree with the claim that orchestral standards are deteriorating because of frequent changes in conductors.

"As a wonderful instrument, an orchestra will always respond to a skilled musician," she says, "just like a fine piano."

Miss Bachauer is alarmed and saddened by young artists who are catapulted (her own term) into professional careers before they are ready.

"The young want a career as fast as possible," she says. "It takes years to build a career. Some years ago, it was easier for a European to accomplish this in America. But America has produced its own artists and heard the best."

"Talent means work!" she declares. "It means the sacrifice of everything else. An artist isn't even allowed to be sick. No matter what, he must be totally involved with his music.

"It is a great mistake for a young artist to set out with a small repertory and try to learn new music while he's concertizing. It just doesn't work that way."

Miss Bachaeur reflects greatness by her very stage appearance. She enters slowly, head high, and looks fixedly at the audience before bowing. She then nods to several segments of the audience.

What does Miss Bachauer think about when she comes onstage and faces a huge audience?

"I must feel that I have done everything possible to make this my best concert," she reveals. "If it doesn't come out that way, I can become reconciled to it because my conscience is clear."

Miss Bachauer feels freer interpretively with some conductors. She cites Davis as one of her favorites.

What qualifications does Miss Bacheur feel are necessary for an artist to be successful — besides the ability to create sensations on the concert platform?

"First, a general music education," she says. "I mean harmony, counterpoint, history, chamber music. Those are the bare essentials. Then, the young artist should speak several languages because he will be traveling in many countries.

"In addition, he should be well-read. He must know poetry because poetry and music are closely related. He should accompany singers. They will teach him where he should breathe in his own playing, how to finish a phrase and start another."

Sophistication Needed

"As I travel about the world, I meet many persons who do not always talk to me about music," she explains. "They might ask me about the latest translation of a Greek text, or books, architecture. They expect me to know about all kinds of current events that interest them. They even talk to me about cooking."

Miss Bachauer is managed by Sol Hurok and takes great satisfaction in the freedom she has in selecting her own recital programs.

The exception, of course, is concertos. An orchestra may have eight or more pianists appearing the same season. Naturally, the same concerto can't be played by two pianists. So, she submits a list of a dozen or more from which they may select what fits into the schedule. At the time, they are all ready to be played.

Miss Bachauer keeps a large volume that her husband calls "Gina's bible." It gives a complete list of every recital and orchestral appearance she has made throughout her career.

Doesn't Repeat

She explains, "If I am booked to play in Holland, for example, I check in the 'bible' to see what I played there before, so that I won't repeat."

In spite of her gargantuan repertory, Miss Bachauer is still learning new music.

She never studies a new work at the piano.

"I practice it with my eyes away from the piano for about 15 days," she says. "I like to do this studying while sitting up in bed. At the end of two weeks, I decide whether it interests me or not. If it does, I already know the notes and how I want them to sound when I take the work to the keyboard."

Last season, Miss Bachauer made a series of appearances with the New York Philharmonic.

"In New York, where I have played so often, I must continually change my programs, so I must always learn new music."

Miss Bachauer feels that "avant-garde" music is purely experimental at the present. She is tolerant of it and agrees that it deserves to be heard.

"But, I don't play avant-garde music," she says bluntly.

Thoughts on Women's Lib

The women's liberation movement.

"Women's advantage is that they have more stamina than men," she states. "They should be given more opportunity as composers and performers in symphony orchestras."

Then, looking at her husband, she added:

"But, being a Greek woman, I like protection from a man."

Mr. and Mrs. Sherman have homes in London, Athens, and maintain an apartment in New York City. London is their "most permanent" home.

How much time do they have "at home?"

"Last year I added up our occasional two or three days at home in London," says Sherman. "It came to about four-and-a-half weeks."

The rest of the time, Miss Bachauer and her husband are world residents.

PASTE OVER

119

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
AUG 11 1972
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood, — Colin Davis, Music Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, and Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in September 1972, conducts three concerts by the Boston Symphony Aug. 11, 12, and 13. This evening at 9 in the Shed, Davis conducts the Orchestra in music of Wagner and Verdi, including Wagner's "Funf Gedichte von Mathilde Wesendonk" (Wesendonk songs) and the "Prelude and Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde." Soprano Jessye Norman is soloist in the Wesendonk songs and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde." Follosing intermission, Davis conducts the Boston Symphony and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus in a performance of Verdi's "Quattro Pezzi Sacri (Four Sacred Pieces). The Weekend Prelude, at 7 p.m. in the Shed and free to ticket-holders of the 9 p.m. concert, features pianist Gina Bachauer playing Mozart's Piano sonata in F, K. 332, Ravel's "Gaspard de la nuit," and Brahms' Variations on a theme by Paganini, set 2, op. 35. Saturday morning at 10:30, Davis leads the season's seventh Open Rehearsal. Tickets go on sale at 8:30 a.m. at the Festival Ticket Office, price is $2.50.

NEWS
WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS.
W. 1,289
AUG 10 1972
New England Newsclip

Colin Davis directing at Tanglewood

Colin Davis, music director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, London, and principalguest conductor of the Boscipal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra starting next month, conducts three concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood for the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts tomorrow (Friday), Saturday, and Sunday.

Tomorrow at 9 p.m. in the Shed, he leads the orchestra in music by Wagner and Verdi, to include Wagner's "Funf Gedichte von Mathilde Wesendonk," (Wesendock songs) and the prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde." Soprano Jessye Norman is soloist for the Wesendonk songs and Liebestad.

After intermission, Mr. Davis will conduct the BSO and Tanglewood Festival Chorus in Verdi's Quattre Pezzi Sacri" (Four Sacred Pieces). The weekend prelude in the Shed a 7 p.m. Friday and free to hold ers of tickets to the 9 o'cloc concert, features Gina Bachau er in a piano recital, playing Mozart's piano sonata in F, K. 332, Ravel's "Gaspard de la Nuit," and Brahms' Variations on a theme by Paganini, set 2, op. 35.

Saturday at 10:30 a.m., Mr. Davis leads the season's seventh open rehearsal for which tickets go on sale two hours before the rehearsal starts. Saturday evening at 8:30, Mr. Davis conducts the BSO in Berlioz's overture to Les Francs-juges, it s first performance at the Festival, Beethoven's piano concerto no. 4 with solist Miss Bachauer, and Brahms' Symphony no. 3 "Eroica," followed by Berlioz's Te Deum with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director and organist Berj Zamkochian.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor, leads the annual Gala Benefit Concert for the Berkshire Music Center Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, featuring the combined Boston Symphony, Berkshire Music Center and Boston University Young Artist orchestras. This is the first concert ever to involve three orchestras in the Shed. Included will be Tchaikovsky's 1812 Overture with real cannons, Handel's Royal Fireworks Music, Respighi's "Fountains of Rome," and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," by Wagner.

Other Tanglewood-on-Parade events include an afternoon of mini-concerts by members of the Berkshire Music Center starting at 2:30 p.m. at various spots on the grounds. Vocal, instrumental, and chamber music programs showing the intense eight-week session of the Berkshire Music Center are afternoon highlights.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514
AUG 4 1972
New England Newsclip

Colin Davis to conduct at Tanglewood

LENOX — Colin Davis, Music Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, and principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in September 1972, conducts three concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood as part of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts August 11, 12, and 13.

Friday evening August 11 at 9:00 p.m. in the Shed, Mr. Davis conducts the orchestra in music of Wagner and Verdi including Wagner's 'Funf Gedichte von Mathilde Wesendonk' (Wesendonk songs) and the "Prelude and Liebestod" from 'Tristan and Isolde.' Soprano Jessye Norman is solist in the 'Wesendonk songs' and "Liebestod" from 'Tristan and Isolde.' Following intermission, Mr. Davis conducts the Boston Symphony and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus in a performance of Verdi's 'Quattro Pezzi Sacri' (Four Sacrd Pieces).

MOZART

The Weekend Prelude, at 7:00 p.m. in the Shed and free to ticket-holders of the 9:00 p.m. concert, features pianist Gina Bachauer in a piano recital playing Mozart's Piano sonata in F, K. 332, Ravel's 'Gaspard de la nuit,' and Brahms' Variations on a theme by Paganini, set 2, op. 35.

Saturday morning at 10:30, Colin Davis leads the season's seventh open rehearsal. Tickets go on sale two hours before the beginning of the rehearsal at the Festival Ticket Office and are priced at $2.50 each. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund. The Saturday morning open rehearsals offer the public the opportunity to observe the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conductors, and soloists preparing music for the Berkshire Festival Concerts in a relaxed and informal atmosphere.

BERLIOZ

Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m., Mr. Davis conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Berlioz' overture to 'Les francs-juges' (the first performance at the Berkshire Festival), Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 4 with soloist Gina Bachauer, and Brahm's Symphony no. 3.

Works of Beethoven and Berlioz will be featured at the Sunday afternoon Berkshire Festival concert, August 13, 1972 at 2:30 p.m. The concert opens with Beethoven's Symphony no. 3 "Eroica", followed by a performance of Berlioz' exciting 'Te Deum' with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, and Boston Symphony Orchestra organist Berj Zamkochian.

FIREWORKS

Tanglewood - on - parade on August 15 begins at 2:00 p.m. with concerts all afternoon featuring ensembles of Berkshire Music Center students. Highlight of the day is the gala concert by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in music that includes Handel's Royal Fireworks Music, and Tchaikovksy's 1812 Overture, complete with canons and fireworks over the Stockbridge Bowl.

Tickets for these concerts, and all other Berkshire Festival concerts are now on sale at the Berkshire Festival Ticket Office in Lenox, Massachusetts 01240, area code 413, 637-1600, and at all Ticketron locations in New York and New England.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 117,499
AUG 6 1972
New England Newsclip

Davis Guest Conductor

LENOX — Colin Davis, Music Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, and Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in September 1972, conducts three concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood as part of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts Aug. 11, 12, and 13.

Friday evening Aug. 11 at 9 p.m. in the Shed, Mr. Davis conducts the Orchestra in music of Wagner and Verdi, including Wagner's Funf Gedichte von Mathilde Wesendonk (Wesendonk songs) and the "Prelude and Liebestod" from Tristan and Isolde. Soprano Jessye Norman is soloist in the Wesendonk songs and "Liebestod" from Tristan and Isolde.

COLIN DAVIS

Following intermission, Mr. Davis conducts the Boston Symphony and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus in a performance of Verdi's Quattro Pezzi Sacri (Four Sacred Pieces).

The Weekend Prelude, at 7 p.m. in the Shed and free to ticket - holders of the 9 p.m. concert, features pianist Gina Bachauer in a piano recital playing Mozart's Piano sonata in F, K. 332, Ravel's Gaspard de la nuit, and Brahms' Variations on a theme by Paganini, set 2, op. 35.

Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m., Mr. Davis conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Berlioz' overture to Les francs-juges (the first performance at the Berkshire Festival), Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 4 with soloist Gina Bachauer, and Brahms' Symphony No. 3.

Works of Beethoven and Berlioz will be featured at the Sunday afternoon Berkshire Festival concert, Aug. 13, 1972 at 2:30 p.m.

The concert opens with Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 "Eroica", followed by a performance of Berlioz' exciting Te Deum with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, and Boston Symphony Orchestra organist Berj Zamkochian.

Tickets for these concerts, and all other Berkshire Festival concerts are now on sale at the Berkshi Festival Ticket Office Lenox, Massachusetts 012 area code 413, 637-1600, a at all Ticketron locations New York and New Englar

GREENVILLE, N.Y.
LOCAL
W. 1,475
AUG 9 1972

Colin Davis To Conduct At Tanglewood

This weekend at Tanglewood all Colin Davis as he will be c ducting the Boston Symphony in three of the weekend concerts the Berkshire Music Festival.

The Friday concert at 9:00 p will consist of Wagner's "W donck Songs" and the Prelude Liebestod from Tristan and Is with Jessye Norman as s After the intermission Mr. will conduct the orchestra ar Tanglewood Festival Cho "Four Sacred Pieces" by V

The Friday evening prel be presented by Gina B pianist, and will start at 7:

On Saturday evening M will open the concert wit Overture "Les Francs-J lowed by Beethoven's P certo no. 4 with Gina Ba soloist. The program wi with Brahams' Symphon

Sunday afternoon's c consist of two number will be Beethoven's Sy 3, the "Eroica". The se Berlioz' "Te Deum" i Boston Symphony will ed by soloist Richard Tanglewood Festival Chor program starts at 2:30 p. m.

TELEGRAPH
NASHUA, N. H.
D. 69,493
AUG 5 1972
New England Newsclip

Colin Davis Will Conduct For Festival

LENOX, Mass. — Colin Davis, music director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, and principal gues conductor of the Bost Symphony Orchestra beginn in September, will con three concerts at Tangle next weekend as part o seventh weekend of Ber Festival concerts.

Davis will conduct the Symphony Orchestra night at 9 in the Shed of Wagner and V prelude concert, a feature pianist Gin in a recital of musi Ravel, Brahms an

The open rehe Saturday morni also be condu These rehearsa the public a observe th preparing m Festival from rehe the orches Tickets Berkshir may b Festiva Mass.

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 42,181
AUG 11 1972

Colin Davis Conductor At Tanglewood

Colin Davis will conduct all three concerts this weekend in the Berkshire Festival series at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass. The weekend prelude concert to-day at 7 p.m. Pianist Gina Bachauer will be the soloist.

In today's 9 p.m. concert, Davis will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Wagner's Wesendonck Songs and Prelude and Liebestod from Tristan and Isolde. Jessy Norman will be the soloist. The Tanglewood Festival Chorus will join the orchestra in a performance of Verdi's four Sacred Pieces, to close the program.

On Saturday evening, the program will include the Berlioz Overture, Les Francs-Judges, Piano Concerto No. 10 and the Brahms' Symphony No. 3. Gina Bachauer will again be piano soloist.

The Sunday afternoon concert, beginning at 2:30 will include Beethoven's Third Symphony, the Eroica, and the Berlioz, Te Deum. Soloist will be Richard Lewis, with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, directed by John Oliver, again assisting.

Davis Guest Conductor at Berkshire Concert

Colin Davis, music director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, and principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in September, conducts three concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood as part of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts tonight, Saturday and Sunday.

Tonight at 9 in the Shed, Davis conducts the Boston in music of Wagner and Verdi, including Wagner's "Funf Gedichte von Mathilde Wesendonk" (Wesendonk songs) and the "Prelude and Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde." Soprano Jessye Norman is soloist in the "Wesendonk songs" and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde."

Following intermission, Davis conducts the Boton Symphony and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus in a performance of Verdi's "Quattro Pezzi Sacri" (Four Sacred Pieces).

The weekend prelude, at 7 p.m. in the Shed and free to ticket-holders of the 9 concert, features pianist Gina Bachauer in a piano recital playing Mozart's Piano sonata in F, K. 332, Ravel's "Gaspard de la nuit," and Brahms' Variations on a theme by Paganini, set 2, op. 35.

Saturday morning at 10:30, Davis leads the season's seventh open rehearsal. Tickets go on sale two hours before the beginning of the rehearsal at the Festival ticket office. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Davis conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Berlioz' overture to "Les francs-juges" (the first performance at the Berkshire Festival), Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 with soloist Gina Bachauer, and Brahms' Symphony No. 3.

Works of Beethoven and Berlioz will be featured at the Sunday afternoon concert, 2:30. The concert opens with Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 "Eroica," followed by a performance of Berlioz' exciting "Te Deum" with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, and Boston Symphony Orchestra organist Berj Zamkochian.

Tickets for these concerts, and all other Berkshire Festival concerts are now on sale at the Berkshire Festival Ticket Office in Lenox, Massachusetts 01240, and at all Ticketron locations in New York and New England.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 16,200
AUG 5 1972
New England Newsclip

GINA BACHAUER, who has appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in recent seasons at Tanglewood, in Boston and in New York, will be performing with the orchestra on Saturday August 12 at 8:30 p.m. in the shed.

Davis To Conduct At Tanglewood

Lenox — Colin Davis, Music Director of the Royal Opera House, Convent Garden, and principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in September 1972, will conduct the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood as part of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts tonight and tomorrow afternoon.

Saturday morning at 10:30, Colin Davis leads the season's seventh open rehearsal. Tickets go on sale two hours before the beginning of the rehearsal at the Festival Ticket Office. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefits the orchestra's pension fund. The Saturday morning open rehearsals offer the public the opportunity to observe the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conductors, and soloists preparing music for the Berkshire Festival Concerts in a relaxed and informal atmosphere.

Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m., Davis will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Berlioz' overture to "Les francs-juges" (the first performance at the Berkshire Festival), Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 4 with soloist Gina Bachauer, and Brahms' Symphony no.3.

Works of Beethoven and Berlioz will be featured at the Sunday afternoon Berkshire Festival concert, August 13, at 2:30 p.m. The concert opens with Beethoven's Symphony no.3 "Eroica" followed by a performance of Berlioz' exciting "Te Deum" with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, and Boston Symphony Orchestra organist Berj Zamkochian.

Tickets for these concerts, and all other Berkshire Festival concerts are on sale at the Berkshire Festival ticket office in Lenox.

COLIN DAVIS

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528
AUG 11 1972
New England Newsclip

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,225
AUG 11 1972
New England Newsclip

Davis, Ozawa and Tilson next at Tanglewood...

Colin Davis, Music Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, and Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in Sept. conducts three concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood as part of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts Aug. 11, 12, and 13.

Friday evening Aug. 11 at 9 p.m. in the Shed, Mr. Davis conducts the Orchestra in music of Wagner and Verdi, including Wagner's "Funf Gedichte von Mathilde Wesendonk" "(Wesendonk songs)" and the "Prelude and Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde." Soprano Jessye Norman is soloist in the "Wesendonk Songs" and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde." Following intermission,

Colin Davis

Mr. Davis conducts the Boston Symphony and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus in a performance of Verdi's "Quattro Pezzi Sacri" (Four Sacred Pieces).

The Weekend Prelude, at 7 p.m. in the Shed, free to ticket-holders of the 9 p.m. concert, features pianist Gina Bachauer in a piano recital playing Mozart's Piano sonata in F, K. 332, Ravel's "Gaspard de la nuit," and Brahms' "Variations on a theme by Paganini," set 2, op. 35.

Saturday morning at 10.30, Colin Davis leads the season's seventh Open Rehearsal. The Saturday morning Open Rehearsals offer the public the opportunity to observe the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conductors, and soloists preparing music for the Berkshire Festival Concerts in a relaxed and informal atmosphere.

Saturday evening at 8.30, Mr. Davis conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Berlioz' overture to "Les francs-judges" (the first performance at the Berkshire Festival), Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 4 with soloist Gina Bachauer, and Brahms' "Symphony no. 3."

Works of Beethoven and Berlioz will be featured at the Sunday afternoon Berkshire Festival concert, Aug. 13, at 2.30. The concert opens with Beethoven's Symphony no. 3 "Eroica," followed by a performance of Berlioz' exciting "Te Deum" with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, and Boston Symphony Orchestra organist Berj Zamkochian.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, and Principal Guest Conductor of the Orchestra beginning in Sept. 1972, conducts the annual Gala Benefit Concert for the Berkshire Music Center, Tuesday, Aug. 15 at 8.30 p.m. in Tanglewood's Music Shed. The concert, featuring the combined Boston Symphony, Berkshire Music Center and Boston University Young Artist Orchestras (the first concert ever to involve three orchestras in the Shed), includes Tchaikovsky's "1812 Overture" with cannons, Handel's "Royal Fireworks Music," Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" by Wagner.

Other Tanglewood-on-Parade events include an afternoon of "mini-concerts" given by members of the Berkshire Music Center beginning at 2.30 p.m. at various locations on the Tangelwood grounds. Vocal, instrumental, and chamber music programs, illustrative of the advanced work that takes place during the intense eight-week session of the Berkshire Music Center, highlight the afternoon's activities.

Seiji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas conduct performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the final weekend of concerts of the 1972 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Aug. 18, 19, and 20.

The weekend opens Friday evening at 7 with the Weekend Prelude: Alexis Weissenberg with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Beethoven's Quintet in E-flat for piano and winds with soloists Alexis Weissenberg, piano, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Harold Wright, clarinet, Sherman Walt, bassoon, and Charles Kavaloski, french horn. Mr. Weissenberg next performs the original piano version of Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an exhibition." The Weekend Prelude recital is free to ticket-holders of the 9.00 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, Aug. 18 at 9 p.m. in the Music Shed. The concert opens with the first performance by the Orchestra of Ligeti's "Melodien" for orchestra, followed by Chopin's Piano concerto no. 1 with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. Following intermission, Mr. Ozawa conducts the first performance at the Berkshire Festival of Bartok's suite from "The miraculous mandarin."

Saturday morning, Aug. 19 at 10.30 is the season's final Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal. Music to be rehearsed is generally that which is to be played the following Sunday afternoon.

Saturday evening, Aug. 19, Mr. Thomas conducts the Orchestra with piano soloist Misha Dichter. The concert includes Mozart's Symphony no. 31, "Paris", Messiaen's "Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum" (first performance at the Berkshire Festival), and Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 with soloist Misha Dichter.

The final concert of the 1972 Berkshire Festival takes place Sunday afternoon, Aug. 20 at 2.30.

PRESS
BRISTOL, CONN.
D. 18,000
AUG 5 1972
New England Newsclip

Colin Davis To Conduct At Tanglewood

Colin Davis, Music Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, and Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in September 1972, conducts three concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood as part of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts August 11, 12, and 13.

Friday at 9 p.m. in the Shed, Mr. Davis conducts the Orchestra in music of Wagner and Verdi, including Wagner's Funf Gedichte von Mathilde Wesendonk (Wesendonk songs) and the "Prelude and Liebestod" from Tristan and Isolde. Soprano Jessye Norman is soloist in the Wesendonk songs and "Liebestod" from Tristan and Isolde. Following intermission, Mr. Davis conducts the Boston Symphony and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus in a performance of Verdi's Quattro Pezzi Sacri (Four Sacred Pieces).

The Weekend Prelude, at 7 p.m. in the Shed and free to ticket-holders of the 9 p.m. concert, features pianist Gina Bachauer in a piano recital playing Mozart's Piano sonata in F, K. 332, Ravel's Gaspard de la nuit, and Brahms' Variations on a theme by Paganini, set 2, op. 35.

Saturday morning at 10:30, Colin Davis leads the season's seventh Open Rehearsal. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund. The Saturday morning Open Rehearsals offer the public the opportunity to observe the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conductors, and soloists preparing music for the Berkshire Festival Concerts in a relaxed and informal atmosphere.

Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Mr. Davis conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Berlioz' overture to Les francs-juges (the first performance at the Berkshire Festival), Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 4 with soloist Gina Bachauer, and Brahms' Symphony no. 3.

Works of Beethoven and Berlioz will be featured at the Sunday afternoon Berkshire Festival concert, August 13, 1972 at 2:30 p.m. The concert opens with Beethoven's Symphony no. 3 "Eroica", followed by a performance of Berlioz' exciting Te Deum with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, and Boston Symphony Orchestra organist Berj Zamkochian.

Davis Guest Conductor at Berkshire Concert

Colin Davis, music director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, and principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in September, conducts three concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood as part of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts tonight, Saturday and Sunday.

Tonight at 9 in the Shed, Davis conducts the Boston in music of Wagner and Verdi, including Wagner's "Funf Gedichte von Mathilde Wesendonk" (Wesendonk songs) and the "Prelude and Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde." Soprano Jessye Norman is soloist in the "Wesendonk songs" and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde."

Following intermission, Davis conducts the Boton Symphony and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus in a performance of Verdi's "Quattro Pezzi Sacri" (Four Sacred Pieces).

The weekend prelude, at 7 p.m. in the Shed and free to ticket-holders of the 9 concert, features pianist Gina Bachauer in a piano recital playing Mozart's Piano sonata in F, K. 332, Ravel's "Gaspard de la nuit," and Brahms' Variations on a theme by Paganini, set 2, op. 35.

Saturday morning at 10:30, Davis leads the season's seventh open rehearsal. Tickets go on sale two hours before the beginning of the rehearsal at the Festival ticket office. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Davis conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Berlioz' overture to "Les francs-juges" (the first performance at the Berkshire Festival), Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 with soloist Gina Bachauer, and Brahms' Symphony No. 3.

Works of Beethoven and Berlioz will be featured at the Sunday afternoon concert, 2:30. The concert opens with Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 "Eroica," followed by a performance of Berlioz' exciting "Te Deum" with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, and Boston Symphony Orchestra organist Berj Zamkochian.

Tickets for these concerts, and all other Berkshire Festival concerts are now on sale at the Berkshire Festival Ticket Office in Lenox, Massachusetts 01240, and at all Ticketron locations in New York and New England.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 16,200
AUG 5 1972
New England Newsclip

GINA BACHAUER, who has appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in recent seasons at Tanglewood, in Boston and in New York, will be performing with the orchestra on Saturday August 12 at 8:30 p.m. in the shed.

Davis To Conduct At Tanglewood

Lenox — Colin Davis, Music Director of the Royal Opera House, Convent Garden, and principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in September 1972, will conduct the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood as part of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts tonight and tomorrow afternoon.

Saturday morning at 10:30, Colin Davis leads the season's seventh open rehearsal. Tickets go on sale two hours before the beginning of the rehearsal at the Festival Ticket Office. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefits the orchestra's pension fund. The Saturday morning open rehearsals offer the public the opportunity to observe the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conductors, and soloists preparing music for the Berkshire Festival Concerts in a relaxed and informal atmosphere.

Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m., Davis will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Berlioz' overture to "Les francs-juges" (the first performance at the Berkshire Festival), Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 4 with soloist Gina Bachauer, and Brahms' Symphony no.3.

Works of Beethoven and Berlicz will be featured at the Sunday afternoon Berkshire Festival concert, August 13, at 2:30 p.m. The concert opens with Beethoven's Symphony no.3 "Eroica" followed by a performance of Berlioz' exciting "Te Deum" with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, and Boston Symphony Orchestra organist Berj Zamkochian.

Tickets for these concerts, and all other Berkshire Festival concerts are on sale at the Berkshire Festival ticket office in Lenox.

COLIN DAVIS

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528
AUG 11 1972
New England Newsclip

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,225
AUG 11 1972
New England Newsclip

Davis, Ozawa and Tilson next at Tanglewood...

Colin Davis, Music Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, and Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in Sept. conducts three concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood as part of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts Aug. 11, 12, and 13.

Friday evening Aug. 11 at 9 p.m. in the Shed, Mr. Davis conducts the Orchestra in music of Wagner and Verdi, including Wagner's "Funf Gedichte von Mathilde Wesendonk" "(Wesendonk songs)" and the "Prelude and Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde." Soprano Jessye Norman is soloist in the "Wesendonk Songs" and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde." Following intermission,

Colin Davis

Mr. Davis conducts the Boston Symphony and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus in a performance of Verdi's "Quattro Pezzi Sacri" (Four Sacred Pieces).

The Weekend Prelude, at 7 p.m. in the Shed, free to ticket-holders of the 9 p.m. concert, features pianist Gina Bachauer in a piano recital playing Mozart's Piano sonata in F, K. 332, Ravel's "Gaspard de la nuit," and Brahms' "Variations on a theme by Paganini," set 2, op. 35.

Saturday morning at 10.30, Colin Davis leads the season's seventh Open Rehearsal. The Saturday morning Open Rehearsals offer the public the opportunity to observe the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conductors, and soloists preparing music for the Berkshire Festival Concerts in a relaxed and informal atmosphere.

Saturday evening at 8.30, Mr. Davis conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Berlioz' overture to "Les francs-judges" (the first performance at the Berkshire Festival), Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 4 with soloist Gina Bachauer, and Brahms' "Symphony no. 3."

Works of Beethoven and Berlioz will be featured at the Sunday afternoon Berkshire Festival concert, Aug. 13, at 2.30. The concert opens with Beethoven's Symphony no. 3 "Eroica," followed by a performance of Berlioz' exciting "Te Deum" with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, and Boston Symphony Orchestra organist Berj Zamkochian.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, and Principal Guest Conductor of the Orchestra beginning in Sept. 1972, conducts the annual Gala Benefit Concert for the Berkshire Music Center, Tuesday, Aug. 15 at 8.30 p.m. in Tanglewood's Music Shed. The concert, featuring the combined Boston Symphony, Berkshire Music Center and Boston University Young Artist Orchestras (the first concert ever to involve three orchestras in the Shed), includes Tchaikovsky's "1812 Overture" with cannons, Handel's "Royal Fireworks Music," Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" by Wagner.

Other Tanglewood-on-Parade events include an afternoon of "mini-concerts" given by members of the Berkshire Music Center beginning at 2.30 p.m. at various locations on the Tangelwood grounds. Vocal, instrumental, and chamber music programs, illustrative of the advanced work that takes place during the intense eight-week session of the Berkshire Music Center, highlight the afternoon's activities.

Seiji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas conduct performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the final weekend of concerts of the 1972 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Aug. 18, 19, and 20.

The weekend opens Friday evening at 7 with the Weekend Prelude: Alexis Weissenberg with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Beethoven's Quintet in E-flat for piano and winds with soloists Alexis Weissenberg, piano, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Harold Wright, clarinet, Sherman Walt, bassoon, and Charles Kavaloski, french horn. Mr. Weissenberg next performs the original piano version of Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an exhibition." The Weekend Prelude recital is free to ticket-holders of the 9.00 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, Aug. 18 at 9 p.m. in the Music Shed. The concert opens with the first performance by the Orchestra of Ligeti's "Melodien" for orchestra, followed by Chopin's Piano concerto no. 1 with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. Following intermission, Mr. Ozawa conducts the first performance at the Berkshire Festival of Bartok's suite from "The miraculous mandarin."

Saturday morning, Aug. 19 at 10.30 is the season's final Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal. Music to be rehearsed is generally that which is to be played the following Sunday afternoon.

Saturday evening, Aug. 19, Mr. Thomas conducts the Orchestra with piano soloist Misha Dichter. The concert includes Mozart's Symphony no. 31, "Paris", Messiaen's "Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum" (first performance at the Berkshire Festival), and Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 with soloist Misha Dichter.

The final concert of the 1972 Berkshire Festival takes place Sunday afternoon, Aug. 20 at 2.30.

PRESS
BRISTOL, CONN.
D. 18,000
AUG 5 1972
New England Newsclip

Colin Davis To Conduct At Tanglewood

Colin Davis, Music Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, and Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in September 1972, conducts three concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood as part of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts August 11, 12, and 13.

Friday at 9 p.m. in the Shed, Mr. Davis conducts the Orchestra in music of Wagner and Verdi, including Wagner's Funf Gedichte von Mathilde Wesendonk (Wesendonk songs) and the "Prelude and Liebestod" from Tristan and Isolde. Soprano Jessye Norman is soloist in the Wesendonk songs and "Liebestod" from Tristan and Isolde. Following intermission, Mr. Davis conducts the Boston Symphony and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus in a performance of Verdi's Quattro Pezzi Sacri (Four Sacred Pieces).

The Weekend Prelude, at 7 p.m. in the Shed and free to ticket-holders of the 9 p.m. concert, features pianist Gina Bachauer in a piano recital playing Mozart's Piano sonata in F, K. 332, Ravel's Gaspard de la nuit, and Brahms' Variations on a theme by Paganini, set 2, op. 35.

Saturday morning at 10:30, Colin Davis leads the season's seventh Open Rehearsal. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund. The Saturday morning Open Rehearsals offer the public the opportunity to observe the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conductors, and soloists preparing music for the Berkshire Festival Concerts in a relaxed and informal atmosphere.

Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Mr. Davis conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Berlioz' overture to Les francs-juges (the first performance at the Berkshire Festival), Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 4 with soloist Gina Bachauer, and Brahms' Symphony no. 3.

Works of Beethoven and Berlioz will be featured at the Sunday afternoon Berkshire Festival concert, August 13, 1972 at 2:30 p.m. The concert opens with Beethoven's Symphony no. 3 "Eroica", followed by a performance of Berlioz' exciting Te Deum with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, and Boston Symphony Orchestra organist Berj Zamkochian.

121

REVIEW
DARIEN, CONN.
W. 4,162

AUG 10 1972

New England Newsclip

Colin Davis, Music Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, and Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in September 1972, conducts three concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood as part of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts August 11, 12, and 13.

MILLERTON, N. Y.
NEWS
W. 1,500

AUG 10 1972

Tanglewood

Davis To Conduct Boston Symphony

Colin Davis, Music Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, and Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in September 1972, conducts three concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood Aug. 11, 12, and 13.

Friday evening Aug. 11 at 9 p.m. in the Shed, Mr. Davis conducts the Orchestra in music of Wagner and Verdi, including Wagner's Funf Gedichte von Mathilde Wesendonk (Wesendonk songs) and the "Prelude and Liebestod" from Tristan and Isolde. Soprano Jessye Norman is soloist in the Wesendonk songs and "Liebestod" from Tristan and Isolde. Following intermission, Mr. Davis conducts the Boston Symphony and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus in a performance of Verdi's Quattro Pezzi Sacri (Four Sacred Pieces).

The Weekend Prelude, at 7 p.m. in the Shed and free to ticket-holders of the 9 p.m. concert, features pianist Gina Bachauer in a piano recital playing Mozart's Piano sonata in F, K. 332, Ravel's Gaspard de la nuit, and Brahms' Variations on a theme by Paganini, set 2, op. 35.

Colin Davis leads the season's seventh Open Rehearsal Saturday morning at 10:30.

Mr. Davis conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m., in performances of Berlioz' overture Les francs-juges (the first performance at the Berkshire Festival), Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 4 with soloist Gina Bachauer, and Brahms' Symphony no. 3.

Works of Beethoven and Berlioz will be featured at the Sunday afternoon Berkshire Festival concert, Aug. 13, at 2:30 p.m. The concert opens with Beethoven's Symphony no. 3 "Eroica", followed by a performance of Berlioz' exciting Te Deum with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, and Boston Symphony Orchestra organist Berj Zamkochian.

AMERICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
D. 40,675

AUG 9 1972

New England Newsclip

Davis To Conduct Tanglewood Show

By SYLVIA S. MEYERS

Colin Davis will conduct three Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Friday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon. Weekend highlights include Verdi's "Quattro Pezzi sacri (four sacred pieces) and Berlioz' Te Deum, with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director.

Colin Davis, music director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, and principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in September, conducts the three concerts at Tanglewood as part of the seventh weekend of the Berkshire Festival Concerts.

Friday at 9 p.m. in the shed, Davis will conduct the orchestra in music of Wagner and Verdi, including Wagner's "Funf Gedichte von Mahilde Wesendonk, Wesendonk songs) and the "Prelude and Liebostod" from Tristan and Isolde. Soprano Jessye Norman is soloist in the Wesendonk songs and Liebostod" from Tristan and Isolde. Following intermission, Davis will conduct the Boston Symphony and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus in a performance of Verdi's Four Sacred Pieces.

The Weekend Prelude, at 7 p.m. in the shed and free to ticket holders of the 9 p.m. concert, features pianist Gina Bachauer in a piano recital.

Saturday morning at 10:30, Davis will lead the season's seventh open rehearsal. Tickets will go on sale two hours before the start of the rehearsal at the festival ticket office. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund. The Saturday morning open rehearsals offer the public an opportunity to observe the Boston Symphony orchestra, conductors and soloists preparing music for the Berkshire Festival Concerts in a relaxed and informal atmosphere and is usually the Sunday afternoon's program in rehearsal.

Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Davis will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in performances of Berlioz' overture to "Les Francs-Juges," first performance at the Berkshire Festival, Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 with soloist Gina Bachauer, and Brahsm' Symphony No. 3.

Works of Beethoven and Berlioz will be featured at the Sunday afternoon Berkshire Festival Concert at 2:30 p.m. The concert opens with Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 "Eroica," followed by a performance of Berlioz' exciting "Te Deum," with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, and the Boston Symphony orchestra organist Berj Zamkochian.

Last weekend's Friday evening concert celebrated the Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, which is continuing through Thursday. Often called a "Festival-within-a-Festival," the concerts turn Tanglewood into the contemporary music capital of the world during its intensive and exciting annual presentation of new and challenging works, some commissioned especially for the Festival, many heard in premiere performances. This festival also celebrates the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, which sponsors this Contemporary Music Festival, in conjunction with the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's academy for advanced study.

POST
WALLINGFORD, CONN.
W. 7,920

AUG 10 1972

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood fest draws to a close

The Berkshire Festival season at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., is drawing to a close with the last of the summer's weekend concerts Aug. 11-13 and Aug. 18-20.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open the weekend with music by Wagner and Verdi, joined by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus at 9 p.m. on Friday, Aug. 11.

Colin Davis will conduct the 8:30 p.m. concert Saturday, Aug. 12, featuring music by Berlioz, Beethoven and Brahms. Closing the weekend's activities will be the Sunday afternoon concert at 2:30 p.m.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

AUG 9 1972

Choir to Perform

The Sunday performance at Tanglewood will be graced by the presence of boy trebles and altos of the Cathedral Choir from the Cathedral of All Saints in Albany.

The Berkshire Boys Choir discovered several weeks ago that they had a conflicting and previous commitment so Lloyd Cast, director of the Cathedral Choir is leading his troops into the breach.

THE WORK is the Berlioz "Te Deum" and it will be presented with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the Tanglewood Festival Choir under the direction of the young Englishman, Colin Davis.

Davis will be in town this morning to rehearse the boys at the Cathedral. He is fortunate to have found on short notice an ensemble of the quality of Cast's choir, and it is surely a feather in the cap of the Cathedral Choir. (R.U.)

(#6)
TO SING WITH SYMPHONY — The 25-voice boys choir of the Cathedral of All Saints of Albany has ben invited to perform with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. at 2:30 p.m. Sunday. They will sing in "Te Deum" by Berlioz.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

AUG 12 1972

REGISTER
TORRINGTON, CONN.
D. 11,891

AUG 5 1972

New England Newsclip

Colin Davis here from London to lead BSO, soloists, chorus

Jessye Norman

Colin Davis will conduct three concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood Aug. 11, 12 and 13. Music director of the Royal Opera House at Covent Garden in London. Davis will become the principal guest conductor of the orchestra in September.

He will lead the orchestra at 9 p.m. next Friday in music of Wagner and Verdi. Soprano Jessye Norman will be soloist in Wagner's Funf Gedichte von (five poems by) Mathilde Wesendonk and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde." The Prelude to "Tristan" will precede "Liebstod." Wagner composed these works in 1857 and 1858 at a retreat on the Zurick estate of Otto Wesendonk, a rich merchant, and his beautiful wife Mathilde.

Following intermission, the orchestra and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus will join in a performance of Quattro Pezzi Sacri (four sacred pieces) by Verdi. The Italian composer wrote the Ave Maria and Laudi alla Vergine around 1889, shortly before Falstaff, and the Te Deum and Stabat mater, his last works of consequence, between 1895 and 1897.

Colin Davis

At the 7 p.m. weekend Prelude, free to all ticket-holders of the 9 p.m. concert, pianist Gina Bachauer will play Mozart's Piano Sonata in F, K. 332; Ravel's Gaspard de la Nuit, and Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Paganini, Set 2, Opus 35.

Davis will lead an open rehearsal at 10:30 a.m. Saturday, Aug. 12. Tickets, on sale two hours before the rehearsal at the Tanglewood ticket office, cost $2.50 each. Proceeds will benefit the orchestra's pension fund.

Beginning at 8:30 p.m., the orchestra will perform Berlioz's overture to Les Frans-Juges, Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 with soloist Gina Bachauer, and Brahms' Symphony No. 3 Berlioz was 23 when he composed the overture, which contains passion, tenderness and loud excitement. Beethoven introduced his fourth concerto in 1806, but the date of composition is unknown. The Brahms Third is the best known of his four symphonies, which are considered among the most important after Franz Schubert.

The Aug. 13 concert will open at 2:30 p.m. with Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, the well-known "Eroica," and end with Berlioz's grandiose Te Deum, with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus directed by John Oliver, and organist Berj Zamkochian.

Tickets are on sale at the Tanglewood ticket office, 413-637-1600, and at all Ticketron outlets in New York and New England.

Gina Bachauer

NEWS
BANGOR, MAINE
D. 78,230
AUG 22 1972
New England Newsclip

By ROBERT H. NEWALL
NEWS Arts Critic

Tanglewood Trek

On Friday, Aug. 12, I finally filled in one of the glaring omissions of my life as a critic: a pilgrimage to Tanglewood. But the fact is that there is such a largesse of music—and good music, too—here in Maine during the summer that one is not so impelled to go elsewhere as he might if the diet here were more bland than it is.

Nonetheless, both visually and artistically Tanglewood is a heady experience. Though it is undeniably a major festival, it seems to have avoided much of the ballyhoo attendent upon such events and to have preserved a charming bucolic flavor.

Those who go on Friday night have a bonus in the form of a recital by the artist who is to play with the orchestra the following night. This time it was the Greek pianist Gina Bachauer, whose cool approach suited the evening's temperuture and setting. Addressing herself to the Mozart Sonata in F, K. 332, a big work full of pitfalls for a pianist who is not consummately in control of his technique, she played with a complete sense of the logic of the work, respecting its demand for nice balances. Above all, what she did was clean and honest—and exemplarily aristocratic (indeed, she herself moves like a duchess).

Afterwards she tackled the enormously difficult Gaspard de la Nuit by Ravel, negotiating all the problems—hand-over-hand, hand-underhand, chronmatic intricacy—of the piece admirably. She ended with Brahms' Variations on a theme by Paganini, again demonstrating technical brilliance but here failing to communicate fully because of her emotional deficiencies. Still one had to admire the pianist's taste and style even if he could not respond completely to the animus of the music.

Colin Davis, the dynamic English conductor whom I interviewed several years ago for these pages, began the major program with Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman", an episodic, somewhat mannered reading that did not sweep one along on its floods of sound. Neither the orchestra (the Boston, of course) nor the conductor seemed wholly comfortable here, neither with the music nor with each other.

Afterwards Davis introduced the new and highly impressive black soprano Jeessye Norman, who sang Wagner's Wesendonck Songs and then the Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde". With a sumptuous lower registrar, a solid middle range and yet secure high notes, Miss Norman (draped in a figured gown that could only emphasize her tremendous bulk) should have a great career. Though she sang her Wagner most beautifully—occasionally Davis drowned her—she would, I think, be even more adaptable to Verdi, for the voice is warm and supple, ideal for the "Forza" Leonora, for example. And she easily establishes a strong rapport with her audience. This is the finest soprano that I have heard since Caballe.

The program closed with an expansive account of Verdi's Quattro pezzi sacri with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, expertly trained by John Oliver. A conductor of great intensity, drama and dynamic subtleties, Davis submitted a moving interpretation of this music, sometimes achieving real glory.

Colin Davis

Gina Bachauer

TANGLEWOOD 1972

SEIJI OZAWA Artistic Director, Berkshire Festival
GUNTHER SCHULLER Artistic Director, Berkshire Music Center
LEONARD BERNSTEIN Adviser

Friday August 11 1972 at 7 o'clock

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

WEEKEND PRELUDE

GINA BACHAUER piano

MOZART
1756-1791

Piano sonata in F K. 332

Allegro
Adagio
Allegro assai

RAVEL
1875-1937

Gaspard de la nuit

Ondine
Le gibet
Scarbo

BRAHMS
1833-1897

Variations on a theme by Paganini, set 2, op. 35

Gina Bachauer plays the Steinway piano

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECORDS EXCLUSIVELY FOR DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON

BALDWIN PIANO
DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON & RCA RECORDS

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,977
AUG 14 1972
New England Newsclip

122

Berkshire Festival Continues at Lenox

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — The paradox of the Berkshire Music Festival's seventh weekend at Tanglewood was the spectacular piano recital by Gina Bachauer for Friday night's Weekend Prelude and her far less satisfying performance of Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto Saturday night with the Boston Symphony conducted by Colin Davis.

Davis conducted the three weekend concerts for audiences totaling 30,520, attesting to his popularity.

Now music director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, London, Davis becomes principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony this fall.

Balance of Saturday night's program was Berlioz' "Junges of the Secret Court" Overture, and Brahms' Third Symphony.

Yesterday afternoon, it was Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and Berliosz "Te Deum," with Kenneth Riegel as a short-notice substitution for tenor Richard Lewis, Tanglewood Festival Chrous and Choir, and members of the Indian Hill School in nearby Stockbridge.

Encores

Miss Bachauer's Friday night recital won her a standing ovation. Following an uninterrupted hour of dazzling keyboard art, she added two encores — Mompou's "Young Ladies in the Garden" and a Rameau Minuet.

She could have continued if it weren't necessary to clear the hall for the 9 p.m. concert by the Boston Symphony.

After an impeccable and polished Mozart Sonata in F major, Miss Bachauer streaked through Ravel's "Gaspard de la Nuit" and the Paganini-Brahms Variations (Set 2) as if she was contemptuous of their stringent complexities.

The Beethoven Piano Concerto on Saturday night was quite another matter.

Rippling passagework was there and a wide scrope of sonorities without pounding. But there was a lack of luster and drive. Virtually all of the orchestra-keyboard contact points were off at the end of technical splurges.

Give-and-Take

The slow movement was a beautiful give-and-take between a serene piano and loud prchestra recitatives.

At one point in the rondo came an alarming parting of the ways. David was resourceful enough to reestablish contact but the cause was lost.

Music Review

PROGRAMS

Saturday Night
Colin Davis, conductor

Overture, Les Francs-Juges, Opus 3 — Berlioz
Piano Concerto No. 4 in G major, Opus 58 — Beethoven
Gina Bachauer, pianist
Symphony No. 3 in F major, Opus 90 — Brahms

Sunday Afternoon
Colin Davis, conductor

Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Opus 55, "Eroica" — Beethoven
Te Deum, for tenor soloist and three choruses, with orchestra and organ, Opus 22 — Berlioz
Kenneth Riegel, tenor
Tanglewood Festival Chorus
Tanglewood Choir
Berj Zamgochian, organ

Nevertheless, there were several curtain calls.

This season's conductor Davis has a new image — athletic, elaborately gestured but still a director of catholic taste.

His concept of Brahms' Third Symphony was built along gothic lines, with melodic sweep, heroic strides, gentle episodes and strong mottos.

Davis must have had tongue in cheek when he programmed Berlioz' theatrical "Judges" Overture. It's an early work, replete with gimmicks and idiosyncracies.

Conducted like the gospel truth, the orchestra helped out with well-shaped harmonies, good tone in strings and full quota of "hoop-la" in brass.

Yesterday afternoon, Davis brought into sharp focus just about everything in Beethoven's "Eroica." Among the special features were discords, syncopated accents, full-scale orchestration, and abrupt changes of key and mood.

The Funeral March alone was enough to identify podium craftsmanship. It didn't lag, drag or lose bright sheen.

As confirmed in the scherzo and finale, Davis selected tempos for the first movement to stress tension. Dynamics were carefully energized and there were vivid juxtapositions of storm and tender exchanges.

The scherzo was energetic and fleet-footed, and Davis uncovered a harvest of drama and vitality in the finale.

Religious Piece

In spite of the heavy gloss coating in Berlioz' "Te Deum," it came through as a deeply religious work of solemnity and fervor.

The large chorus pronounced the Latin well. Berj Zamgochian's organ backgrounds were particularly effective. In fact, the singers merged and blended Berlioz' intricate parts with professional expertise, without eclipsing spiritual message with over-polished mechanics.

Children's voices from Indian Hill enhanced tonal structure and mixtures.

Excepting the instrumental introduction to "Dignare Domine," it's to Davis' credit that Berlioz' rich, even bravura orchestration didn't surpass the voices in eclat and motivation.

NEWS
BANGOR, MAINE
D. 78,230

AUG 22 1972

New England Newsclip

By ROBERT H. NEWALL
NEWS Arts Critic

Tanglewood Trek

On Friday, Aug. 12, I finally filled in one of the glaring omissions of my life as a critic: a pilgrimage to Tanglewood. But the fact is that there is such a largesse of music—and good music, too—here in Maine during the summer that one is not so impelled to go elsewhere as he might if the diet here were more bland than it is.

Nonetheless, both visually and artistically Tanglewood is a heady experience. Though it is undeniably a major festival, it seems to have avoided much of the ballyhoo attendent upon such events and to have preserved a charming bucolic flavor.

Those who go on Friday night have a bonus in the form of a recital by the artist who is to play with the orchestra the following night. This time it was the Greek pianist Gina Bachauer, whose cool apporach suited the evening's temperuture and setting. Addressing herself to the Mozart Sonata in F, K. 332, a big work full of pitfalls for a pianist who is not consummately in control of his technique, she played with a complete sense of the logic of the work, respecting its demand for nice balances. Above all, what she did was clean and honest—and exemplarily aristocratic (indeed, she herself moves like a duchess).

Afterwards she tackled the enormously difficult Gaspard de la Nuit by Ravel, negotiating all the problems—h and-over-hand, hand-underhand, chronmatic intricacy—of the piece admirably. She ended with Brahms' Variations on a theme by Paganini, again demonstrating technical brilliance but here failing to communicate fully because of her emotional deficiencies. Still one had to admire the pianist's taste and style even if he could not respond completely to the animus of the music.

Colin Davis, the dynamic English conductor whom I interviewed several years ago for these pages, began the major program with Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman", an episodic, somewhat mannered reading that did not sweep one along on its floods of sound. Neither the orchestra (the Boston, of course) nor the conductor seemed wholly comfortable here, neither with the music nor with each other.

Afterwards Davis introduced the new and highly impressive black soprano Jeessye Norman, who sang Wagner's Wesendonck Songs and then the Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde". With a sumptuous lower registrar, a solid middle range and yet secure high notes, Miss Norman (draped in a figured gown that could only emphasize her tremendous bulk) should have a great career. Though she sang her Wagner most beautifully—occasionally Davis drowned her—she would, I think, be even more adaptable to Verdi, for the voice is warm and supple, ideal for the "Forza" Leonora, for example. And she easily establishes a strong rapport with her audience. This is the finest soprano that I have heard since Caballe.

The program closed with an expansive account of Verdi's Quattro pezzi sacri with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, expertly trained by John Oliver. A conductor of great intensity, drama and dynamic subtleties, Davis submitted a moving interpretation of this music, sometimes achieving real glory.

Colin Davis

Gina Bachauer

TANGLEWOOD 1972

SEIJI OZAWA Artistic Director, Berkshire Festival
GUNTHER SCHULLER Artistic Director, Berkshire Music Center
LEONARD BERNSTEIN Adviser

Friday August 11 1972 at 7 o'clock

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

WEEKEND PRELUDE

GINA BACHAUER piano

MOZART 1756-1791 — Piano sonata in F K. 332
Allegro
Adagio
Allegro assai

RAVEL 1875-1937 — Gaspard de la nuit
Ondine
Le gibet
Scarbo

BRAHMS 1833-1897 — Variations on a theme by Paganini, set 2, op. 35

Gina Bachauer plays the Steinway piano

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECORDS EXCLUSIVELY FOR DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON

BALDWIN PIANO
DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON & RCA RECORDS

19

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,977

AUG 14 1972

New England Newsclip

Berkshire Festival Continues at Lenox

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — The paradox of the Berkshire Music Festival's seventh weekend at Tanglewood was the spectacular piano recital by Gina Bachauer for Friday night's Weekend Prelude and her far less satisfying performance of Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto Saturday night with the Boston Symphony conducted by Colin Davis.

Davis conducted the three weekend concerts for audiences totaling 30,520, attesting to his popularity.

Now music director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, London, Davis becomes principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony this fall.

Balance of Saturday night's program was Berlioz' "Junges of the Secret Court" Overture, and Brahms' Third Symphony.

Yesterday afternoon, it was Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and Berliosz "Te Deum," with Kenneth Riegel as a short-notice substitution for tenor Richard Lewis, Tanglewood Festival Chrous and Choir, and members of the Indian Hill School in nearby Stockbridge.

Encores

Miss Bachauer's Friday night recital won her a standing ovation. Following an uninterrupted hour of dazzling keyboard art, she added two encores — Mompou's "Young Ladies in the Garden" and a Rameau Minuet.

She could have continued if it weren't necessary to clear the hall for the 9 p.m. concert by the Boston Symphony.

After an impeccable and polished Mozart Sonata in F major, Miss Bachauer streaked through Ravel's "Gaspard de la Nuit" and the Paganini-Brahms Variations (Set 2) as if she was contemptuous of their stringent complexities.

The Beethoven Piano Concerto on Saturday night was quite another matter.

Rippling passagework was there and a wide scrope of sonorities without pounding. But there was a lack of luster and drive. Virtually all of the orchestra-keyboard contact points were off at the end of technical splurges.

Give-and-Take

The slow movement was a beautiful give-and-take between a serene piano and loud orchestra recitatives.

At one point in the rondo came an alarming parting of the ways. David was resourceful enough to reestablish contact but the cause was lost.

Music Review

PROGRAMS

Saturday Night
Colin Davis, conductor

Overture, Les Francs-Juges, Opus 3 — Berlioz
Piano Concerto No. 4 in G major, Opus 58 — Beethoven
Gina Bachauer, pianist
Symphony No. 3 in F major, Opus 90 — Brahms

Sunday Afternoon
Colin Davis, conductor

Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Opus 55, "Eroica" — Beethoven
Te Deum, for tenor soloist and three choruses, with orchestra and organ, Opus 22 — Berlioz
Kenneth Riegel, tenor
Tanglewood Festival Chorus
Tanglewood Choir
Berj Zamgochian, organ

Nevertheless, there were several curtain calls.

This season's conductor Davis has a new image — athletic, elaborately gestured but still a director of catholic taste.

His concept of Brahms' Third Symphony was built along gothic lines, with melodic sweep, heroic strides, gentle episodes and strong mottos.

Davis must have had tongue in cheek when he programmed Berlioz' theatrical "Judges" Overture. It's an early work, replete with gimmicks and idiosyncracies.

Conducted like the gospel truth, the orchestra helped out with well-shaped harmonies, good tone in strings and full quota of "hoop-la" in brass.

Yesterday afternoon, Davis brought into sharp focus just about everything in Beethoven's "Eroica." Among the special features were discords, syncopated accents, full-scale orchestration, and abrupt changes of key and mood.

The Funeral March alone was enough to identify podium craftsmanship. It didn't lag, drag or lose bright sheen.

As confirmed in the scherzo and finale, Davis selected tempos for the first movement to stress tension. Dynamics were carefully energized and there were vivid juxtapositions of storm and tender exchanges.

The scherzo was energetic and fleet-footed, and Davis uncovered a harvest of drama and vitality in the finale.

Religious Piece

In spite of the heavy gloss coating in Berlioz' "Te Deum," it came through as a deeply religious work of solemnity and fervor.

The large chorus pronounced the Latin well. Berj Zamgochian's organ backgrounds were particularly effective. In fact, the singers merged and blended Berlioz' intricate parts with professional expertise, without eclipsing spiritual message with over-polished mechanics.

Children's voices from Indian Hill enhanced tonal structure and mixtures.

Excepting the instrumental introduction to "Dignare Domine," it's to Davis' credit that Berlioz' rich, even bravura orchestration didn't surpass the voices in eclat and motivation.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525
AUG 15 1972
New England

In Concert

When Davis Took Possession

By Peter M. Knapp

The Boston Symphony belonged to Colin Davis this weekend. The English musician, who will be one of the orchestra's two principal guest conductors next season solidified his respect here with three programs of romantic staples capped by two large choral works.

This summer's eight week Tanglewood season has been generous with big choral-orchestra compositions, including Haydn's "The Seasons" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Next Sunday it will end with one of the biggest — Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 8, the so-called "Symphony of a Thousand."

This weekend features were Guiseppe Verdi's "Quattro Pezzi Sacri" ("Four Sacred Pieces"), heard Friday night, and Hector Berlioz' "Te Deum", a major undertaking for tenor soloist, three choruses, orchestra and organ, performed Sunday afternoon before 12,043.

The "Te Deum," considered by Berlioz as a "brother" to the requiem it postdates, was given a potent performance by Davis and the orchestra, joined by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Tanglewood Choir and the choir of men and boys of the Cathedral of All Saints in Albany, New York.

Even for Berlioz, who rarely thought on a small scale, this setting of the hymn of praise to God is mighty in scope. "Colossal Babylonian, Ninivite," he wrote after the premiere. The concept is about on the same order as the New York Trade Center, and at Tanglewood you could probably not fit a grace note between the hundreds of choristers and instrumentalists squeezed on stage.

All this makes an overwhelming aural impact, of course, with the triple choruses the added brass (remember the requiem?) and organ which plays a prominent independent part. Fortes are sprinkled like salt over the score and when Berlioz describes "the majesty of Thy glory" he calls for dual cymbal clashes not just one.

Inspired

The piece is more than mere noise of course. There are a number of inspired effects including the mystical chorus of the sopranos and tenors in the soft prayer in canon, "Dignare Domine," and the resplendent complex polyphony of the mighty opening "Te Deum" chorus. But much of it seem pitched to weight and volume and power which, even with the splendid and taut reading Sunday afternoon becomes somewhat relentless.

Tenor Kenneth Riegel, who was called on short notice to replace the ill Richard Lewis, sang the solo in "Te Ergo Quaesumus" with force and feeling.

The Verdi "Quattro Pezzi Sacri" heard Friday night may not quite be up to Berlioz' decibel count, but these four pieces written at the end of Verdi's career are noble and superior works of art. The drama and brilliance of technique, the melodic inspiration and emotional punch of the two large pieces — the "Stabat Mater" and the "Te Deum" (in this case for soprano solo double chorus and orchestra) show Verdi at the height of his creative genius.

Both composers, of course, had an uncanny sense of theater, and Verdi though perhaps not up to Berlioz' fabulous ear for instrumental coloring and combinations, knew how to build a climax as well as anyone.

In all, it was a resounding weekend for choral music at Tanglewood, and Davis put it all together brilliantly. Not the least of the pleasures was the precision and beauty of the choral singing, and Davis should be well satisfied with their enthusiasm and alertness.

Classical

Also on Sunday's program was an exceptionally well proportioned and coherent performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, the "Eroica." It was good to hear Beethoven, even the "Eroica," played without the customary super-heroic gestures, in almost classical terms.

The performance had its share of sinew, but the accent was on lucidity and purity of line rather than on fist-shaking outbursts. And the quality of the orchestral playing was impeccable — one of the most impressive events of the weekend.

Along with the Verdi choral works, music of Wagner was heard Friday evening.

It was overcoat weather, and Davis mimicked a shiver as he faced the orchestra for "The Flying Dutchman" overture. The audience of 5,131 mainly kept warm by applauding, with much of the enthusiasm going to Jessye Norman, a Wagnerian-scaled soprano who has spent most of her career in Europe.

It was Miss Norman's Tanglewood and BSO debut, and judging from the response, including more than polite applause from the musicians, she'll be asked back. She sang the Wesendonk lieder, the settings of five poems by Mathilde Wesendonk which Wagner wrote during his work on "Tristan und Isolde", then appropriately the "Liebestod" from "Tristan."

She has a voice of unusual, striking timbre — weighty, richly vibratoed and dusky-hued. It carries well, and Miss Norman usually has it under firm control and with excellent diction.

Breathless

Interpretively, she has not fully plumbed the possibilities of nuance and communication in the Wesendonk Songs — the rapid initial stanzas of "Stehe Still" were not fully sorted out and left her a little breathless, and the change of mood at "Das in Selig Suesseum Vergessen" required somewhat more depiction of the emotions of the text, to cite one example. Yet she gave the impression of a serious and thoughtful singer, and sang the "Liebstod" with unhackneyed expression and tonal brilliance.

Davis provided clear-textured orchestral support for the Wesendonk Songs and examples of the art of climax-building in the "Tristan" prelude and "Liebestod" — controlled terracing of loudness and passion.

Saturday night, 9,556 people heard Davis lead Berlioz' overture "Les Francs-Juges," Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4, and Brahms Symphony No. 3 in F, completing the Tanglewood Brahms symphonic cycle.

Gina Bachauer was the soloist in the Beethoven concerto, providing an exhibition of the art of keyboard touch and nuance. She stayed within a subdued scale rather than asserting an aggressive dominance as soloist. But the regal Miss Bachauer is anything but mousy even in a performance that stressed lightness and delicacy.

There were many instances of her extraordinary technique. Crackling phrases snapped off in sharp staccati, seamless passagework, and any number of subtle touches that sounded deceptively simple. And in the famous dialogue of the second movement, her answers to the orchestra's rhetorical statements were serene and profound.

Quick Recovery

Not all of the partnership between soloist and orchestra went smoothly — the tuning in the first movement was questionable and toward the end of the rondo finale the partners in two cases went separate ways, but quickly and professionally recovered.

Miss Bachauer's weekend prelude recital of Mozart, Ravel and Brahms Friday evening was another pianistic treat. There were some astonishing coloristic effects in Ravel's "Gaspard de la Nuit" — a piece which she has been playing for some three decades, and in which she had found impressionistic sounds a piano doesn't ordinarily produce. And Grahms' "Variations on a Theme by Paganini," another Bachauer specialty and a work bristling with technical hurdles, seemed as easy as a beginner's exercise despite her daring speed and challenging effects.

The Brahms Third Symphony took some time to settle down, but when it did there was a nice mixture of toughness and grace. Much of the playing was notably light and airy even if the conception occasionally fluttered on the flowery in the middle movements.

As for the Berlioz overture, it is a potpourri catalogue of the young Berlioz' ideas laced with echoes of Donizetti, Bellini and Rossini. At times it sounds as if it might be the "long-lost original overture" to "Lucia Di Lammermoor." In 1972, it sounds like pure camp, and although Davis conducted it with a straight face, I couldn't keep one.

TANGLEWOOD 1972

SEIJI OZAWA Artistic Director, Berkshire Festival
GUNTHER SCHULLER Artistic Director, Berkshire Music Center
LEONARD BERNSTEIN Adviser

Friday August 11 1972 at 9 o'clock

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

COLIN DAVIS conductor

WAGNER — *Overture to 'Der fliegende Holländer'

Fünf Gedichte von Mathilde Wesendonk
(Five poems by Mathilde Wesendonk)

Der Engel (The angel)
Stehe still (Stand still)
Im Triebhaus (In the hothouse)
Schmerzen (Sorrows)
Träume (Dreams)

JESSYE NORMAN soprano

*Prelude and Liebestod from 'Tristan und Isolde'

JESSYE NORMAN soprano

intermission

VERDI — Quattro pezzi sacri (Four sacred pieces)

†Ave Maria, for unaccompanied choir
Stabat mater, for choir and orchestra
Laudi alla Vergine Maria, for women's chorus
Te Deum, for soprano solo, double chorus and orchestra

TANGLEWOOD FESTIVAL CHORUS
TANGLEWOOD CHOIR
John Oliver director

JOAN HELLER soprano

†first performance at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

first performance at the Berkshire Festival*

The program notes for this evening's concert begin on page 26

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECORDS EXCLUSIVELY FOR DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON

BALDWIN PIANO
DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON AND *RCA RECORDS

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
AUG 14 1972
New England Newsclip

Whitestone

With feeling

Guest conductor Colin Davis calls for the last drop of emotion from the Boston Symphony Orchestra as he leads yesterday's concert of works by Beethoven and Berlioz. A total of 12,043 persons attended Sunday's program, bringing the total weekend attendance to 30,520. Review of Davis's weekend concerts appears on Page 12.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

AUG 15 1972 New England

In Concert

When Davis Took Possession

By Peter M. Knapp

The Boston Symphony belonged to Colin Davis this weekend. The English musician, who will be one of the orchestra's two principal guest conductors next season solidified his respect here with three programs of romantic staples capped by two large choral works.

This summer's eight week Tanglewood season has been generous with big choral-orchestra compositions, including Haydn's "The Seasons" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Next Sunday it will end with one of the biggest — Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 8, the so-called "Symphony of a Thousand."

This weekend features were Guiseppe Verdi's "Quattro Pezzi Sacri" ("Four Sacred Pieces"), heard Friday night, and Hector Berlioz' "Te Deum", a major undertaking for tenor soloist, three choruses, orchestra and organ, performed Sunday afternoon before 12,043.

The "Te Deum," considered by Berlioz as a "brother" to the requiem it postdates, was given a potent performance by Davis and the orchestra, joined by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Tanglewood Choir and the choir of men and boys of the Cathedral of All Saints in Albany, New York.

Even for Berlioz, who rarely thought on a small scale, this setting of the hymn of praise to God is mighty in scope. "Colossal Babylonian, Ninivite," he wrote after the premiere. The concept is about on the same order as the New York Trade Center, and at Tanglewood you could probably not fit a grace note between the hundreds of choristers and instrumentalists squeezed on stage.

All this makes an overwhelming aural impact, of course, with the triple choruses the added brass (remember the requiem?) and organ which plays a prominent independent part. Fortes are sprinkled like salt over the score and when Berlioz describes "the majesty of Thy glory" he calls for dual cymbal clashes not just one.

Inspired

The piece is more than mere noise of course. There are a number of inspired effects including the mystical chorus of the sopranos and tenors in the soft prayer in canon, "Dignare Domine," and the resplendent complex polyphony of the mighty opening "Te Deum" chorus. But much of it seem pitched to weight and volume and power which, even with the splendid and taut reading Sunday afternoon becomes somewhat relentless.

Tenor Kenneth Riegel, who was called on short notice to replace the ill Richard Lewis, sang the solo in "Te Ergo Quaesumus" with force and feeling.

The Verdi "Quattro Pezzi Sacri" heard Friday night may not quite be up to Berlioz' decibel count, but these four pieces written at the end of Verdi's career are noble and superior works of art. The drama and brilliance of technique, the melodic inspiration and emotional punch of the two large pieces — the "Stabat Mater" and the "Te Deum" (in this case for soprano solo double chorus and orchestra) show Verdi at the height of his creative genius.

Both composers, of course, had an uncanny sense of theater, and Verdi though perhaps not up to Berlioz' fabulous ear for instrumental coloring and combinations, knew how to build a climax as well as anyone.

In all, it was a resounding weekend for choral music at Tanglewood, and Davis put it all together brilliantly. Not the least of the pleasures was the precision and beauty of the choral singing, and Davis should be well satisfied with their enthusiasm and alertness.

Classical

Also on Sunday's program was an exceptionally well proportioned and coherent performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, the "Eroica." It was good to hear Beethoven, even the "Eroica," played without the customary super-heroic gestures, in almost classical terms.

The performance had its share of sinew, but the accent was on lucidity and purity of line rather than on fist-shaking outbursts. And the quality of the orchestral playing was impeccable — one of the most impressive events of the weekend.

Along with the Verdi choral works, music of Wagner was heard Friday evening.

It was overcoat weather, and Davis mimicked a shiver as he faced the orchestra for "The Flying Dutchman" overture. The audience of 5,131 mainly kept warm by applauding, with much of the enthusiasm going to Jessye Norman, a Wagnerian-scaled soprano who has spent most of her career in Europe.

It was Miss Norman's Tanglewood and BSO debut, and judging from the response, including more than polite applause from the musicians, she'll be asked back. She sang the Wesendonk lieder, the settings of five poems by Mathilde Wesendonk which Wagner wrote during his work on "Tristan und Isolde", then appropriately the "Liebestod" from "Tristan."

She has a voice of unusual, striking timbre — weighty, richly vibratoed and dusky-hued. It carries well, and Miss Norman usually has it under firm control and with excellent diction.

Breathless

Interpretively, she has not fully plumbed the possibilities of nuance and communication in the Wesendonk Songs — the rapid initial stanzas of "Stehe Still" were not fully sorted out and left her a little breathless, and the change of mood at "Das in Selig Suesseum Vergessen" required somewhat more depiction of the emotions of the text, to cite one example. Yet she gave the impression of a serious and thoughtful singer, and sang the "Liebstod" with unhackneyed expression and tonal brilliance.

Davis provided clear-textured orchestral support for the Wesendonk Songs and examples of the art of climax-building in the "Tristan" prelude and "Liebestod" — controlled terracing of loudness and passion.

Saturday night, 9,556 people heard Davis lead Berlioz' overture "Les Francs-Juges," Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4, and Brahms Symphony No. 3 in F, completing the Tanglewood Brahms symphonic cycle.

Gina Bachauer was the soloist in the Beethoven concerto, providing an exhibition of the art of keyboard touch and nuance. She stayed within a subdued scale rather than asserting an aggressive dominance as soloist. But the regal Miss Bachauer is anything but mousy even in a performance that stressed lightness and delicacy.

There were many instances of her extraordinary technique. Crackling phrases snapped off in sharp staccati, seamless passagework, and any number of subtle touches that sounded deceptively simple. And in the famous dialogue of the second movement, her answers to the orchestra's rhetorical statements were serene and profound.

Quick Recovery

Not all of the partnership between soloist and orchestra went smoothly — the tuning in the first movement was questionable and toward the end of the rondo finale the partners in two cases went separate ways, but quickly and professionally recovered.

Miss Bachauer's weekend prelude recital of Mozart, Ravel and Brahms Friday evening was another pianistic treat. There were some astonishing coloristic effects in Ravel's "Gaspard de la Nuit" — a piece which she has been playing for some three decades, and in which she had found impressionistic sounds a piano doesn't ordinarily produce. And Grahms' "Variations on a Theme by Paganini," another Bachauer specialty and a work bristling with technical hurdles, seemed as easy as a beginner's exercise despite her daring speed and challenging effects.

The Brahms Third Symphony took some time to settle down, but when it did there was a nice mixture of toughness and grace. Much of the playing was notably light and airy even if the conception occasionally fluttered on the flowery in the middle movements.

As for the Berlioz overture, it is a potpourri catalogue of the young Berlioz' ideas laced with echoes of Donizetti, Bellini and Rossini. At times it sounds as if it might be the "long-lost original overture" to "Lucia Di Lammermoor." In 1972, it sounds like pure camp, and although Davis conducted it with a straight face, I couldn't keep one.

TANGLEWOOD 1972

SEIJI OZAWA Artistic Director, Berkshire Festival
GUNTHER SCHULLER Artistic Director, Berkshire Music Center
LEONARD BERNSTEIN Adviser

Friday August 11 1972 at 9 o'clock

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

COLIN DAVIS conductor

WAGNER — *Overture to 'Der fliegende Holländer'

Fünf Gedichte von Mathilde Wesendonk
(Five poems by Mathilde Wesendonk)

Der Engel (The angel)
Stehe still (Stand still)
Im Triebhaus (In the hothouse)
Schmerzen (Sorrows)
Träume (Dreams)

JESSYE NORMAN soprano

*Prelude and Liebestod from 'Tristan und Isolde'

JESSYE NORMAN soprano

intermission

VERDI — Quattro pezzi sacri (Four sacred pieces)

†Ave Maria, for unaccompanied choir
Stabat mater, for choir and orchestra
Laudi alla Vergine Maria, for women's chorus
Te Deum, for soprano solo, double chorus and orchestra

TANGLEWOOD FESTIVAL CHORUS
TANGLEWOOD CHOIR
John Oliver director

JOAN HELLER soprano

†first performance at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

first performance at the Berkshire Festival*

The program notes for this evening's concert begin on page 26

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECORDS EXCLUSIVELY FOR DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON

BALDWIN PIANO
DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON AND *RCA RECORDS

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 14 1972 New England Newsclip

Whitestone

With feeling

Guest conductor Colin Davis calls for the last drop of emotion from the Boston Symphony Orchestra as he leads yesterday's concert of works by Beethoven and Berlioz. A total of 12,043 persons attended Sunday's program, bringing the total weekend attendance to 30,520. Review of Davis's weekend concerts appears on Page 12.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549
AUG 13 1972
New England Newsclip

A FESTIVAL TAKES SOPRANO TO HEART

Jessye Norman's Rich Voice Wins Fans at Tanglewood

By DONAL HENAHAN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 12—If you fancy great singers, and you haven't heard the name of Jessye Norman, don't worry. You will. Miss Norman is a 26-year-old black American soprano, and, judging from her first Boston Symphony appearance last night at the Berkshire Festival, hers is one of the more important voices to come along in some time.

Not only did her sizable tones project easily in Tanglewood's vast Music Shed, where she sang Wagner's "Wesendonk" Songs and the Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde," but it also retained a sumptuous, velvety quality at just those points in the music where hardness and strain usually creep in. Her high pianissimo at the crest of the Liebestod was masterly.

Furthermore, Miss Norman proved to be an uncommonly sensitive artist, and with Colin Davis delicately adjusting the Boston Symphony to her vocal and interpretive needs, she thoroughly captivated the audience. Both after the "Wesendonk" Songs and after the Liebestod, there were standing ovations, and the kind of public delerium that great singing can arouse.

Miss Norman makes an impressive presence on stage, no doubt about that. She send out a blinding laser-beam of a smile, she wears an Afro and she is scaled along the lines of Callas in her monumental early years. But is was the singing that turned on Tanglewood's audience and kept it turned on.

Davis's Ability Accented

From her recent recording of the Countess in Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," under Mr. Davis, one had expected a lighter voice. In fact, Miss Norman's is quite robust and might in time become a genuine Wagnerian soprano instrument. But, though, she can obviously handle an occasional concert Liebestod even now, heavyweight Wagner would not seem to be a wise course for her to follow if the voice is to develop and mature.

Miss Norman was born in Augusta, Ga., and attended Howard University. She studied with Pierre Bernac at the University of Michigan and with Alice Duschack at the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore.

However, she has lived in West Berlin since 1969 and she made her operatic debut there (as Elisabeth in "Tannhäuser." Last April she sang Aïda at La Scala and next season she will make her Covent Garden debut as Cassandra in Berlioz's "Les Troyens," again with Colin Davis as conductor

Mr. Davis deserved great credit for last night's triumphs, which also included Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and Verdi's Four Sacred Pieces. Mr. Davis is not only a technician of the highest order under whose baton the orchestra seemed to run like the expensive machine it is, but a musician of tremendous dramatic instinct and flair.

The melding voice, orchestra and poetic conception in the "Wesendonk" Songs could hardly have been more complete, and in the Tristan excerpts (he also conducted the prelude, of course) his control over the orchestra allowed Miss Norman's voice to bloom at its richest with no dramatic comporimse. His handling of orchestra and vocal forces (the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and Tanglewood Choir) in the Verdi pieces showed in all their quasi-operatic; quasi-liturgical glory.

NEW YORK MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
AUG 28 1972

The Lively Arts/Alan Rich

ALL IS WELL IN MARLBORO COUNTRY

"... People don't come here for specific programs; they come for a style and spirit that don't exist anywhere else in the U.S. . . ."

I arrived at Tanglewood on Saturday morning to find the place in a state of emotional shock after the debut the night before of a young black dramatic soprano named Jessye Norman. "Where were you?" everybody screamed. A kindly recording engineer bridged the gap by playing me the tapes. Miss Norman, who is 26, comes from Georgia, has been singing opera in Europe and is the Countess on the recent Philips recording of Figaro. She is, indeed, a cause for emotional shock. Her voice, over a remarkable range from well below the staff up to at least an A, is seamless, pure and dazzlingly rich. She has been beautifully trained, with the sense of placement that most singers mature into only gradually. She sang Wagner's Wesendonk songs and the Liebestod with passion and great musicality, creating a strong line even when Colin Davis's rather placid conducting put her on her own.

I don't get to Tanglewood nearly often enough, but I have been there for a number of important debuts over the years: the day Koussevitzky introduced the haunting young Carol Brice, the night a kid named Bernstein led the American premiere of Peter Grimes, the nights when other bright kids named Seymour Lipkin, Julius Katchen and Eleazar de Carvalho brought screaming audiences to their feet. The electricity Jessye Norman generated brought back memories of those other nights. She is a tremendous discovery, an artist of genuine value.

Back in the office on Monday, I got her on the phone, a lady of obvious great vivacity and charm. She's perfectly happy living in Germany, where she has been singing big roles at the Munich and Berlin Operas; she makes her Covent Garden debut in October, as Cassandra in Les Troyens. Extrapolating her work in Wagner into the demands of that wonderful role, I can predict nothing but glory. She has two new Philips recordings on the way: a Schubert-Mahler recital and a leading role in Mozart's La Finta Giardinera. She sings at Dunbarton Oaks in Washington in November. "New York is not yet in the picture," she says. "I want to sing there, but not in just anything. I'd love to give a Lieder recital, but I'm afraid nobody would come. It's not inevitable that I sing at the Met; it would have to be in the right role, probably Mozart rather than Wagner. I'm learning both Elvira and Anna, in case anybody feels like producing a Don Giovanni for me."

This is all good, straight singer's talk, and it's clear that she hasn't been thrown off by her Tanglewood ovation, at which she admits to being "overwhelmed." One seldom gains any great musical insights from chatting with even great singers, but the insight Miss Norman affords is that she is a wise, shrewd lady whose greatest concern these days is being around for a while. Believe me, she's entitled.

At the evening concert, after sadly hearing Gina Bachauer suffer two memory lapses in short order in the Beethoven Fourth Concerto, I played hookey from Brahms (always a pleasure) to drive over to the Lenox Arts Center for a musical entertainment by Richard Foreman and Stanley Silverman called Doctor Selavy's Magic Theater. The Arts Center, a place where a lot of talented youngsters do some interesting work in far-out theatrical ideas, gives you the feeling on arrival of a summer camp on counselor's night off, but by performance time everything came together splendidly. Silverman, who did the marvelous Elephant Steps a few years ago, has turned out for this absurdist play an ingenious set of parody-pieces, mostly of old movie tunes and a little elementary rock. If the music doesn't reveal as much of his own outlook as Elephant Steps did, it at least shows him as a marvelous observer. If I ever find out what Foreman's plot is about (I haven't, yet), you all will be the next to know, but the show is a greatly charming experience. "Selavy," for what the information is worth, means "c'est la vie."

Jessye Norman, "cause for shock."

The other big news at Tanglewood this weekend was a production of Monteverdi's Coronation of Poppea by Jan Strasfogel's Music Theater Project. Any summer affording two Poppeas (here and Caramoor) can't be all bad. This one, done in a tiny theater, used a reconstruction of the score by Alan Curtis that is fluent, imaginative, and rather closer to the original than the Leppard edition at Caramoor, and an English translation by Geoffrey Dunn that is one of the best jobs of vivifying an archaic text I've ever encountered. Strasfogel's staging was "modern" mostly in that the costumes were a kind of all-era Fascist and that the love scenes were, shall we say, rather explicit. Much debate raged here about that, spilling over into the Sunday Times. This, it seems to me, is useless, around-the-edges stuff; what is important is that Monteverdi's awesome masterpiece be given headway. This happened here, as the result of superb singing, a vivid conducting job by Bruno Maderna, and an over-all approach to the work as a timeless, alive masterpiece.

Courier-Journal & Times
Louisville, Ky.
SUN. 350,303
AUG 20 1972

Jessye Norman is rising young black soprano

By DONAL HENAHAN
© New York Times News Service

LENOX, Mass.—If you fancy great singers and haven't heard the name Jessye Norman—you will.

Miss Norman is a 26-year-old black American soprano and, judging from her first Boston Symphony appearance at the recent Berkshire Festival, hers is one of the more important voices to come along in some time.

Not only did her sizable tones project easily in Tanglewood's vast Music Shed, where she sang Wagner's "Wesendonk Songs" and the Liberstod from "Tristan und Isolde," but her voice retained a sumptuous, velvety quality at just those points in the music where hardness and strain usually creep in.

Miss Norman makes an impressive presence on stage. She sends out a blinding laser-beam of a smile, she wears an Afro and she is scaled along the lines of Callas in her monumental early years. But it was the singing that turned on Tanglewood's audience and kept it turned on.

She was born in Augusta, Ga., and attended Howard University. She studied with Pierre Bernac at the University of Michigan and with Alice Duschack at the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore. Since 1969 she has lived in West Berlin and made her operatic debut there as Elisabeth in "Tannhauser." Last April she sang Aida at La Scala and next season will make her Covent Garden debut as Cassandra in Berlioz's "Les Troyens."

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
AUG 14 1972
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood concert

Soprano almost sensation

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENNOX — If Jessye Norman were as famous as she is good, there would have been a mob at Tanglewood for the Friday night Boston Symphony Concert instead of the barely 5000, in fact about as small an audience as the orchestra has drawn this summer.

Jessye Norman is a young black soprano who in the last three years has made it big in Europe in operatic repertories ranging from Purcell's "Dido" to "Aida," and who is now in the process of being introduced to the public in her own country.

At Tanglewood she sang Wagner, Wesendonk songs and the Love-Death from "Tristan," and she brought to it musical taste of a high order, intensity and that kind of personal projection which instantly says "star," and beautiful, expressive German.

Yes, an extraordinary, ample voice, a bit heavily laden with vibrato at first and with just the slightest tendency sometimes to flirt with the underside of pitches, the latter impeccably in tune and steady, almost coldly steady, like a superb organ diapason.

She made an enormous impression, and I think with another conductor — or even with the same conductor, Colin Davis, on another day — she might have made a sensation. Davis, who has made his reputation as a great Mozart conductor and as a man who found the classicism and the cleanness in Beilioz, just may not be temperamentally a "Tristan" conductor (and the Wesdonk songs are part of the "Tristan" world, too), or perhaps he was momentarily below form. I don't know which.

He provided attentive accompaniments for the songs, but the "Tristan" prelude just lay there and never took fire. The voice buffs could and did get thoroughly turned-on by the singer's marvelous sound. I, although aware of the beautiful things Miss Norman was doing, could not separate them from their unexciting context, and in the end, the experience was disappointing.

It will be interesting to see how the same music goes when Miss Norman, Davis, and the orchestra do this again in Boston in March.

Davis began the Wagner group with "Flying Dutchman Overture." It was energetic although rough, with accident-prone brass and wind tuning generally not up to snuff (true to some extent in the rest of the Wagner, too). The orchestra did so much fine playing earlier that it is startling in the last couple of weekends to be back in the roughness that so often prevailed in recent years.

After intermission, Davis conducted Verdi's "Four Sacred Pieces," the a capella "Ave Maria" and the setting of the 33d canto of Dante's "Paradiso," and, with orchestra, a stabat mater and te deum: fantastic music, especially in the two big pieces. There was taste, although some lack of delicacy in the execution, a tendency to emphasize the line-by-line sectionality of the pieces more than their cohesiveness, and here, too, some failure of energy.

John Oliver's Tanglewood Festival Chorus and Tanglewood Choir sang with sound both handsome and transparent, with diction that was clear but seeming rather in the direction of "tay dayum."

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398
AUG 13 1972
New England Newsclip

Jessye Norman Steals Hearts At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The fulsome sonority of Wagner filled the giant shed at Tanglewood last night and a soprano new to Tanglewood audiences stole their hearts.

She was Jessye Norman, a large young woman with a big grin and a magnificent voice. She has, as far as I know, everything a soprano needs to establish a permanent niche in vocal immortaility.

And she has planted sturdy feet on a secure spot in the international music world in only four years. She studied in America and moved to Europe, where she became a professional of stature in the major opera houses and concert halls.

She displayed a voice Friday of great warmth and beauty of tone as well as of the kind of power needed to handle the demands of Wagner; and she demonstrated a technical control, a liquid smooth phrasing and a surety of articulation and intonation that made her beautiful tones seem easy.

Not only that, she handled the German words with a clarity of diction that was rare.

The audience responded to her with shouts of approval and many of them stood to express their happiness.

It seems unnecessary to report what she sang, but here it is: Wagner's "Five Poems by Mathilde Wesendonk" and the prelude and liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde."

After intermission the Tanglewool festival chorus appeared to start off Verdi's "Four Sacred Pieces" with the unaccompanied "Ave Maria" in six minutes of purity.

Then the orchestra joined the chorus for the "Stabat Mater" which was followed by the "Laudi Alla Vergine Maria."

The Te Deum for soprano soloist Joan Heller, double chorus and orchestra wound up the program, the second half again proving for me that this season Tanglewood has the best chorus it has had in 10 years.

At the 7 p.m. prelude concert Gina Bachauer, who some music lovers believe is the pre-eminent female pianist, gave a 58-minute recital of three works by Mozart, Ravel, and Brahms plus two encores.

There was nothing in her performance to damage her reputation. She is a phenomenal pianist . . . secure, mature, gracefully fluid and warmly expressive.

The Mozart piece was a sonata in F (K.332) offered with careful attention to the traditional style. . . . steady meters, level dynamics and a gentle nod toward adventurous rhythmic variation during the slow middle movement.

Miss Bachauer's precision of articulation was most evident, as was her famed depth of technical resources, during Ravel's "Gaspard de la Nuit" and Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Paganini," set 2, opus 35.

Both require great virtuosity, and the Ravel especially requires a sensitivity of expression.

She was, of course, equal to the requirements of both. Her brand of pianism is at the very top level of quality and she does it with a regally calm, undemonstrative stage presence.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549
AUG 13 1972
New England Newsclip

A FESTIVAL TAKES SOPRANO TO HEART

Jessye Norman's Rich Voice Wins Fans at Tanglewood

By DONAL HENAHAN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 12—If you fancy great singers, and you haven't heard the name of Jessye Norman, don't worry. You will. Miss Norman is a 26-year-old black American soprano, and, judging from her first Boston Symphony appearance last night at the Berkshire Festival, hers is one of the more important voices to come along in some time.

Not only did her sizable tones project easily in Tanglewood's vast Music Shed, where she sang Wagner's "Wesendonk" Songs and the Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde," but it also retained a sumptuous, velvety quality at just those points in the music where hardness and strain usually creep in. Her high pianissimo at the crest of the Liebestod was masterly.

Furthermore, Miss Norman proved to be an uncommonly sensitive artist, and with Colin Davis delicately adjusting the Boston Symphony to her vocal and interpretive needs, she thoroughly captivated the audience. Both after the "Wesendonk" Songs and after the Liebestod, there were standing ovations, and the kind of public delerium that great singing can arouse.

Miss Norman makes an impressive presence on stage, no doubt about that. She send out a blinding laser-beam of a smile, she wears an Afro and she is scaled along the lines of Callas in her monumental early years. But is was the singing that turned on Tanglewood's audience and kept it turned on.

Davis's Ability Accented

From her recent recording of the Countess in Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," under Mr. Davis, one had expected a lighter voice. In fact, Miss Norman's is quite robust and might in time become a genuine Wagnerian soprano instrument. But, though, she can obviously handle an occasional concert Liebestod even now, heavyweight Wagner would not seem to be a wise course for her to follow if the voice is to develop and mature.

Miss Norman was born in Augusta, Ga., and attended Howard University. She studied with Pierre Bernac at the University of Michigan and with Alice Duschack at the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore.

However, she has lived in West Berlin since 1969 and she made her operatic debut there as Elisabeth in "Tannhäuser." Last April she sang Aïda at La Scala and next season she will make her Covent Garden debut as Cassandra in Berlioz's "Les Troyens," again with Colin Davis as conductor

Mr. Davis deserved great credit for last night's triumphs, which also included Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and Verdi's Four Sacred Pieces. Mr. Davis is not only a technician of the highest order under whose baton the orchestra seemed to run like the expensive machine it is, but a musician of tremendous dramatic instinct and flair.

The melding voice, orchestra and poetic conception in the "Wesendonk" Songs could hardly have been more complete, and in the Tristan excerpts (he also conducted the prelude, of course) his control over the orchestra allowed Miss Norman's voice to bloom at its richest with no dramatic comporimse. His handling of orchestra and vocal forces (the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and Tanglewood Choir) in the Verdi pieces showed in all their quasi-operatic; quasi-liturgical glory.

NEW YORK MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. - CIRC. N. AVAIL.
AUG 28 1972

The Lively Arts/Alan Rich

ALL IS WELL IN MARLBORO COUNTRY

". . . People don't come here for specific programs; they come for a style and spirit that don't exist anywhere else in the U.S. . . ."

I arrived at Tanglewood on Saturday morning to find the place in a state of emotional shock after the debut the night before of a young black dramatic soprano named Jessye Norman. "Where were you?" everybody screamed. A kindly recording engineer bridged the gap by playing me the tapes. Miss Norman, who is 26, comes from Georgia, has been singing opera in Europe and is the Countess on the recent Philips recording of Figaro. She is, indeed, a cause for emotional shock. Her voice, over a remarkable range from well below the staff up to at least an A, is seamless, pure and dazzlingly rich. She has been beautifully trained, with the sense of placement that most singers mature into only gradually. She sang Wagner's Wesendonk songs and the Liebestod with passion and great musicality, creating a strong line even when Colin Davis's rather placid conducting put her on her own.

I don't get to Tanglewood nearly often enough, but I have been there for a number of important debuts over the years: the day Koussevitzky introduced the haunting young Carol Brice, the night a kid named Bernstein led the American premiere of Peter Grimes, the nights when other bright kids named Seymour Lipkin, Julius Katchen and Eleazar de Carvalho brought screaming audiences to their feet. The electricity Jessye Norman generated brought back memories of those other nights. She is a tremendous discovery, an artist of genuine value.

Back in the office on Monday, I got her on the phone, a lady of obvious great vivacity and charm. She's perfectly happy living in Germany, where she has been singing big roles at the Munich and Berlin Operas; she makes her Covent Garden debut in October, as Cassandra in Les Troyens. Extrapolating her work in Wagner into the demands of that wonderful role, I can predict nothing but glory. She has two new Philips recordings on the way: a Schubert-Mahler recital and a leading role in Mozart's La Finta Giardinera. She sings at Dunbarton Oaks in Washington in November. "New York is not yet in the picture," she says. "I want to sing there, but not in just anything. I'd love to give a Lieder recital, but I'm afraid nobody would come. It's not inevitable that I sing at the Met; it would have to be in the right role, probably Mozart rather than Wagner. I'm learning both Elvira and Anna, in case anybody feels like producing a Don Giovanni for me."

This is all good, straight singer's talk, and it's clear that she hasn't been thrown off by her Tanglewood ovation, at which she admits to being "overwhelmed." One seldom gains any great musical insights from chatting with even great singers, but the insight Miss Norman affords is that she is a wise, shrewd lady whose greatest concern these days is being around for a while. Believe me, she's entitled.

At the evening concert, after sadly hearing Gina Bachauer suffer two memory lapses in short order in the Beethoven Fourth Concerto, I played hookey from Brahms (always a pleasure) to drive over to the Lenox Arts Center for a musical entertainment by Richard Foreman and Stanley Silverman called Doctor Selavy's Magic Theater. The Arts Center, a place where a lot of talented youngsters do some interesting work in far-out theatrical ideas, gives you the feeling on arrival of a summer camp on counselor's night off, but by performance time everything came together splendidly. Silverman, who did the marvelous Elephant Steps a few years ago, has turned out for this absurdist play an ingenious set of parody-pieces, mostly of old movie tunes and a little elementary rock. If the music doesn't reveal as much of his own outlook as Elephant Steps did, it at least shows him as a marvelous observer. If I ever find out what Foreman's plot is about (I haven't, yet), you all will be the next to know, but the show is a greatly charming experience. "Selavy," for what the information is worth, means "c'est la vie."

Jessye Norman, "cause for shock."

The other big news at Tanglewood this weekend was a production of Monteverdi's Coronation of Poppea by Jan Strasfogel's Music Theater Project. Any summer affording two Poppeas (here and Caramoor) can't be all bad. This one, done in a tiny theater, used a reconstruction of the score by Alan Curtis that is fluent, imaginative, and rather closer to the original than the Leppard edition at Caramoor, and an English translation by Geoffrey Dunn that is one of the best jobs of vivifying an archaic text I've ever encountered. Strasfogel's staging was "modern" mostly in that the costumes were a kind of all-era Fascist and that the love scenes were, shall we say, rather explicit. Much debate raged here about that, spilling over into the Sunday Times. This, it seems to me, is useless, around-the-edges stuff; what is important is that Monteverdi's awesome masterpiece be given headway. This happened here, as the result of superb singing, a vivid conducting job by Bruno Maderna, and an over-all approach to the work as a timeless, alive masterpiece.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
AUG 14 1972
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood concert

Soprano almost sensation

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENNOX — If Jessye Norman were as famous as she is good, there would have been a mob at Tanglewood for the Friday night Boston Symphony Concert instead of the barely 5000, in fact about as small an audience as the orchestra has drawn this summer.

Jessye Norman is a young black soprano who in the last three years has made it big in Europe in operatic repertories ranging from Purcell's "Dido" to "Aida," and who is now in the process of being introduced to the public in her own country.

At Tanglewood she sang Wagner, Wesendonk songs and the Love-Death from "Tristan," and she brought to it musical taste of a high order, intensity and that kind of personal projection which instantly says "star," and beautiful, expressive German.

Yes, an extraordinary, ample voice, a bit heavily laden with vibrato at first and with just the slightest tendency sometimes to flirt with the underside of pitches, the latter impeccably in tune and steady, almost coldly steady, like a superb organ diapason.

She made an enormous impression, and I think with another conductor — or even with the same conductor, Colin Davis, on another day — she might have made a sensation. Davis, who has made his reputation as a great Mozart conductor and as a man who found the classicism and the cleanness in Beilioz, just may not be temperamentally a "Tristan" conductor (and the Wesdonk songs are part of the "Tristan" world, too), or perhaps he was momentarily below form. I don't know which.

He provided attentive accompaniments for the songs, but the "Tristan" prelude just lay there and never took fire. The voice buffs could and did get thoroughly turned-on by the singer's marvelous sound. I, although aware of the beautiful things Miss Norman was doing, could not separate them from their unexciting context, and in the end, the experience was disappointing.

It will be interesting to see how the same music goes when Miss Norman, Davis, and the orchestra do this again in Boston in March.

Davis began the Wagner group with "Flying Dutchman Overture." It was energetic although rough, with accident-prone brass and wind tuning generally not up to snuff (true to some extent in the rest of the Wagner, too). The orchestra did so much fine playing earlier that it is startling in the last couple of weekends to be back in the roughness that so often prevailed in recent years.

After intermission, Davis conducted Verdi's "Four Sacred Pieces," the a capella "Ave Maria" and the setting of the 33d canto of Dante's "Paradiso," and, with orchestra, a stabat mater and te deum: fantastic music, especially in the two big pieces. There was taste, although some lack of delicacy in the execution, a tendency to emphasize the line-by-line sectionality of the pieces more than their cohesiveness, and here, too, some failure of energy.

John Oliver's Tanglewood Festival Chorus and Tanglewood Choir sang with sound both handsome and transparent, with diction that was clear but seeming rather in the direction of "tay dayum."

Courier-Journal & Times
Louisville, Ky.
SUN. 350,303
AUG 20 1972

Jessye Norman is rising young black soprano

By DONAL HENAHAN
© New York Times News Service

LENOX, Mass.—If you fancy great singers and haven't heard the name Jessye Norman—you will.

Miss Norman is a 26-year-old black American soprano and, judging from her first Boston Symphony appearance at the recent Berkshire Festival, hers is one of the more important voices to come along in some time.

Not only did her sizable tones project easily in Tanglewood's vast Music Shed, where she sang Wagner's "Wesendonk Songs" and the Liberstod from "Tristan und Isolde," but her voice retained a sumptuous, velvety quality at just those points in the music where hardness and strain usually creep in.

Miss Norman makes an impressive presence on stage. She sends out a blinding laser-beam of a smile, she wears an Afro and she is scaled along the lines of Callas in her monumental early years. But it was the singing that turned on Tanglewood's audience and kept it turned on.

She was born in Augusta, Ga., and attended Howard University. She studied with Pierre Bernac at the University of Michigan and with Alice Duschack at the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore. Since 1969 she has lived in West Berlin and made her operatic debut there as Elisabeth in "Tannhauser." Last April she sang Aida at La Scala and next season will make her Covent Garden debut as Cassandra in Berlioz's "Les Troyens."

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS
D. 79,398
AUG 13 1972
New England Newsclip

Jessye Norman Steals Hearts At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The fulsome sonority of Wagner filled the giant shed at Tanglewood last night and a soprano new to Tanglewood audiences stole their hearts.

She was Jessye Norman, a large young woman with a big grin and a magnificent voice. She has, as far as I know, everything a soprano needs to establish a permanent niche in vocal immortaility.

And she has planted sturdy feet on a secure spot in the international music world in only four years. She studied in America and moved to Europe, where she became a professional of stature in the major opera houses and concert halls.

She displayed a voice Friday of great warmth and beauty of tone as well as of the kind of power needed to handle the demands of Wagner, and she demonstrated a technical control, a liquid smooth phrasing and a surety of articulation and intonation that made her beautiful tones seem easy.

Not only that, she handled the German words with a clarity of diction that was rare.

The audience responded to her with shouts of approval and many of them stood to express their happiness.

It seems unnecessary to report what she sang, but here it is: Wagner's "Five Poems by Mathilde Wesendonk" and the prelude and liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde."

After intermission the Tanglewool festival chorus appeared to start off Verdi's "Four Sacred Pieces" with the unaccompanied "Ave Maria" in six minutes of purity.

Then the orchestra joined the chorus for the "Stabat Mater" which was followed by the "Laudi Alla Vergine Maria."

The Te Deum for soprano soloist Joan Heller, double chorus and orchestra wound up the program, the second half again proving for me that this season Tanglewood has the best chorus it has had in 10 years.

At the 7 p.m. prelude concert Gina Bachauer, who some music lovers believe is the pre-eminent female pianist, gave a 58-minute recital of three works by Mozart, Ravel, and Brahms plus two encores.

There was nothing in her performance to damage her reputation. She is a phenomenal pianist . . . secure, mature, gracefully fluid and warmly expressive.

The Mozart piece was a sonata in F (K.332) offered with careful attention to the traditional style. . . steady meters, level dynamics and a gentle nod toward adventurous rhythmic variation during the slow middle movement.

Miss Bachauer's precision of articulation was most evident, as was her famed depth of technical resources, during Ravel's "Gaspard de la Nuit" and Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Paganini," set 2, opus 35.

Both require great virtuosity, and the Ravel especially requires a sensitivity of expression.

She was, of course, equal to the requirements of both. Her brand of pianism is at the very top level of quality and she does it with a regally calm, undemonstrative stage presence.

125

Concert Review

Colin Davis Featured At Tanglewood's Berkshire Festival

By MARTHA deB. BEAVER

The next to final weekend of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox featured Colin Davis, musical director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, London, who becomes principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this fall.

Saturday evening's concert began with Berlioz' Overture "Les francs-juges," op.3, a first performance at the Berkshire Festival and a youthful (age 23) work of this composer. In fact, the second theme he evidently wrote as part of a flute quintet at age 11; it also suggests the motto of his later incomparable Symphonie Fantastique.

Thin Bombast

A first hearing for this reviewer, the Overture seemed full of thin bombast, the orchestration open and puerile (it was composed before Berlioz was fully aware of instrumental possibilities), relieved only by the Mozartean charm of the second theme, but ending in typical fortissimo fashion.

Davis does not wield a temperate baton. In fact, he might be termed a British Bernstein, although it is mainly his upper body that generates an incredible, almost infinite energy in making his directions known to the musicians.

More relaxed in the Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 4, in G major, op. 58, Davis set the tempos and shadings but bowed to the superior musicianship of the mature soloist Gina Bachauer, who brought sparkling virtuosity, tender warmth and powerful majesty to this long-neglected concerto, revived by Mendelssohn in 1836.

Her incredibly soft tones in the non-traditional opening were breathtaking and as commanding as the more vigorously propelled themes of the final Rondo, the two Beethoven candenzas in the first movement and single one in the latter superbly articulated. Those difficult double trills in the first about which Beethoven had written "Cadenza (masenza cadere)" were fluently facile, never failing.

Slow Andante

Although the Andante seemed exceptionally slow (perhaps Davis felt the tempo allowed the music to speak more fully) the piano's gently impassioned beauty in dialogue with a rather forbidding figure for the strings, spoke eloquently and insistently, crystal clear in its exalted rise and pleading retreat against the low-pitched orchestration.

Ms. Bachauer retains her remarkable and perfect tonal balance between right and left hand, the latter also always in equal technical control. It was a performance that will linger long in memory.

A student of Alfred Cortot and Sergei Rachmaninov, Ms. Bachauer was born in Greece of Austrian parentage. She played more than 200 concerts for the Allied Troops during World War II, in hospitals, aboard warships and in military camps.

An indefatigable pianist, Gina Bachauer has covered more than 2 million miles in her travels, playing with the world's major orchestras and giving innumerable recitals.

Last season, as a founding artist, she gave the first piano concert at The Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts. Her many European engagements included 15 appearances in 19 days with the Israel Orchestra.

Concluding Work

With the concluding work, Brahms' third symphony in F major, op. 90, Davis drew a restrained reading from the musicians, their response seeming distant and removed from his gestural pleadings. The music resounded in all its heroic and contemplative beauty, Davis stressing dynamic changes but not always indicating the structural interweaving of themes and development.

The impassioned Finale found him exerting every muscle to achieve the inherent opposing moods of despair and jubilation, introduced by a ghostly theme whispering through the strings, giving way to a sturdy and brighter melody from the cellos and horns.

As usual the winds and brass were tonally exact and brilliantly evocative, in every recurrence of the three-note "motto" theme, spread throughout the symphony's movements. Incidentally the highest voice, consisting of F, A flat, F, is supposed to stand for Frei aber froh (free but happy), Brahms having adopted that as a personal slogan.

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 42,181
AUG 14 1972

Bachauer-Davis Duo Delights Tanglewood

By BILL RICE

Famed pianist Gina Bachauer joined conductor Colin Davis and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evening at Tanglewood in a program that included Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4, Brahms' Symphony No. 3 and the lesser known, Overture 'Les francs-juges,' by Berlioz.

Miss Bachauer's interpretation of the Beethoven was one of reserved dignity and taste. Every note was perfectly calculated and placed with articulate beauty into the whole.

Miss Bachauer's name has been at the top of the list of fine pianists for a number of years now, and her deliberate interpretation of the Beethoven work Saturday proved it deserves to stay. Her reading of the beautiful cadenzas (these were Beethoven's) resisted any attempt for glory, other than the type that comes of a thorough display of inspired ability.

Overture

Opening the program was the overture, written when Berlioz was 23, for an opera which has since been discarded. As the program points out, the overture has moments which are surprisingly classical in nature, considering Berlioz was otherwise so thoroughly entrenched in romanticism.

The work abounds in emotional outbursts from the brass, thunderous clatters from the tympani and bass drum, but at times the light violin textures of a Mozart can be heard. The violins of the BSO were playing wonderfully together as a section.

This is early Berlioz and he seemed already to be experimenting in orchestral tonal effects, with, at one point, staccato muted trumpets being combined with pizzicato passages from the violins.

The work's brassy and percussive nature make it one suited for Sunday-afternoon-in-the-park type concerts.

Sold Out

The popularity of Colin Davis at Tanglewood is such that all three weekend concerts were sold out performances. Total attendance Saturday evening was given as 9,556.

The program concluded with utmost attention to the melodic line and blend and the balance of the Symphony.

All in all, it was a nearly unbeatable evening of beautiful music, made more so by beautiful weather, something of a rarity these days.

NEWS
WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS.
W. 1,289
AUG 17 1972
New England Newsclip

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 16,200
AUG 16 1972
New England Newsclip

Mostly Music

BY WILLIAM P. MERRILL

Davis conducts: pure joy.

The penultimate weekend of the 1972 Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood saw as guest conductor Colin Davis. Mr. Davis was well received and with good reason; he entered into the spirit of the works performed: his were no dazzling tempi, nor did he call for blazing orchestral fireworks. The result was music free from the excesses placed on it by more zealous conductors.

Saturday night's concert was a case in point. The Overture to "Les Francs-juges" of Hector Berlioz is a youthful composition and full of imperfections. Such a work can easily get out of hand if played too bombastically, for Berlioz' earlier work leaned more toward the classical than the romantic. There is a statement for brass in octaves in the beginning of the Overture which, while an example of faulty orchestration, would nevertheless fail completely had it been allowed to blare forth. Davis presided in such a way so as to allow the best parts to come through.

Gina Bachauer was the soloist in Beethoven's Piano Concerto Number 4 in G. Her Chamber-like approach illustrates how widely interpretations can vary.

The results here were perfectly enchanting. The introduction on the piano was played so softly that had ones eyes been closed one scarcely would have known at which moment the performer had begun. It was as though Miss Bachauer were playing on a pianoforte of the period: not the instrument of heroic proportions found in Tchaikowsky or even in Beethoven's Fifth concerto, but the more delicate instrument of Mozart's era. How incredible to hear the stormy, noble Beethoven played with such restraint, if one may call it that. The second movement, the "argument" between orchestra and piano was done beautifully, the adamant statements of the orchestra finally giving in to the plaintive remakrs of the piano. The finale which follows the andante without pause was carried on in the same spirit - never too loud, but with reserve: a perfect example of control. I am used to hearing Beethoven played aggresively. This performance, different, beautiful, was indeed a treat.

A famous musician was once asked which of Brahm's four symphonies was his favorite. His reply was, "The one I heard the last." So it is that each of the four stands as an individual. For many, the Third stands as the sensitive one, the "Pathétique," and surely the prevailing mood may be seen where each movement ends as it is begun: not with a bang, but with a sigh. Some may prefer a more tempestuous Third, but for these ears, Davis' performance was pure joy.

TANGLEWOOD 1972

SEIJI OZAWA Artistic Director, Berkshire Festival
GUNTHER SCHULLER Artistic Director, Berkshire Music Center
LEONARD BERNSTEIN Adviser

Saturday August 12 1972 at 8.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

COLIN DAVIS conductor

BERLIOZ Overture 'Les francs-juges' op. 3

first performance at the Berkshire Festival

*BEETHOVEN Piano concerto no. 4 in G op. 58

Allegro moderato
Andante con moto
Rondo: vivace

GINA BACHAUER

intermission

*BRAHMS Symphony no. 3 in F op. 90

Allegro con brio
Andante
Poco allegretto
Allegro

Gina Bachauer plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for this evening's concert begin on page 30

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECORDS EXCLUSIVELY FOR DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON

BALDWIN PIANO
DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON & *RCA RECORDS

HOUR
NORWALK, CONN.
D. 23,000
AUG 17 1972
New England Newsclip

Colin Davis Adds To Boston Symphony's Summer Attractiveness

Adding new lustre to the already established shine of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer performances at Tanglewood two major stellar attractions added much to the great program of Saturday night at the Lenox, Mass. Festival location for the musicians.

Colin Davis is a conductor of no ordinary attainments, and Gina Bachauer guest pianist, has an envious reputation of not only having been a student of Sergey Rachmaninov, a teacher at the Athens Conservatory, but has played with the world's major orchestras, and was a founding artist at the opening of Kennedy Center in Washington last year.

Her choice, at this momentous concert, which was packed to the rafters, the Piano concerto No. 4 in G. of Beethoven met with intense listening pleasure and approbation. Here is an artist with a real depth of musical understanding, who is able to intepret her feelings with an apparent outward ease in the most difficult of pasages and with a resultant incomparable productivity that is breathtaking, and one comes away with an intense joie de vivre, grateful for ears that hear. With a giant program, boasting Berlioz Overture Les francs-judges, to open it, and the Brahms Symphony No. 3 in F. for the entire second half, the bigness of these hours on Saturday evening brought again the realization that however familiar the music may become it has the capacity to become ever new in its mood of interpretation and rendition. The orchestra seemed on fire, the conductor who becomes principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony this fall is also musical, director of the Royal Opera House Covent Garden and has an otherwise wide experience and capacity for challenging the musicians under his batonic control.

Thus we climbed the mountain peaks of the Brahms third like those who first heard, it proclaiming, its composer as a great symphonist, and its performance a real occasion. By now, Brahms had become known as a fully matured symphonist, perhaps more tranquil, subdued and delicate but proproclaimed "an aristrocat of his art", What remians of the Berlioz opera, from which his overture has been preserved, has been termed by Conductor Davis as an "extension of Mozart, with a painful nostalgia for a world of lost innocence" Portions of it were taken from a flute quintet composed at 11 years of age, with a resemblance to the recurrent theme of his imimitable Fantastique. He completed the piece at 23. Of this piece. piece, Berlioz himself wrote" I was so elated I went home with my head in the clouds, and not looking where it was going, twisted my ankle. I get a pain in my foot whenever I hear the piece. Others, perhaps get a pain in the head." But not the Tanglewood audience of Saturday night. Applause hardly ceased in time for the entrance of the piano and pianist, which were to follow: Three of the Big Bs brought once again Bravos, brightness and beauty.

ROXIE E. HOUGHTON

125

Concert Review

Colin Davis Featured At Tanglewood's Berkshire Festival

By MARTHA deB. BEAVER

The next to final weekend of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox featured Colin Davis, musical director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, London, who becomes principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this fall.

Saturday evening's concert began with Berlioz' Overture "Les francs-juges," op.3, a first performance at the Berkshire Festival and a youthful (age 23) work of this composer. In fact, the second theme he evidently wrote as part of a flute quintet at age 11; it also suggests the motto of his later incomparable Symphonie Fantastique.

Thin Bombast

A first hearing for this reviewer, the Overture seemed full of thin bombast, the orchestration open and puerile (it was composed before Berlioz was fully aware of instrumental possibilities), relieved only by the Mozartean charm of the second theme, but ending in typical fortissimo fashion.

Davis does not wield a temperate baton. In fact, he might be termed a British Bernstein, although it is mainly his upper body that generates an incredible, almost infinite energy in making his directions known to the musicians.

More relaxed in the Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 4, in G major, op. 58, Davis set the tempos and shadings but bowed to the superior musicianship of the mature soloist Gina Bachauer, who brought sparkling virtuosity, tender warmth and powerful majesty to this long-neglected concerto, revived by Mendelssohn in 1836.

Her incredibly soft tones in the non-traditional opening were breathtaking and as commanding as the more vigorously propelled themes of the final Rondo, the two Beethoven candenzas in the first movement and single one in the latter superbly articulated. Those difficult double trills in the first about which Beethoven had written "Cadenza (masenza cadere)" were fluently facile, never failing.

Slow Andante

Although the Andante seemed exceptionally slow (perhaps Davis felt the tempo allowed the music to speak more fully) the piano's gently impassioned beauty in dialogue with a rather forbidding figure for the strings, spoke eloquently and insistently, crystal clear in its exalted rise and pleading retreat against the low-pitched orchestration.

Ms. Bachauer retains her remarkable and perfect tonal balance between right and left hand, the latter also always in equal technical control. It was a performance that will linger long in memory.

A student of Alfred Cortot and Sergei Rachmaninov, Ms. Bachauer was born in Greece of Austrian parentage. She played more than 200 concerts for the Allied Troops during World War II, in hospitals, aboard warships and in military camps.

An indefatigable pianist, Gina Bachauer has covered more than 2 million miles in her travels, playing with the world's major orchestras and giving innumerable recitals.

Last season, as a founding artist, she gave the first piano concert at The Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts. Her many European engagements included 15 appearances in 19 days with the Israel Orchestra.

Concluding Work

With the concluding work, Brahms' third symphony in F major, op. 90, Davis drew a restrained reading from the musicians, their response seeming distant and removed from his gestural pleadings. The music resounded in all its heroic and contemplative beauty, Davis stressing dynamic changes but not always indicating the structural interweaving of themes and development.

The impassioned Finale found him exerting every muscle to achieve the inherent opposing moods of despair and jubilation, introduced by a ghostly theme whispering through the strings, giving way to a sturdy and brighter melody from the cellos and horns.

As usual the winds and brass were tonally exact and brilliantly evocative, in every recurrence of the three-note "motto" theme, spread throughout the symphony's movements. Incidentally the highest voice, consisting of F, A flat, F, is supposed to stand for Frei aber froh (free but happy), Brahms having adopted that as a personal slogan.

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 42,181
AUG 14 1972

Bachauer-Davis Duo Delights Tanglewood

By BILL RICE

Famed pianist Gina Bachauer joined conductor Colin Davis and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evening at Tanglewood in a program that included Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4, Brahms' Symphony No. 3 and the lesser known, Overture 'Les francs-juges,' by Berlioz.

Miss Bachauer's interpretation of the Beethoven was one of reserved dignity and taste. Every note was perfectly calculated and placed with articulate beauty into the whole.

Miss Bachauer's name has been at the top of the list of fine pianists for a number of years now, and her deliberate interpretation of the Beethoven work Saturday proved it deserves to stay. Her reading of the beautiful cadenzas (these were Beethoven's) resisted any attempt for glory, other than the type that comes of a thorough display of inspired ability.

Overture

Opening the program was the overture, written when Berlioz was 23, for an opera which has since been discarded. As the program points out, the overture has moments which are surprisingly classical in nature, considering Berlioz was otherwise so thoroughly entrenched in romanticism.

The work abounds in emotional outbursts from the brass, thunderous clatters from the tympani and bass drum, but at times the light violin textures of a Mozart can be heard. The violins of the BSO were playing wonderfully together as a section.

This is early Berlioz and he seemed already to be experimenting in orchestral tonal effects, with, at one point, staccato muted trumpets being combined with pizzicato passages from the violins.

The work's brassy and percussive nature make it one suited for Sunday-afternoon-in-the-park type concerts.

Sold Out

The popularity of Colin Davis at Tanglewood is such that all three weekend concerts were sold out performances. Total attendance Saturday evening was given as 9,556.

The program concluded with utmost attention to the melodic line and blend and balance of the Symphony.

All in all, it was a nearly unbeatable evening of beautiful music, made more so by beautiful weather, something of a rarity these days.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 16,200
AUG 16 1972
New England Newsclip

NEWS
WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS.
W. 1,289
AUG 17 1972
New England Newsclip

Mostly Music

BY WILLIAM P. MERRILL

Davis conducts: pure joy.

The penultimate weekend of the 1972 Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood saw as guest conductor Colin Davis. Mr. Davis was well received and with good reason; he entered into the spirit of the works performed: his were no dazzling tempi, nor did he call for blazing orchestral fireworks. The result was music free from the excesses placed on it by more zealous conductors.

Saturday night's concert was a case in point. The Overture to "Les Francs-juges" of Hector Berlioz is a youthful composition and full of imperfections. Such a work can easily get out of hand if played too bombastically, for Berlioz' earlier work leaned more toward the classical than the romantic. There is a statement for brass in octaves in the beginning of the Overture which, while an example of faulty orchestration, would nevertheless fail completely had it been allowed to blare forth. Davis presided in such a way so as to allow the best parts to come through.

Gina Bachauer was the soloist in Beethoven's Piano Concerto Number 4 in G. Her Chamber-like approach illustrates how widely interpretations can vary.

The results here were perfectly enchanting. The introduction on the piano was played so softly that had ones eyes been closed one scarcely would have known at which moment the performer had begun. It was as though Miss Bachauer were playing on a pianoforte of the period: not the instrument of heroic proportions found in Tchaikowsky or even in Beethoven's Fifth concerto, but the more delicate instrument of Mozart's era. How incredible to hear the stormy, noble Beethoven played with such restraint, if one may call it that. The second movement, the "argument" between orchestra and piano was done beautifully, the adamant statements of the orchestra finally giving in to the plaintive remakrs of the piano. The finale which follows the andante without pause was carried on in the same spirit - never too loud, but with reserve: a perfect example of control. I am used to hearing Beethoven played aggresively. This performance, different, beautiful, was indeed a treat.

A famous musician was once asked which of Brahm's four symphonies was his favorite. His reply was, "The one I heard the last." So it is that each of the four stands as an individual. For many, the Third stands as the sensitive one, the "Pathétique," and surely the prevailing mood may be seen where each movement ends as it is begun: not with a bang, but with a sigh. Some may prefer a more tempestuous Third, but for these ears, Davis' performance was pure joy.

TANGLEWOOD 1972

SEIJI OZAWA Artistic Director, Berkshire Festival
GUNTHER SCHULLER Artistic Director, Berkshire Music Center
LEONARD BERNSTEIN Adviser

Saturday August 12 1972 at 8.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

COLIN DAVIS conductor

BERLIOZ Overture 'Les francs-juges' op. 3

first performance at the Berkshire Festival

*BEETHOVEN Piano concerto no. 4 in G op. 58

Allegro moderato
Andante con moto
Rondo: vivace

GINA BACHAUER

intermission

*BRAHMS Symphony no. 3 in F op. 90

Allegro con brio
Andante
Poco allegretto
Allegro

Gina Bachauer plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for this evening's concert begin on page 30

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECORDS EXCLUSIVELY FOR DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON

BALDWIN PIANO
DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON & *RCA RECORDS

HOUR
NORWALK, CONN.
D. 23,000
AUG 17 1972
New England Newsclip

Colin Davis Adds To Boston Symphony's Summer Attractiveness

Adding new lustre to the already established shine of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer performances at Tanglewood two major stellar attractions added much to the great program of Saturday night at the Lenox, Mass. Festival location for the musicians.

Colin Davis is a conductor of no ordinary attainments, and Gina Bachauer guest pianist, has an envious reputation of not only having been a student of Sergey Rachmaninov, a teacher at the Athens Conservatory, but has played with the world's major orchestras, and was a founding artist at the opening of Kennedy Center in Washington last year.

Her choice, at this momentous concert, which was packed to the rafters, the Piano concerto No. 4 in G. of Beethoven met with intense listening pleasure and approbation. Here is an artist with a real depth of musical understanding, who is able to intepret her feelings with an apparent outward ease in the most difficult of pasages and with a resultant incomparable productivity that is breathtaking, and one comes away with an intense joie de vivre, grateful for ears that hear. With a giant program, boasting Berlioz Overture Les francs-judges, to open it, and the Brahms Symphony No. 3 in F. for the entire second half, the bigness of these hours on Saturday evening brought again the realization that however familiar the music may become it has the capacity to become ever new in its mood of interpretation and rendition. The orchestra seemed on fire, the conductor who becomes principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony this fall is also musical, director of the Royal Opera House Covent Garden and has an otherwise wide experience and capacity for challenging the musicians under his batonic control.

Thus we climbed the mountain peaks of the Brahms third like those who first heard, it proclaiming, its composer as a great symphonist, and its performance a real occasion. By now, Brahms had become known as a fully matured symphonist, perhaps more tranquil, subdued and delicate but proproclaimed "an aristrocat of his art", What remians of the Berlioz opera, from which his overture has been preserved, has been termed by Conductor Davis as an "extension of Mozart, with a painful nostalgia for a world of lost innocence" Portions of it were taken from a flute quintet composed at 11 years of age, with a resemblance to the recurrent theme of his imimitable Fantastique. He completed the piece at 23. Of this piece. piece, Berlioz himself wrote" I was so elated I went home with my head in the clouds, and not looking where it was going, twisted my ankle. I get a pain in my foot whenever I hear the piece. Others, perhaps get a pain in the head." But not the Tanglewood audience of Saturday night. Applause hardly ceased in time for the entrance of the piano and pianist, which were to follow: Three of the Big Bs brought once again Bravos, brightness and beauty.

ROXIE E. HOUGHTON

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

AUG 15 1972

New England Newsclip

Hub Symphony Orchestra Splits Double-Header

By RICHARD CONWAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of visiting manager Colin Davis, split a double - header at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon.

Before a crowd of slightly over 12,000, they turned in a lack - lustre performance of Beethoven's Third Symphony "The Eroica." Davis flailed the air with his baton repeatedly, but the only result was a slow moving, sluggish, indifferent playing of the music.

Hector Berlioz' "Te Deum, for tenor soloist, three choruses, orchestra, and organ, Op. 22" fared better.

One begins to suspect that Davis is a much better conductor of works involving the voice than he is a straight symphonic conductor. He enjoys a fine reputation among musicians. He is evidently thorough and knowledgeable. But having seen and heard the results of Friday night's and Sunday afternoon's concerts, the impression is that Davis has more of an affinity for music than for the voice.

He got some wonderful sound and marvelous effects out of the Berlioz work on Sunday. The Tanglewood Festival Chorus and Choir, prepared by John Oliver, responded well to Davis' direction. For the second time in a row though, the chorus failed to reach its previous heights of the season.

Again, a certain crispness was missing. The chorus does not seem to handle Latin as well as it did the German. They do have a rich, full sound, although the male voices do not seem as strong as they did earlier this season. The chorus did a particularly lovely job on the unaccompanied passages immediately following the tenor solo.

Due to the illness of tenor Richard Lewis, Kenneth Riegel was guest soloist Sunday. Riegel has a strong tenor voice, which he uses with considerable artistry. His enunciation is remarkably clear.

It is nearing the end of the season, with only one more week end to go. One suspects the orchestra is getting weary. The excitement and precision of the early weeks is missing. In the "Eroica" Sunday the musicians were just playing notes and going through the motions.

TANGLEWOOD 1972

SEIJI OZAWA Artistic Director, Berkshire Festival
GUNTHER SCHULLER Artistic Director, Berkshire Music Center
LEONARD BERNSTEIN Adviser

Sunday August 13 1972 at 2.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

COLIN DAVIS conductor

*BEETHOVEN Symphony no. 3 in E flat op. 55 'Eroica'

Allegro con brio
Marcia funebre: adagio assai
Scherzo: allegro vivace
Finale: allegro molto

intermission

BERLIOZ Te Deum, for tenor soloist and three choruses, with orchestra and organ op. 22

Te Deum laudamus
Tibi omnes angeli
Preludium: allegretto
Dignare, Domine
Christe, Rex gloriae
Te ergo quaesumus
Judex crederis esse venturus

RICHARD LEWIS tenor
TANGLEWOOD FESTIVAL CHORUS
TANGLEWOOD CHOIR
John Oliver director
BERJ ZAMKOCHIAN organ

The program notes for this afternoon's concert begin on page 33

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECORDS EXCLUSIVELY FOR DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON

BALDWIN PIANO
DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON AND *RCA RECORDS

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 14 1972

New England Newsclip

Music Review

Davis conducts Tanglewood to colossal heights

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

FRIDAY NIGHT'S program, the first of the seventh and penultimate Tanglewood weekend, impressed an outstandingly memorable experience on the large audience which sat through an evening of chilly but bracing air and of glowing and thrilling vocalism. Soprano Jessye Norman astonished and enchanted her audience with a sublimely beautiful rendition of the five Wagner poems by Mathilde Wesendonck and the Liebestod, which with the prelude from "Tristan und Isolde," conductor Colin Davis had conducted in the first half of the evening.

Whitestone
Jessye Norman

* * *

THERE appeared to be a bit of felicitous planning in the three concerts, for there were splendid examples for chorus both Friday and yesterday afternoon, examples of the earliest overtures of Wagner and Berlioz on the first two programs and the third symphonies of both Brahms and Beethoven on the last two, respectively.

* * *

MISS NORMAN, with the stage dignity and majesty of an empress, amazed the audience with a voice production which was as steadfast as it was disciplined, a tonal production which was as wholesome in all registers as it was even, a German diction as articulate as it was authentic and a penetration of her Wagner excerpts as spellbinding as they were consummate. One thinks back to Flagstad and Hempel. Think today of Norman.

Davis preceded the Liebestod with an extremely spacious prelude but of lavish tonal opulence, and then complemented the singer with total empathy and discretion. His program opener, the "Fliegende Hollander" overture, was vehement and urgent.

The weekend choral music was sung by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir, John Oliver, director, and they produced a volume of unsurpassed pressure, attacks and responses of keen trenchancy, and a formidably effective tonal quality. Friday they sang the Four Sacred Pieces of Verdi and yesterday the "Te Deum" of Berlioz.

It was a fortunate situation that all three programs were allotted to Davis, who not only fulfilled them with distinction but exhibited the advantages of a plan of some continuity, which has not been in effect on any other of the season's Festival weekends.

I HAVE waited years to hear the Brahms third symphony played at the unrushed, unhurried tempos which, I have it by occult communication with the composer, Brahms intended and which Davis adopted Saturday night. The first three movements became love songs in this guise, and Davis sang them with affection. For once the last two notes in the theme in the fourth bar of the first movement were played with long full bow strokes and given their proper breadth and value. How marvelous the clarinets and bassoons sound as Brahms placed the second movement theme in their registers. How well-chosen was Brahms' orchestrating sense to guide him in placing the theme of the allegretto in the cellos, and what superb refinement in the coda of the finale when in the last nine bars he implies but does not specifically repeat the very theme he had used in the beginning of the first movement. All these hidden treasures showed up under Davis's fortunate conception, a judgment stressing the passionate fervor of Brahms which the usual swifter readings obscure.

Gina Bachauer, in addition to all the other factors of piano playing she possesses so abundantly, has a remarkable poise. It is remarkable how much an artist can say and reveal in the simple scriptural statement of the first few bars of the introduction. In her case, it showed a lifetime of sophistication, and Davis kept the orchestral introduction in the exact same level and spirit.

* * *

DAVIS played the Beethoven "Eroica" (No. 3) yesterday afternoon, and it is noteworthy to place this by the side of the Brahms and see how each one filled in the framework of their introductory measures. Brahms used two sustained and ominously overpowering chords to launch his awesome theme; Beethoven filled the analogous two bars with strong anvil blows after which he glides less violently into his calmer narration. Incidentally, that power-generating grandiose descending Brahms statement is one of the most inspired rhythmic idioms in music and, in my opinion, ranks only with such other striking instances as the "March to the Gallows," of Berlioz.

Beethoven's hero is a determined altruistic individual, battling for the welfare of humanity and, in that sense, far removed from Strauss's "Held," who is a vainglorious, flamboyant egotist. Strauss's gallant has some poignantly touching moments. To parallel that part of the "Heldenleben" Beethoven wrote a funeral march!

Hans Richter called Brahms' third symphony his Eroica, but there is no warrant to look for exploits of an Horatio at the bridge in either case. It was patently Davis's conception that both symphonies need more de-

Whitestone
Gina Bachauer

to my ears he couldn't be righter. They both require moderate liberation than impetuosity, and orchestral personnel.

For the massive splendor of the greatly expanded orchestral requirements, Davis played the Berlioz-overture "Les Francs-Juges" Saturday night. Here he released all the impact and colossal drive anyone could want.

* * *

THE VERDI choruses offer a variety of participations. An "Ave Maria" is for unaccompanied choir, the "Stabat Mater" for choir and orchestra; the "Laudi alla Vergine Maria" for women's chorus, and the final "Te Deum" for double chorus with a very short but salient emergence for a soprano solo which was sung more than capably by Joan Heller.

Berlioz' "Te Deum" is designated for tenor soloist and three choruses with orchestra and organ. Berlioz, as in his overture of the previous program, thought in overwhelming production. The personnel of his brass sections are expanded and his hoped-for executants, never actually realized, were on the dimensions requisitioned later on occasion by Mahler or Berlioz' charlatan contemporary, Louis Jullien for his "Concert monstre et Congres musical." For certain effects yesterday Berlioz employed four pairs of cymbals.

The tenor solo in the "Te ergo quaesumus" was sung by Kenneth Riegel, called as a replacement at short notice, with every factor achieved with most satisfying excellence.

* * *

DAVIS extended the voices of his large choral forces to their ultimate potential most of the time. In the tenor solo, they adjusted to judicious collaboration, but their utterances almost without variation were drained to the last decibel.

Davis is a relaxed, free-swinging conductor. He conducts lines more often than he beats time and when feasible doesn't disdain to refrain entirely from giving a beat. Since his last appearance here, he seems to have developed a few far-flung gestures such as haymakers and circuit-clouts, but what comes out warrants any vehemence he may choose to indicate his intentions, for he conveyed a spirit and a penetration of the most thorough understanding and imagination.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

AUG 15 1972

New England Newsclip

Hub Symphony Orchestra Splits Double-Header

By RICHARD CONWAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of visiting manager Colin Davis, split a double - header at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon.

Before a crowd of slightly over 12,000, they turned in a lack - lustre performance of Beethoven's Third Symphony "The Eroica." Davis flailed the air with his baton repeatedly, but the only result was a slow moving, sluggish, indifferent playing of the music.

Hector Berlioz' "Te Deum, for tenor soloist, three choruses, orchestra, and organ, Op. 22" fared better.

One begins to suspect that Davis is a much better conductor of works involving the voice than he is a straight symphonic conductor. He enjoys a fine reputation among musicians. He is evidently thorough and knowledgeable. But having seen and heard the results of Friday night's and Sunday afternoon's concerts, the impression is that Davis has more of an affinity for music than for the voice.

He got some wonderful sound and marvelous effects out of the Berlioz work on Sunday. The Tanglewood Festival Chorus and Choir, prepared by John Oliver, responded well to Davis' direction. For the second time in a row though, the chorus failed to reach its previous heights of the season.

Again, a certain crispness was missing. The chorus does not seem to handle Latin as well as it did the German. They do have a rich, full sound, although the male voices do not seem as strong as they did earlier this season. The chorus did a particularly lovely job on the unaccompanied passages immediately following the tenor solo.

Due to the illness of tenor Richard Lewis, Kenneth Riegel was guest soloist Sunday. Riegel has a strong tenor voice, which he uses with considerable artistry. His enunciation is remarkably clear.

It is nearing the end of the season, with only one more week end to go. One suspects the orchestra is getting weary. The excitement and precision of the early weeks is missing. In the "Eroica" Sunday the musicians were just playing notes and going through the motions.

TANGLEWOOD 1972

SEIJI OZAWA Artistic Director, Berkshire Festival
GUNTHER SCHULLER Artistic Director, Berkshire Music Center
LEONARD BERNSTEIN Adviser

Sunday August 13 1972 at 2.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

COLIN DAVIS conductor

*BEETHOVEN Symphony no. 3 in E flat op. 55 'Eroica'

Allegro con brio
Marcia funebre: adagio assai
Scherzo: allegro vivace
Finale: allegro molto

intermission

BERLIOZ Te Deum, for tenor soloist and three choruses, with orchestra and organ op. 22

Te Deum laudamus
Tibi omnes angeli
Preludium: allegretto
Dignare, Domine
Christe, Rex gloriae
Te ergo quaesumus
Judex crederis esse venturus

RICHARD LEWIS tenor
TANGLEWOOD FESTIVAL CHORUS
TANGLEWOOD CHOIR
John Oliver director
BERJ ZAMKOCHIAN organ

The program notes for this afternoon's concert begin on page 33

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECORDS EXCLUSIVELY FOR DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON

BALDWIN PIANO
DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON AND *RCA RECORDS

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 14 1972

New England Newsclip

Music Review

Davis conducts Tanglewood to colossal heights

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

FRIDAY NIGHT'S program, the first of the seventh and penultimate Tanglewood weekend, impressed an outstandingly memorable experience on the large audience which sat through an evening of chilly but bracing air and of glowing and thrilling vocalism. Soprano Jessye Norman astonished and enchanted her audience with a sublimely beautiful rendition of the five Wagner poems by Mathilde Wesendonck and the Liebestod, which with the prelude from "Tristan und Isolde," conductor Colin Davis had conducted in the first half of the evening.

Whitestone
Jessye Norman

* * *

THERE appeared to be a bit of felicitous planning in the three concerts, for there were splendid examples for chorus both Friday and yesterday afternoon, examples of the earliest overtures of Wagner and Berlioz on the first two programs and the third symphonies of both Brahms and Beethoven on the last two, respectively.

* * *

MISS NORMAN, with the stage dignity and majesty of an empress, amazed the audience with a voice production which was as steadfast as it was disciplined, a tonal production which was as wholesome in all registers as it was even, a German diction as articulate as it was authentic and a penetration of her Wagner excerpts as spellbinding as they were consummate. One thinks back to Flagstad and Hempel. Think today of Norman.

Davis preceded the Liebestod with an extremely spacious prelude but of lavish tonal opulence, and then complemented the singer with total empathy and discretion. His program opener, the "Fliegende Hollander" overture, was vehement and urgent.

The weekend choral music was sung by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir, John Oliver, director, and they produced a volume of unsurpassed pressure, attacks and responses of keen trenchancy, and a formidably effective tonal quality. Friday they sang the Four Sacred Pieces of Verdi and yesterday the "Te Deum" of Berlioz.

It was a fortunate situation that all three programs were allotted to Davis, who not only fulfilled them with distinction but exhibited the advantages of a plan of some continuity, which has not been in effect on any other of the season's Festival weekends.

I HAVE waited years to hear the Brahms third symphony played at the unrushed, unhurried tempos which, I have it by occult communication with the composer, Brahms intended and which Davis adopted Saturday night. The first three movements became love songs in this guise, and Davis sang them with affection. For once the last two notes in the theme in the fourth bar of the first movement were played with long full bow strokes and given their proper breadth and value. How marvelous the clarinets and bassoons sound as Brahms placed the second movement theme in their registers. How well-chosen was Brahms' orchestrating sense to guide him in placing the theme of the allegretto in the cellos, and what superb refinement in the coda of the finale when in the last nine bars he implies but does not specifically repeat the very theme he had used in the beginning of the first movement. All these hidden treasures showed up under Davis's fortunate conception, a judgment stressing the passionate fervor of Brahms which the usual swifter readings obscure.

Gina Bachauer, in addition to all the other factors of piano playing she possesses so abundantly, has a remarkable poise. It is remarkable how much an artist can say and reveal in the simple scriptural statement of the first few bars of the introduction. In her case, it showed a lifetime of sophistication, and Davis kept the orchestral introduction in the exact same level and spirit.

* * *

DAVIS played the Beethoven "Eroica" (No. 3) yesterday afternoon, and it is noteworthy to place this by the side of the Brahms and see how each one filled in the framework of their introductory measures. Brahms used two sustained and ominously overpowering chords to launch his awesome theme; Beethoven filled the analogous two bars with strong anvil blows after which he glides less violently into his calmer narration. Incidentally, that power-generating grandiose descending Brahms statement is one of the most inspired rhythmic idioms in music and, in my opinion, ranks only with such other striking instances as the "March to the Gallows," of Berlioz.

Beethoven's hero is a determined altruistic individual, battling for the welfare of humanity and, in that sense, far removed from Strauss's "Held," who is a vainglorious, flamboyant egotist. Strauss's gallant has some poignantly touching moments. To parallel that part of the "Heldenleben" Beethoven wrote a funeral march!

Hans Richter called Brahms' third symphony his Eroica, but there is no warrant to look for exploits of an Horatio at the bridge in either case. It was patently Davis's conception that both symphonies need more de-

Whitestone
Gina Bachauer

to my ears he couldn't be righter. They both require moderate liberation than impetuosity, and orchestral personnel.

For the massive splendor of the greatly expanded orchestral requirements, Davis played the Berlioz-overture "Les Francs-Juges" Saturday night. Here he released all the impact and colossal drive anyone could want.

* * *

THE VERDI choruses offer a variety of participations. An "Ave Maria" is for unaccompanied choir, the "Stabat Mater" for choir and orchestra; the "Laudi alla Vergine Maria" for women's chorus, and the final "Te Deum" for double chorus with a very short but salient emergence for a soprano solo which was sung more than capably by Joan Heller.

Berlioz' "Te Deum" is designated for tenor soloist and three choruses with orchestra and organ. Berlioz, as in his overture of the previous program, thought in overwhelming production. The personnel of his brass sections are expanded and his hoped-for executants, never actually realized, were on the dimensions requisitioned later on occasion by Mahler or Berlioz' charlatan contemporary, Louis Jullien for his "Concert monstre et Congres musical." For certain effects yesterday, Berlioz employed four pairs of cymbals:

The tenor solo in the "Te ergo quaesumus" was sung by Kenneth Riegel, called as a replacement at short notice, with every factor achieved with most satisfying excellence.

* * *

DAVIS extended the voices of his large choral forces to their ultimate potential most of the time. In the tenor solo, they adjusted to judicious collaboration, but their utterances almost without variation were drained to the last decibel.

Davis is a relaxed, free-swinging conductor. He conducts lines more often than he beats time and when feasible doesn't disdain to refrain entirely from giving a beat. Since his last appearance here, he seems to have developed a few far-flung gestures such as haymakers and circuit-clouts, but what comes out warrants any vehemence he may choose to indicate his intentions, for he conveyed a spirit and a penetration of the most thorough understanding and imagination.

127

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
D. 26,679

AUG 17 1972 New England

30,520 Attend Berkshire Concert

By SYLVIA S. MEYERS

Attendance for last weekend reached a new high of 30,520 at the Boston Symphony's Tanglewood Berkshire Festival, primarily due to the guest conductor, Colin Davis, music director of Covent Garden, London Symphony Orchestra.

Friday evening's Prelude concert featured pianist, Gina Bachauer in a 58 minute recital of three works by Mozart, Ravel and Brahms.

The regular Friday evening's concert at 9 p.m. was devoted to music by Wagner, starting with the Overture to the Flying Dutchman, followed by the introduction of Soprano, Jessye Norman, a 26-year-old, singing Wagner's "Wesendonk" songs and the Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde".

After intermission the Tanglewood Festival Chorus appeared, starting off with Verdi's "Four Sacred Pieces". The Te Deum for soprano soloist, Joan Heller, and the chorus finished the evening. John Oliver is the director of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and Tanglewood Choir.

Saturday evening's concert started with Berlioz, "Overture 'Les franc juges'. It was a first performance at the Berkshire Festival. Gina Bachauer returned to the podium performing Beethoven's beautiful and lyrical Piano Concerto No. 4.

The concert's last half was devoted to Brahms Symphony No. 3.

Sunday afternoon's concert brought out an audience of 12,043, many thousands sprawled all over the grounds in addition to a full audience sitting in the shed, to hear Beethoven's monumental "Eroica" Symphony (No. 3), for the first half.

The last half of the concert on Sunday afternoon was devoted to Berlioz "Te Deum" for tenor solist and three choruses with orchestra and organ. Richard Lewis, the soloist, suddenly ill, was replaced by his colleague, Kenneth Reigel, who agreed, at short notice, to sing the solo tenor part in this work. The Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir, were augmented by girls from the Indian Hill School, located in Stockbridge, a few miles from Tanglewood, and voluntarily took part in this performance. As one can imagine, the stage was full, with 150 singers and about 30 in the children's choir, with an augmented orchestra. Berlioz composed this music for a chorus of 800 and an orchestra of 150, wanting to produce a tremendous impact and production.

Next weekend the 35th Berkshire Music Festival will end this 1972 season with performances conducted by Seiji Ozawa on Friday evening at 9 p.m., with Alexis Weissenberg as piano soloist. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts on Saturday evening at 8:30 with Misha Dichter as piano soloist and Sunday afternoon at 2:30 with Ozawa conducting Mahler's 8th Symphony with seven vocal soloists and two choirs joining the orchestra.

The Friday night Prelude at 7 p.m. will feature Alexis Weissenberg performing with members of the Boston Symphony's Chamber Players in the Quintet in E-Flat for Piano and Winds. Soloists in addition to Weissenberg will be Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Harold Wright, clarient; Sherman Walt, bassoon and Charles Kavaloski, french horn.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405

AUG 17 1972 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

Friday, Aug. 11

Concertgoers fortunate enough to be at Tanglewood on Friday evening were treated to an overwhelming musical experience. The Boston Symphony was directed by Colin Davis, the exciting English conductor.

The first offering of the evening was Richard Wagner's Overture to The Flying Dutchman. It was given a spirited, authentic reading. Mr. Davis established from the outset that he was in command of the orchestra; its members responded with magnificent tone, restraint, extraordinary power and unanimity throughout the concert.

The highlight of the evening, however, was the appearance of the young, black soprano, Jessye Norman, who sang the Wesendonk songs of Wagner. Seldom does one hear a voice of such beauty. Miss Norman portrayed all of the passion of these poems and the music with great skill, rich and mellow tone, and superb control. Her presence, and the ease with which she sang these songs, was a remarkable demonstration of her artistry. The ovations which she received were a dramatic testimony to her great performance.

Miss Norman then appeared with the orchestra in the "Prelude" and "Liebestod" from Tristan and Isolde. Her voice soared above the full orchestra from which Mr. Davis summoned the full range of dynamics.

After the intermission, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and Choir joined with the BSO, in the "Four Sacred Pieces" of Verdi. These are lovely motets, written late in Verdi's life. They represent the devotion of a person under the strong influence of Palestrina. The music was sung with great care and conviction by the choral forces, prepared skillfully by their director, John Oliver. Mr. Davis obviously knows this music well, loves it, and directed it with great power, intensity and devotion. This is important choral literature, seldom performed, and it deserves to be sung and heard more often.

This was a memorable and a highly rewarding concert. The musical stature of Colin Davis, his strong direction, and Miss Norman's singing provided the assembly with an experience not to be forgotten.

William N. Penfield

Saturday, Aug. 12

Colin Davis opened Saturday's program with the Berlioz Overture to Les Francs — Juges. Written when the composer was 23, it does not abound in the unusual chromaticisms which were to characterize his later work, but it has a truly delightful second theme and many interesting surprises.

Conductor Davis is considered by many to be the foremost interpreter of Berlioz today, and his reading of this work was truly breathtaking.

There is always some danger of anticlimax when the opening of a concert is so exciting; unfortunately, this danger was realized in the performance of Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto with soloist Gina Bachauer. Miss Bachauer, one of the "first ladies" of the piano, has certainly played this work many times before (quite possibly with most of the major orchestras extant), but she seemed uncomfortable on this occasion and it reflected in her playing There were times when she and Mr. Davis were not at the same places in the score, and her playing seemed lacking in direction in some solo portions. We have heard Miss Bachauer play well before and would appreciate the opportunity to hear her interpretation of this great work under more favorable circumstances.

The evening ended with a tasteful, if somewhat lush, performance of the Brahms Third Symphony. Mr. Davis' conception is an exciting one, injecting life into this sometimes solemnly-interpreted work.

Franklin G. Coleman

Sunday, Aug. 13

Sunday's concert was magnificent from beginning to end. Mr. Davis began with a spirited, well-ordered performance of Beethoven's Eroica Symphony. The orchestra played brilliantly; we particularly enjoyed the marvelous sweep of the "Funeral March" movement (which was separated from the first movement by five minutes' worth of waiting for latecomers to be seated) and the playing of the horns in the Trio of the Scherzo movement.

Tenor Richard Lewis, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the Cathedral Choir of the Episcopal Cathedral of All Saints in Albany joined Mr. Davis and the orchestra for an outstanding performance of the Berlioz Te Deum.

It was far and away the best choral performance we have heard at Tanglewood this season, and Mr. Davis infused the participants with his amazing joy and enthusiasm. This was truly a Hymn of Praise!

Franklin G. Coleman

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

AUG 14 1972 New England Newsclip

Top Performances Overshadow London Director

Bos Symphony

By R.C. HAMMERICH

COLIN DAVIS

LENOX — After the splendor of Jessye Norman's soprano Friday night and the charm of Gina Bachauer's piano Saturday, yesterday afternoon's concert at Tanglewood was something of a letdown.

Colin Davis conducted all three performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is the highly - regarded musical director at Covent Garden, London, who will be one of the principal guest conductors of the orchestra beginning this fall.

The program yesterday consisted of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and Berlioz' Te Deum (for tenor soloist and three choruses with orchestra and organ) Opus 22.

The Te Deum is not half the piece the "Eroica" is. The stage was full for it: about 150 in the split chorus plus about 50 in the children's choir, and the orchestra was augmented. Berlioz wrote it to make its performance a "big event." He specified a chorus of 800 and an orchestra of 150; he was "colossal" minded long before Hollywood.

The best sound yesterday was the "Te ergo quaesumus," which let Richard Lewis put his tension - laden, dramatic tenor above the cool, floating, chant - like tones of the sopranos in the chorus. It was nice.

Nice, also, was the "Dignare, Domine," which let the double chorus play games with overlapping phrases (canonic imitation).

But, in general, the chorus showed neither the clarity of diction nor the crispness of phrasing that it has shown in earlier performances; and the "Te Deum" was, except for the aforementioned sections, unexciting even during the full - volume moments, of which there are several.

The "Eroica" was characterized by beautiful tones, a surprisingly leisurely pace and a limited range of volume. The sound was pleasant but there was a lack of the sort of thrust and vigor one may reasonably expect to hear in Beethoven.

Saturday night Gina Bachauer returned, during the first movement of Beethoven's fourth piano concerto, to the aggressive percussiveness she has been well - known for.

But at 59 she is one of the great ladies of the piano, and her solo cadenzas and the second and third movements were gentle and gracious and infectious. It is a beautiful concerto, and she played most of it with gentleness.

The Berlioz' overture ("Les francs - juges") which opened the program was a garish melange of sonic handsprings out of a carnival, but the Brahms' third symphony which ended the Saturday program was strong, sharply defined, tightly phrased and full of sensuous, full - throated string tones.

Attendance for the weekend was 5131 Friday, 3970 at the Saturday morning open rehearsal, 9556 Saturday night and 12,043 yesterday afternoon; total, 30,520.

Tuesday the series of concerts called Tanglewood - On - Parade given by the students of the Berkshire Music Center will start at 2.30 and end with a large orchestral program at 8.30 enlisting the participation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Next weekend the 35th Berkshire Festival will wind up its 1972 season with performances conducted by Seiji Ozawa Friday at 9 with Alexis Weissenberg as piano soloist, by Michael Tilson Thomas Saturday at 8.30 with pianist Misha Dichter as soloist and Sunday at 2.30 with Ozawa conducting Mahler's eighth symphony with seven vocal soloists and two choirs joining the orchestra.

KITE * August 17, 1972 *

Davis, BSO Make Splendid Music Together

By Milton Zapolski

Colin Davis returned to Tanglewood to conduct the Boston Symphony in all three of its weekend concerts. Davis and the orchestra represent a winning combination since their rapport far surpasses the ordinary relationship between conductor and instrumentalists. The orchestra really plays their best for Davis, something they do not do for everyone, and for his part the British maestro excells in sheer musicality by encouraging impeccable phrasing, strongly delineated voice leadings in chords (especially ambiguous ones), and a profound sense of ensemble. He may not be the most terrifically exciting interpreter in the huge spots but all his performances build up in a very pleasing manner and almost by accident reveal significant detail along the way. Davis might get even better results if he could acquire a coherent stick technique whose primary motions evolved from the wrist instead of the elbow or shoulder, but as long as he keeps getting those astounding finishing touches there is no cause for complaint.

Excellent Brahms

Brahms' Third Saturday night was unusually lovely. Glowing in many beautiful colors, it was a performance to admire. One quickly realized that Davis did not emphasize the work's structure but by insisting upon balances and clarity as well as asserting orchestrational felicities he achieved a sense of structural definition through the music's built-in emotional content and instrumental contrasts. Hearing things like the perfect trumpet crescendo at the close of the first movement or the melancholy ruminations of the poco allegretto indicated a specific and general excellence not often encountered. And let's not forget the haunting violin entry so expressively yearning just before the end of the andante or the chorales in the finale or the luminous ending.

Gina Bachauer Is Pianist

Saturday's concert began with Berlioz' Overture to Les Francs-Judges, an early work not played often (with good reason since its curious sonorities and episodic proportions do not entirely erase a lack of inspiration). But it is good to hear the overture occasionally, particularly when played as brilliantly as it was. Gina Bachauer then soloed in Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto, a reading noteworthy for its lack of eccentricity and good musical taste. Davis elicited all manner of wind solos and details that were both a surprise and delight.

Wagner Selections

Friday's offering began with the Flying Dutchman Overture but this was unexceptional. The interesting thing was the Wesendonck Songs sung by Jessye Norman. Miss Norman's voice is really something, a big voice capable of being heard above the orchestra but not sounding forced nor harsh. There was an occasional graininess of tone and a very slight fuzziness of pitch when chromatically different from the accompaniment, but her adjustments were quick and precise. In ten years Miss Norman could easily be one of the leading Wagnerian sopranos. Davis led a marvelous accompaniment. The ecstatic feeling he got from the violins near the end of song one or the sombre voicing of muted strings in the third song were typical of his sensitivity.

MUSIC

PRESS
BRISTOL, CONN.
D. 18,000
AUG 9 1972
New England Newsclip

Final Week Program Set At Tanglewood

Seiji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas conduct performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the final weekend of concerts of the 1972 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, August 18, 19, and 20.

The weekend opens Friday evening at 7:00 p.m. with the Weekend Prelude: Alexis Weissenberg with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Beethoven's Quintet in E-flat for piano and winds with soloists Alexis Weissenberg, piano, Ralph Comberg, oboe, Harold Wright, Clarinet, Sherman Walt, bassoon, and Charles Kavaloski, french horn. Mr. Weissenberg next performs the original piano version of Mussorgsky's Pictures at an exhibition. The Weekend Prelude recital is free to ticket-holders of the 9:00 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, August 18 at 9:00 p.m. in the Music Shed. The concert opens with the first performance by the Orchestra of Ligeti's Melodien for orchestra, followed by Chopin's Piano concerto no. 1 with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. Following intermission, Mr. Ozawa conducts the first performance at the Berkshire Festival of Bartok's suite from The miraculous mandarin.

Saturday morning, August 19 at 10:30 a.m. is the season's final Boston Symphony Open Rdhearsal. Music to be rehearsed is generally that which is to be played the following Sunday afternoon. Tickets are $2.50, on sale two hours before the beginning of the rehearsal, and proceeds benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Saturday evening, August 19, Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra with piano soloist Misha Dichter. The concert includes Mozart's Symphony no. 31, "Paris," Messiaen's Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum (first performance at the Berkshire Festival), and Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 with soloist Misha Dichter.

The final concert of the 1972 Berkshire Festival takes place Sunday afternoon, August 20 at 2:30 p.m. Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts Mahler's monumental Symphony no. 8, the "Symphony of a thousand" with vocal soloists Deborah O'Brien, Linda Phillips, Jane Bryden, Susan Clickner, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, William Dooley, Saverio Barbieri, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, St. Paul's School Boy Choir, Theodore Marier, director, and Berj Zamkochian, organist.

Tickets for these, and other Berkshire Festival concerts are available from the Festival Ticket Office at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts 02140, telephone (413) 637-1600, and at all Ticketron locations in New York and New England.

EIGHTH WEEKEND BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL CONCERTS

Friday, August 18

7:00 p.m. Shed: Weekend Prelude, Boston Symphony Chamber Players, Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Harold Wright, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; Charles Kavaloski, horn; Alexis Weissenberg, piano. Beethoven: Quintet in E-flat for piano and winds. Mussorgsky: Pictures at an exhibition

9:00 p.m. Shed: Seiji Ozawa, conductor; Alexis Weissenberg, piano; Ligeti: Melodien for orchestra; Chopin: Piano concerto no. 1; Bartok: suit from The miraculous mandarin

Saturday, August 19

10:30 a.m. Shed: Boston Symphony Orchestra Open Rehearsal

8:30 p.m. Shed: Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor; Misha Dichter, piano; Mozart: Symphony no. 31 "Paris"; Messiaen: Et exespecto resurrectionem mortuorum; Brahms: Piano concerto no. 2.

Sunday, August 20

2:30 p.m. Shed: Seiji Ozawa conductor; Deborah O'Brien, soprano; Linda Phillips, soprano; Jane Bryden, mezzo-soprano; Susan Clickner, alto; Eunice Alberts, alto; John Alexander, tenor; William Dooley, baritone; Saverio Barbieri, bass; Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver director; St. Paul's School Boy Choir, Theodore Marier, director; Berj Zamkochian, organ; Mahler: Symphony no. 8 "Symphony of a thousand".

POST
WALLINGFORD, CONN.
W. 7,920
AUG 17 1972
New England Newsclip

Season's finale at Tanglewood

The final weekend program of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Festival, Lenox, Mass., will be given Friday, Aug. 18, through Sunday, Aug. 20.

Friday evening's concert at 9 p.m. will include works by Chopin and Bartok, with Seiji Ozawa conducting. On Saturday at 8:30 p.m. selections by Mozart, Meissiaen and Brahms will be performed. Mahler's "Symphony No. 8" will be heard at 2:30 p.m. Sunday.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405
AUG 17 1972
New England Newsclip

Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony Friday evening at Tanglewood and again Sunday afternoon in Mahler's Symphony no. 8, with several soloists, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, St. Paul's School Boy Choir, and Berj Zamkochian, organist. — Photo contributed

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
AUG 18 1972
New England Newsclip

Highlights this week

Musical entertainment at Tanglewood this weekend features Seiji Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Chopin's Piano Concerto No. 1 and Bartok's Miraculous Mandarin. Also scheduled is Michael Tilson Thomas leading the BSO in Mozart's Paris Symphony, and Brahm's Concerto No. 2.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 117,499
AUG 13 1972
New England Newsclip

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,934
AUG 4 1972

CLEFS & ARPEGGIOS

by NANCY CURRAN

Broadening the circle we find included the Music at Marlboro series, the Boston Symphony Orchestra at illustrious Tanglewood and a different category at the Lenox Barn adjunct.

Can you see everything? Obviously not. But then, maybe you don't want to see everything. By careful newspaper clipping (one of my hobbies) it's possible to come up with a sensible plan of attack. If Seiji Ozawa is your man, for instance, you could see him conduct at Tanglewood Aug. 20. But then you'd miss Tony Bennett at SPAC, so it would be better to see Ozawa at SPAC Aug. 11, or at Tanglewood Aug. 18.

You would like to see the closing night of "Tosca" at Lake George, but that means missing the Fabulous Philadelphians' last 1972 concert at Saratoga. Instead, move yourself to "Tosca" Aug. 12. That's an Ozawa night at SPAC, and you already have plans to see him on a different evening.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER &
SUNDAY ADVERTISER
S. 415,000
AUG 13 1972
New England Newsclip

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000
AUG 18 1972
New England Newsclip

Final Concert Set Sunday At Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Serji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the final weekend of concerts of the 1972 Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

The final concert Sunday afternoon, always a main attraction at Tanglewood, will feature Tanglewood Artistic Director Ozawa conducting Gustav Mahler's symphony no. 8, the "Symphony of a Thousand."

Tanglewood features Mahler

By ELLEN PFEIFER

To culminate the summer season at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has programmed Mahler's massive Symphony No. 8, familiarly known as the Symphony of a Thousand, which Seiji Ozawa will conduct next Sunday afternoon.

The work, which takes considerably less than 1000 performers—more in the range of 300—is rarely performed because of its size and, in fact, the premiere in Munich was given in a large hall built especially for the occasion.

But perhaps as unwieldy as the small army of performers it requires is the grandiose, pretentious, and complex vision which Mahler attempted to communicate through it.

The vision is central to the work (which is really a choral symphony), but audiences might find it impossible to penetrate and even Mahler himself may not have understood it fully.

The 1906 symphony, like most of Mahler's compositions, was written at his summer home. His widow, Alma, relates in her memoirs that Gustav experienced the usual fortnight at the beginning of the vacation in which he felt all his inspiration had dried up. Walking to his studio cottage, one day, he thought of the medieval Latin hymn, "Veni Creator Spiritus," a powerful call for inspiration of mind and heart. He seized upon it and it became the first movement of the two-part Eighth.

ALSO VERY MUCH on his mind that summer was Goethe's "Faust," which he could be seen carrying around, in a worn volume, in his coat pocket.

It is the final scene of the second part of "Faust" which makes up the enormous second half of the symphony—a second half that is about three times longer than the first and includes slow movement, scherzo and finale.

The juxtaposition of these apparently disparate sections is what may cause real problems for an audience and certainly the relationship between them which Mahler saw is not made explicit.

The "Veni" section is straightforward enough in its passionate call for faith, strength, love and peace. The prayer invokes inspiration, brings it down from God into mind, heart and, even literally into the physical body as the generative agent.

According to Philip Barford who proceeds to give a very Freudian interpretation of Mahler's motives in his analysis of the symphony, this spiritual grace which has come down to earth must then return to heaven through "a progressive sublimation of energies."

It is this return to heaven, "the ascent of consciousness," which takes place in the second half during the "Faust" episode. The soul of the redeemed Faust makes his way progressively up the mountain of Paradise to expanded spiritual awareness, led by the spirit of Gretchen-Marguerite who has preceded him. It is all sort of like the Pilgrim's Progress through Heaven. Heaven is not a static state where you can relax once you get there, but a series of ever-higher positions of eminence and holiness.

THIS GOETHEAN Paradise is peopled by Angels, Blessed Boys, Younger Angels, More Perfect Angels Dr. Marianus (who, as his name suggests, is devoted to the Virgin), and several women from New testament stories (Magna Peccatrix, the Sinful Woman who wiped Jesus' feet with her hair; Mulier Samaritana, the Samaritan Woman at the well; Maria Aegyptiaca, the Egyptian Mary).

There is also the Mater Gloriosa or Virgin Mary who intercedes for Faust and Marguerite-Gretchen. She instructs Marguerite to "raise yourself to the highest spheres" and Faust will follow. All of this symbolically refers to the redemptive qualities of the Eternal Feminine whom Marguerite-Gretchen represents.

The symphony is scored for a huge array of instruments and choral groups. The populace of Heaven is performed by two mixed choruses, a boy choir and eight soloists (three sopranos, two altos, tenor, baritone and bass).

Instruments include an incredible combination of piccolo, four flutes, four oboes, English horn, two E-flat clarinets, three B-flat clarinets, bass clarinet, four bassoons, contra-bassoon, eight horns, four trumpets, four trombones, bass tuba, three timpani, percussion, celesta, piano, harmonium, organ, two harps, mandolin and strings.

Musically, the symphony is bound together by a number of thematic cross-references which are introduced in the first movement and reappear in the later section to give musical continuity and philosophical correspondences.

SOME OF THE MOST beautiful music Mahler wrote is in this symphony and an understanding of the complicated ideas is not necessary to be moved by the exquisite writing.

Perhaps most beautiful are the ecstatic love passages for the Virgin sung by Dr. Marianus, the purely orchestral moments when the Mater Gloriosa appears, and the great choral climax affirming the mystical transcendence of the Feminine which begins muted and ends in a triumphal outburst.

The Eighth Symphony is not performed very often and you won't have many chances to hear it in a life-time. It's more than worth the two hour drive to Tanglewood.

SARATOGA SPRINGS, N. Y.
SARATOGIAN
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
D. 11,000
AUG 13 1972

Misc.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL — Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Friday, 9 p.m., Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Seiji Ozawa, Tickets $2.50 -$8. Open rehearsal, Saturday, 10:30 a.m., seats unreserved, $2.50.

AT TANGLEWOOD

Final Concert Weekend Slated

LENOX — Seiji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas conduct performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the final weekend of concerts of the 1972 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Aug, 18, 19, and 20.

The weekend opens Friday evening at 7 p.m. with the Weekend Prelude: Alexis Weissenberg with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Beethoven's Quintet in E-flat for piano and winds with soloists Alexis Weissenberg, piano, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Harold Wright, clarinet, Sherman Walt, bassoon, and Charles Kavaloski, French horn. Mr. Weissenberg next performs the original piano version of Mussorgsky's Pictures at an exhibition. The Weekend Prelude recital is free to ticket - holders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, Aug. 18 at 9 p.m. in the Music Shed. The concert opens with the first performance by the Orchestra of Ligeti's Melodien for orchestra, followed by Chopin's Piano concerto no. 1 with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. Following intermission, Mr. Ozawa conducts the first performance at the Berkshire Festival of Bartok's suite from The miraculous mandarin.

LINDA PHILLIPS

Saturday morning, Aug. 19 at 10:30 a.m. is the season's final Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal. Music to be rehearsed is generally that which is to be played the following Sunday afternoon. Tickets are $2.50, on sale two hours before the beginning of the rehearsal, and proceeds benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Saturday evening, Aug. 19, Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra with piano soloist Misha Dichter. The concert includes Mozart's Symphony no. 31, "Paris", Messaen's Et exspector resurrectionem mortuorum (first performance at the Berkshire Festival), and Brahms Piano concerto no. 2 with soloist Misha Dichter.

The final concert of the 1972 Berkshire Festival takes place Sunday afternoon, Aug. 20 at 2:30 p.m. Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts Mahler's monumental Symphony no. 8, the "Symphony of a thousand" with vocal soloists Deborah O'Brian, Linda Phillips, Jane Bryden, Susan Clickner, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, William Dooley, Saverio Barbieri, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, St. Paul's School Boy Choir, Theodore Marier, director, and Berj Jamkochian, organist.

Tickets for these, and other Berkshire Festival concerts are available from the Festival Ticket Office at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts 02140, telephone (413) 637-1600, and at all Ticketron locations in New York and New England.

PRESS
BRISTOL, CONN.
D. 18,000
AUG 9 1972
New England Newsclip

Final Week Program Set At Tanglewood

Seiji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas conduct performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the final weekend of concerts of the 1972 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, August 18, 19, and 20.

The weekend opens Friday evening at 7:00 p.m. with the Weekend Prelude: Alexis Weissenberg with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Beethoven's Quintet in E-flat for piano and winds with soloists Alexis Weissenberg, piano, Ralph Comberg, oboe, Harold Wright, Clarinet, Sherman Walt, bassoon, and Charles Kavaloski, french horn. Mr. Weissenberg next performs the original piano version of Mussorgsky's Pictures at an exhibition. The Weekend Prelude recital is free to ticket-holders of the 9:00 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, August 18 at 9:00 p.m. in the Music Shed. The concert opens with the first performance by the Orchestra of Ligeti's Melodien for orchestra, followed by Chopin's Piano concerto no. 1 with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. Following intermission, Mr. Ozawa conducts the first performance at the Berkshire Festival of Bartok's suite from The miraculous mandarin.

Saturday morning, August 19 at 10:30 a.m. is the season's final Boston Symphony Open Rdhearsal. Music to be rehearsed is generally that which is to be played the following Sunday afternoon. Tickets are $2.50, on sale two hours before the beginning of the rehearsal, and proceeds benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Saturday evening, August 19, Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra with piano soloist Misha Dichter. The concert includes Mozart's Symphony no. 31, "Paris," Messiaen's Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum (first performance at the Berkshire Festival), and Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 with soloist Misha Dichter.

The final concert of the 1972 Berkshire Festival takes place Sunday afternoon, August 20 at 2:30 p.m. Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts Mahler's monumental Symphony no. 8, the "Symphony of a thousand" with vocal soloists Deborah O'Brien, Linda Phillips, Jane Bryden, Susan Clickner, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, William Dooley, Saverio Barbieri, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, St. Paul's School Boy Choir, Theodore Marier, director, and Berj Zamkochian, organist.

Tickets for these, and other Berkshire Festival concerts are available from the Festival Ticket Office at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts 02140, telephone (413) 637-1600, and at all Ticketron locations in New York and New England.

EIGHTH WEEKEND BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL CONCERTS

Friday, August 18

7:00 p.m. Shed: Weekend Prelude, Boston Symphony Chamber Players, Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Harold Wright, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; Charles Kavaloski, horn; Alexis Weissenberg, piano. Beethoven: Quintet in E-flat for piano and winds. Mussorgsky: Pictures at an exhibition

9:00 p.m. Shed: Seiji Ozawa, conductor; Alexis Weissenberg, piano; Ligeti: Melodien for orchestra; Chopin: Piano concerto no. 1; Bartok: suit from The miraculous mandarin

Saturday, August 19

10:30 a.m. Shed: Boston Symphony Orchestra Open Rehearsal

8:30 p.m. Shed: Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor; Misha Dichter, piano; Mozart: Symphony no. 31 "Paris"; Messiaen: Et exespecto resurrectionem mortuorum; Brahms: Piano concerto no. 2.

Sunday, August 20

2:30 p.m. Shed: Seiji Ozawa conductor; Deborah O'Brien, soprano; Linda Phillips, soprano; Jane Bryden, mezzo-soprano; Susan Clickner, alto; Eunice Alberts, alto; John Alexander, tenor; William Dooley, baritone; Saverio Barbieri, bass; Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver director; St. Paul's School Boy Choir, Theodore Marier, director; Berj Zamkochian, organ; Mahler: Symphony no. 8 "Symphony of a thousand".

POST
WALLINGFORD, CONN.
W. 7,920
AUG 17 1972
New England Newsclip

Season's finale at Tanglewood

The final weekend program of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Festival, Lenox, Mass., will be given Friday, Aug. 18, through Sunday, Aug. 20.

Friday evening's concert at 9 p.m. will include works by Chopin and Bartok, with Seiji Ozawa conducting. On Saturday at 8:30 p.m. selections by Mozart, Meissiaen and Brahms will be performed. Mahler's "Symphony No. 8" will be heard at 2:30 p.m. Sunday.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405
AUG 17 1972
New England Newsclip

Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony Friday evening at Tanglewood and again Sunday afternoon in Mahler's Symphony no. 8, with several soloists, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, St. Paul's School Boy Choir, and Berj Zamkochian, organist. — Photo contributed

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
AUG 18 1972
New England Newsclip

Highlights this week

Musical entertainment at Tanglewood this weekend features Seiji Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Chopin's Piano Concerto No. 1 and Bartok's Miraculous Mandarin. Also scheduled is Michael Tilson Thomas leading the BSO in Mozart's Paris Symphony, and Brahm's Concerto No. 2.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 117,499
AUG 13 1972
New England Newsclip

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,934
AUG 4 1972

CLEFS & ARPEGGIOS

by NANCY CURRAN

Broadening the circle we find included the Music at Marlboro series, the Boston Symphony Orchestra at illustrious Tanglewood and a different category at the Lenox Barn adjunct.

Can you see everything? Obviously not. But then, maybe you don't want to see everything. By careful newspaper clipping (one of my hobbies) it's possible to come up with a sensible plan of attack. If Seiji Ozawa is your man, for instance, you could see him conduct at Tanglewood Aug. 20. But then you'd miss Tony Bennett at SPAC, so it would be better to see Ozawa at SPAC Aug. 11, or at Tanglewood Aug. 18.

You would like to see the closing night of "Tosca" at Lake George, but that means missing the Fabulous Philadelphians' last 1972 concert at Saratoga. Instead, move yourself to "Tosca" Aug. 12. That's an Ozawa night at SPAC, and you already have plans to see him on a different evening.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER &
SUNDAY ADVERTISER
S. 415,000
AUG 13 1972
New England Newsclip

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000
AUG 18 1972
New England Newsclip

Final Concert Set Sunday At Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Serji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the final weekend of concerts of the 1972 Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

The final concert Sunday afternoon, always a main attraction at Tanglewood, will feature Tanglewood Artistic Director Ozawa conducting Gustav Mahler's symphony no. 8, the "Symphony of a Thousand."

MUSIC

Tanglewood features Mahler

By ELLEN PFEIFER

To culminate the summer season at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has programmed Mahler's massive Symphony No. 8, familiarly known as the Symphony of a Thousand, which Seiji Ozawa will conduct next Sunday afternoon.

The work, which takes considerably less than 1000 performers—more in the range of 300—is rarely performed because of its size and, in fact, the premiere in Munich was given in a large hall built especially for the occasion.

But perhaps as unwieldy as the small army of performers it requires is the grandiose, pretentious, and complex vision which Mahler attempted to communicate through it.

The vision is central to the work (which is really a choral symphony), but audiences might find it impossible to penetrate and even Mahler himself may not have understood it fully.

The 1906 symphony, like most of Mahler's compositions, was written at his summer home. His widow, Alma, relates in her memoirs that Gustav experienced the usual fortnight at the beginning of the vacation in which he felt all his inspiration had dried up. Walking to his studio cottage, one day, he thought of the medieval Latin hymn, "Veni Creator Spiritus," a powerful call for inspiration of mind and heart. He seized upon it and it became the first movement of the two-part Eighth.

ALSO VERY MUCH on his mind that summer was Goethe's "Faust," which he could be seen carrying around, in a worn volume, in his coat pocket.

It is the final scene of the second part of "Faust" which makes up the enormous second half of the symphony—a second half that is about three times longer than the first and includes slow movement, scherzo and finale.

The juxtaposition of these apparently disparate sections is what may cause real problems for an audience and certainly the relationship between them which Mahler saw is not made explicit.

The "Veni" section is straightforward enough in its passionate call for faith, strength, love and peace. The prayer invokes inspiration, brings it down from God into mind, heart and, even literally into the physical body as the generative agent.

According to Philip Barford who proceeds to give a very Freudian interpretation of Mahler's motives in his analysis of the symphony, this spiritual grace which has come down to earth must then return to heaven through "a progressive sublimation of energies."

It is this return to heaven, "the ascent of consciousness," which takes place in the second half during the "Faust" episode. The soul of the redeemed Faust makes his way progressively up the mountain of Paradise to expanded spiritual awareness, led by the spirit of Gretchen-Marguerite who has preceded him. It is all sort of like the Pilgrim's Progress through Heaven. Heaven is not a static state where you can relax once you get there, but a series of ever-higher positions of eminence and holiness.

THIS GOETHEAN Paradise is peopled by Angels, Blessed Boys, Younger Angels, More Perfect Angels Dr. Marianus (who, as his name suggests, is devoted to the Virgin), and several women from New testament stories (Magna Peccatrix, the Sinful Woman who wiped Jesus' feet with her hair; Mulier Samaritana, the Samaritan Woman at the well; Maria Aegyptiaca, the Egyptian Mary).

There is also the Mater Gloriosa or Virgin Mary who intercedes for Faust and Marguerite-Gretchen. She instructs Marguerite to "raise yourself to the highest spheres" and Faust will follow. All of this symbolically refers to the redemptive qualities of the Eternal Feminine whom Marguerite-Gretchen represents.

The symphony is scored for a huge array of instruments and choral groups. The populace of Heaven is performed by two mixed choruses, a boy choir and eight soloists (three sopranos, two altos, tenor, baritone and bass).

Instruments include an incredible combination of piccolo, four flutes, four oboes, English horn, two E-flat clarinets, three B-flat clarinets, bass clarinet, four bassoons, contra-bassoon, eight horns, four trumpets, four trombones, bass tuba, three timpani, percussion, celesta, piano, harmonium, organ, two harps, mandolin and strings.

Musically, the symphony is bound together by a number of thematic cross-references which are introduced in the first movement and reappear in the later section to give musical continuity and philosophical correspondences.

SOME OF THE MOST beautiful music Mahler wrote is in this symphony and an understanding of the complicated ideas is not necessary to be moved by the exquisite writing.

Perhaps most beautiful are the ecstatic love passages for the Virgin sung by Dr. Marianus, the purely orchestral moments when the Mater Gloriosa appears, and the great choral climax affirming the mystical transcendence of the Feminine which begins muted and ends in a triumphal outburst.

The Eighth Symphony is not performed very often and you won't have many chances to hear it in a life-time. It's more than worth the two hour drive to Tanglewood.

SARATOGA SPRINGS, N. Y.
SARATOGIAN
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
D. 11,000
AUG 13 1972

Misc.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL — Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Friday, 9 p.m., Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Seiji Ozawa, Tickets $2.50 -$8. Open rehearsal, Saturday, 10:30 a.m., seats unreserved, $2.50.

AT TANGLEWOOD

Final Concert Weekend Slated

LENOX — Seiji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas conduct performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the final weekend of concerts of the 1972 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Aug, 18, 19, and 20.

The weekend opens Friday evening at 7 p.m. with the Weekend Prelude: Alexis Weissenberg with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Beethoven's Quintet in E-flat for piano and winds with soloists Alexis Weissenberg, piano, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Harold Wright, clarinet, Sherman Walt, bassoon, and Charles Kavaloski, French horn. Mr. Weissenberg next performs the original piano version of Mussorgsky's Pictures at an exhibition. The Weekend Prelude recital is free to ticket - holders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, Aug. 18 at 9 p.m. in the Music Shed. The concert opens with the first performance by the Orchestra of Ligeti's Melodien for orchestra, followed by Chopin's Piano concerto no. 1 with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. Following intermission, Mr. Ozawa conducts the first performance at the Berkshire Festival of Bartok's suite from The miraculous mandarin.

LINDA PHILLIPS

Saturday morning, Aug. 19 at 10:30 a.m. is the season's final Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal. Music to be rehearsed is generally that which is to be played the following Sunday afternoon. Tickets are $2.50, on sale two hours before the beginning of the rehearsal, and proceeds benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Saturday evening, Aug. 19, Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra with piano soloist Misha Dichter. The concert includes Mozart's Symphony no. 31, "Paris", Messaen's Et exspector resurrectionem mortuorum (first performance at the Berkshire Festival), and Brahms Piano concerto no. 2 with soloist Misha Dichter.

The final concert of the 1972 Berkshire Festival takes place Sunday afternoon, Aug. 20 at 2:30 p.m. Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts Mahler's monumental Symphony no. 8, the "Symphony of a thousand" with vocal soloists Deborah O'Brian, Linda Phillips, Jane Bryden, Susan Clickner, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, William Dooley, Saverio Barbieri, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, St. Paul's School Boy Choir, Theodore Marier, director, and Berj Jamkochian, organist.

Tickets for these, and other Berkshire Festival concerts are available from the Festival Ticket Office at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts 02140, telephone (413) 637-1600, and at all Ticketron locations in New York and New England.

129

TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
D. 38,127
JUL 20 1972
New England Newsclip

Miss Massachusetts To Be Busy After She Relinquishes Crown

By DALE KING

THE ATTLEBOROS

Attleboro — When Deborah Ann O'Brien turns over her crown to a new Miss Massachusetts Saturday night, it won't be an ending, but another in a series of continuing events.

The 22-year old brunette who won the state title a year ago as Miss Foxboro, found the distinction "has opened many doors" as she traveled all over the state during her reign which began in the place it will conclude, the Attleboro High School auditorium.

"I guess the highlights of the year were appearing with the Boston Ballet Company, singing at the Esplanade and performing with the Boston Pops Orchestra in Symphony Hall," recalled Miss O'Brien.

She will sing with the Boston Symphony Aug. 20 in the Tanglewood concert series at Lenox.

Miss O'Brien is not a new face to western Massachusetts since she has performed in the Miss Northhampton Pageant and appeared on television in that part of the state.

In the Attleboro area, she was a special guest in the Miss Attleboro Pageant five months ago and later appeared at Bishop Feehan High School for an evening of songs and arias.

Though "long-hair music" is her specialty, Miss O'Brien enjoys the light sounds as well, and may sing some in the 1972 pageant.

Miss Massachusetts, Deborah Ann O'Brien

She has had vocal training at the New England Conservatory of Music, Boston, and Oberlin College, Ohio.

Massachusetts residents may recall Miss O'Brien helped to draw the first state lottery number. She counts Gov. Francis Sargent among famous people she has met this year, along with Bob Hope and, of course, Bert Parks in Atlantic City last September.

Miss Massachusetts of 1971 will have little time to relax after turning over her crown.

"I have to be in Lenox at 5 o'clock Sunday to start rehearsing for the Tanglewood concert," she said. "After the awards banquet, I'll have a nice drive there."

Pursuit of a professional career in music seems the goal set by Miss O'Brien, though she admits that her plans for after September are a little unsettled.

The future may hold a trip to Europe or an attempt at a Fulbright Scholarship to study overseas.

Though not representing the state as talent and beauty queen, Miss O'Brien expects to be around the Greater Attleboros, particularly since she has taken up residency for the time being in Plainville.

"I hope to come back, maybe appear in some of the future pagents," she mused, adding, "I may become such a familiar face around Attleboro, you'll want to get rid of me!"

HOUR
NORWALK, CONN.
D. 23,000
AUG 9 1972
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Final Berkshire Concert Aug. 18, 19, 20

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS.—Seiji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas conduct performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the final weekend of concerts of the 1972 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Aug. 18, 19, and 20.

The weekend opens Friday evening at 7 P.M. with the Week end Prelude: Alexis Weissenberg with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Beethoven's Quintet in E-flat for piano and winds with soloists Alexis Weissenberg, piano, Ralph Gomberg, aboe, Harold Wright, clarinet, Sherman Walt, bassoon, and Charles Kavaloski, french horn. Mr. Weissenberg next performs the original piano version of Mussorgsky's Pictures at an exhibition. The Weekend Prelude recital is free to ticket-holders of the 9 P.M. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphiny Orchestra Friday evening, Aug. 18 at 9 P.M. in the Music Shed. The concert opens with the first performance by the Orchestra of Ligeti's Melodien for orchestra, followed by Chopin's Piano concerto No. 1 with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. Following intermission, Mr. Ozawa conducts the first performance at the Berkshire Festival of Bartok's suite from The miraculous mandarin.

Saturday morning, Aug. 19 at 10:30 A.M. is the season's final Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal. Music to be rehearsed is generally that which is to be played the following Sunday afternoon. Tickets are $2.50, on sale two hours before the beginning of the rehearsal, and proceeds benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Saturday evening, Aug. 19, Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra with piano soloist Misha Dichter. The concert includes Mozart's Symphony No. 31, "Paris", Messiaen's . . . Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum (first performance at the Berkshire Festival), and Brahms' Piano concerto No. 2 with soloist Misha Dichter.

The final concert of the 1972 Berkshire Festival takes place Sunday afternoon, Aug. 20 at 2:30 P.M. Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts Mahler's monumental Symphony No. 8, the "Symphony of a thousand" with vocal soloists Deborah O'Brian, Linda Phillips, Jane Bryden, Susan Clickner, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, William Dooley, Saverio Barbieri, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, St Paul's School Boy Choir, Theodore Marier, director, and Berj Zamochian, organist.

Tickets for these, and other Berkshire Festival concerts are available from the Festival Ticket Office at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts 02140, telephone (413) 637-1600, and at all Ticketron locations in New York and New England.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
AUG 20 1972
New England Newsclip

...along summer circuit

WILLIAM DOOLEY of the Metropolitan Opera is at Tanglewood today at 2:30, appearing with the Boston Symphony. He performed and recorded the BSO's 1965 "Lohengrin."

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,225
AUG 11 1972
New England Newsclip

Eunice Alberts, a Boston native, will appear with Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday, Aug. 20 at 2.30 p.m. for last concert at Tanglewood this summer. For several years she has been principal contralto of Opera Company of Boston.

Eunice Alberts

CITIZEN
WINSTED, CONN.
D. 4,600
AUG 2 1972
New England Newsclip

Eunice Alberts, a native of Boston, will be appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, Aug 20 at 2:30 p.m for the last concert at Tanglewood this summer She has performed with major orchestras including the New York Philharmonic, the Washington National Symphony, the Philadelphia Symphony and the Buffalo, Cincinnati and Dallas Symphonies For several years she has been principal contralto of the Opera Company of Boston

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
S. 106,767
APR 2 1972
New England Newsclip

LOCAL MEZZO-SOPRANO

Susan Clickner has received a prestigious engagement to sing with the Boston Symphony, conducted by Seiji Ozawa, at the concluding concert of the Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, Aug. 20. It came as the result of an audition at Ozawa's invitation.

Mrs. Clickner will be one of seven soloists in Mahler's Symphony No. 8 by the orchestra, St. Paul's School Choir, Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Other soloists are Deborah O'Brien, Linda Phillips, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, William Dooley and Saverio Barbieri.

Mrs. Clickner is on the faculties of Clark University and Worcester Community School of the Performing Arts.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
AUG 19 1972
New England Newsclip

Linda Phillips

. . . will make her Boston Symphony debut Aug. 20 in the final concert of the Tanglewood season as a soprano soloist in Mahler's Eighth Symphony, under Seiji Ozawa's direction. A former Berkshire Music Center student, Miss Phillips was awarded the Leonard Bernstein Fellowship and the Musical America-High Fidelity Prize.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
AUG 19 1972
New England Newsclip

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 8,245
AUG 16 1972

Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Weekend Prelude Friday at 7 p.m., Boston Symphony Chamber Players, Alexis Weissenberg, piano. At 9 p.m. the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Seiji Ozawa, conducting. Saturday at 10:30 a.m., BSO Open Rehearsal; at 8:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducting; Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa conducting

Fowler

Without thousands of eyes and ears to witness, Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians tune up

INCORRECT PAGINATION

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405

AUG 17 1972

New England Newsclip

Misha Dichter, who has played on several occasions with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will perform at Tanglewood Saturday evening, Aug. 19 at 8.30 p.m. He has appeared with major orchestras in many parts of the world.

Misha Dichter, who has played on several occasions with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be performing with the orchestra at Tanglewood Saturday evening, Aug. 19 at 8:30 p.m. — Photo contributed

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,225

AUG 11 1972

New England Newsclip

Misha Dichter

Herald American
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
S. 251,094

AUG 13 1972

BOSTON AND BRAHMS. Misha Dichter teams up with the Boston Symphony for Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 when the orchestra presents its Saturday concert at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood at Lenox, Mass. The Berkshire Music Festival event will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas. Works by Mozart and Messiaen will be performed also.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

AUG 13 1972

New England Newsclip

MISHA DICHTER, pianist, will appear with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood Saturday.

NEWS
WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS.
W. 1,289

AUG 17 1972

New England Newsclip

Ozawa, Thomas lead Tanglewood

Seiji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season's final series of weekend concerts, closing with Sunday's 2:30 p.m. program.

Friday at 7 p.m., the series starts with the Weekend Prelude, when Alexis Weissenberg with the BSO Chamber Players perform Beethoven's Quintet in E-flat for piano and winds,

Artistic Director Ozawa conducts the BSO that evening at 9 in the Music Shed.

Saturday at 10:30 a.m. will be the season's final BSO Open Rehearsal for which tickets may be purchased starting two hours before rehearsal time.

Closing the season Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Mr. Ozawa conducts Mahler's Symphony no. 8.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790

AUG 7 1972

Ozawa, Thomas conduct at Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass. — Seiji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas conduct performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the final weekend of concerts of the 1972 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood Aug. 18, 19 and 20.

The weekend opens Friday evening at 7 with the Weekend Prelude: Alexis Weissenberg with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Beethovens's Quintet in E-flat for piano and winds with soloists Alexis Weissenberg, piano, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Harold Wright, clarinet, Sherman Walt, bassoon, and Charles Kavaloski, french horn.

Wiessenberg next performs the original piano version of Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." The Weekend Prelude recital is free to ticket-holders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Tanglewood

'72 Festival to end with Mahler's 'Eighth'

Seiji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the Boston Symphony at the final weekend of concerts of the 1972 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood Aug. 18, 19 and 20.

The weekend will open at 7 p.m. Friday with the Weekend Prelude. Alexis Weissenberg with members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will perform Beethoven's Quintet in E-Flat for Piano and Winds. Soloists will be Weissenberg, piano; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Harold Wright, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon, and Charles Kavaloski, french horn. Next, Weissenberg will perform the original piano version of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Ozawa, Tanglewood artistic director, will conduct the Boston Symphony at 9 p.m. Friday, opening with the first performance by the orchestra of Ligeti's Melodien for orchestra, followed by Chopin's Piano Concerto No. 1 with soloist Weissenberg. Following intermission, Ozawa will conduct the first performance at Tanglewood of Bartok's suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin."

The short work by the Hungarian-born Ligeti, completed in 1971, emphasizes rhythm and melody and gradually rises to an intense climax. Chopin's E-Minor Concerto, written when the composer was 20 years old, contains some blissful and richly resonant horn and piano passages. While the ballet was rejected by the authorities in 1926 as immoral and banned, Bartok's music for it is a triumph of orchestral writing.

The orchestra's final open rehearsal of the season will be held at 10:30 a.m. Saturday, Aug. 19. The music to be rehearsed will be performed at the following Sunday afternoon concert.

Thomas, the Boston Symphony's associate conductor, will lead the orchestra at 8:30 p.m. Saturday, Aug. 19, with piano soloist Misha Dichter, beginning with Mozart's Symphony No. 31 ("Paris"). Next will follow the first performance at Tanglewood of Messiaen's Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum. Dichter will again solo with the orchestra in Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2.

Misha Dichter

Mozart's "Paris" symphony is about 18 minutes in length with the accent on individual instruments. The Latin title of the Messiaen work means, "And I look for the resurrection of the dead." It was commissioned by Andre Malraux and composed and orchestrated in 1964. The Brahms piano concerto is unrivaled in grandeur among concertos.

Ozawa will conduct Mahler's monumental Symphony No. 8, the "Symphony of a Thousand," for the final concert of the 1972 Tanglewood season at 2:30 p.m. Sunday, Aug. 20. Vocal soloists will be Deborah O'Brian, Linda Phillips, Jane Bryden, Susan Clickner, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, William Dooley and Ara Berberian. The orchestra and soloists will be accompanied by the Tanglewood Chorus, directed by John Oliver; the St. Paul's School Boy Choir, directed by Theodore Marier, and Berj Zamkochian, organist. The culminating symphony of his life, Mahler called the Eighth "a great dispenser of joy."

On Parade

Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the annual Gala Benefit Concert for the Berkshire Music Center, at 8:30 p.m., Tuesday, Aug. 15 in Tanglewood's Music Shed.

The concert, featuring the combined Boston Symphony, Berkshire Music Center and Boston University Young Artist Orchestras will be the first ever to involve three orchestras in the Shed. The program will include Tchaikovsky's "1812 Overture" with cannons, Handel's "Royal Fireworks Music," Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" by Wagner.

Other Tanglewood-on-Parade events will include an afternoon of "mini-concerts" given by members of the Berkshire Music Center beginning at 2:30 p.m. at various locations on the Tanglewood grounds. Vocal, instrumental, and chamber music programs, illustrative of the advanced work that takes place during the intense eight-week session of the Berkshire Music Center, will highlight the afternoon's activities.

REVIEW
DARIEN, CONN.
W. 4,162

AUG 17 1972

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Ends Season Sunday

Seiji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas conduct performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the final weekend of concerts of the 1972 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, August 18, 19, and 20.

The weekend opens Friday evening at 7 p.m. with the Weekend Prelude: Alexis Weissenberg with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Beethoven's Quintet in E-flat for piano and winds with soloists Alexis Weissenberg, piano, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Harold Wright, clarinet, Sherman Walt, bassoon, and Charles Kavaloski, french horn. Mr. Weissenberg next performs the original piano version of Mussorgsky's Pictures at an exhibition. The Weekend Prelude recital is free to ticket-holders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, August 18 at 9 p.m. in the Music Shed. The concert opens with the first performance by the Orchestra of Ligeti's Melodien for orchestra, followed by Chopin's Piano concerto No. 1 with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. Following intermission, Mr. Ozawa conducts the first performance at the Berkshire Festival of Bartok's suite from The miraculous mandarin.

Saturday morning, August 19 at 10:30 a.m. is the season's final Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal. Music to be rehearsed is generally that which is to be played the following Sunday afternoon. Tickets are $2.50, on sale two hours before the beginning of the rehearsal, and proceeds benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Saturday evening, August 19, Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra with piano soloist Misha Dichter. The concert includes Mozart's Symphony no. 31, "Paris," Messiaen's Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum (first performance at the Berkshire Festival), and Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 with soloist Misha Dichter.

The final concert of the 1972 Berkshire Festival takes place Sunday afternoon, August 20 at 2:30 p.m. Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts Mahler's monumental Symphony no. 8, the "Symphony of a thousand" with vocal soloists Deborah O'Brian, Linda Phillips, Jane Bryden, Susan Clickner, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, William Dooley, Saverio Barbieri, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, St. Paul's School Boy Choir, Theodore Marier, director, and Berj Zamkochian, organist.

Tickets for these, and other Berkshire Festival concerts are available from the Festival Ticket Office at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts 02140, telephone (413) 637-1600, and at all Ticketron locations in New York and New England.

REGISTER
TORRINGTON, CONN.
D. 11,891

AUG 12 1972

New England Newsclip

MILLERTON, N. Y.
NEWS
W. 1,500

AUG 17 1972

Tanglewood

Final Concerts Of Season Announced

Seiji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas conduct performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the final weekend of concerts of the 1972 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Aug. 18, 19, and 20.

The weekend opens Friday evening at 7 p.m. with the Weekend Prelude: Alexis Weissenberg with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Beethoven's Quintet in E-flat for piano and winds with soloists Alesis Weissenberg, piano, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Harold Wright, clarinet, Sherman Walt, bassoon, and Charles Kavaloski, french horn.

Mr. Weissenberg, next performs the original piano version of Mussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition. The Weekend Prelude recital is free to ticket-holders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, Aug. 18 at 9 p.m. in the Music Shed. The concert opens with the first performance by the orchestra of Ligeti's Melodien for orchestra, followed by Chopin's Piano concerto no. 1 with soloist Alexis Weissenberg.

Following intermission, Mr. Ozawa conducts the first performance at the Berkshire Festival of Bartok's suite from The Miraculous Mandarin.

Saturday morning, Aug. 19 at 10:30 a.m. is the season's final Boston Sumphony Open Rehearsal. Music to be rehearsed is generally that which is to be played the following Sunday afternoon. Tickets are on sale two hours before the beginning of the rehearsal, and proceeds benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra with piano soloist Misha Dichter Saturday evening, Aug. 19. The concert includes Mozart's Symphony no. 31, "Paris", Messiaen's Et exspecto ressurrectionem mortuorum (first performance at the Berkshire Festival), and Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 with soloist Misha Dichter.

The final concert of the 1972 Berkshire Festival takes place Sunday afternoon, Aug. 20 at 2:30 p.m. Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts Mahler's monumental Symphony No. 8, the "Symphony of a Thousand" with vocal soloists Deborah O'Brian, Linda Phillips, Jane Bryden, Susan Clickner, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, William Dooley, Saverio Barbieri, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, St. Paul's School Boy Choir, Theodore Marier, director, and Berj Zamkochian, organist.

INCORRECT PAGINATION

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405

AUG 17 1972

New England Newsclip

Misha Dichter, who has played on several occasions with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will perform at Tanglewood Saturday evening, Aug. 19 at 8.30 p.m. He has appeared with major orchestras in many parts of the world.

Misha Dichter, who has played on several occasions with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be performing with the orchestra at Tanglewood Saturday evening, Aug. 19 at 8:30 p.m. — Photo contributed

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS
D. 13,225

AUG 11 1972

New England Newsclip

Misha Dichter

Herald American
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
S. 251,094

AUG 13 1972

BOSTON AND BRAHMS. Misha Dichter teams up with the Boston Symphony for Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 when the orchestra presents its Saturday concert at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood at Lenox, Mass. The Berkshire Music Festival event will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas. Works by Mozart and Messiaen will be performed also.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

AUG 13 1972

New England Newsclip

MISHA DICHTER, pianist, will appear with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood Saturday.

NEWS
WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS.
W. 1,289

AUG 17 1972

New England Newsclip

Ozawa, Thomas lead Tanglewood

Seiji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season's final series of weekend concerts, closing with Sunday's 2:30 p.m. program.

Friday at 7 p.m., the series starts with the Weekend Prelude, when Alexis Weissenberg with the BSO Chamber Players perform Beethoven's Quintet in E-flat for piano and winds,

Artistic Director Ozawa conducts the BSO that evening at 9 in the Music Shed.

Saturday at 10:30 a.m. will be the season's final BSO Open Rehearsal for which tickets may be purchased starting two hours before rehearsal time.

Closing the season Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Mr. Ozawa conducts Mahler's Symphony no. 8.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790

AUG 7 1972

Ozawa, Thomas conduct at Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass. — Seiji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas conduct performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the final weekend of concerts of the 1972 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood Aug. 18, 19 and 20.

The weekend opens Friday evening at 7 with the Weekend Prelude: Alexis Weissenberg with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Beethovens's Quintet in E-flat for piano and winds with soloists Alexis Weissenberg, piano, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Harold Wright, clarinet, Sherman Walt, bassoon, and Charles Kavaloski, french horn.

Wiessenberg next performs the original piano version of Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." The Weekend Prelude recital is free to ticket-holders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Tanglewood

'72 Festival to end with Mahler's 'Eighth'

Seiji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the Boston Symphony at the final weekend of concerts of the 1972 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood Aug. 18, 19 and 20.

The weekend will open at 7 p.m. Friday with the Weekend Prelude. Alexis Weissenberg with members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will perform Beethoven's Quintet in E-Flat for Piano and Winds. Soloists will be Weissenberg, piano; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Harold Wright, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon, and Charles Kavaloski, french horn. Next, Weissenberg will perform the original piano version of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Ozawa, Tanglewood artistic director, will conduct the Boston Symphony at 9 p.m. Friday, opening with the first performance by the orchestra of Ligeti's Melodien for orchestra, followed by Chopin's Piano Concerto No. 1 with soloist Weissenberg. Following intermission, Ozawa will conduct the first performance at Tanglewood of Bartok's suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin."

The short work by the Hungarian-born Ligeti, completed in 1971, emphasizes rhythm and melody and gradually rises to an intense climax. Chopin's E-Minor Concerto, written when the composer was 20 years old, contains some blissful and richly resonant horn and piano passages. While the ballet was rejected by the authorities in 1926 as immoral and banned, Bartok's music for it is a triumph of orchestral writing.

The orchestra's final open rehearsal of the season will be held at 10:30 a.m. Saturday, Aug. 19. The music to be rehearsed will be performed at the following Sunday afternoon concert.

Thomas, the Boston Symphony's associate conductor, will lead the orchestra at 8:30 p.m. Saturday, Aug. 19, with piano soloist Misha Dichter, beginning with Mozart's Symphony No. 31 ("Paris"). Next will follow the first performance at Tanglewood of Messiaen's Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum. Dichter will again solo with the orchestra in Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2.

Mozart's "Paris" symphony is about 18 minutes in length with the accent on individual instruments. The Latin title of the Messiaen work means, "And I look for the resurrection of the dead." It was commissioned by Andre Malraux and composed and orchestrated in 1964. The Brahms piano concerto is unrivaled in grandeur among concertos.

Ozawa will conduct Mahler's monumental Symphony No. 8, the "Symphony of a Thousand," for the final concert of the 1972 Tanglewood season at 2:30 p.m. Sunday, Aug. 20. Vocal soloists will be Deborah O'Brian, Linda Phillips, Jane Bryden, Susan Clickner, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, William Dooley and Ara Berberian. The orchestra and soloists will be accompanied by the Tanglewood Chorus, directed by John Oliver; the St. Paul's School Boy Choir, directed by Theodore Marier, and Berj Zamkochian, organist. The culminating symphony of his life, Mahler called the Eighth "a great dispenser of joy."

Misha Dichter

On Parade

Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the annual Gala Benefit Concert for the Berkshire Music Center, at 8:30 p.m., Tuesday, Aug. 15 in Tanglewood's Music Shed.

The concert, featuring the combined Boston Symphony, Berkshire Music Center and Boston University Young Artist Orchestras will be the first ever to involve three orchestras in the Shed. The program will include Tchaikovsky's "1812 Overture" with cannons, Handel's "Royal Fireworks Music," Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" by Wagner.

Other Tanglewood-on-Parade events will include an afternoon of "mini-concerts" given by members of the Berkshire Music Center beginning at 2:30 p.m. at various locations on the Tanglewood grounds. Vocal, instrumental, and chamber music programs, illustrative of the advanced work that takes place during the intense eight-week session of the Berkshire Music Center, will highlight the afternoon's activities.

REVIEW
DARIEN, CONN.
W. 4,162

AUG 17 1972

New England Newsclip

REGISTER
TORRINGTON, CONN.
D. 11,891

AUG 13 1972

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Ends Season Sunday

Seiji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas conduct performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the final weekend of concerts of the 1972 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, August 18, 19, and 20.

The weekend opens Friday evening at 7 p.m. with the Weekend Prelude: Alexis Weissenberg with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Beethoven's Quintet in E-flat for piano and winds with soloists Alexis Weissenberg, piano, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Harold Wright, clarinet, Sherman Walt, bassoon, and Charles Kavaloski, french horn. Mr. Weissenberg next performs the original piano version of Mussorgsky's Pictures at an exhibition. The Weekend Prelude recital is free to ticket-holders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, August 18 at 9 p.m. in the Music Shed. The concert opens with the first performance by the Orchestra of Ligeti's Melodien for orchestra, followed by Chopin's Piano concerto No. 1 with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. Following intermission, Mr. Ozawa conducts the first performance at the Berkshire Festival of Bartok's suite from The miraculous mandarin.

Saturday morning, August 19 at 10:30 a.m. is the season's final Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal. Music to be rehearsed is generally that which is to be played the following Sunday afternoon. Tickets are $2.50, on sale two hours before the beginning of the rehearsal, and proceeds benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Saturday evening, August 19, Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra with piano soloist Misha Dichter. The concert includes Mozart's Symphony no. 31, "Paris," Messiaen's Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum (first performance at the Berkshire Festival), and Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 with soloist Misha Dichter.

The final concert of the 1972 Berkshire Festival takes place Sunday afternoon, August 20 at 2:30 p.m. Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts Mahler's monumental Symphony no. 8, the "Symphony of a thousand" with vocal soloists Deborah O'Brian, Linda Phillips, Jane Bryden, Susan Clickner, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, William Dooley, Saverio Barbieri, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, St. Paul's School Boy Choir, Theodore Marier, director, and Berj Zamkochian, organist.

Tickets for these, and other Berkshire Festival concerts are available from the Festival Ticket Office at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts 02140, telephone (413) 637-1600, and at all Ticketron locations in New York and New England.

MILLERTON, N. Y.
NEWS
W. 1,500

AUG 17 1972

Tanglewood

Final Concerts Of Season Announced

Seiji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas conduct performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the final weekend of concerts of the 1972 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Aug. 18, 19, and 20.

The weekend opens Friday evening at 7 p.m. with the Weekend Prelude: Alexis Weissenberg with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Beethoven's Quintet in E-flat for piano and winds with soloists Alesis Weissenberg, piano, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Harold Wright, clarinet, Sherman Walt, bassoon, and Charles Kavaloski, french horn.

Mr. Weissenberg, next performs the original piano version of Mussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition. The Weekend Prelude recital is free to ticket-holders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, Aug. 18 at 9 p.m. in the Music Shed. The concert opens with the first performance by the orchestra of Ligeti's Melodien for orchestra, followed by Chopin's Piano concerto no. 1 with soloist Alexis Weissenberg.

Following intermission, Mr. Ozawa conducts the first performance at the Berkshire Festival of Bartok's suite from The Miraculous Mandarin.

Saturday morning, Aug. 19 at 10:30 a.m. is the season's final Boston Sumphony Open Rehearsal. Music to be rehearsed is generally that which is to be played the following Sunday afternoon. Tickets are on sale two hours before the beginning of the rehearsal, and proceeds benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra with piano soloist Misha Dichter Saturday evening, Aug. 19. The concert includes Mozart's Symphony no. 31, "Paris", Messiaen's Et exspecto ressurrectionem mortuorum (first performance at the Berkshire Festival), and Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 with soloist Misha Dichter.

The final concert of the 1972 Berkshire Festival takes place Sunday afternoon, Aug. 20 at 2:30 p.m. Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts Mahler's monumental Symphony No. 8, the "Symphony of a Thousand" with vocal soloists Deborah O'Brian, Linda Phillips, Jane Bryden, Susan Clickner, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, William Dooley, Saverio Barbieri, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, St. Paul's School Boy Choir, Theodore Marier, director, and Berj Zamkochian, organist.

130

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398
AUG 19 1972
New England Newsclip

Alexis Weissenberg Caps Tanglewood With Triple Play

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — It was Alexis Weissenberg - night at Tanglewood last night; he pulled off a triple play with consumate ease . . . chamber music, recital, and concerto.

It was an assisted triple play admittedly, but no less exciting . . . a rare demonstration of virtuousity.

At the 7 p. m. prelude concert he was pianist with woodwinds from the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a performance of Beethoven's quintet for piano and winds, Op. 16. He followed with a performance of the original (piano) version of Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" that brought about 3000 early listeners to their feet with cheers.

And during the regular 9 p. m. concert of the orchestra he was soloist for a performance of Chopin's Piano Concerto No. 1, Opus 11, with Seiji Ozawa on the podium.

Weissenberg is not unknown in this area. He has played in Springfield a couple of times and a few at Tanglewood. His playing for the most part, has been characterized by incredible digital dexterity and clarity of melodic line and by an atmosphere of cool elegance and stylish precision.

Seldom has his music seemed to deliver a message of emotional warmth even though, on close inspection, he pays close attention to all the usual means of expressing musical sensitivity.

Such was the case also with the Chopin Concerto, but cool clarity and speaking elegance are exactly what the immensely popular showpiece needs.

Weissenberg played it beautifully last night, and Ozawa helped the orchestra stick closely to the piano's varying speeds and volumes.

The runs and broken chorus, of which there are dozens peeled off the keyboard like so many strings of flashing diamonds, and the midle, quiet, tuneful movement was filled with glow. The last few moments were unusually beautiful. Seldom has this over-played little concerto sounded better.

But in the end, it was with the Mussorgsky solo piano in the prelude that Weissenberg made the strongest effect. That 28-minute piece is a giant of pianism and he filled it with strength.

The programs opened with a 13-minute piece composed last year by Gyrogy Ligeti, for which the orchestra was reduced to about 35.

The sound was, as is frequent with new music, like the misty, timeless, oozing sound effects devised during the 1930's for radio science fiction drama, i.e. eerie.

But with that notion acknowledged and shelved, the piece, an interesting, unusual and academically fascinating combination of rumbling, deep horns and stratospheric, nearly squeeky strings.

The story line seduction, robbery, rape, murder and magic and the sound, like the story, builds to a tremendous sonority.

Tonight at 8.30 Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the orchestra, will lead a program of Mozart's "Paris" symphony (K. 297), Messiaen's "Et Exspecto Ressurectionem Mortuorum" and Brahms' second piano concerto with Misha Dichter, soloist.

TANGLEWOOD 1972

SEIJI OZAWA Artistic Director, Berkshire Festival
GUNTHER SCHULLER Artistic Director, Berkshire Music Center
LEONARD BERNSTEIN Adviser

Friday August 18 1972 at 7 o'clock

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

WEEKEND PRELUDE

ALEXIS WEISSENBERG piano
BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS

BEETHOVEN Quintet in E flat for piano and winds op. 16

Grave – allegro ma non troppo
Andante cantabile
Rondo: allegro ma non troppo

ALEXIS WEISSENBERG piano
RALPH GOMBERG oboe
HAROLD WRIGHT clarinet
SHERMAN WALT bassoon
CHARLES KAVALOSKI horn

MUSSORGSKY Pictures at an exhibition

Promenade – Gnomus (the gnome) – Il vecchio castello (the old castle) – Tuileries (children in the Tuileries gardens) – Bydlo (ox cart) – Ballet of chicks in their shells – Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle – Promenade – Limoges, the market – Catacombs – Con mortuis in lingua mortua (with the dead in a dead language) – The hut on hens' legs (Baba Yaga the witch) – The great gate of Kiev

ALEXIS WEISSENBERG

Alexis Weissenberg plays the Steinway piano

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS RECORD EXCLUSIVELY FOR DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON

BALDWIN PIANO
DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON AND RCA RECORDS

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405
AUG 24 1972
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

BSO

Final Concerts Feature Several 'Firsts'

Friday, Aug. 18

The final weekend at Tanglewood proved to be particularly interesting in that four of the seven compositions presented at the three concerts were being performed for the first time at the Berkshire Festival.

Friday's program, conducted by Seiji Ozawa, opened with one such work — the Melodien for Orchestra by Gyorgy Ligeti, the composer best known for his music used in the film 2001 without his permission or knowledge. This composition is a sensuous, lyrical atonal piece which exploits the various orchestral colors in a fascinating manner and is fiendishly complicated rhythmically. Mr. Ozawa and the orchestra gave a truly brilliant reading of this work.

A substantial number of Chopin enthusiasts (including your reviewer) concede that the two piano concerti are not among his strongest work. Be that as it may, the stunning virtuoso performance of pianist Alexis Weissenberg of that composer's E Minor Concerto made the work seem exciting indeed. Mr. Weissenberg's performance was the most brilliant playing we have heard from a pianist at the Festival this year.

The program closed with a hair-raising performance of the familiar miraculous Mandarin Suite of Bela Bartok — another of the four "first" performances of the weekend.

Saturday, Aug. 19

Michael Tilson Thomas opened his Saturday program with a tasteful reading of the Mozart Paris Symphony, performed without the usual annoying breaks for late-comer seating.

An outstanding performance of the "Et exspecto resurrentionem mortuorum" of the contemporary French composer Olivier Messiaen followed. This controversial work utilizes many metallic percussion instruments, including perhaps the largest and loudest Chinese gong "tam tam" we've ever encountered. The composition was generally well received, although one heard much pro and con discussion in the audience between the movements.

This program concluded with an adequate reading of the Brahms Second Piano Concerto by the young American pianist Misha Dichter, who, we trust, will gain more insight into this work in the years to come.

Sunday, Aug. 20

There is little one could say about Sunday's performance of the Mahler Eighth Symphony except that it was spectacular — Mr. Ozawa, the orchestra, distinguished soloists, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the St. Paul's School Boy Choir of Cambridge combined forces in the mammoth work.

The ten-minute standing ovation testified to the huge audience's enthusiasm for the performance — a fitting end to a truly excellent season.

Franklin G. Coleman

130

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

AUG 19 1972

New England Newsclip

Alexis Weissenberg Caps Tanglewood With Triple Play

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — It was Alexis Weissenberg - night at Tanglewood last night; he pulled off a triple play with consumate ease . . . chamber music, recital, and concerto.

It was an assisted triple play admittedly, but no less exciting . . . a rare demonstration of virtuousity.

At the 7 p. m. prelude concert he was pianist with woodwinds from the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a performance of Beethoven's quintet for piano and winds, Op. 16. He followed with a performance of the original (piano) version of Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" that brought about 3000 early listeners to their feet with cheers.

And during the regular 9 p. m. concert of the orchestra he was soloist for a performance of Chopin's Piano Concerto No. 1, Opus 11, with Seiji Ozawa on the podium.

Weissenberg is not unknown in this area. He has played in Springfield a couple of times and a few at Tanglewood. His playing for the most part, has been characterized by incredible digital dexterity and clarity of melodic line and by an atmosphere of cool elegance and stylish precision.

Seldom has his music seemed to deliver a message of emotional warmth even though, on close inspection, he pays close attention to all the usual means of expressing musical sensitivity.

Such was the case also with the Chopin Concerto, but cool clarity and speaking elegance are exactly what the immensely popular showpiece needs.

Weissenberg played it beautifully last night, and Ozawa helped the orchestra stick closely to the piano's varying speeds and volumes.

The runs and broken chorus, of which there are dozens peeled off the keyboard like so many strings of flashing diamonds, and the midle, quiet, tuneful movement was filled with glow. The last few moments were unusually beautiful. Seldom has this over-played little concerto sounded better.

But in the end, it was with the Mussorgsky solo piano in the prelude that Weissenberg made the strongest effect. That 28-minute piece is a giant of pianism and he filled it with strength.

The programs opened with a 13-minute piece composed last year by Gyrogy Ligeti, for which the orchestra was reduced to about 35.

The sound was, as is frequent with new music, like the misty, timeless, oozing sound effects devised during the 1930's for radio science fiction drama, i.e. eerie.

But with that notion acknowledged and shelved, the piece, an interesting, unusual and academically fascinating combination of rumbling, deep horns and stratospheric, nearly squeeky strings.

The story line seduction, robbery, rape, murder and magic and the sound, like the story, builds to a tremendous sonority.

Tonight at 8.30 Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the orchestra, will lead a program of Mozart's "Paris" symphony (K. 297), Messiaen's "Et Exspecto Ressurectionem Mortuorum" and Brahms' second piano concerto with Misha Dichter, soloist.

TANGLEWOOD 1972

SEIJI OZAWA Artistic Director, Berkshire Festival
GUNTHER SCHULLER Artistic Director, Berkshire Music Center
LEONARD BERNSTEIN Adviser

Friday August 18 1972 at 7 o'clock

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

WEEKEND PRELUDE

ALEXIS WEISSENBERG piano
BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS

BEETHOVEN Quintet in E flat for piano and winds op. 16

Grave – allegro ma non troppo
Andante cantabile
Rondo: allegro ma non troppo

ALEXIS WEISSENBERG piano
RALPH GOMBERG oboe
HAROLD WRIGHT clarinet
SHERMAN WALT bassoon
CHARLES KAVALOSKI horn

MUSSORGSKY Pictures at an exhibition

Promenade – Gnomus (the gnome) – Il vecchio castello (the old castle) – Tuileries (children in the Tuileries gardens) – Bydlo (ox cart) – Ballet of chicks in their shells – Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle – Promenade – Limoges, the market – Catacombs – Con mortuis in lingua mortua (with the dead in a dead language) – The hut on hens' legs (Baba Yaga the witch) – The great gate of Kiev

ALEXIS WEISSENBERG

Alexis Weissenberg plays the Steinway piano

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS RECORD EXCLUSIVELY FOR DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON

BALDWIN PIANO
DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON AND RCA RECORDS

19

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405

AUG 24 1972

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

Final Concerts Feature Several 'Firsts'

Friday, Aug. 18

The final weekend at Tanglewood proved to be particularly interesting in that four of the seven compositions presented at the three concerts were being performed for the first time at the Berkshire Festival.

Friday's program, conducted by Seiji Ozawa, opened with one such work — the Melodien for Orchestra by Gyorgy Ligeti, the composer best known for his music used in the film 2001 without his permission or knowledge. This composition is a sensuous, lyrical atonal piece which exploits the various orchestral colors in a fascinating manner and is fiendishly complicated rhythmically. Mr. Ozawa and the orchestra gave a truly brilliant reading of this work.

A substantial number of Chopin enthusiasts (including your reviewer) concede that the two piano concerti are not among his strongest work. Be that as it may, the stunning virtuoso performance of pianist Alexis Weissenberg of that composer's E Minor Concerto made the work seem exciting indeed. Mr. Weissenberg's performance was the most brilliant playing we have heard from a pianist at the Festival this year.

The program closed with a hair-raising performance of the familiar miraculous Mandarin Suite of Bela Bartok — another of the four "first" performances of the weekend.

Saturday, Aug. 19

Michael Tilson Thomas opened his Saturday program with a tasteful reading of the Mozart Paris Symphony, performed without the usual annoying breaks for late-comer seating.

An outstanding performance of the "Et exspecto resurrentionem mortuorum" of the contemporary French composer Olivier Messiaen followed. This controversial work utilizes many metallic percussion instruments, including perhaps the largest and loudest Chinese gong "tam tam" we've ever encountered. The composition was generally well received, although one heard much pro and con discussion in the audience between the movements.

This program concluded with an adequate reading of the Brahms Second Piano Concerto by the young American pianist Misha Dichter, who, we trust, will gain more insight into this work in the years to come.

Sunday, Aug. 20

There is little one could say about Sunday's performance of the Mahler Eighth Symphony except that it was spectacular — Mr. Ozawa, the orchestra, distinguished soloists, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the St. Paul's School Boy Choir of Cambridge combined forces in the mammoth work.

The ten-minute standing ovation testified to the huge audience's enthusiasm for the performance — a fitting end to a truly excellent season.

Franklin G. Coleman

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

AUG 19 1972

New England Newsclip

Ozawa and Weissenberg Heroes at Tanglewood

B Lym.

By RICHARD CONWAY

There were two 'heroes' at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood last night. For the vast majority of the audience, first and foremost was guest artist pianist Alexis Weissenberg. For some of us though, the real 'hero' was conductor Seiji Ozawa.

It was Weissenberg, however, who drew two standing ovations for his artistry. The first came when he played Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an exhibition" during the Weekend Prelude. A good portion of the crowd jumped to its feet, and there were shouts of "Bravo!".

Later, Weissenberg appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play Chopin's "Piano concerto No. 1 in E minor, op. 11." Again the crowd roared its approval, and Weissenberg put his hand to his heart.

Incredible Technique

He is indeed some kind of pianist. His technique is incredible. There is a machine - like precision about his playing. The music comes out remarkably clear and impeccably controlled. One is literally awed by the man's technical skill.

But that is just the problem, at least for me. Weissenberg's playing has been described here, and elsewhere before, as having an 'icy brilliance'. There is a certain coolness about his work that frequently leaves the listener unfulfilled.

This was not quite so noticeable last night in the Chopin concerto. In fact, there was a considerable degree of warmth, especially in the lovely second movement 'Romanza,' which was enriched by some beautiful bassoon work by Sherman Walt.

Credit to Ozawa

A large part of the satisfying sensitivity of the Chopin piece must go the other 'hero' of the evening. Seiji Ozawa returned to the Tanglewood podium Friday, and there was an immediately noticeable difference in the orchestra. Ozawa restored the vitality, and renewed the precision, the cohesiveness, the coherence that was missing quite often these past few weekends.

Ozawa opened the concert with Gyorgy Ligeti's "Melodien," composed in 1971. This was its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In the Movies

Ligeti who was born in Hungary, became well - known a few years ago when one of his compositions was used, without his knowledge, as part of the background music for the movie "2001."

As is to be expected from a modern work, the complex score calls for virtuoso playing, and explores certain melodic and rhythmic concepts. The listener tries mostly in vain to follow the melodic unravelling for some 12 minutes.

During this time, there is a gradual crescendo taking place which reaches its height just before the end. The opening and closing passages have an eerie quality about them, being played in the highest positions of the stringed instruments.

Although Ligeti did not like his other music being associated with Stanley Kubrick's film "Melodien" not intended to be programmatic, does conjure up similar pictures in the mind. Those passages mentioned above brought images of some unknown orerunner of man crawling his way out of some primeval ooze.

The program ended with a stunning performance of Bartok's "Suite from 'The Miraculous Mandarin' ". The ballet, for various reasons, has not had many performances. But the music is exciting, chilling, sensuous, and revealing. There was excellent solo clarinet work by Harold Wright.

TANGLEWOOD 1972

SEIJI OZAWA Artistic Director, Berkshire Festival
GUNTHER SCHULLER Artistic Director, Berkshire Music Center
LEONARD BERNSTEIN Adviser

Friday August 18 1972 at 9 o'clock

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

SEIJI OZAWA conductor

LIGETI 'Melodien' for orchestra (1971)

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

*CHOPIN Piano concerto no. 1 in E minor op. 11
Allegro maestoso
Romanza: larghetto
Rondo: vivace

ALEXIS WEISSENBERG

intermission

BARTÓK Suite from 'The miraculous mandarin'

first performance at the Berkshire Festival

Alexis Weissenberg plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for this evening's concert begin on page 26

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECORDS EXCLUSIVELY FOR DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON

BALDWIN PIANO
DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON AND *RCA RECORDS

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 42,181

AUG 19 1972 Rockefeller

Another Fine Pianist Heard With Tanglewood Orchestra

By BILL RICE

Make no mistake about it. Between Saratoga and Tanglewood, this is the week that was for fine pianists.

Having heard Firkusny and Van Cliburn at Saratoga on Wednesday and Thursday, respectively, it was with some reserve that we traveled to Tanglewood on Friday to hear still another piano performance, this one by Alexis Weissenberg, who performed the Chopin Piano Concerto No. 1, with Seiji Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The brilliance of his performance soon swept any reluctance away.

Weissenberg played with firmness and full piano tone without ever pounding the keyboard. His single note passages were marked by clarity and machine-like precision and Ozawa held the orchestra at a level which allowed every note of the soloists to be heard.

Strings Balanced

The string instruction to the second movement was perfectly balanced and so smooth it fairly melted out over the audience. Weissenberg responded with a refined, delicate touch that would be difficult for any artist to match. His solo passages were balanced perfectly with the haunting bassoon playing counter melodies. There is much beauty in this movement and the soloists, conductor and orchestra brought all of it forth.

The spiritely final movement was played in perfect tempo and bore out what we had expected from the beginning of the concerto, that technical difficulties would pose no problems for this extraordinary pianist.

Opening the program was an ethereal modern composition, Melodies for Orchestra by the Hungarian composer Gyorgy Ligeti. Ligeti is perhaps best known for the fact that Stanley Kubrick used some of his music in the film 2001, reportedly without permission. It would not be hard to conceive of Melodies, composed last year, as being used in a similar film. The short work has a drifting, weightless feeling, being almost a continuous drone from beginning to end. Changing instrumental timbre, pitches, dynamics and fragments of melody jutting out raggedly provide the interest.

Conducting Feat

If one were not watching the conductor, it would be hard to imagine he was conducting a straight, slow, four beats to the measure all the way through the 12-minute composition.

The work opens with sliding strings and upper reeds playing thinly in their upper registers and after a continually changing transition, closed with a contrast in pitch, with the low pedal tone of a trombone matched against uppermost violin harmonics. The music doesn't really end, it simply disappears.

Closing the program was ballet music that is rarely danced to, Bela Barton's Suite from the Miraculous Mandarin. This work had an animalistic feel, not unlike the Stravinsky score used in Jerome Robbins' The Cage as danced by the New York City Ballet. Heard throughout the composition were outstanding solos from nearly every section of the orchestra, and Ozawa's conducting displayed his greatness in this type of composition.

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 42,181

AUG 19 1972

Another Fine Pianist Heard With Tanglewood Orchestra

By BILL RICE

Make no mistake about it. Between Saratoga and Tanglewood, this is the week that was for fine pianists.

Having heard Firkusny and Van Cliburn at Saratoga on Wednesday and Thursday, respectively, it was with some reserve that we traveled to Tanglewood on Friday to hear still another piano performance, this one by Alexis Weissenberg, who performed the Chopin Piano Concerto No. 1, with Seiji Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The brilliance of his performance soon swept any reluctance away.

Weissenberg played with firmness and full piano tone without ever pounding the keyboard. His single note passages were marked by clarity and machine-like precision and Ozawa held the orchestra at a level which allowed every note of the soloists to be heard.

Strings Balanced

The string instruction to the second movement was perfectly balanced and so smooth it fairly melted out over the audience. Weissenberg responded with a refined, delicate touch that would be difficult for any artist to match. His solo passages were balanced perfectly with the haunting bassoon playing counter melodies. There is much beauty in this movement and the soloists, conductor and orchestra brought all of it forth.

The spiritely final movement was played in perfect tempo and bore out what we had expected from the beginning of the concerto, that technical difficulties would pose no problems for this extraordinary pianist.

Opening the program was an ethereal modern composition, Melodies for Orchestra by the Hungarian composer Gyorgy Ligeti. Ligeti is perhaps best known for the fact that Stanley Kubrick used some of his music in the film 2001, reportedly without permission. It would not be hard to conceive of Melodies, composed last year, as being used in a similar film. The short work has a drifting, weightless feeling, being almost a continuous drone from beginning to end. Changing instrumental timbre, pitches, dynamics and fragments of melody jutting out raggedly provide the interest.

Conducting Feat

If one were not watching the conductor, it would be hard to imagine he was conducting a straight, slow, four beats to the measure all the way through the 12-minute composition.

The work opens with sliding strings and upper reeds playing thinly in their upper registers and after a continually changing transition, closed with a contrast in pitch, with the low pedal tone of a trombone matched against uppermost violin harmonics. The music doesn't really end, it simply disappears.

Closing the program was ballet music that is rarely danced to, Bela Barton's Suite from the Miraculous Mandarin. This work had an animalistic feel, not unlike the Stravinsky score used in Jerome Robbins' The Cage as danced by the New York City Ballet. Heard throughout the composition were outstanding solos from nearly every section of the orchestra, and Ozawa's conducting displayed his greatness in this type of composition.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

AUG 19 1972

New England Newsclip

Ozawa and Weissenberg Heroes at Tanglewood

By RICHARD CONWAY

There were two 'heroes' at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood last night. For the vast majority of the audience, first and foremost was guest artist pianist Alexis Weissenberg. For some of us though, the real 'hero' was conductor Seiji Ozawa.

It was Weissenberg, however, who drew two standing ovations for his artistry. The first came when he played Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an exhibition" during the Weekend Prelude. A good portion of the crowd jumped to its feet, and there were shouts of "Bravo!".

Later, Weissenberg appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play Chopin's "Piano concerto No. 1 in E minor, op. 11." Again the crowd roared its approval, and Weissenberg put his hand to his heart.

Incredible Technique

He is indeed some kind of pianist. His technique is incredible. There is a machine - like precision about his playing. The music comes out remarkably clear and impeccably controlled. One is literally awed by the man's technical skill.

But that is just the problem, at least for me. Weissenberg's playing has been described here, and elsewhere before, as having an 'icy brilliance'. There is a certain coolness about his work that frequently leaves the listener unfulfilled.

This was not quite so noticeable last night in the Chopin concerto. In fact, there was a considerable degree of warmth, especially in the lovely second movement 'Romanza,' which was enriched by some beautiful bassoon work by Sherman Walt.

Credit to Ozawa

A large part of the satisfying sensitivity of the Chopin piece must go the other 'hero' of the evening. Seiji Ozawa returned to the Tanglewood podium Friday, and there was an immediately noticeable difference in the orchestra. Ozawa restored the vitality, and renewed the precision, the cohesiveness, the coherence that was missing quite often these past few weekends.

Ozawa opened the concert with Gyorgy Ligeti's "Melodien," composed in 1971. This was its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In the Movies

Ligeti who was born in Hungary, became well - known a few years ago when one of his compositions was used, without his knowledge, as part of the background music for the movie "2001."

As is to be expected from a modern work, the complex score calls for virtuoso playing, and explores certain melodic and rhythmic concepts. The listener tries mostly in vain to follow the melodic unravelling for some 12 minutes.

During this time, there is a gradual crescendo taking place which reaches its height just before the end. The opening and closing passages have an eerie quality about them, being played in the highest positions of the stringed instruments.

Although Ligeti did not like his other music being associated with Stanley Kubrick's film "Melodien" not intended to be programmatic, does conjure up similar pictures in the mind. Those passages mentioned above brought images of some unknown orerunner of man crawling his way out of some primeval ooze.

The program ended with a stunning performance of Bartok's "Suite from 'The Miraculous Mandarin' ". The ballet, for various reasons, has not had many performances. But the music is exciting, chilling, sensuous, and revealing. There was excellent solo clarinet work by Harold Wright.

TANGLEWOOD 1972

SEIJI OZAWA Artistic Director, Berkshire Festival
GUNTHER SCHULLER Artistic Director, Berkshire Music Center
LEONARD BERNSTEIN Adviser

Friday August 18 1972 at 9 o'clock

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

SEIJI OZAWA conductor

LIGETI 'Melodien' for orchestra (1971)

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

*CHOPIN Piano concerto no. 1 in E minor op. 11
Allegro maestoso
Romanza: larghetto
Rondo: vivace

ALEXIS WEISSENBERG

intermission

BARTÓK Suite from 'The miraculous mandarin'

first performance at the Berkshire Festival

Alexis Weissenberg plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for this evening's concert begin on page 26

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECORDS EXCLUSIVELY FOR DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON

BALDWIN PIANO
DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON AND *RCA RECORDS

21

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 67,117

AUG 22 1972.

New England Newsclip

Music: Tanglewood's Final Weekend

By EDWIN SAFFORD

Lenox, Mass. — Attendance at the final 1972 Berkshire Music Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood this past weekend helped push the total figure for the summer to 257,860.

While music remains more important than numbers at Tanglewood, things have gone well there in its 35th season. Not only have audiences increased by 40,838 over 1971, but programming, especially on the festival's second half, held much that was inviting.

One concert was part of the 20th annual Festival of Contemporary Music sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation. A colleague from a Boston newspaper reports that weeklong "festival within a festival" contained among its world premieres several quite admirable works.

Excitement produced by controversy surrounded the performance of one of them, Charles Wuorinen's violin concerto which Paul Zukofsky performed with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Orchestra members themselves were among vocal antagonists, it is said.

Nothing so inflaming happened during the final weekend, although a piece of Olivier Messiaen's threatened to unsettle conservatives. It was his "And I look for the resurrection of the dead," performed under Michael Tilson Thomas' direction Saturday night in a program also including the Mozart "Paris" symphony and the second piano concerto by Brahms.

Composed in 1964 for winds, brass and percussion, the work encompasses Messiaen's usual mysticism and nature sounds (calls of the short-toed lark, for example). In makeup it consists of tone clusters, silences and, at points, a total body of sound that would put the most amplified rock band to shame.

When, during this performance, an enormous tam tam was struck to a crescendo, you would have thought a 747 jetliner was flying directly above Tanglewood's music shed. Still, such a startling effect was far from all. With players spread across the stage Thomas exacted a rejoicing exaltation which seemed inherent in the score.

His reading of the "Paris" was radiant and beautifully clear in detail, using a fair sized orchestra (nine double basses.) The Brahms, with Mischa Dichter as soloist, was not as satisfactory, owing to the young pianist's rather timid approach.

Sunday afternoon was the big event. It seemed all summer long people were asking, "Are you going to Tanglewood for the Mahler 8th?" They came in droves, clogging Lenox' streets and holding up the performance time.

Seiji Ozawa conducted this "Symphony of a Thousand." His forces were the orchestra, the huge Tanglewood Festival Chorus and Tanglewood Choir, prepared by John Oliver; the St. Paul's School Boy Choir, Theodore Marier, director; organist Berj Zamkochian and an octet of soloists.

The latter were sopranos Deborah O'Brien, Linda Phillips and Jane Bryden, altos Susan Clickner and Eunice Alberts, tenor John Alexander, baritone William Dooley and bass Ara Berberian. Only Alexander and Dooley could be called first class, with Alexander really outstanding.

Ozawa's active conducting style, down to marching in place frequently, may have been entertaining. But he had the music fully within his grasp, from the monumental "Veni, Creator Spiritus" through the more reflective "Closing Scene from Goethe's 'Faust'" of the second part.

To call his reception an ovation is understatement. At the end people streamed in from the lawns, a great many of them young, to join the hollering seat holders, Tanglewood had done Mahler proud in 1972, with the sixth and fifth symphonies preceding. Ozawa's eighth crowned it all with a super achievement.

At the Concert

American Works 'Dark Hued'

By EDWARD FRENCH

SATURDAY EVENING AT TANGLEWOOD featured the first Berkshire Festival performance of Olivier Messiaen's "Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorium." It is scored for three ensembles, woodwind, brass and metallic percussion. There are five pieces, each bearing a text from Scripture.

Messiaen has been called the "Atomic bomb of contemporary music. Like all of his works, "Et Resurrection mortuorum" commands attention. His idiom is uniquely individual; the use of rests figures importantly in his rhetoric and his sonorities are like nothing we have heard before. As to whether we like it or not, we don't know at this time but it has impace which can not be ingored.

Michael Tilson Thomas was a most effective interpreter of this far out excursion.

THE REMAINDER of the program included a marvelously polished exposition of Mozart's "Paris" Symphony —the Boston Strings were at their very best in this. Brahms' Piano Concerto in B flat, Misha Dicter as soloist followed.

While young Dichter did some beautiful playing in this concerto a certain lack of cohesiveness and sweep reduced the total impact.

The concluding Tanglewood concert for this season on Sunday afternoon found over thirteen thousand present to hear Seiji Ozawa conduct Mahler's Symphony No. 8, a work of gargantuan proportions as to length and forces employed.

These included three choruses, eight solo voices.

The first half, the "Hymnus; "Veni creator spiritus" found both orchestra and chorus forcing. The tone quality was strident, the execution rough and the decibel reading very high.

It was far different in the second half, the final scene from Goethe's "Faust." Here the combined Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Tanglewood Choir and St. Paul's School Boy Choir did some exceptionally fine singing.

TANGLEWOOD 1972

SEIJI OZAWA Artistic Director, Berkshire Festival
GUNTHER SCHULLER Artistic Director, Berkshire Music Center
LEONARD BERNSTEIN Adviser

Saturday August 19 1972 at 8.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 31 in D K. 297 'Paris'
Allegro assai
Andante
Allegro

MESSIAEN — Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum

first performance at the Berkshire Festival

intermission

BRAHMS — Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat op. 83
Allegro non troppo
Allegro appassionato
Andante
Allegretto grazioso

MISHA DICHTER

Misha Dichter plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for this evening's concert begin on page 28

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECORDS EXCLUSIVELY FOR DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON

BALDWIN PIANO
DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON & RCA RECORDS

132

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 67,117

AUG 22 1972.

New England Newsclip

Music: Tanglewood's Final Weekend

By EDWIN SAFFORD

Lenox, Mass. — Attendance at the final 1972 Berkshire Music Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood this past weekend helped push the total figure for the summer to 257,860.

While music remains more important than numbers at Tanglewood, things have gone well there in its 35th season. Not only have audiences increased by 40,838 over 1971, but programming, especially on the festival's second half, held much that was inviting.

One concert was part of the 20th annual Festival of Contemporary Music sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation. A colleague from a Boston newspaper reports that week-long "festival within a festival" contained among its world premieres several quite admirable works.

Excitement produced by controversy surrounded the performance of one of them, Charles Wuorinen's violin concerto which Paul Zukofsky performed with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Orchestra members themselves were among vocal antagonists, it is said.

Nothing so inflaming happened during the final weekend, although a piece of Olivier Messiaen's threatened to unsettle conservatives. It was his "And I look for the resurrection of the dead," performed under Michael Tilson Thomas' direction Saturday night in a program also including the Mozart "Paris" symphony and the second piano concerto by Brahms.

Composed in 1964 for winds, brass and percussion, the work encompasses Messiaen's usual mysticism and nature sounds (calls of the short-toed lark, for example). In make-up it consists of tone clusters, silences and, at points, a total body of sound that would put the most amplified rock band to shame.

When, during this performance, an enormous tam tam was struck to a crescendo, you would have thought a 747 jetliner was flying directly above Tanglewood's music shed. Still, such a startling effect was far from all. With players spread across the stage Thomas exacted a rejoicing exaltation which seemed inherent in the score.

His reading of the "Paris" was radiant and beautifull, clear in detail, using a fair sized orchestra (nine double basses.) The Brahms, with Mischa Dichter as soloist, was not as satisfactory, owing to the young pianist's rather timid approach.

Sunday afternoon was the big event. It seemed all summer long people were asking, "Are you going to Tanglewood for the Mahler 8th?" They came in droves, clogging Lenox' streets and holding up the performance time.

Seiji Ozawa conducted this "Symphony of a Thousand." His forces were the orchestra, the huge Tanglewood Festival Chorus and Tanglewood Choir, prepared by John Oliver; the St. Paul's School Boy Choir, Theodore Marier, director; organist Berj Zamkochian and an octet of soloists.

The latter were sopranos Deborah O'Brien, Linda Phillips and Jane Bryden, altos Susan Clickner and Eunice Alberts, tenor John Alexander, baritone William Dooley and bass Ara Berberian. Only Alexander and Dooley could be called first class, with Alexander really outstanding.

Ozawa's active conducting style, down to marching in place frequently, may have been entertaining. But he had the music fully within his grasp, from the monumental "Veni, Creator Spiritus" through the more reflective "Closing Scene from Goethe's 'Faust' " of the second part.

To call his reception an ovation is understatement. At the end people streamed in from the lawns, a great many of them young, to join the hollering seat holders, Tanglewood had done Mahler proud in 1972, with the sixth and fifth symphonies preceding. Ozawa's eighth crowned it all with a super achievement.

At the Concert

American Works 'Dark Hued'

By EDWARD FRENCH

SATURDAY EVENING AT TANGLEWOOD featured the first Berkshire Festival performance of Olivier Messiaen's "Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorium." It is scored for three ensembles, woodwind, brass and metallic percussion. There are five pieces, each bearing a text from Scripture.

Messiaen has been called the "Atomic bomb of contemporary music. Like all of his works, "Et Resurrection mortuorum" commands attention. His idiom is uniquely individual; the use of rests figures importantly in his rhetoric and his sonorities are like nothing we have heard before. As to whether we like it or not, we don't know at this time but it has impace which can not be ingored.

Michael Tilson Thomas was a most effective interpreter of this far out excursion.

THE REMAINDER of the program included a marvelously polished exposition of Mozart's "Paris" Symphony —the Boston Strings were at their very best in this. Brahms' Piano Concerto in B flat, Misha Dicter as soloist followed.

While young Dichter did some beautiful playing in this concerto a certain lack of cohesiveness and sweep reduced the total impact.

The concluding Tanglewood concert for this season on Sunday afternoon found over thirteen thousand present to hear Seiji Ozawa conduct Mahler's Symphony No. 8, a work of gargantuan proportions as to length and forces employed.

These included three choruses, eight solo voices.

The first half, the "Hymnus; "Veni creator spiritus" found both orchestra and chorus forcing. The tone quality was strident, the execution rough and the decibel reading very high.

It was far different in the second half, the final scene from Goethe's "Faust." Here the combined Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Tanglewood Choir and St. Paul's School Boy Choir did some exceptionally fine singing.

TANGLEWOOD 1972

SEIJI OZAWA Artistic Director, Berkshire Festival
GUNTHER SCHULLER Artistic Director, Berkshire Music Center
LEONARD BERNSTEIN Adviser

Saturday August 19 1972 at 8.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 31 in D K. 297 'Paris'
Allegro assai
Andante
Allegro

MESSIAEN — Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum

first performance at the Berkshire Festival

intermission

BRAHMS — Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat op. 83
Allegro non troppo
Allegro appassionato
Andante
Allegretto grazioso

MISHA DICHTER

Misha Dichter plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for this evening's concert begin on page 28

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECORDS EXCLUSIVELY FOR DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON

BALDWIN PIANO
DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON & RCA RECORDS

BSO plays Mahler in Tanglewood finale

The Boston Globe
(EVENING)
D. 195.032
AUG 21 1972
New England Newsclip

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — Tanglewood has been rich in Mahler this summer. The Boston Symphony has played the 5th and 6th symphonies, the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra the 1st, and half of the 9th, the series being capped Sunday afternoon at the season's last Boston Symphony concert by the 8th, with Seiji Ozawa conducting.

It is a monster, the 8th. Mahler first set the Ninth Century hymn, "Veni, creator, spiritus," and then the last scene of Geothe's "Faust" II, and in it he involved a very large orchestra, an extra brass group, eight vocal soloists, two mixed choruses, and a boys' chorus.

The BSO had never played it before and is not likely to in Boston, unless for something special like a pension fund concert: you literally can't fit it on the Symphony Hall stage without ripping out front rows of seats. No recording makes much acoustic sense of it, and so concert performances, which, as you can imagine, are rare, are automatically events, potent theater and unsurpassed sonorous extravaganza.

"Faust," with its bold and bizzare wedding of the barbaric with the classical, the sublime with the commonplace, is Ur-Mahler. It was inevitable that Mahler would sometime have to come to terms with Goethe, and his juxtaposition and eventual blending (in music, not in words) of "Veni, creator" and "The Eternal feminine" is conceptually a daring and fascinating extension of Goethe's inspired but less-than-organic goulash.

Mahler's "Veni, creator" is admirably terse and dramatic, in a way that makes it a hard act to follow, but, less admirably, noisy and overpopulated. Its "Faust" starts marvelously with one of his greatest moments, anticipating the spare, delicate, liberated counterpoint of "Das Lied von der Erde" and the 9th and 10th symphonies, as he produces Goethe's forest- and rockscape in which friendly, silent lions prowl.

Once later, in the quiet Adagissimo, the aureole that precedes the appearance of Mater gloriosa, the figure of redemption, Mahler finds his way right to the middle of Goethe's poetry; for the rest, and in spite of compelling dramatic and sonorous details, he is mired in a series of conspicuous non-successes because the musical gestures are (in ascending order of inadequacy) trivial, strange, or sentimental. I am sorry, but the Pater Ecstaticus solo sounds like Richard Rodgers with wrong notes, and a deafening setting of "Alles Vergengliche ist nur ein Gleichnis" (all that is transitory is but a parable) is the work of a man who is so far on an ego-trip but he has lost all sight of his task.

The performance: yes and no. Ozawa had the work under impressive control, did all he could to make and keep it exciting, and played the theater of its acoustic and visual massiveness for all it was worth. The Boston Symphony, th Tanglewood Festival rus, the Tanglewood C and the St. Paul's School Boy Choir performed beautifully for him.

It is a work, though, that depends enormously on its soloists, who Sunday were not, as whole, good enough. Jane Bryden sang her brief part as Mater gloriosa very well, and Deborah O'Brien, though overtaxed as Magna Peccatrix, at least offered the promise that goes with a bright, though still unformed, lyric soprano, and careful preparation of music and words. William Dooley was in vocal trouble, though clearly someone who knew what it was all about. The rest — Linda Phillips, Susan Clinckener, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, Ara Berberian — produced collectively a museum of screams, wobbles, inaudibility, operetta style, "gee, I don't know what's going on here," and German the like of which hasn't been spoken at public entertainments since "The Great Dictator."

TANGLEWOOD 1972

SEIJI OZAWA Artistic Director, Berkshire Festival
GUNTHER SCHULLER Artistic Director, Berkshire Music Center
LEONARD BERNSTEIN Adviser

Sunday August 20 1972 at 2.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

SEIJI OZAWA conductor

MAHLER

Symphony no. 8 in E flat 'Symphony of a thousand'

PART 1 Hymnus: Veni, creator spiritus

intermission

PART 2 Final scene from Goethe's 'Faust'

Magna peccatrix	DEBORAH O'BRIEN
Una poenitentium (Gretchen)	LINDA PHILLIPS
Mater gloriosa	JANE BRYDEN
Mulier Samaritana	SUSAN CLICKNER
Maria Aegiptica	EUNICE ALBERTS
Doctor Marianus	JOHN ALEXANDER
Pater ecstaticus	WILLIAM DOOLEY
Pater profundus	ARA BERBERIAN

TANGLEWOOD FESTIVAL CHORUS
TANGLEWOOD CHOIR
John Oliver director
ST PAUL'S SCHOOL BOY CHOIR
Theodore Marier director
BERJ ZAMKOCHIAN organ

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The program note for this afternoon's concert begins on page 32

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECORDS EXCLUSIVELY FOR DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON

BALDWIN PIANO
DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON AND RCA RECORDS

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER & RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885
AUG 23 1972
New England Newsclip

Mahler Symphony Stunning

BY ELLENE PFEIFER
Music Critic

Of the premiere of her husband's Eighth Symphony in 1910, Alma Mahler wrote in her memoirs that there was great excitement and anticipation before the performance, a wild ovation following it and that, as they drove home afterwards, she and Gustav wept over the greatness of the symphony and the reception to it.

Their response was slightly more exaggerated, perhaps, than that of the audience at Tanglewood Sunday where the Symphony was performed by Seiji Ozawa and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There is no doubt, however, that this performance was the most stunning musical experience of the season and the audience, justly moved (for once), was on its feet and cheering as early as intermission.

The work, a really mammoth performing enterprise for two mixed choruses, boy choir, eight soloists and large orchestra, has been dubbed "symphony of a thousand" although that many performers are really unnecessary and only about 320 were used on this occasion.

• Concert Review

It is constructed in two parts —the first based on the thousand-year-old hymn "Veni Creator Spiritus" and composed in traditional first movement sonata form; the second much longer, comprises a fairly discernible slow movement, scherzo, and finale and is based on the final scene of Goethe's "Faust." The two are connected by detailed thematic cross-references and by the philosophical connection seen by Mahler in which the inspiration and grace obtained through the Holy Spirit are transformed through struggle to ever greater levels of spiritual enlightenment (the latter symbolized in Faust's ascent to the highest plateaus of heaven.)

"Imagine that the universe bursts into song. We hear no longer human voices, but those of planets and suns circling in their orbits," Mahler wrote.

He might have added that there are also angels of every age and eminence, blessed boys, Doctor Marianus, characters from biblical stories, and the Mater Gloriosa (Virgin Mary and the Eternal Feminine somehow mixed) as symbolic personages.

This other-worldliness of thought applies also in the demands of instrumental-vocal balance and in more-than-mortal pitch extremes. These account for the uncomfortable feeling I have that the work cannot ever fully come off in live performance because Mahler has written things just about impossible to realize.

Even while doubling most of the solo soprano passages in the first half, for example, it is almost too much to expect that the lines will be heard over the rest of the orchestral-choral texture. In fact, most of the solo passages were often inaudible in Sunday's performance.

The extremes of pitch (particularly the upper reaches) are another problem and to find eight soloists who can sing them comfortably and beautifully is probably beyond the limits of practicality for any performing organization.

It was the soloists (Deborah O'Brien, Linda Phillips, Jane Bryden, Susan Clickner, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, William Dooley, Ara Benberian) then, who were disappointing in Sunday's performance. Ms. O'Brien and Ms. Phillips, the two sopranos, provided some very shrill (but also not very audible) singing and the latter lacked the passionate urgency which seems a requisite for the Penitent/Gretchen passages.

Alexander as Dr. Marianus had some of the most gorgeous music in the entire symphony but even he, usually comfortable with high tessitura, sounded pinched and nasal.

Ms. Bryden was the outstanding exception among the soloists. She had all of two lines to sing as the Mater Gloriosa, but standing in the rafters above the stage, she provided the transparent, perfectly focused sound that one envisions coming from celestial creatures.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus and Tanglewood Choir, prepared by John Oliver, and the St. Paul Boys choir, directed by Theodore Marier, sang superbly, handling the contrapuntal complexities and chromatic melodic lines with precision and beautiful tone.

The orchestra, too, played beautifully especially the Mater Gloriosa's music, and my few reservations with Ozawa's view of the score have to do with some not always convincing transitions from one tempo to another, dynamic levels which needed to be either louder or softer than played, and occasionally more attention to Mahler's very subtle nuances.

BSO plays Mahler in Tanglewood finale

The Boston Globe
(EVENING)
D. 195,032
AUG 21 1972
New England Newsclip

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — Tanglewood has been rich in Mahler this summer. The Boston Symphony has played the 5th and 6th symphonies, the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra the 1st, and half of the 9th, the series being capped Sunday afternoon at the season's last Boston Symphony concert by the 8th, with Seiji Ozawa conducting.

It is a monster, the 8th. Mahler first set the Ninth Century hymn, "Veni, creator, spiritus," and then the last scene of Goethe's "Faust" II, and in it he involved a very large orchestra, an extra brass group, eight vocal soloists, two mixed choruses, and a boys' chorus.

The BSO had never played it before and is not likely to in Boston, unless for something special like a pension fund concert: you literally can't fit it on the Symphony Hall stage without ripping out front rows of seats. No recording makes much acoustic sense of it, and so concert performances, which, as you can imagine, are rare, are automatically events, potent theater and unsurpassed sonorous extravaganza.

"Faust," with its bold and bizzare wedding of the barbaric with the classical, the sublime with the commonplace, is Ur-Mahler. It was inevitable that Mahler would sometime have to come to terms with Goethe, and his juxtaposition and eventual blending (in music, not in words) of "Veni, creator" and "The Eternal feminine" is conceptually a daring and fascinating extension of Goethe's inspired but less-than-organic goulash.

Mahler's "Veni, creator" is admirably terse and dramatic, in a way that makes it a hard act to follow, but, less admirably, noisy and overpopulated. Its "Faust" starts marvelously with one of his greatest moments, anticipating the spare, delicate, liberated counterpoint of "Das Lied von der Erde" and the 9th and 10th symphonies, as he produces Goethe's forest- and rockscape in which friendly, silent lions prowl.

Once later, in the quiet Adagissimo, the aureole that precedes the appearance of Mater gloriosa, the figure of redemption, Mahler finds his way right to the middle of Goethe's poetry; for the rest, and in spite of compelling dramatic and sonorous details, he is mired in a series of conspicuous non-successes because the musical gestures are (in ascending order of inadequacy) trivial, strange, or sentimental. I am sorry, but the Pater Ecstaticus solo sounds like Richard Rodgers with wrong notes, and a deafening setting of "Alles Vergengliche ist nur ein Gleichnis" (all that is transitory is but a parable) is the work of a man who is so far on an ego-trip but he has lost all sight of his task.

The performance: yes and no. Ozawa had the work under impressive control, did all he could to make and keep it exciting, and played the theater of its acoustic and visual massiveness for all it was worth. The Boston Symphony, th Tanglewood Festival rus, the Tanglewood C and the St. Paul's School Boy Choir performed beautifully for him.

It is a work, though, that depends enormously on its soloists, who Sunday were not, as whole, good enough. Jane Bryden sang her brief part as Mater gloriosa very well, and Deborah O'Brien, though overtaxed as Magna Peccatrix, at least offered the promise that goes with a bright, though still unformed, lyric soprano, and careful preparation of music and words. William Dooley was in vocal trouble, though clearly someone who knew what it was all about. The rest — Linda Phillips, Susan Clinckener, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, Ara Berberian — produced collectively a museum of screams, wobbles, inaudibility, operetta style, "gee, I don't know what's going on here," and German the like of which hasn't been spoken at public entertainments since "The Great Dictator."

TANGLEWOOD 1972

SEIJI OZAWA Artistic Director, Berkshire Festival
GUNTHER SCHULLER Artistic Director, Berkshire Music Center
LEONARD BERNSTEIN Adviser

Sunday August 20 1972 at 2.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

SEIJI OZAWA conductor

MAHLER

Symphony no. 8 in E flat 'Symphony of a thousand'

PART 1 Hymnus: Veni, creator spiritus

intermission

PART 2 Final scene from Goethe's 'Faust'

Magna peccatrix	DEBORAH O'BRIEN
Una poenitentium (Gretchen)	LINDA PHILLIPS
Mater gloriosa	JANE BRYDEN
Mulier Samaritana	SUSAN CLICKNER
Maria Aegiptica	EUNICE ALBERTS
Doctor Marianus	JOHN ALEXANDER
Pater ecstaticus	WILLIAM DOOLEY
Pater profundus	ARA BERBERIAN

TANGLEWOOD FESTIVAL CHORUS
TANGLEWOOD CHOIR
John Oliver director
ST PAUL'S SCHOOL BOY CHOIR
Theodore Marier director
BERJ ZAMKOCHIAN organ

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The program note for this afternoon's concert begins on page 32

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECORDS EXCLUSIVELY FOR DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON

BALDWIN PIANO
DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON AND RCA RECORDS

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER & RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885
AUG 23 1972
New England Newsclip

Mahler Symphony Stunning

BY ELLENE PFEIFER
Music Critic

Of the premiere of her husband's Eighth Symphony in 1910, Alma Mahler wrote in her memoirs that there was great excitement and anticipation before the performance, a wild ovation following it and that, as they drove home afterwards, she and Gustav wept over the greatness of the symphony and the reception to it.

Their response was slightly more exaggerated, perhaps, than that of the audience at Tanglewood Sunday where the Symphony was performed by Seiji Ozawa and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There is no doubt, however, that this performance was the most stunning musical experience of the season and the audience, justly moved (for once), was on its feet and cheering as early as intermission.

The work, a really mammoth performing enterprise for two mixed choruses, boy choir, eight soloists and large orchestra, has been dubbed "symphony of a thousand" although that many performers are really unnecessary and only about 320 were used on this occasion.

• Concert Review

It is constructed in two parts —the first based on the thousand-year-old hymn "Veni Creator Spiritus" and composed in traditional first movement sonata form; the second much longer, comprises a fairly discernible slow movement, scherzo, and finale and is based on the final scene of Goethe's "Faust." The two are connected by detailed thematic cross-references and by the philosophical connection seen by Mahler in which the inspiration and grace obtained through the Holy Spirit are transformed through struggle to ever greater levels of spiritual enlightenment (the latter symbolized in Faust's ascent to the highest plateaus of heaven.)

"Imagine that the universe bursts into song. We hear no longer human voices, but those of planets and suns circling in their orbits," Mahler wrote.

He might have added that there are also angels of every age and eminence, blessed boys, Doctor Marianus, characters from biblical stories, and the Mater Gloriosa (Virgin Mary and the Eternal Feminine somehow mixed) as symbolic personages.

This other-worldliness of thought applies also in the demands of instrumental-vocal balance and in more-than-mortal pitch extremes. These account for the uncomfortable feeling I have that the work cannot ever fully come off in live performance because Mahler has written things just about impossible to realize.

Even while doubling most of the solo soprano passages in the first half, for example, it is almost too much to expect that the lines will be heard over the rest of the orchestral-choral texture. In fact, most of the solo passages were often inaudible in Sunday's performance.

The extremes of pitch (particularly the upper reaches) are another problem and to find eight soloists who can sing them comfortably and beautifully is probably beyond the limits of practicality for any performing organization.

It was the soloists (Deborah O'Brien, Linda Phillips, Jane Bryden, Susan Clickner, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, William Dooley, Ara Benberian) then, who were disappointing in Sunday's performance. Ms. O'Brien and Ms. Phillips, the two sopranos, provided some very shrill (but also not very audible) singing and the latter lacked the passionate urgency which seems a requisite for the Penitent/Gretchen passages.

Alexander as Dr. Marianus had some of the most gorgeous music in the entire symphony but even he, usually comfortable with high tessitura, sounded pinched and nasal.

Ms. Bryden was the outstanding exception among the soloists. She had all of two lines to sing as the Mater Gloriosa, but standing in the rafters above the stage, she provided the transparent, perfectly focused sound that one envisions coming from celestial creatures.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus and Tanglewood Choir, prepared by John Oliver, and the St. Paul Boys choir, directed by Theodore Marier, sang superbly, handling the contrapuntal complexities and chromatic melodic lines with precision and beautiful tone.

The orchestra, too, played beautifully especially the Mater Gloriosa's music, and my few reservations with Ozawa's view of the score have to do with some not always convincing transitions from one tempo to another, dynamic levels which needed to be either louder or softer than played, and occasionally more attention to Mahler's very subtle nuances.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,977

AUG 21 1972 New England Newsclip

35th Berkshire Music Festival Closes

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — The 35th Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood ended yesterday afternoon with a full-scale performance of Mahler's Symphony No. 8 in E flat by the Boston Symphony, three choruses, eight soloists and organ, conducted by Seiji Ozawa.

Attendance of 32,012 for the eighth weekend brought the summer's total to 257,860, an increase of 40,838 over last summer. Some of the increase can be attributed, in part at least, to generally favorable weather conditions.

Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the Boston Symphony Saturday night, with Misha Dichter as soloist in Brahms' Second Piano Concerto.

French Composer

The entire festival's biggest shock was administered Saturday night with the contemporary French composer Olivier Messiaen's "And I Look for the Resurrection of the Dead" for wind instruments and percussion.

Mozart's "Paris" Symphony preceded Messiaen's sepulchral clatter and the Brahms' concerto later soothed frazzled nerves.

Mahler's "Symphony of a Thousand" is rarely performed because of the huge forces it requires, excessive length (one hour and a quarter of actual playing), and the work's textural complexities.

Yesterday's orchestra was 110, including extra brass, 250 singers from the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and Choir and St. Paul's School Boy Choir from Cambridge.

Soloists

Soloists were Deborah O'Brien, Linda Phillips and Jane Bryden, sopranos; Susan Clickner and Eunice Alberts, contraltos; John Alexander, tenor; William Dooley, baritone; Ara Berberian, bass.

It is to the credit of Mrs. Clickner, Worcester contralto, that she came through splendidly. Mahler's demands on the soloists (even the offstage role, sung by Miss Bryden) are rather heartless and almost futile.

The second part, sung in German — the final scene from Goethe's "Faust" — was less strenuous in effect than the opening Latin segment.

Massive sections were quite overpowering, to a point that voices struggled to penetrate the thick orchestral fabric. Nevertheless, the combined choruses were a well-disciplined lot and came much closer to splendid achievement than frustrated effort.

Podium Control

Extremely active on podium, Ozawa kept everything under control and gave everyone marvelous cue service while keeping the massive work on a forward course.

Memory of the Mahler will not outlive Messiaen's clangorous "Resurrection."

Provocative as it may be, this music has enormous power and achieves stature through the very drama it generates.

Among the noise-makers were three sets of tuned cow bells, tubular bells, six gongs and three tam tams, one of them at least eight feet in diameter. In addition was a full complement of woodwinds and brasses.

We can but assume the earnestness with which Messiaen related the five movements to his proposed religious themes.

Reporting on the work objectively . . . subterranean growls in brass triggered a succession of experiences that stunned some listeners and seemed to completely possess others.

There were long periodic silences as part of the text, solos of great beauty in woodwinds, oriental-styled chatter without discernible key — and ear-splitting thunder from the huge tam tam that rivalled a jet takeoff, associated with general chaos.

Applause was also thunderous.

Thomas stressed crispness of phrase and dynamics in Mozart's "Paris." Wind solos were immaculate, and the conductor had a gesture for every detail whether it was needed or not.

The andante was beautifully united in purpose and tonal quality. The finale suffered no damage taken at breakneck speed.

Dichter gave a respectful and respectable performance of the Brahms concerto without plumbing any depth of emotion or brilliance.

PROGRAMS
Saturday Night
Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor
Symphony No. 31 in D, K. 297, "Paris" — Mozart
Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum — Messiaen
Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat, Opus 83 — Brahms
Misha Dichter, pianist

Sunday Afternoon
Seiji Ozawa, conductor
Symphony No. 8 in E flat, "Symphony of a Thousand" — Mahler
Deborah O'Brien, Linda Phillips, and Jane Bryden, sopranos
Susan Clickner and Eunice Alberts, contraltos
John Alexander, tenor
William Dooley, baritone
Ara Berberian, bass.

Tanglewood Festival Chorus and Choir
St. Paul's School Boy Choir

Berj Zamgochian, organist

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

AUG 22 1972 New England Newsclip

Mahler's giant Eighth, a BSO first

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

Nature and the public have smiled on the Berkshire Festival during most of its eight-week season this summer, and for the three concerts of the closing weekend, there were clear skies, cool breezes, and a total of 27,958 paying customers.

What they heard ranged from the sophisticated modernities of Gyorgy Ligeti's "Melodien" (a BSO first) and Bartok's "The Miraculous Mandarin" to the sublimities of Mahler's Eighth Symphony in E flat, and the shattering sonorities of Messiaen's "Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum." Pianists Alexis Weissenberg and Misha Dichter played the Chopin First and Brahms Second Piano Concertos on Friday and Saturday nights respectively.

* * *

Sunday afternoon's performance of the Mahler Eighth under Seiji Ozawa's direction would have been an event in any setting, but in the packed Tanglewood Shed and over the expansive green lawns the music surged like pure ambrosia. The Tanglewood Festival Chorus and Choir, which John Oliver has made into a major singing group in an astonishingly short time; Theodore Marier's smartly-disciplined St. Paul's School Boy Choir, and of course the Boston Symphony in top form were brought together with the particular kind of genius that Ozawa commands, especially when conducting large forces and strong emotional works.

From the first exhilarating pronouncement of "Veni, creator spiritus" by full orchestra, chorus, and organist (Berj Zamkochian), to the final "Chorus mysticus," which brings Part 2, the Goethe "Faust" redemption scene, to a magnificently serene conclusion, Ozawa's tremendous control and the performers' outgoing response was continuously absorbing. The voluminous applause and cheers that followed Part 1, and came in greatest measure at the end of the afternoon were not of the predictable Tanglewood brand — everyone seemed to sense that he had witnessed a memorable one-time event.

The Eighth Symphony, in which Mahler didn't stint on musical requirements, calls for eight vocal soloists, to sing ensemble and alone. It must be admitted that the group chosen for this performance was a surprisingly variable one in experience and suitability for the requirements of an undertaking of this magnitude. Of all of them, tenor John Alexander brought the greatest stature to the lines, while among the new voices mezzo Susan Clickner and soprano Linda Phillips seemed best equal to the demands made by these circumstances. However, Ozawa made places for them all in this crowning work, so that by this solicitousness they shone like stars, albeit some rather dimly.

* * *

Another event of loudly resounding importance was the first Tanglewood performance, on Saturday, of Messiaen's "Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum," which Michael Tilson Thomas had included in his Boston Spectrum Series. This is, of course, a work composed with all outdoors in mind, so that even with three sides of the shed open, the presence of a battery of woodwinds, brass, and metallic percussion instruments, including what must be the largest (and loudest) tam-tam in the world could be felt in the marrow of one's bones.

It is truly a glorious work, not simply because of its awesome total grandeur, but on account of the deft weaving of instrumental coloring on a sumptuous cathedral scale. It received a virtuoso performance under Mr. Thomas, with the percussion section achieving new wonders of skill and of coordination. In the audience there were some demurrers, at first shocked and outraged by more volume than usual, but they soon came under the spell, and added thunderous approval of their own at the end.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638

AUG 21 1972

Season Ends

Ozawa Conducts Spectacular Performance of Mahler's Work

By RICHARD CONWAY

Almost as one, the capacity audience inside the Music Shed at Tanglewood came to its feet with thundering applause and shouts, as conductor Seiji Ozawa brought the baton down to end the season at the Berkshire Music Festival. The audience of 12,884 had heard a spectacular, if uneven, performance of Mahler's monumental "Symphony No. 8 in E flat," commonly called the "Symphony of a Thousand," because that number of performers took part in its first performance.

There were not that many performers Sunday, but there were enough. In addition to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there were the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Tanglewood Choir, the St. Paul's School Boy Choir, and eight soloists: Deborah O'Brien, Linda Phillips, Jane Bryden, Susan Clickner, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, William Dooley, and Ara Berberian.

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this was its first performance of the Mahler work. Conductor Ozawa made it a memorable one.

How fortunate Boston is to have him as its new conductor! The man is simply fantastic. He gets more music out of that orchestra than anyone else I have heard conduct it — and that includes Leonard Bernstein.

One doesn't even have to know the music. All one has to do is watch Ozawa and listen to the results. What the music is all ablut will be absolutely clear.

What Mahler's music is all about is perhaps best expressed by the composer himself. "Imagine that the universe bursts into song. We hear no longer human voices, but those of planets and suns circling in their orbits."

Certainly the voices that sang yesterday were human. But somehow, under Ozawa's masterful musicianship and dynamic leadership, and despite occasional weak passages in both orchestra and chorus, Mahler's soaring message of hope and redemption was brought home with dramatic impact.

The choruses, heard struggling with the work in rehearsal shortly before the performance, took new life under Ozawa's baton; and, although we still feel they were better at the beginning of the season, turned in a first rate job. Again, we were most impressed with their work in the softer passages. The St. Paul Boy Choir, not included in that ragged rehearsal beforehand, sang with lovely tone.

As for the soloists, with the exception of Jane Bryden's work, we were generally unimpressed. Their ensemble singing was atrocious.

The brass sections of the orchestra had some bad moments in the first section of the work, but redeemed itself in the second. Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein had some expressive solo passages.

Mahler's music has had a considerable revival of these past five to ten years. Three of his symphonies were played at Tanglewood this summer. All of his symphonic works are long, and one often has to wait for something to happen in them; but his masterful scoring and depth of feeling are unquestioned. The exquisite opening of the second section of the eighth, for orchestra alone is, for me, an example of Mahler at his most expressive. It was beautifully played Sunday.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

AUG 21 1972 New England Newsclip

SEIJI OZAWA received a standing ovation for his reading of Mahler's Symphony No. 8 at Tanglewood's closing concert.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

AUG 22 1972

Bombastic Note Closes Festival

By RICHARD VINCENT
Music Critic

In the words of the travelogue, "and so we bid farewell to lovely Tanglewood, jewel of the East, purveyor of sublime sound, servant of the senses, and home of the chosen."

Well, things weren't all that good on this last Sunday of the season, but it is always somewhat melancholy when this fine Festival comes to a close. It is surely one of the very civilized experiences possible in this vale of tears and one that I value.

THE PROGRAM consisted entirely of the Mahler Symphony No. 8 in E Flat subtitled, "Symphony of a thousand."

This sobriquet stems from the premiere performance, when Mahler gathered one thousand performers, including mixed choruses, boy choirs, eight solo singers, full orchestra, and pipe organ to do the job.

Mahler was obsessed with size and this is not necessarily bad. But too often something big is equated with something good and this is a dangerous and misleading concept. Many examples come to mind, where great size tends to obscure the threadbare and transitory quality of its base.

TEXAS, FOR EXAMPLE. Wilt Chamberlain. Primo Carnera. The Pentagon. Italy's Tomb of the Unknown Soldier. The Maginot Line. Hitler's Grand Plan for Berlin. Thruways. Bernstein's "Mass." And much of Mahler.

Seiji Ozawa was the nerve center of this massive undertaking and after a ragged beginning things became somewhat better. It is, I suppose, an achievement in itself, keeping all the various components of this work working with some coherence, and Ozawa did at least that.

BUT THE WORK began at full cry and never slackened. Ozawa kept whipping them up and at times, there was an edge of hysteria in the results, particularly with the five female soloists in their efforts to be heard over the mass of sound that the orchestra, organ, and combined choruses were making. At times their voices were ragged shrieks, perceptible over the tumult and shouting.

The audience in their reaction was divided. There were many who were transported by it all and others who were disenthralled, even embarrassed, by what appeared to their sensibilities the overt and spurious emotion being purveyed. The reactions were, quite simply, an immediate definition of taste, and who can legislate that? Not I, not anyone.

It ill becomes someone to try, patronizingly or honestly, to impose his own template of sensibilities on another who is getting an authentic serving of psychic and emotional income from a musical experience. The important thing is to have the experience, a good cleansing, a jogging of the senses.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,977

AUG 21 1972 New England Newsclip

35th Berkshire Music Festival Closes

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — The 35th Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood ended yesterday afternoon with a full-scale performance of Mahler's Symphony No. 8 in E flat by the Boston Symphony, three choruses, eight soloists and organ, conducted by Seiji Ozawa.

Attendance of 32,012 for the eighth weekend brought the summer's total to 257,860, an increase of 40,838 over last summer. Some of the increase can be attributed, in part at least, to generally favorable weather conditions.

Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the Boston Symphony Saturday night, with Misha Dichter as soloist in Brahms' Second Piano Concerto.

French Composer

The entire festival's biggest shock was administered Saturday night with the contemporary French composer Olivier Messiaen's "And I Look for the Resurrection of the Dead" for wind instruments and percussion.

Mozart's "Paris" Symphony preceded Messiaen's sepulchral clatter and the Brahms concerto later soothed frazzled nerves.

Mahler's "Symphony of a Thousand" is rarely performed because of the huge forces it requires, excessive length (one hour and a quarter of actual playing), and the work's textural complexities.

Yesterday's orchestra was 110, including extra brass, 250 singers from the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and Choir and St. Paul's School Boy Choir from Cambridge.

Soloists

Soloists were Deborah O'Brien, Linda Phillips and Jane Bryden, sopranos; Susan Clickner and Eunice Alberts, contraltos; John Alexander, tenor; William Dooley, baritone; Ara Berberian, bass.

It is to the credit of Mrs. Clickner, Worcester contralto, that she came through splendidly. Mahler's demands on the soloists (even the offstage role, sung by Miss Bryden) are rather heartless and almost futile.

The second part, sung in German — the final scene from Goethe's "Faust" — was less strenuous in effect than the opening Latin segment.

Massive sections were quite overpowering, to a point that voices struggled to penetrate the thick orchestral fabric. Nevertheless, the combined choruses were a well-disciplined lot and came much closer to splendid achievement than frustrated effort.

Podium Control

Extremely active on podium, Ozawa kept everything under control and gave everyone marvelous cue service while keeping the massive work on a forward course.

Memory of the Mahler will not outlive Messiaen's clangorous "Resurrection."

Provocative as it may be, this music has enormous power and achieves stature through the very drama it generates.

Among the noise-makers were three sets of tuned cow bells, tubular bells, six gongs and three tam tams, one of them at least eight feet in diameter. In addition was a full complement of woodwinds and brasses.

We can but assume the earnestness with which Messiaen related the five movements to his proposed religious themes.

Reporting on the work objectively . . . subterranean growls in brass triggered a succession of experiences that stunned some listeners and seemed to completely possess others.

There were long periodic silences as part of the text, solos of great beauty in woodwinds, oriental-styled chatter without discernible key — and earsplitting thunder from the huge tam tam that rivalled a jet takeoff, associated with general chaos.

Applause was also thunderous.

Thomas stressed crispness of phrase and dynamics in Mozart's "Paris." Wind solos were immaculate, and the conductor had a gesture for every detail whether it was needed or not.

The andante was beautifully united in purpose and tonal quality. The finale suffered no damage taken at breakneck speed.

Dichter gave a respectful and respectable performance of the Brahms concerto without plumbing any depth of emotion or brilliance.

PROGRAMS
Saturday Night

Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor
Symphony No. 31 in D, K. 297, "Paris" — Mozart
Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum — Messiaen
Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat, Opus 83 — Brahms
Misha Dichter, pianist

Sunday Afternoon
Seiji Ozawa, conductor
Symphony No. 8 in E flat, "Symphony of a Thousand" — Mahler
Deborah O'Brien, Linda Phillips, and Jane Bryden, sopranos
Susan Clickner and Eunice Alberts, contraltos
John Alexander, tenor
William Dooley, baritone
Ara Berberian, bass.

Tanglewood Festival Chorus and Choir
St. Paul's School Boy Choir

Berj Zamgochian, organist

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

AUG 22 1972 New England Newsclip

Mahler's giant Eighth, a BSO first

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

Nature and the public have smiled on the Berkshire Festival during most of its eight-week season this summer, and for the three concerts of the closing weekend, there were clear skies, cool breezes, and a total of 27,958 paying customers.

What they heard ranged from the sophisticated modernities of Gyorgy Ligeti's "Melodien" (a BSO first) and Bartok's "The Miraculous Mandarin" to the sublimities of Mahler's Eighth Symphony in E flat, and the shattering sonorities of Messiaen's "Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum." Pianists Alexis Weissenberg and Misha Dichter played the Chopin First and Brahms Second Piano Concertos on Friday and Saturday nights respectively.

* * *

Sunday afternoon's performance of the Mahler Eighth under Seiji Ozawa's direction would have been an event in any setting, but in the packed Tanglewood Shed and over the expansive green lawns the music surged like pure ambrosia. The Tanglewood Festival Chorus and Choir, which John Oliver has made into a major singing group in an astonishingly short time; Theodore Marier's smartly-disciplined St. Paul's School Boy Choir, and of course the Boston Symphony in top form were brought together with the particular kind of genius that Ozawa commands, especially when conducting large forces and strong emotional works.

From the first exhilarating pronouncement of "Veni, creator spiritus" by full orchestra, chorus, and organist (Berj Zamkochian), to the final "Chorus mysticus," which brings Part 2, the Goethe "Faust" redemption scene, to a magnificently serene conclusion, Ozawa's tremendous control and the performers' outgoing response was continuously absorbing. The voluminous applause and cheers that followed Part 1, and came in greatest measure at the end of the afternoon were not of the predictable Tanglewood brand — everyone seemed to sense that he had witnessed a memorable one-time event.

The Eighth Symphony, in which Mahler didn't stint on musical requirements, calls for eight vocal soloists, to sing ensemble and alone. It must be admitted that the group chosen for this performance was a surprisingly variable one in experience and suitability for the requirements of an undertaking of this magnitude. Of all of them, tenor John Alexander brought the greatest stature to the lines, while among the new voices mezzo Susan Clickner and soprano Linda Phillips seemed best equal to the demands made by these circumstances. However, Ozawa made places for them all in this crowning work, so that by this solicitousness they shone like stars, albeit some rather dimly.

* * *

Another event of loudly resounding importance was the first Tanglewood performance, on Saturday, of Messiaen's "Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum," which Michael Tilson Thomas had included in his Boston Spectrum Series. This is, of course, a work composed with all outdoors in mind, so that even with three sides of the shed open, the presence of a battery of woodwinds, brass, and metallic percussion instruments, including what must be the largest (and loudest) tam-tam in the world could be felt in the marrow of one's bones.

It is truly a glorious work, not simply because of its awesome total grandeur, but on account of the deft weaving of instrumental coloring on a sumptuous cathedral scale. It received a virtuoso performance under Mr. Thomas, with the percussion section achieving new wonders of skill and of coordination. In the audience there were some demurrers, at first shocked and outraged by more volume than usual, but they soon came under the spell, and added thunderous approval of their own at the end.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638

AUG 21 1972

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

AUG 22 1972

Season Ends

Ozawa Conducts Spectacular Performance of Mahler's Work

By RICHARD CONWAY

Almost as one, the capacity audience inside the Music Shed at Tanglewood came to its feet with thundering applause and shouts, as conductor Seiji Ozawa brought the baton down to end the season at the Berkshire Music Festival. The audience of 12,884 had heard a spectacular, if uneven, performance of Mahler's monumental "Symphony No. 8 in E flat," commonly called the "Symphony of a Thousand," because that number of performers took part in its first performance.

There were not that many performers Sunday, but there were enough. In addition to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there were the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Tanglewood Choir, the St. Paul's School Boy Choir, and eight soloists: Deborah O'Brien, Linda Phillips, Jane Bryden, Susan Clickner, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, William Dooley, and Ara Berberian.

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this was its first performance of the Mahler work. Conductor Ozawa made it a memorable one.

How fortunate Boston is to have him as its new conductor! The man is simply fantastic. He gets more music out of that orchestra than anyone else I have heard conduct it — and that includes Leonard Bernstein.

One doesn't even have to know the music. All one has to do is watch Ozawa and listen to the results. What the music is all ablut will be absolutely clear.

What Mahler's music is all about is perhaps best expressed by the composer himself. "Imagine that the universe bursts into song. We hear no longer human voices, but those of planets and suns circling in their orbits."

Certainly the voices that sang yesterday were human. But somehow, under Ozawa's masterful musicianship and dynamic leadership, and despite occasional weak passages in both orchestra and chorus, Mahler's soaring message of hope and redemption was brought home with dramatic impact.

The choruses, heard struggling with the work in rehearsal shortly before the performance, took new life under Ozawa's baton; and, although we still feel they were better at the beginning of the season, turned in a first rate job. Again, we were most impressed with their work in the softer passages. The St. Paul Boy Choir, not included in that ragged rehearsal beforehand, sang with lovely tone.

As for the soloists, with the exception of Jane Bryden's work, we were generally unimpressed. Their ensemble singing was atrocious.

The brass sections of the orchestra had some bad moments in the first section of the work, but redeemed itself in the second. Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein had some expressive solo passages.

Mahler's music has had a considerable revival of these past five to ten years. Three of his symphonies were played at Tanglewood this summer. All of his symphonic works are long, and one often has to wait for something to happen in them; but his masterful scoring and depth of feeling are unquestioned. The exquisite opening of the second section of the eighth, for orchestra alone is, for me, an example of Mahler at his most expressive. It was beautifully played Sunday.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

AUG 21 1972 New England Newsclip

SEIJI OZAWA received a standing ovation for his reading of Mahler's Symphony No. 8 at Tanglewood's closing concert.

Bombastic Note Closes Festival

By RICHARD VINCENT
Music Critic

In the words of the travelogue, "and so we bid farewell to lovely Tanglewood, jewel of the East, purveyor of sublime sound, servant of the senses, and home of the chosen."

Well, things weren't all that good on this last Sunday of the season, but it is always somewhat melancholy when this fine Festival comes to a close. It is surely one of the very civilized experiences possible in this vale of tears and one that I value.

THE PROGRAM consisted entirely of the Mahler Symphony No. 8 in E Flat subtitled, "Symphony of a thousand."

This sobriquet stems from the premiere performance, when Mahler gathered one thousand performers, including mixed choruses, boy choirs, eight solo singers, full orchestra, and pipe organ to do the job.

Mahler was obsessed with size and this is not necessarily bad. But too often something big is equated with something good and this is a dangerous and misleading concept. Many examples come to mind, where great size tends to obscure the threadbare and transitory quality of its base.

TEXAS, FOR EXAMPLE. Wilt Chamberlain, Primo Carnera, The Pentagon, Italy's Tomb of the Unknown Soldier, The Maginot Line, Hitler's Grand Plan for Berlin, Thruways, Bernstein's "Mass." And much of Mahler.

Seiji Ozawa was the nerve center of this massive undertaking and after a ragged beginning things became somewhat better. It is, I suppose, an achievement in itself, keeping all the various components of this work working with some coherence, and Ozawa did at least that.

BUT THE WORK began at full cry and never slackened. Ozawa kept whipping them up and at times, there was an edge of hysteria in the results, particularly with the five female soloists in their efforts to be heard over the mass of sound that the orchestra, organ, and combined choruses were making. At times their voices were ragged shrieks, perceptible over the tumult and shouting.

The audience in their reaction was divided. There were many who were transported by it all and others who were disenthralled, even embarrassed, by what appeared to their sensibilities the overt and spurious emotion being purveyed. The reactions were, quite simply, an immediate definition of taste, and who can legislate that? Not I, not anyone.

It ill becomes someone to try, patronizingly or honestly, to impose his own template of sensibilities on another who is getting an authentic serving of psychic and emotional income from a musical experience. The important thing is to have the experience, a good cleansing, a jogging of the senses.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398
AUG 21 1972
New England Newsclip

Happy Note Closes Season

LENOX — The Boston Symphony Orchestra ended one of its happiest seasons at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon with an attendance of 12,884 that helped the 35th Berkshire Festival set what is believed to be a 10 - year seasonal record.

Total 1972 attendance was 257,860 for 24 orchestra concerts, eight open rehearsals, Tanglewood - on - Parade and the Boston Pops. The 1971 total was 217,022. The 1965 total was 242,015. Records are missing before 1963.

The increase of 1972 over 1971 was 40,838, or 18.5 per cent.

Comparison of the key figures ... those of the 24 regular concerts plus the open rehearsals given on Saturday mornings ... shows 236,869 this summer; 202,954 last summer and 209,900 in he summer of 1965.

The Pops attracted 13,235 this year and 9626 last year. The 10 - year record for the Pops was set in 1967 at more than 17,000.

HOUR
NORWALK, CONN.
D. 23,000
AUG 24 1972
New England Newsclip

Record Breaking Tanglewood Audience Hears Mahler Work

Bas syn

Tanglewood triumphantly closed its successful 1972 season in a blaze of glory, vying with the setting sun in its effulgence and exultation. Boasting a pinnacle performance of Mahler's "Symphony of a Thousand" his eighth, in E flat, before a record breaking audience of several thousand on Sunday afternoon was the high point of its entire season. A piece not to be undertaken without peak performers and direction, it came forth in a mightly paean of praise, exultant sound, and technically flawless production. The great choral work was tackled by a huge choir comprising The Tanglewood Festival Chorus, sponsored jointly by the Boston University and the Boston Symphony orchestra. The Tanglewood choir (students of the Berkshire Music Center and the St. Paul Choir School of Cambridge, a year-round academic and music training school for boys 10 to 14. This plus extraordinary soloists, full orchestra, organ, and the superb conducting of Seiji Ozawa, who is also artistic director of the Berkshire Festival, and next year will be its music director, it could come forth as nothing short of a magnificence in sound. Sung in German, the diction seemed excellent (librettos were included with the programs) — the top-flight soloists sufficiently able to carry the airs above orchestral and choral backgrounds to nearly the entire expanse of the lawn auditors, as well as to those in the shell, and both pianissimo and crescendo portions were exceptionally noteworthy.

Though a thousand performers presented the premier of this great symphony in 1910 which Mahler himself considered his greatest work, could it have sounded any more glorious then than now? About the work, Mahler himself said, "imagine the universe bursting into song; we hear no longer human voices, but those of the planets and suns circling in their orbits . . . great dispensers of joy." The three thousand auditors at this first performance gave him a standing ovation which lasted nearly 30 minutes; that enthusiasm and that joy was repeated at Sunday's concert; one stopped counting curtain calls and the reverberation of bravos and applause is still resounding in my ears. The work itself combines a medieval Latin hymn and the closing scene of Goethe's Faust — an invocation and prayer at Pentecost, and a theme of redemption, resulting in an overwhelming, mystical-spiritual supreme moment, beyond words. Jack Diether, leading Mahler scholar feels it is the expression more than of one man, the composer, and more of all humanity.

The closing weekend began with the Friday prelude to the major concert, featuring pianist Alexis Weissenberg, with the Boston Symphony Chamber players in the Beethoven quintet in E flat, and the piano transcription of Mussorgsky's Pictures at an exhibition; Ozowa conducting Ligeti's Melodien for orchestra, the Chopin piano concerto No. 1 in E Minor with Weissenberg, and Bartok's suite from the Miraculous Mandarin, in the major concert of the evening.

To continue among its innovations and more first performances at Tanglewood, the Saturday night program, with Michael Tilson-Thomas conducting, included the Mozart symphony No. 31 in D., the Paris — a brilliant and charming piece with many solo instruments called into play; the ever-favored second piano concerto in B. flat of Brahms, with Misha Dichter as soloist, and a startling innovative offering of Olivier Messiaen, Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum — a well balanced fare featuring just about everything. Dichter who plays exceedingly and skillfully favorably, and no stranger to Tanglewood, was a 1966 Tchaikovsky piano competition winner in Moscow. He has played with the major orchestras and his appearance was greeted with vociferous welcome and applauded with continuous acclaim.

The Messiaen compositon "And I look for the ressurection of the dead" was written around huge and mighty surroundings — The Alps, the pyramids of Mexico, the temples and statues of ancient Egypt, and Roman and Gothic churches. The program notes speak of the "colors of the instrumental timbres . . . the sonorous intracacies . . . and alternating resonances . . . like encircling stained glass windows in the great cathedrals where it was first performed — Sainte Chapel, and Notre Dame de-Chartres. Its heavy, resonant, powerful instrumentation is suited for vast and open and high mountainous places. It is divided into five parts, each bearing a text from Holy Scriptures from the Psalms, the book of Job, the gospels and the epistles of Paul, and the Book of Revelation. From the cries of the depths of the soul from a great abyss, to the exultation of the believer in the power of the resurrection, and the coming Glory of the Lord, not a contained melody, but the continuation of descriptive and revelant and mighty sound bespeak the theme in great and thunderous power, and quiet, and sometimes silent awe, almost as though it were the voice of the great Creator, yet not a voice, but a knowing that this power comes only from the Highest and Most Almighty. To produce this, there are 18 woodwinds, 16 brass instruments, and metallic percussion, which uses three sets of tuned cow bells, tubular bells, six gongs and three tam tams. Inexpressibly difficult to analyze, it is likewise inexpressively effective and a magnificent production by the musicians themselves.

So the familiarly beautiful, the provocative, the not disagreeable cacophany of controlled and scheduled dissonance, the power and the harmony and the great — concluded the thirty-fifth Berkshire festival with praiseworthy work, well done; and many stereos and tapes will be enjoyed the more, as newer and more unusual selections are better known because another season of music at Tanglewood has introduced new listening and aroused keener pleasure in the extent of today's musical media.

—Roxie E. Houghton

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000
SEP 2 1972

SUMMER CIRCUIT

BERKSHIRE/TANGLEWOOD MUSIC FESTIVAL—At Lenox, Mass. The most successful season in the 30-plus summers of this great Festival closed with a very special event—the first performance ever by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Mahler's Eighth Symphony. This so-called "Symphony of a Thousand" may not require quite that many performers, but the 500 or so who jammed the stage of the Music Shed were all kept very busy. Mahler's dense, complex, monumental choral symphony uses an enormous orchestra, several large and small choruses, and eight vocal soloists—performing separately, together en masse, and in endlessly varied counterpointed groupings. The work is in two parts—the first, a half hour setting of a hymn of praise in Latin; the second, an intricate near-oratorio setting in German of the last scene of Goethe's "Faust." As a confirmed Mahlerite, I found my own first live exposure to it exciting and interesting, but despite its scale and complexity and a few wonderful sections—especially the final earth- and soul-shattering moment—I was strangely unmoved. One is grateful to Seiji Ozawa for programming the Eighth, and for the rousing performance he brought forth from all concerned. While occasionally ragged, it offered a coherent sense of a remarkable work.

—STANLEY NEWMAN

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
AUG 21 1972
New England Newsclip

Music Review

A Mighty Finale

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

SOME 12,884 people will not readily forget the thrilling conclusion of yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert, which marked the end of the 1972 Berkshire Festival. A great crowd, with more scattered about on the adjacent lawns than under the Shed, heard Seiji Ozawa conduct Mahler's mighty Eighth Symphony with masterful leadership and consistently exciting elan.

Mahler's eighth, the "Symphony of a Thousand," is geared for magnificence, and Ozawa realized every last atom of its eloquence. The first half is a setting to music of a medieval Latin hymn; the second, the closing scene of Goethe's drama "Faust." The tremendous Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, was assisted by the St. Paul's School Boy Choir, Theodore Marier, director, and eight sterling vocal soloists.

Two other Mahler symphonies were heard at Tanglewood this season but they, Nos. 5 and 6, are solely instrumental. The eighth, the last to be completed (Nos. 9 and 10 were in process when he died before his 51st birthday), makes use of vocal resources almost to the exclusion of orchestra.

* * *

MAHLER was a major operatic conductor and, although he never wrote anything for the theatre, this symphony is his most dramatic and monumental work. It owes its enormousness to a plea for the personal intervention of the Lord in favor of the sinner.

The first movement is giant chorale sung almost without cessation a voce piena. The second half gives the orchestra a narrative to relate underlying the utterances of the soloists' verses pertinent to the roles they portrayed. The stellar soloists were Deborah O'Brien, Linda Phillips, Susan Clickner, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, William Dooley and Ara Berberian.

At the close of the symphony, the Mater Gloriosa is given a short verse to sing and it was one of the most moving moments of the afternoon. Jane Bryden, placed on the platform in the rafters where the television cameras usually work, sang "Rise, thou, to Higher Spheres" not only with beautiful voice but in classic style. The text could not have been better suited to the station.

Offstage, but really in the southern corridor of the Shed, was placed a brass septet, four trumpets and three trombones, which also lent color to the closing pages of the symphony.

* * *

THE CLOSING scene from "Faust" is placed in mountain gorges, forest, rock and desert, and the Holy Anchorites, divided on ascending planes, are posted among the ravines. The only orchestral section occurs at the beginning of this half. The choral numbers which follow are descriptive and more restrained, becoming dramatically expressive.

Ozawa marshaled his forces as a victorious commander in the field, and the ovation accorded him at the finale from the orchestra and chorus was as much and as genuine as that rendered him by the audience.

* * *

SATURDAY'S program placed one of the season's most significant new works — new at least to Tanglewood, although it was composed in 1964 — between Mozart and Brahms. Michael Tilson Thomas gave Olivier Messiaen's "Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum" a thoroughly thought-out performance, although it is an extremely controversial work. Written for wind and percussion instruments only, it seeks to express the messages of five excerpts from Holy Scripture. The sonorities and resonances are convincing as well as novel.

For example, "Out of the depths have I cried unto Thee, O Lord," originates in the lowest registers of the trombones, and the tuba and the ensuing six horns, "crying from the abyss," sound in colored clusters, tremendously effective and suggestive of the text.

Messiaen calls for 36 wind instruments and six percussionists. At one point, an enormous gong, certainly seven feet in diameter, is sounded, and its volume is progressively increased until the decibel count surely exceeded anything ever before produced at Tanglewood short of an explosion of artillery or a bomb; yet it was a congruous element in the nature of the piece which often had Hindu relevance.

* * *

WHEN Messiaen conducted a seminar of composition at the Berkshire Music Center in 1949, his absorption in religious matters was a salient feature of his residence here. This example of his creative energies is intended primarily for performance outdoors. When the six percussionists apply themselves to their assigned tasks in support of the enlarged brass sections, the extreme tumult and turmoil become manic, yet a purpose can be discerned through it all, in which the uses of sound are explored and extended.

* * *

THOMAS began his evening with the Mozart D major symphony No. 31, K. 297, the so-called "Paris Symphony." He gave it an animated and sprightly reading, indicating details to the Boston Symphony men, probably more precise than was necessary continuously, but he did instill vivacity to the delightful three movements. It was fortunate there were no traffic cops around during the last movement, for they might have questioned whether he was exceeding the speed limit. The musicians, to be sure, took it in stride.

Misha Dichter in the first movement of the Brahms B flat piano concerto missed nearly everything but the notes. In the later three movements, he evinced an interest in content and the third was incomparably enhanced by Jules Eskin's performance of the exquisite cello solo of the introduct, but Dichter gave a performance in which marvelously controlled speed seemed to be the predominant factor.

* * *

OZAWA'S program Friday night didn't enlist the entire orchestra until after the intermission. The evening's opening was a contemporary work by Georgy Ligeti, "Melodien," for a very small orchestra, and the Chopin E minor piano concerto which followed still required but a moiety of the personnel. Only in Bartok's "The Miraculous Mandarin" was the full complement employed, and this was the stunner of the evening.

Alexis Weissenberg, the soloist in the Chopin, confirmed his previous impressions on the same stage as a most sensitive and fastidious artist. The Chopin, between two such many-stranded weavers as Ligeti and Bartok, seemed comparatively thin and transparent. There is an overlong orchestral introduction in which a pompous declaration is followed by a gracile and guileless contrasting theme, whereupon the soloist enters on balletic figures and decorations. These were achieved with consummate skill and taste by Weissenberg.

* * *

THERE could be no wider difference in purpose than between the Legeti and the Bartok. Ligeti creates an atmospheric watercolor changing as the descending sun paints clouds. There is a keen insight in orchestral color, but, paradoxically, the part-writing contributes to the whole but is not interesting of itself. Immoderately sustained tones in the violins are interrupted by arabesques and voluted ornaments. The effect is of pleasant, narcotic somnolence.

The "Mandarin," on the other hand, is a brutally vulgar work. The subject is sordid, and Bartok attacks it without any pretense of lenience. One must really be familiar with the ballet to realize what goes on. In the briefest resumé, it concerns the robbery by three brigands of the various clients that a young lady, acting as a decoy, entices to her lair. Bartok depicts the savagery with intensely realistic ferocity. The only relief comes when the girl by means of a supple charm, expressed once by a solo oboe and another time by a solo clarinet, attracts and lures passersby. Once the protagonist is caught in the arachnidan web all subterfuge is cast aside, and Bartok portrays his bandits with relentless fury and merciless vigor.

The performance was a tour de force for the orchestra and a triumph for the conductor.

Whitestone

Ozawa acknowledging plaudits at yesterday's concert.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 130,857
AUG 21 1972
New England Newsclip

Ozawa Ends Tanglewood Series

By DOROTHY STOWE
Times Music Critic

LENOX, Mass. — Seiji Ozawa, Boston Symphony's conductor who is a frail dynamo of energy and inspiration, achieved a resounding triumph at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon, as he led a powerfully moving performance of Mahler's Eighth Sympathy, the closing work of this season's shed series.

A crowd of almost 13,000, responding to the charms of beautiful music and fine weather, presented themselves at Tanglewood, and stayed afterwords to accord a long and justified ovation to all who performed.

Applause intensified for Ozawa, and for the superb Festival Chorus and Choir, which responded to his every demand with artistic unity and conviction. Special credit should go to their director, John Oliver, whole behind the scenes has prepared them so outstandingly several times during this season.

Thz full orchestra, augmented by extra timpany and brass, did masterfully its part in presenting this music, in which voices and instruments are interwoven almost inseparably in a marvelous paean of praise (Veni Creator Spiritus); and a plea for mercy and final triumphant vision of the glories of God's salvation, in the words of Goethe's Faust.

Neither voices nor instruments alone could achieve what they accomplish together in the inspired texture of this transcendent masterpiece by a master symphonist, and every-person on stage from Ozawa down to the smallest choir boy from St. Paul's School became a musician who reached beyond himself, and an instrument of God's peace.

The large assemblage of soloists performed with overall distinction. However, there are some tall orders for tonal opulence and projection, not to mention tessitura, among the solo passages of this symphony, and as might be expected some came off covered with more glory than others.

John Alexander was especially dependable and moving as Dr. Marianus. He rose to thrilling heights in his "Jungfrau, rein imschonsten Sinne." Thomas Dooley and Ara Berberian filled their music with intense meaning, as did Linda Phillips as Gretchen, a penitent. Deborah O'Brien (Miss Massachusetts of 1971) showed a promising voice but was occassionally in over her head with the cruel demands of her music.

NEWS
ATHOL, MASS.
D. 5,281
AUG 21 1972
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conductor Seiji Ozawa, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and eight soloists received a 10-minute ovation Sunday at the conclusion of the final concert of the 1972 Berkshire Festival.

To conclude the summer series, Ozawa conducted 300 musicians and singers in Mahler's Eighth Symphony.

The audience of 12,884 brought the summer total to 257,860, some 40,000 more than 1971, and a new record.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 16,200
AUG 21 1972
New England Newsclip

10-Minute Ovation For Seiji Ozawa

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conductor Seiji Ozawa, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and eight soloists received a 10-minute ovation Sunday at the conclusion of the final concert of the 1972 Berkshire Festival.

To conclude the summer series, Ozawa conducted 300 musicians and singers in Mahler's Eighth Symphony.

The audience of 12,884 brought the summer total to 257,860, some 40,000 more than 1971, and a new record.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398
AUG 21 1972
New England Newsclip

Happy Note Closes Season

LENOX — The Boston Symphony Orchestra ended one of its happiest seasons at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon with an attendance of 12,884 that helped the 35th Berkshire Festival set what is believed to be a 10 - year seasonal record.

Total 1972 attendance was 257,860 for 24 orchestra concerts, eight open rehearsals, Tanglewood - on - Parade and the Boston Pops. The 1971 total was 217,022. The 1965 total was 242,015. Records are missing before 1963.

The increase of 1972 over 1971 was 40,838, or 18.5 per cent.

Comparison of the key figures ... those of the 24 regular concerts plus the open rehearsals given on Saturday mornings ... shows 236,869 this summer; 202,954 last summer and 209,900 in he summer of 1965.

The Pops attracted 13,235 this year and 9626 last year. The 10 - year record for the Pops was set in 1967 at more than 17,000.

HOUR
NORWALK, CONN.
D. 23,000
AUG 24 1972
New England Newsclip

Record Breaking Tanglewood Audience Hears Mahler Work

Bos syn

Tanglewood triumphantly closed its successful 1972 season in a blaze of glory, vying with the setting sun in its effulgence and exultation. Boasting a pinnacle performance of Mahler's "Symphony of a Thousand" his eighth, in E flat, before a record breaking audience of several thousand on Sunday afternoon was the high point of its entire season. A piece not to be undertaken without peak performers and direction, it came forth in a mightly paean of praise, exultant sound, and technically flawless production. The great choral work was tackled by a huge choir comprising The Tanglewood Festival Chorus, sponsored jointly by the Boston University and the Boston Symphony orchestra. The Tanglewood choir (students of the Berkshire Music Center and the St. Paul Choir School of Cambridge, a year-round academic and music training school for boys 10 to 14. This plus extraordinary soloists, full orchestra, organ, and the superb conducting of Seiji Ozawa, who is also artistic director of the Berkshire Festival, and next year will be its music director, it could come forth as nothing short of a magnificence in sound. Sung in German, the diction seemed excellent (librettos were included with the programs) — the top-flight soloists sufficiently able to carry the airs above orchestral and choral backgrounds to nearly the entire expanse of the lawn auditors, as well as to those in the shell, and both pianissimo and crescendo portions were exceptionally noteworthy.

Though a thousand performers presented the premier of this great symphony in 1910 which Mahler himself considered his greatest work, could it have sounded any more glorious then than now? About the work, Mahler himself said, "imagine the universe bursting into song; we hear no longer human voices, but those of the planets and suns circling in their orbits . . . great dispensers of joy." The three thousand auditors at this first performance gave him a standing ovation which lasted nearly 30 minutes; that enthusiasm and that joy was repeated at Sunday's concert; one stopped counting curtain calls and the reverberation of bravos and applause is still resounding in my ears. The work itself combines a medieval Latin hymn and the closing scene of Goethe's Faust — an invocation and prayer at Pentecost, and a theme of redemption, resulting in an overwhelming, mystical-spiritual supreme moment, beyond words. Jack Diether, leading Mahler scholar feels it is the expression, more than of one man, the composer, and more of all humanity.

The closing weekend began with the Friday prelude to the major concert, featuring pianist Alexis Weissenberg, with the Boston Symphony Chamber players in the Beethoven quintet in E flat, and the piano transcription of Mussorgsky's Pictures at an exhibition; Ozowa conducting Ligeti's Melodien for orchestra, the Chopin piano concerto No. 1 in E Minor with Weissenberg, and Bartok's suite from the Miraculous Mandarin, in the major concert of the evening.

To continue among its innovations and more first performances at Tanglewood, the Saturday night program, with Michael Tilson-Thomas conducting, included the Mozart symphony No. 31 in D., the Paris — a brilliant and charming piece with many solo instruments called into play; the ever-favored second piano concerto in B. flat of Brahms, with Misha Dichter as soloist, and a startling innovative offering of Olivier Messiaen, Et exspecto ressurrectionem mortuorum — a well balanced fare featuring just about everything. Dichter who plays exceedingly and skillfully favorably, and no stranger to Tanglewood, was a 1966 Tchaikovsky piano competition winner in Moscow. He has played with the major orchestras and his appearance was greeted with vociferous welcome and applauded with continuous acclaim.

The Messiaen compositon "And I look for the ressurection of the dead" was written around huge and mighty surroundings — The Alps, the pyramids of Mexico, the temples and statues of ancient Egypt, and Roman and Gothic churches. The program notes speak of the "colors of the instrumental timbres . . . the sonorous intracacies . . . and alternating resonances . . . like encircling stained glass windows in the great cathedrals where it was first performed — Sainte Chapel, and Notre Dame de-Chartres. Its heavy, resonant, powerful instrumentation is suited for vast and open and high mountainous places. It is divided into five parts, each bearing a text from Holy Scriptures from the Psalms, the book of Job, the gospels and the epistles of Paul, and the Book of Revelation. From the cries of the depths of the soul from a great abyss, to the exultation of the believer in the power of the resurrection, and the coming Glory of the Lord, not a contained melody, but the continuation of descriptive and revelant and mighty sound bespeak the theme in great and thunderous power, and quiet, and sometimes silent awe, almost as though it were the voice of the great Creator, yet not a voice, but a knowing that this power comes only from the Highest and Most Almighty. To produce this, there are 18 woodwinds, 16 brass instruments, and metallic percussion, which uses three sets of tuned cow bells, tubular bells, six gongs and three tam tams. Inexpressibly difficult to analyze, it is likewise inexpressively effective and a magnificent production by the musicians themselves.

So the familiarly beautiful, the provocative, the not disagreeable cacophany of controlled and scheduled dissonance, the power and the harmony and the great — concluded the thirty-fifth Berkshire festival with praiseworthy work, well done; and many stereos and tapes will be enjoyed the more, as newer and more unusual selections are better known because another season of music at Tanglewood has introduced new listening and aroused keener pleasure in the extent of today's musical media.

—Roxie E. Houghton

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000
SEP 2 1972

SUMMER CIRCUIT

BERKSHIRE/TANGLEWOOD MUSIC FESTIVAL—At Lenox, Mass: The most successful season in the 30-plus summers of this great Festival closed with a very special event—the first performance ever by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Mahler's Eighth Symphony. This so-called "Symphony of a Thousand" may not require quite that many performers, but the 500 or so who jammed the stage of the Music Shed were all kept very busy. Mahler's dense, complex, monumental choral symphony uses an enormous orchestra, several large and small choruses, and eight vocal soloists—performing separately, together en masse, and in endlessly varied counterpointed groupings. The work is in two parts—the first, a half hour setting of a hymn of praise in Latin; the second, an intricate near-oratorio setting in German of the last scene of Goethe's "Faust." As a confirmed Mahlerite, I found my own first live exposure to it exciting and interesting, but despite its scale and complexity and a few wonderful sections—especially the final earth- and soul-shattering moment—I was strangely unmoved. One is grateful to Seiji Ozawa for programming the Eighth, and for the rousing performance he brought forth from all concerned. While occasionally ragged, it offered a coherent sense of a remarkable work. —STANLEY NEWMAN

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
AUG 21 1972
New England Newsclip

Music Review

A Mighty Finale

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

SOME 12,884 people will not readily forget the thrilling conclusion of yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert, which marked the end of the 1972 Berkshire Festival. A great crowd, with more scattered about on the adjacent lawns than under the Shed, heard Seiji Ozawa conduct Mahler's mighty Eighth Symphony with masterful leadership and consistently exciting elan.

Mahler's eighth, the "Symphony of a Thousand," is geared for magnificence, and Ozawa realized every last atom of its eloquence. The first half is a setting to music of a medieval Latin hymn; the second, the closing scene of Goethe's drama "Faust." The tremendous Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, was assisted by the St. Paul's School Boy Choir, Theodore Marier, director, and eight sterling vocal soloists.

Two other Mahler symphonies were heard at Tanglewood this season but they, Nos. 5 and 6, are solely instrumental. The eighth, the last to be completed (Nos. 9 and 10 were in process when he died before his 51st birthday), makes use of vocal resources almost to the exclusion of orchestra.

* * *

MAHLER was a major operatic conductor and, although he never wrote anything for the theatre, this symphony is his most dramatic and monumental work. It owes its enormousness to a plea for the personal intervention of the Lord in favor of the sinner.

The first movement is giant chorale sung almost without cessation a voce piena. The second half gives the orchestra a narrative to relate underlying the utterances of the soloists' verses pertinent to the roles they portrayed. The stellar soloists were Deborah O'Brien, Linda Phillips, Susan Clickner, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, William Dooley and Ara Berberian.

At the close of the symphony, the Mater Gloriosa is given a short verse to sing and it was one of the most moving moments of the afternoon. Jane Bryden, placed on the platform in the rafters where the television cameras usually work, sang "Rise, thou, to Higher Spheres" not only with beautiful voice but in classic style. The text could not have been better suited to the station.

Offstage, but really in the southern corridor of the Shed, was placed a brass septet, four trumpets and three trombones, which also lent color to the closing pages of the symphony.

* * *

THE CLOSING scene from "Faust" is placed in mountain gorges, forest, rock and desert, and the Holy Anchorites, divided on ascending planes, are posted among the ravines. The only orchestral section occurs at the beginning of this half. The choral numbers which follow are descriptive and more restrained, becoming dramatically expressive.

Ozawa marshaled his forces as a victorious commander in the field, and the ovation accorded him at the finale from the orchestra and chorus was as much and as genuine as that rendered him by the audience.

* * *

SATURDAY'S program placed one of the season's most significant new works — new at least to Tanglewood, although it was composed in 1964 — between Mozart and Brahms. Michael Tilson Thomas gave Olivier Messiaen's "Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum" a thoroughly thought-out performance, although it is an extremely controversial work. Written for wind and percussion instruments only, it seeks to express the messages of five excerpts from Holy Scripture. The sonorities and resonances are convincing as well as novel.

For example, "Out of the depths have I cried unto Thee, O Lord," originates in the lowest registers of the trombones, and the tuba and the ensuing six horns, "crying from the abyss," sound in colored clusters, tremendously effective and suggestive of the text.

Messiaen calls for 36 wind instruments and six percussionists. At one point, an enormous gong, certainly seven feet in diameter, is sounded, and its volume is progressively increased until the decibel count surely exceeded anything ever before produced at Tanglewood short of an explosion of artillery or a bomb; yet it was a congruous element in the nature of the piece which often had Hindu relevance.

* * *

WHEN Messiaen conducted a seminar of composition at the Berkshire Music Center in 1949, his absorption in religious matters was a salient feature of his residence here. This example of his creative energies is intended primarily for performance outdoors. When the six percussionists apply themselves to their assigned tasks in support of the enlarged brass sections, the extreme tumult and turmoil become manic, yet a purpose can be discerned through it all, in which the uses of sound are explored and extended.

* * *

THOMAS began his evening with the Mozart D major symphony No. 31, K. 297, the so-called "Paris Symphony." He gave it an animated and sprightly reading, indicating details to the Boston Symphony men, probably more precise than was necessary continuously, but he did instill vivacity to the delightful three movements. It was fortunate there were no traffic cops around during the last movement, for they might have questioned whether he was exceeding the speed limit. The musicians, to be sure, took it in stride.

Misha Dichter in the first movement of the Brahms B flat piano concerto missed nearly everything but the notes. In the later three movements, he evinced an interest in content and the third was incomparably enhanced by Jules Eskin's performance of the exquisite cello solo of the introduct, but Dichter gave a performance in which marvelously controlled speed seemed to be the predominant factor.

* * *

OZAWA'S program Friday night didn't enlist the entire orchestra until after the intermission. The evening's opening was a contemporary work by Georgy Ligeti, "Melodien," for a very small orchestra, and the Chopin E minor piano concerto which followed still required but a moiety of the personnel. Only in Bartok's "The Miraculous Mandarin" was the full complement employed, and this was the stunner of the evening.

Alexis Weissenberg, the soloist in the Chopin, confirmed his previous impressions on the same stage as a most sensitive and fastidious artist. The Chopin, between two such many-stranded weavers as Ligeti and Bartok, seemed comparatively thin and transparent. There is an overlong orchestral introduction in which a pompous declaration is followed by a gracile and guileless contrasting theme, whereupon the soloist enters on balletic figures and decorations. These were achieved with consummate skill and taste by Weissenberg.

* * *

THERE could be no wider difference in purpose than between the Legeti and the Bartok. Ligeti creates an atmospheric watercolor changing as the descending sun paints clouds. There is a keen insight in orchestral color, but, paradoxically, the part-writing contributes to the whole but is not interesting of itself. Immoderately sustained tones in the violins are interrupted by arabesques and voluted ornaments. The effect is of pleasant, narcotic somnolence.

The "Mandarin," on the other hand, is a brutally vulgar work. The subject is sordid, and Bartok attacks it without any pretense of lenience. One must really be familiar with the ballet to realize what goes on. In the briefest resumé, it concerns the robbery by three brigands of the various clients that a young lady, acting as a decoy, entices to her lair. Bartok depicts the savagery with intensely realistic ferocity. The only relief comes when the girl by means of a supple charm, expressed once by a solo oboe and another time by a solo clarinet, attracts and lures passersby. Once the protagonist is caught in the arachnidian web all subterfuge is cast aside, and Bartok portrays his bandits with relentless fury and merciless vigor.

The performance was a tour de force for the orchestra and a triumph for the conductor.

Whitestone

Ozawa acknowledging plaudits at yesterday's concert.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 130,857
AUG 21 1972
New England Newsclip

Ozawa Ends Tanglewood Series

By DOROTHY STOWE
Times Music Critic

LENOX, Mass. — Seiji Ozawa, Boston Symphony's conductor who is a frail dynamo of energy and inspiration, achieved a resounding triumph at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon, as he led a powerfully moving performance of Mahler's Eighth Sympathy, the closing work of this season's shed series.

A crowd of almost 13,000, responding to the charms of beautiful music and fine weather, presented themselves at Tanglewood, and stayed afterwords to accord a long and justified ovation to all who performed.

Applause intensified for Ozawa, and for the superb Festival Chorus and Choir, which responded to his every demand with artistic unity and conviction. Special credit should go to their director, John Oliver, whole behind the scenes has prepared them so outstandingly several times during this season.

Thz full orchestra, augmented by extra timpany and brass, did masterfully its part in presenting this music, in which voices and instruments are interwoven almost inseparably in a marvelous paean of praise (Veni Creator Spiritus); and a plea for mercy and final triumphant vision of the glories of God's salvation, in the words of Goethe's Faust.

Neither voices nor instruments alone could achieve what they accomplish together in the inspired texture of this transcendent masterpiece by a master symphonist, and every-person on stage from Ozawa down to the smallest choir boy from St. Paul's School became a musician who reached beyond himself, and an instrument of God's peace.

The large assemblage of soloists performed with overall distinction. However, there are some tall orders for tonal opulence and projection, not to mention tessitura, among the solo passages of this symphony, and as might be expected some came off covered with more glory than others.

John Alexander was especially dependable and moving as Dr. Marianus. He rose to thrilling heights in his "Jungfrau, rein imschonsten Sinne." Thomas Dooley and Ara Berberian filled their music with intense meaning, as did Linda Phillips as Gretchen, a penitent. Deborah O'Brien (Miss Massachusetts of 1971) showed a promising voice but was occassionally in over her head with the cruel demands of her music.

NEWS
ATHOL, MASS.
D. 5,281
AUG 21 1972
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conductor Seiji Ozawa, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and eight soloists received a 10-minute ovation Sunday at the conclusion of the final concert of the 1972 Berkshire Festival.

To conclude the summer series, Ozawa conducted 300 musicians and singers in Mahler's Eighth Symphony.

The audience of 12,884 brought the summer total to 257,860, some 40,000 more than 1971, and a new record.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 16,200
AUG 21 1972
New England Newsclip

10-Minute Ovation For Seiji Ozawa

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conductor Seiji Ozawa, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and eight soloists received a 10-minute ovation Sunday at the conclusion of the final concert of the 1972 Berkshire Festival.

To conclude the summer series, Ozawa conducted 300 musicians and singers in Mahler's Eighth Symphony.

The audience of 12,884 brought the summer total to 257,860, some 40,000 more than 1971, and a new record.

BLANK PAGE

136

INDEPENDENT
WESTBORO, MASS.
W. 2,000

JUL 27 1972 New England Newsclip

1972 Festival Of Contemporary Music At Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS. —— The 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood takes place this year from August 4 through 10. The Festival, celebrating the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, is sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of Music) in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Often called a "Festival-within-a-Festival", the concerts turn Tanglewood into the contemporary music capital of the world during its intensive and exciting annual presentation of new and challenging works, some commissioned especially for the Festival, many heard in premiere performances. This season, the Festival of Contemporary Music will expand its program, and will include, among other highlights, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Festival of Contemporary Music opens this year at the beginning of the sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, August 4 to 7:00 p.m. with a special Weekend Prelude Concert devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, Chairman Emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Music to be performed is "Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson," with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtin (one of the 1972 Tanglewood Granrud Artists - in-Residence), and Mr. Copland as pianist; "Piano variations" with Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas as pianist; and "Vitebsk, study on a Jewish Theme" performed by Boston Symphony Chamber Players Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with Aaron Copland as pianist.

The 9:00 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Friday evening, August 4 in the Shed is conducted by the Orchestra's Associate Conductor niversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, takes place Tuesday evening, August 8 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Under the direction of conductors Bruno Maderna and Gunther Schuller (Artistic Director of the Berkshire Music Center), the ensemble performs Berio's "Circles," Carter's "Double concerto," Schuller's "Tre Invenzione" (a world premiere performance commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation in honor of its 20th Anniversary), and Maderna's "Giardino Religioso," also a world premiere performance commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation honoring its 20th Anniversary.

Wednesday evening, August 9 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, the Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music concert scheduled includes Imbrie's "To A Traveler," Kim's "rattling on...," Mather's "Cantata II," and Erb's "Brass quintet."

The final event of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music is a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert conducted by Bruno Maderna Thursday evening, August 10 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Mr. Maderna conducts the Orchestra in Webern's "Variations for Orchestra", Op. 30, Shinohara's "Piece for orchestra," the world premiere of Fred Lerdahl's "Chromorhythmos" (commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation), and, to conclude the concert, Druckman's "Windows."

All concerts are events of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood, requiring a $1.50 donation per concert or Friends membership card. The opening Festival concert on August 4 is a regular Berkshire Festival concert for which Berkshire Festival tickets are required.

Carnival Against Dystrophy

MARLBORO — A neighborhood carnival against Dystrophy will be held on August 2nd, at 1046 Hemenway Ext. Valerie Collins, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James E. Collins will serve as Ringmaster, assisted by Denise LeLievre, Jennifer Collins, Sharon Chambers, and friends.

The carnival, which begins at 1 o'clock, will feature such games as Mini Bike Rides ring toss, swimming pool, darts and balloons, sand box treasure hunt, etc., and all proceeds will go to aid the fight against dystrophy and related diseases afflicting millions.

The children got the idea for staging their event while watching TV personality Hex Trailer who is promoting Carnivals on his show seen on station WBZ-TV, Channel 4.

Last year, in cooperation with Muscular Dystrophy Associations of America, Greater Boston Chapter, more than 2000 Carnivals were held by children in Southeastern New England, and over $65,000 was raised for MDAA's research and patient service

L. grade 4.

"Mr. Barney's" — "A man who was lazy. he had a big long beard. A bird made a nest."
Kelly O'Mara, grade 1.

"What do they do" - "A little

Since May the group has been meeting in patrols to improve their camping skills and most recently spent 3 days at Camp Paloma in Hollision. In addition to studying the culture and history of England they have prepared information about New England and Scouting history in the U.S. To entertain their hosts the girls will take the film describing troop, day and resident camping in Bay Path Colonial Council and have prepared a musical program.

Their schedule in England will include a 10 day camp session with British Guides at a national site in Sussex, a visit to the British Girl Guides Headquarters and Hampton Court, residence of Lady Baden-Powell. The final 10 days will be spent with Girl Guide host families in Hertfordshire, just north of London.

Plans for this trip were begun when 21 British Guides and their adult adviser attended Camp Wabasso and visited in Bay Path Colonial Scout homes last summer.

Contemporary Music Festival Starts Friday at Tanglewood

THE SPRINGFIELD UNION
AMUSEMENTS
Tuesday, August 1, 1972

LENOX — The 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood takes place this year from August 4 through 10. The Festival, celebrating the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, is sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music) in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

"Capital of the World"

Often called a "Festival-within-a-Festival," the concerts turn Tanglewood into the contemporary music capital of the world during its intensive and exciting annual presentation of new and challenging works, some commissioned especially for the Festival, many heard in premiere performances.

This season, the Festival of Contemporary Music will expand its program, and will include, among other highlights, a concert by th Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Aaron Copland

The Festival of Contemporary Music opens this year at the beginning of the sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening at 7.00 p.m. with a special Weekend Prelude concert devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, Chairman Emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Music to be performed is Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson, with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtin (one of the 1972 Tanglewood Granrud Artists-in-Residence3, and Mr. Copland as pianist; Piano variations with Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas as pianist; and Vitebsk, study on a Jewish theme performed by Boston Symphony Chamber Players Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with Aaron Copland as pianist.

The 9.00 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Friday evening, August 4, in the Shed is conducted by the Orchestra's Associate Conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, with soloists soprano Phyllis Curtin, and violinist Paul Zukofsky. The concert opens with Carl Ruggles' Evocations for orchestr a (performed in memory of the composer), followed by the orchestral version of the Poems of Emily Dickinson by Aaron Copland, with soprano soloist Phyllis Curin. Paul Zukofsky next performs the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin and orchestra. The concerto was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation. The evening's concert concludes with Mr. Thomas conducting a performance of Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring, also played in memory of the composer

The festival of Contemporary Music continues through August 10 with a wide range of performances by Berkshire Music Center students, including vocal and chamber music programs, a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert, and performances by the Center's Music Theatre Project. There will also be a concert by Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Saturday, the Festival presents a Berkshire Music Center Vocal Music Recital at 2.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. The program includes Druckman's Dark Upon the Harp, Kim's Letters Found Near a Suicide, Powell's Haiku Settings, and Carter's Robert Frost Songs.

World Premieres

Sunday evening, at 8.30 p.m. in the West Barn, the Berkshire Music Center Music Theatre Project presents the world premiere of Robert Selig's Chocorua, commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation. Also to be performed on the same program is Brech-Weill's The Yes Man. Chocorua is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by the Boston Poet Richard Moore. Its story, derived from actual events of the eighteenth century, tells of Indian Chief Chocorua who stays behind in New Hampshire when his tribe emigrates northward, to mingle with the English settlers with tragic results.

August 7 at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presents a concert that includes Foss' Time Cycle (chamber version), Druckman's Valentine, Crumb's Madrigals, Books I and II, Pusztai's Nocturnes, and Davidovsky's Synchronisms No. 2.

The special Berkshire Music Center Chamber Ensemble concert honoring the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, takes place August 8 at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Under the direction of conductors Bruno Maderna and Gunther Schuller (Artistic Director of the Berkshire Music Center), the ensemble performs Berio's Circles, Carter's Double Concerto, Schuller's Tre Invenzione (a world premiere performance commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation in honor of its 20th Anniversary), and Maderna's Giardino Religioso, also a world premiere performance commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation honoring its 20th Anniversary.

August 9 at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, the Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music concert scheduled includes Imbrie's To A Traveler, Kim's rattling on. . ., Mather's Cantata II, and Erb's Brass quintet.

The final event of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music is a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert conducted by Bruno Maderna, August 10 at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Mr. Maderna conducts the Orchestra in Webern's Variations for Orchestra, Op. 30, Shinohara's Piece for orchestra, the world premiere of Fred Lerdahl's Chromorhythmos (commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation), and, to conclude the concert, Druckman's Windows.

All concerts are events of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood, requiring a $1.50 donation per concert or Friends membership card. The opening festival concert on August 4 is a regular Berkshire Festival concert for which Berkshire Festival tickets are required.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

AUG 1 1972 New England Newsclip

CHRONICLE
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
D. 8,500

JUL 29 1972 New England Newsclip

Contemporary music slated at Tanglewoood

LENOX: Mass. — The 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood takes place this year from Aug. 4 through 10.

The festival, celebrating the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, is sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music) in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

Often called a "Festival-within-a-Festival," the concerts turn Tanglewood into the contemporary music capital of the world during its intensive and exciting annual presentation of new and challenging works, some commissioned especially for the festival, many heard in premiere performances. This season, the festival of Contemporary Music will expand its program, and will include, among other highlights, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Festival of Contemporary Music opens this year at the beginning of the sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Aug. 4 at 7 p.m. with a special weekend prelude concert devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, chairman emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Music to be performed is "Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson," with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtin Zone of the 1972 Tanglewood Granrud Artists-in-Residence), and Copland as pianist; "Piano variations" with Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas as pianist; and "Vitebsk, study on a Jewish theme" performed by Boston Symphony Chamber Players Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with Aaron Copland as pianist.

The 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Aug. 4 in the Shed is conducted by Thomas. The concert opens with Carl Ruggles' 'Evocations for orchestra" followed by the orchestral version of the "Poems of Emily Dickinson" by Copland, with Mrs. Curtin.Paul Zukofsky next performs the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's "Concerto for amplified violin and orchestra." The concerto was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation. The evening's concert concludes with Thomas conducting aperformance of Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring."

The Festival continues through Aug. 10 with a wide range of performances by Berkshire Music Center students, including vocal and chamber music programs, a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert, and performances by the Center's Music Theatre Project. There will also be a concert by Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Aug. 5, the Festival presents a Berkshire Music Center Vocal Music Recital at 2:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. The program includes Druckman's "Dark Upon the Harp," Kim's "Letters Found Near a Suicide" Powell's "Haiku Settings," and Carter's "Robert Frost Songs."

Aug. 6 at 8G30 p.m. in the West Barn, the Berkshire Music Center Music Theatre Project presents the world premiere of Robert Selig's "Chocorua," commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation. Also to be performed on the same program is Brecht-Weill's "The Yes Man." "Chocorua" is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by the Boston Poet Richard Moore. Its story, derived from actual events of the eighteenth century, tells of Indian Chief Chocorua who stays behind in New Hampshire when his tribe emigrates northward, to mingle with the English settlers with tragic results.

Aug. 7 at 8:30 p.m. in the Tehatre-Concert Hall, Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony, presents a concert that includes Foss' "Time Cycle" (chamber version), Druckman's "Valentine," Crumb's "Madrigals," Books I and II, Pusztai's "Nocturnes," and Davidovsky's "Synchronisms no. 2."

The special Berkshire Music Center Chamber Ensemble concert honoring the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, takes place Aug. 8 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Under the direction of conductors Bruno Maderna and Gunther Schuller (Artistic Director of the Berkshire Music Center), the ensemble performs Berio's "Circles," Carter's "Double concerto," Schuller's "Tre Invenzione" (a world premiere performance commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation in honor of its 20th anniversary), and Maderna's "Giardino Religioso," also a world premiere.

Aug. 9 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, the Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music concert scheduled includes Imbrie's "To A Traveler," Kim's "rattling on...," Mather's "Cantala II," and Erb's "Brass quintet."

The final event of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music is a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert conducted by Maderna Aug. 10 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Maderna conducts the Orchestra in Webern's "Variations for Orchestra," Op. 30, Shinohara's "Piece for orchestra," the world premiere of Fred Lerdahl's "Chromorhythmos" (commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation).

VILLAGER
FREETOWN, MASS.
W. 1,350

AUG 3 1972 New England Newsclip

* * * * * * * * Bisym

1972 Festival Of Contemporary Music at ~~Tanglewood~~, Lennox, takes place Aug. 4 through 10. Festival celebrates 20th Anniversary of Fromm Music Foundation. Festival highlights include world premiere performances of Wuorinen, Selig, Lerdahl, Schuller, and Maderna.

INDEPENDENT
WESTBORO, MASS.
W. 2,000

JUL 27 1972

New England Newsclip

1972 Festival Of Contemporary Music At Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS. —— The 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood takes place this year from August 4 through 10. The Festival, celebrating the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, is sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of Music) in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Often called a "Festival-within-a-Festival", the concerts turn Tanglewood into the contemporary music capital of the world during its intensive and exciting annual presentation of new and challenging works, some commissioned especially for the Festival, many heard in premiere performances. This season, the Festival of Contemporary Music will expand its program, and will include, among other highlights, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Festival of Contemporary Music opens this year at the beginning of the sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, August 4 to 7:00 p.m. with a special Weekend Prelude Concert devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, Chairman Emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Music to be performed is "Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson," with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtin (one of the 1972 Tanglewood Granrud Artists - in-Residence), and Mr. Copland as pianist; "Piano variations" with Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas as pianist; and "Vitebsk, study on a Jewish Theme" performed by Boston Symphony Chamber Players Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with Aaron Copland as pianist.

The 9:00 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Friday evening, August 4 in the Shed is conducted by the Orchestra's Associate Conductor

niversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, takes place Tuesday evening, August 8 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Under the direction of conductors Bruno Maderna and Gunther Schuller (Artistic Director of the Berkshire Music Center), the ensemble performs Berio's "Circles," Carter's "Double concerto," Schuller's "Tre Invenzione" (a world premiere performance commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation in honor of its 20th Anniversary), and Maderna's "Giardino Religioso," also a world premiere performance commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation honoring its 20th Anniversary.

Wednesday evening, August 9 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, the Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music concert scheduled includes Imbrie's "To A Traveler," Kim's "rattling on...," Mather's "Cantata II," and Erb's "Brass quintet."

The final event of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music is a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert conducted by Bruno Maderna Thursday evening, August 10 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Mr. Maderna conducts the Orchestra in Webern's "Variations for Orchestra", Op. 30, Shinohara's "Piece for orchestra," the world premiere of Fred Lerdahl's "Chromorhythmos" (commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation), and, to conclude the concert, Druckman's "Windows."

All concerts are events of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood, requiring a $1.50 donation per concert or Friends membership card. The opening Festival concert on August 4 is a regular Berkshire Festival concert for which Berkshire Festival tickets are required.

Contemporary Music Festival Starts Friday at Tanglewood

THE SPRINGFIELD UNION
AMUSEMENTS
Tuesday, August 1, 1972

LENOX — The 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood takes place this year from August 4 through 10. The Festival, celebrating the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, is sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music) in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

"Capital of the World"

Often called a "Festival-within-a-Festival," the concerts turn Tanglewood into the contemporary music capital of the world during its intensive and exciting annual presentation of new and challenging works, some commissioned especially for the Festival, many heard in premiere performances.

This season, the Festival of Contemporary Music will expand its program, and will include, among other highlights, a concert by th Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Aaron Copland

The Festival of Contemporary Music opens this year at the beginning of the sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening at 7.00 p.m. with a special Weekend Prelude concert devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, Chairman Emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Music to be performed is Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson, with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtin (one of the 1972 Tanglewood Granrud Artists-in-Residence3, and Mr. Copland as pianist; Piano variations with Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas as pianist; and Vitebsk, study on a Jewish theme performed by Boston Symphony Chamber Players Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with Aaron Copland as pianist.

The 9.00 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Friday evening, August 4, in the Shed is conducted by the Orchestra's Associate Conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, with soloists soprano Phyllis Curtin, and violinist Paul Zukofsky. The concert opens with Carl Ruggles' Evocations for orchestr a (performed in memory of the composer), followed by the orchestral version of the Poems of Emily Dickinson by Aaron Copland, with soprano soloist Phyllis Curin. Paul Zukofsky next performs the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin and orchestra. The concerto was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation. The evening's concert concludes with Mr. Thomas conducting a performance of Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring, also played in memory of the composer

The festival of Contemporary Music continues through August 10 with a wide range of performances by Berkshire Music Center students, including vocal and chamber music programs, a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert, and performances by the Center's Music Theatre Project. There will also be a concert by Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Saturday, the Festival presents a Berkshire Music Center Vocal Music Recital at 2.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. The program includes Druckman's Dark Upon the Harp, Kim's Letters Found Near a Suicide, Powell's Haiku Settings, and Carter's Robert Frost Songs.

World Premieres

Sunday evening, at 8.30 p.m. in the West Barn, the Berkshire Music Center Music Theatre Project presents the world premiere of Robert Selig's Chocorua, commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation. Also to be performed on the same program is Brech-Weill's The Yes Man. Chocorua is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by the Boston Poet Richard Moore. Its story, derived from actual events of the eighteenth century, tells of Indian Chief Chocorua who stays behind in New Hampshire when his tribe emigrates northward, to mingle with the English settlers with tragic results.

August 7 at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presents a concert that includes Foss' Time Cycle (chamber version), Druckman's Valentine, Crumb's Madrigals, Books I and II, Pusztai's Nocturnes, and Davidovsky's Synchronisms No. 2.

The special Berkshire Music Center Chamber Ensemble concert honoring the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, takes place August 8 at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Under the direction of conductors Bruno Maderna and Gunther Schuller (Artistic Director of the Berkshire Music Center), the ensemble performs Berio's Circles, Carter's Double Concerto, Schuller's Tre Invenzione (a world premiere performance commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation in honor of its 20th Anniversary), and Maderna's Giardino Religioso, also a world premiere performance commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation honoring its 20th Anniversary.

August 9 at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, the Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music concert scheduled includes Imbrie's To A Traveler, Kim's rattling on. . ., Mather's Cantata II, and Erb's Brass quintet.

The final event of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music is a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert conducted by Bruno Maderna, August 10 at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Mr. Maderna conducts the Orchestra in Webern's Variations for Orchestra, Op. 30, Shinohara's Piece for orchestra, the world premiere of Fred Lerdahl's Chromorhythmos (commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation), and, to conclude the concert, Druckman's Windows.

All concerts are events of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood, requiring a $1.50 donation per concert or Friends membership card. The opening festival concert on August 4 is a regular Berkshire Festival concert for which Berkshire Festival tickets are required.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

AUG 1 1972

New England Newsclip

137

CHRONICLE
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
D. 8,500

JUL 29 1972

New England Newsclip

Contemporary music slated at Tanglewoood

LENOX: Mass. — The 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood takes place this year from Aug. 4 through 10.

The festival, celebrating the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, is sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music) in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

Often called a "Festival-within-a-Festival," the concerts turn Tanglewood into the contemporary music capital of the world during its intensive and exciting annual presentation of new and challenging works, some commissioned especially for the festival, many heard in premiere performances. This season, the festival of Contemporary Music will expand its program, and will include, among other highlights, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Festival of Contemporary Music opens this year at the beginning of the sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Aug. 4 at 7 p.m. with a special weekend prelude concert devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, chairman emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Music to be performed is "Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson," with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtin Zone of the 1972 Tanglewood Granrud Artists-in-Residence), and Copland as pianist; "Piano variations" with Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas as pianist; and "Vitebsk, study on a Jewish theme" performed by Boston Symphony Chamber Players Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with Aaron Copland as pianist.

The 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Aug. 4 in the Shed is conducted by Thomas. The concert opens with Carl Ruggles' 'Evocations for orchestra" followed by the orchestral version of the "Poems of Emily Dickinson" by Copland, with Mrs. Curtin.Paul Zukofsky next performs the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's "Concerto for amplified violin and orchestra." The concerto was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation. The evening's concert concludes with Thomas conducting aperformance of Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring."

The Festival continues through Aug. 10 with a wide range of performances by Berkshire Music Center students, including vocal and chamber music programs, a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert, and performances by the Center's Music Theatre Project. There will also be a concert by Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Aug. 5, the Festival presents a Berkshire Music Center Vocal Music Recital at 2:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. The program includes Druckman's "Dark Upon the Harp," Kim's "Letters Found Near a Suicide" Powell's "Haiku Settings," and Carter's "Robert Frost Songs."

Aug. 6 at 8G30 p.m. in the West Barn, the Berkshire Music Center Music Theatre Project presents the world premiere of Robert Selig's "Chocorua," commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation. Also to be performed on the same program is Brecht-Weill's "The Yes Man." "Chocorua" is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by the Boston Poet Richard Moore. Its story, derived from actual events of the eighteenth century, tells of Indian Chief Chocorua who stays behind in New Hampshire when his tribe emigrates northward, to mingle with the English settlers with tragic results.

Aug. 7 at 8:30 p.m. in the Tehatre-Concert Hall, Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony, presents a concert that includes Foss' "Time Cycle" (chamber version), Druckman's "Valentine," Crumb's "Madrigals," Books I and II, Pusztai's "Nocturnes," and Davidovsky's "Synchronisms no. 2."

The special Berkshire Music Center Chamber Ensemble concert honoring the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, takes place Aug. 8 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Under the direction of conductors Bruno Maderna and Gunther Schuller (Artistic Director of the Berkshire Music Center), the ensemble performs Berio's "Circles," Carter's "Double concerto," Schuller's "Tre Invenzione" (a world premiere performance commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation in honor of its 20th anniversary), and Maderna's "Giardino Religioso," also a world premiere.

Aug. 9 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, the Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music concert scheduled includes Imbrie's "To A Traveler," Kim's "rattling on...," Mather's "Cantala II," and Erb's "Brass quintet."

The final event of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music is a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert conducted by Maderna Aug. 10 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Maderna conducts the Orchestra in Webern's "Variations for Orchestra," Op. 30, Shinohara's "Piece for orchestra," the world premiere of Fred Lerdahl's "Chromorhythmos" (commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation).

VILLAGER
FREETOWN, MASS.
W. 1,350

AUG 3 1972

New England Newsclip

* * * * * * * * Bi Sym

1972 Festival Of Contemporary Music at ~~Tanglewood~~, Lennox, takes place Aug. 4 through 10. Festival celebrates 20th Anniversary of Fromm Music Foundation. Festival highlights include world premiere performances of Wuorinen, Selig, Lerdahl, Schuller, and Maderna.

Carnival Against Dystrophy

MARLBORO — A neighborhood carnival against Dystrophy will be held on August 2nd, at 1046 Hemenway Ext. Valerie Collins, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James E. Collins will serve as Ringmaster, assisted by Denise LeClerc, Jennifer Collins, Sharon Chambers, and friends.

The carnival, which begins at 1 o'clock, will feature such games as Mini Bike Rides ring toss, swimming pool, darts and balloons, sand box treasure hunt, etc., and all proceeds will go to aid the fight against dystrophy and related diseases afflicting millions.

The children got the idea for staging their event while watching TV personality Rex Trailer who is promoting Carnivals on his show seen on station WBZ-TV, Channel 4.

Last year, in cooperation with Muscular Dystrophy Associations of America, Greater Boston Chapter, more than 2000 Carnivals were held by children in Southeastern New England, and over $65,000 was raised for MDAA's research and patient service

L. grade 4.

"Mr. Barney's" — "A man who was lazy, he had a big long beard. A bird made a nest."
Kelly O'Mara, grade 1.

"What do they do" - "A little

Since May the group has been meeting in patrols to improve their camping skills and most recently spent 3 days at Camp Patoma in Hollston. In addition to studying the culture and history of England they have prepared information about New England and Scouting history in the U.S. To entertain their hosts the girls will take the film describing troop, day and resident camping in Bay Path Colonial Council and have prepared a musical program.

Their schedule in England will include a 10 day camp session with British Guides at a national site in Sussex, a visit to the British Girl Guides Headquarters and Hampton Court, residence of Lady Baden-Powell. The final 10 days will be spent with Girl Guide host families in Hertfordshire, just north of London.

Plans for this trip were begun when 21 British Guides and their adult adviser attended Camp Wabasso and visited in Bay Path Colonial Scout homes last summer.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Contemporary Music Festival Starts Friday at Tanglewood

INDEPENDENT
WESTBORO, MASS.
W. 2,000

JUL 27 1972 New England Newsclip

1972 Festival Of Contemporary Music At Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS. —— The 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood takes place this year from August 4 through 10. The Festival, celebrating the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, is sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of Music) in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Often called a "Festival-within-a-Festival", the concerts turn Tanglewood into the contemporary music capital of the world during its intensive and exciting annual presentation of new and challenging works, some commissioned especially for the Festival, many heard in premiere performances. This season, the Festival of Contemporary Music will expand its program, and will include, among other highlights, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Festival of Contemporary Music opens this year at the beginning of the sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, August 4 to 7:00 p.m. with a special Weekend Prelude Concert devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, Chairman Emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Music to be performed is "Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson," with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtin (one of the 1972 Tanglewood Granrud Artists - in-Residence), and Mr. Copland as pianist; "Piano variations" with Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas as pianist; and "Vitebsk, study on a Jewish Theme" performed by Boston Symphony Chamber Players Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with Aaron Copland as pianist.

The 9:00 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Friday evening, August 4 in the Shed is conducted by the Orchestra's Associate Conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, with soloists soprano Phyllis Curtin, and violinist Paul Zukofsky. The concert opens with Carl Ruggles' "Evocations for orchestra" (performed in memory of the composer), followed by the orchestral version of the "Poems of Emily Dickinson" by Aaron Copland, with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtin. Paul Zukofsky next performs the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's "Concert for amplified violin and orchestra." The concerto was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation. The evening's concert concludes with Mr. Thomas conducting a performance of Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring," also played in memory of the composer.

The Festival of Contemporary Music continues through August 10 with a wide range of performances by Berkshire Music Center students, including vocal and chamber music programs, a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert, and performances by the Center's Music Theatre Project. There will also be a concert by Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Saturday, the Festival presents a Berkshire Music Center Vocal Music Recital at 2.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. The program includes Druckman's Dark Upon the Harp, Kim's Letters Found Near a Suicide, Powell's Haiku Settings, and Carter's Robert Frost Songs.

World Premieres

Sunday evening, at 8.30 p.m. in the West Barn, the Berkshire Music Center Music Theatre Project presents the world premiere of Robert Selig's Chocorua, commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation. Also to be performed on the same program is Brech-Weill's The Yes Man. Chocorua is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by the Boston Poet Richard Moore. Its story, derived from actual events of the eighteenth century, tells of Indian Chief Chocorua who stays behind in New Hampshire when his tribe emigrates northward, to mingle with the English settlers with tragic results.

August 7 at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presents a concert that includes Foss' Time Cycle (chamber version), Druckman's Valentine, Crumb's Madrigals, Books I and II, Pusztai's Nocturnes, and Davidovsky's Synchronisms No. 2.

The special Berkshire Music Center Chamber Ensemble concert honoring the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, takes place August 8 at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Under the direction of conductors Bruno Maderna and Gunther Schuller (Artistic Director of the Berkshire Music Center), the ensemble performs Berio's Circles, Carter's Double Concerto, Schuller's Tre Invenzione (a world premiere performance commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation in honor of its 20th Anniversary), and Maderna's Giardino Religioso, also a world premiere performance commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation honoring its 20th Anniversary.

August 9 at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, the Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music concert scheduled includes Imbrie's To A Traveler, Kim's rattling on. . ., Mather's Cantata II, and Erb's Brass quintet.

The final event of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music is a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert conducted by Maderna Aug. 10 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Maderna conducts the Orchestra in Webern's Variations for Orchestra, Op. 30, Shinohara's Piece for orchestra, the world premiere of Fred Lerdahl's Chromorhythmos (commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation), and, to conclude the concert, Druckman's Windows.

All concerts are events of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood, requiring a $1.50 donation per concert or Friends membership card. The opening Festival concert on August 4 is a regular Berkshire Festival concert for which Berkshire Festival tickets are required.

THE SPRINGFIELD UNION
AMUSEMENTS

Tuesday, August 1, 1972

LENOX — The 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood takes place this year from August 4 through 10. The Festival, celebrating the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, is sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music) in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

"Capital of the World"

Often called a "Festival-within-a-Festival," the concerts turn Tanglewood into the contemporary music capital of the world during its intensive and exciting annual presentation of new and challenging works, some commissioned especially for the Festival, many heard in premiere performances.

This season, the Festival of Contemporary Music will expand its program, and will include, among other highlights, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Aaron Copland

The Festival of Contemporary Music opens this year at the beginning of the sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening at 7.00 p.m. with a special Weekend Prelude concert devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, Chairman Emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Music to be performed is Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson, with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtin (one of the 1972 Tanglewood Granrud Artists-in-Residence3, and Mr. Copland as pianist; Piano variations with Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas as pianist; and Vitebsk, study on a Jewish theme performed by Boston Symphony Chamber Players Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with Aaron Copland as pianist.

The 9.00 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Friday evening, August 4, in the Shed is conducted by the Orchestra's Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, with soloists soprano Phyllis Curtin, and violinist Paul Zukofsky. The concert opens with Carl Ruggles' "Evocations for orchestra" (performed in memory of the composer), followed by the orchestral version of the "Poems of Emily Dickinson" by Aaron Copland, with soprano soloist Phyllis Curin. Paul Zukofsky next performs the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin and orchestra. The concerto was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation. The evening's concert concludes with Mr. Thomas conducting a performance of Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring, also played in memory of the composer

The festival of Contemporary Music continues through August 10 with a wide range of performances by Berkshire Music Center students, including vocal and chamber music programs, a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert, and performances by the Center's Music Theatre Project. There will also be a concert by Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Saturday, the Festival presents a Berkshire Music Center Vocal Music Recital at 2.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. The program includes Druckman's Dark Upon the Harp, Kim's Letters Found Near a Suicide, Powell's Haiku Settings, and Carter's Robert Frost Songs.

World Premieres

Sunday evening, at 8.30 p.m. in the West Barn, the Berkshire Music Center Music Theatre Project presents the world premiere of Robert Selig's Chocorua, commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation. Also to be performed on the same program is Brech-Weill's The Yes Man. Chocorua is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by the Boston Poet Richard Moore. Its story, derived from actual events of the eighteenth century, tells of Indian Chief Chocorua who stays behind in New Hampshire when his tribe emigrates northward, to mingle with the English settlers with tragic results.

August 7 at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presents a concert that includes Foss' Time Cycle (chamber version), Druckman's Valentine, Crumb's Madrigals, Books I and II, Pusztai's Nocturnes, and Davidovsky's Synchronisms No. 2.

The special Berkshire Music Center Chamber Ensemble concert honoring the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, takes place August 8 at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Under the direction of conductors Bruno Maderna and Gunther Schuller (Artistic Director of the Berkshire Music Center), the ensemble performs Berio's Circles, Carter's Double Concerto, Schuller's Tre Invenzione (a world premiere performance commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation in honor of its 20th Anniversary), and Maderna's Giardino Religioso, also a world premiere performance commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation honoring its 20th Anniversary.

August 9 at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, the Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music concert scheduled includes Imbrie's To A Traveler, Kim's rattling on. . ., Mather's Cantata II, and Erb's Brass quintet.

The final event of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music is a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert conducted by Maderna Aug. 10 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Maderna conducted by Bruno Maderna, August 10 at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Mr. Maderna conducts the Orchestra in Webern's Variations for Orchestra, Op. 30, Shinohara's Piece for orchestra, the world premiere of Fred Lerdahl's Chromorhythmos (commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation), and, to conclude the concert, Druckman's Windows.

All concerts are events of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood, requiring a $1.50 donation per concert or Friends membership card. The opening festival concert on August 4 is a regular Berkshire Festival concert for which Berkshire Festival tickets are required.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

AUG 1 1972 New England Newsclip

CHRONICLE
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
D. 8,500

JUL 29 1972 New England Newsclip

Contemporary music slated at Tanglewoood

LENOX: Mass. — The 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood takes place this year from Aug. 4 through 10.

The festival, celebrating the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, is sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music) in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

Often called a "Festival-within-a-Festival," the concerts turn Tanglewood into the contemporary music capital of the world during its intensive and exciting annual presentation of new and challenging works, some commissioned especially for the festival, many heard in premiere performances. This season, the festival of Contemporary Music will expand its program, and will include, among other highlights, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Festival of Contemporary Music opens this year at the beginning of the sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Aug. 4 at 7 p.m. with a special weekend prelude concert devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, chairman emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Music to be performed is "Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson," with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtin Zone of the 1972 Tanglewood Granrud Artists-in-Residence), and Copland as pianist; "Piano variations" with Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas as pianist; and "Vitebsk, study on a Jewish theme" performed by Boston Symphony Chamber Players Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with Aaron Copland as pianist.

The 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Aug. 4 in the Shed is conducted by Thomas. The concert opens with Carl Ruggles' 'Evocations for orchestra" followed by the orchestral version of the "Poems of Emily Dickinson" by Copland, with Mrs. Curtin.Paul Zukofsky next performs the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's "Concerto for amplified violin and orchestra." The concerto was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation. The evening's concert concludes with Thomas conducting aperformance of Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring."

The Festival continues through Aug. 10 with a wide range of performances by Berkshire Music Center students, including vocal and chamber music programs, a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert, and performances by the Center's Music Theatre Project. There will also be a concert by Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Aug. 5, the Festival presents a Berkshire Music Center Vocal Music Recital at 2:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. The program includes Druckman's "Dark Upon the Harp," Kim's "Letters Found Near a Suicide" Powell's "Haiku Settings," and Carter's "Robert Frost Songs."

Aug. 6 at 8G30 p.m. in the West Barn, the Berkshire Music Center Music Theatre Project presents the world premiere of Robert Selig's "Chocorua," commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation. Also to be performed on the same program is Brecht-Weill's "The Yes Man." "Chocorua" is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by the Boston Poet Richard Moore. Its story, derived from actual events of the eighteenth century, tells of Indian Chief Chocorua who stays behind in New Hampshire when his tribe emigrates northward, to mingle with the English settlers with tragic results.

Aug. 7 at 8:30 p.m. in the Tehatre-Concert Hall, Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony, presents a concert that includes Foss' "Time Cycle" (chamber version), Druckman's "Valentine," Crumb's "Madrigals," Books I and II, Pusztai's "Nocturnes," and Davidovsky's "Synchronisms no. 2."

The special Berkshire Music Center Chamber Ensemble concert honoring the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, takes place Aug. 8 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Under the direction of conductors Bruno Maderna and Gunther Schuller (Artistic Director of the Berkshire Music Center), the ensemble performs Berio's "Circles," Carter's "Double concerto," Schuller's "Tre Invenzione" (a world premiere performance commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation in honor of its 20th anniversary), and Maderna's "Giardino Religioso," also a world premiere.

Aug. 9 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, the Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music concert scheduled includes Imbrie's "To A Traveler," Kim's "rattling on...," Mather's "Cantala II," and Erb's "Brass quintet."

The final event of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music is a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert conducted by Maderna Aug. 10 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Maderna conducts the Orchestra in Webern's "Variations for Orchestra," Op. 30, Shinohara's "Piece for orchestra," the world premiere of Fred Lerdahl's "Chromorhythmos" (commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation).

VILLAGER
FREETOWN, MASS.
W. 1,350

AUG 3 1972 New England Newsclip

 Bisym

1972 Festival Of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, Lennox, takes place Aug. 4 through 10. Festival celebrates 20th Anniversary of Fromm Music Foundation. Festival highlights include world premiere performances of Wuorinen, Selig, Lerdahl, Schuller, and Maderna.

138

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO
D. 176,688 SUN. 200,492

JUN 11 1972

The World Of Music

A Toast—With Wine—To Paul Fromm And His Work

5454 - Tanglewood

By BORIS NELSON
Blade Music Critic

A man celebrating the birthday of his own foundation shouldn't make any special ripples. But Paul Fromm, founder-director of the Fromm Music Foundation, which celebrated its 20th birthday in April, is the kind of man and his foundation the kind of tangible public-spirited devotion to music which mark the exceptions to the proverbial rule.

I first met Paul Fromm rather casually; we bumped into each other at a crowded reception for Igor Stravinsky who was the honored composer at a week's festival at Oberlin College some years ago. We got into a fascinating conversation, and only afterward introduced ourselves to each other.

I have had many occasions since then to see him, talk with him, listen to him, and grow in my respect for his deeply felt interest in contemporary music and musicians and in my affection for this most affable man.

Who is Paul Fromm?

A 65-year-old, independent Chicago wine merchant who emigrated to the United States in 1938. Long before then, in central Europe, it seemed inconceivable to him that "at a time when painters and poets were expressing themselves in new ways, composers would sustain the status quo in an art which through the centuries seemed always to be in a state of renewal."

It was in 1927, so Fromm recalls, that he first heard Stravinsky's music and something happened to his thinking. But it was not until he arrived in America, that — interested in its music and musical life — "I became concerned about the anomalous position that the composer occupies in American society.

"Finally, in 1952, I decided to make my own contribution to the musical scene, and thus the Fromm Music Foundation came into existence."

★ ★ ★

Its purpose? To restore to the contemporary composer his rightful place at the center of musical life.

Not highly structured like large institutional foundations,

FROM LEFT, MRS. SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, FROMM, MICHAEL TILSON
Great conductor's widow and associate conductor of Boston Symphony compare notes with benefactor at Tanglewood concert

Among them are Milton Babbitt, Arthur Berger, Luciano Berio, Easley Blackwood, Elliott Carter, Michael Colgrass, Ingolf Dahl, Mario Davidovsky, David Diamond, John Eaton, Irving Fine, Lukas Foss, Richard Felciano, Alberto Ginastera, Alan Hovhaness, Andrew Imbrie.

Leon Kirchner, Ellis Kohs, Barbara Kolb, Ernst Krenek, Bruno Maderna, Bohuslav Martinu, Harry Partch, Oedoen Partos, Wallingford Riegger, George Rochberg, Murray Schafer, Gunther Schuller, Roger Sessions, Seymour Shifrin, Stanley Silverman, Halsey Stevens, Stefan Wolpe, Charles Wuorinen, and many other lesser - known names.

★ ★ ★

Wisely, Paul Fromm is aware of the fact that all music is modern in its own time, and that music as an art will cease to exist if a living flow of musical creation no longer reaches a concerned and interested public. Thus musical creation and performance are inseparable.

Realizing this, Fromm has provided forums for these creations, by sponsoring concerts and festivals jointly with institutions, colleges, and universities.

As Fromm says: "The emphasis is always on what Boulez has called 'exploration,' the mutual discovery of new works, new forms, new means of musical expression."

Under this sponsorship there have been concerts at New York's Metropolitan Museum of Art, with Leopold Stokowski; in Chicago's Goodman Theater and at the Universities of Chicago and Illinois; Vermont's Marlboro Festival; at Mills College in Oakland, Calif.; at Northwestern University in Evanston, Ill.; the Library of Congress; Los Angeles; Boston's New England Conservatory of Music, and so on.

Another activity in behalf of contemporary music has been the joint sponsorship since 1956 by the Fromm Foundation and the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood of an annual Contemporary Music Festival, a festival within a summer festival. Commissioned works are performed and a number of young performers are awarded fellowships, which permit them to study contemporary music. Altogether, a total of 312 such fellowships have been awarded.

The example took hold, for other such ensembles have been founded, some by former Fromm fellows, among them Collage, an ensemble of the Boston Symphony; the Dorian Woodwind Quintet, and the Lenox Quartet.

★ ★ ★

In 1969 and 1970, Fromm also sponsored music critics' institutes at Tanglewood, a project administered by the Music Critics Association, both of which I have been very much involved with. Six young critics spent three weeks at Tanglewood — listening, consulting with composers and performers, holding daily meetings with senior critics, and writing daily reviews for analysis at daily seminars. The success of this venture has led to the establishment of similar institutes this summer at Washington's Kennedy Center and other performing arts centers.

In 1957, yet another project was explored, that of recording some of these new works, so that a listener could hear it repeatedly and learn to meet it on its own terms. Some 45 works thus found permanency on disks.

The Fromm Foundation also initiated a radio series, "Composers on Composers," produced jointly with Chicago station WFMT, first broadcast in 1960, repeated in 1965, and ultimately disseminated nationwide via the National Association of Educational Broadcasters. While some composers speak about themselves, there is Arthur Berger on Stravinsky, Babbitt on Schoenberg, Ross Lee Finney on Alban Berg, Lopatnikoff on Hindemith, Krenek on Bebern, among others.

In 1959 and 1960, Fromm sponsored, jointly with Princeton University, seminars in advanced musical studies, emphasizing the musical sensibilities of the day. Roger Sessions directed the seminars, assisted by a distinguished faculty.

"Perspectives of New Music," a periodical, was the direct outgrowth of these seminars.

Published by the Princeton University Press for the Fromm Foundation, first in the fall of 1962, it surveyed the contemporary music scene in depth. The fall of 1972 will unfortunately see its demise. Articles from it and seminar lectures have been published in book form — four such volumes to date — by W. W. Norton.

★ ★ ★

Paul Fromm has done heroic work in behalf of contemporary music because he loves the art and has an abiding faith in its progress.

There are many instances of personal interest and an ever-present warmth of a wonderful human being who smiles easily, and who has turned into an astute music patron and critic. (He plays the piano quite well, I am told).

With traces of his Bavarian ancestry in his rich English vocabulary, he would be the first to deny it, but composers, performers, conductors, and even critics agree that Paul Fromm has become a powerful force in the contemporary musical scene.

He is on the side of the angels, but he stands uncompromisingly aside the disciplined, intellectual, challenging composer and he resents — as do we all — the prevalent accent on the glamorous "star" performer.

And he has a right, despite his old-world formality and honest humility, to fret about the state of affairs, for, putting it bluntly, he puts his money where his mouth, his heart is.

He deeply loves music. "The most beautiful thing about music is that it says something tremendously meaningful, though it cannot be translated into words, about the pulsing of time."

When Stravinsky first met Paul Fromm, who had ordered coffee, Stravinsky canceled the order and requested champagne, the best in the house. "I want to know you," he said, "because contemporary music has many friends, but only a few lovers."

And so, how does Paul Fromm, the music lover, celebrate the 20th anniversary of his foundation? He sponsors a concert at the University of Chicago, having commissioned Roger Sessions to write a new work.

And when he was presented, at that event, with a volume of 78 letters from his composer friends, his reply pegged his philosophy: "What is created in our midst is so much more important than what has gone before, however much we enjoy the past."

Let's all drink a salute with wine — Paul Fromm's, to be sure — to an enlightened private citizen, who devotes himself to helping living composers go on living and to getting their music performed, heard, and understood.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 500,118 SUN. 657,560

JUL 3 1972

Bridging the New Music Gap

Crosscurrents

By Alan M. Kriegsman

The time is ripe for a salute to the Fromm Music Foundation, which is celebrating its 20th anniversary this year. Under the vigorous and enlightened leadership of 65-year-old Paul Fromm, a wine merchant by trade, this small organization has made a contribution that can only be described as vast. Its imaginative, wise and remarkably diverse programs of support have been a cardinal factor in the growth and vitality of contemporary music in the United States over two densely packed decades.

In a modest little booklet reviewing the foundation's activities, Fromm states that the primary objective has been "to bridge the gap that exists between contemporary composers and society."

To achieve this laudable aim, the foundation has awarded nearly 100 commissions to composers, both known and unknown; given over 300 fellowships to performers concerned with contemporary idioms; co-sponsored, since 1956, the annual Tanglewood Festivals of Contemporary Music; presented more than a score of landmark concerts featuring notable premieres; published the nation's only serious journal exclusively devoted to 20th century music, "Perspectives of New Music"; organized seminars involving composers, performers, critics and teachers; and made possible a sizable number of recordings and radio broadcasts which have helped to disseminate new music to a broad audience.

To mark the current anniversary, three special concerts will be offered this year under foundation auspices, for which new works were commissioned from Gunther Schuller, Roger Sessions, Charles Wuorinen and Bruno Maderna. Coming up in this series, on Aug. 4, will be a program by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas.

"Selfless devotion" may be an overworked and easily abused phrase, but in the case of Paul Fromm it is the only one that seems both accurate and fitting. And the way he has gone about distributing the foundation's considerable largesse affords some lessons in intelligent philanthropy that might well be studied by others in the field.

"Rather than entrusting policies and programs to an administrative staff, committees or trustees, we have actively involved as advisers in our work some of the most eminent members of the musical community," Fromm writes. "Their concerns, opinions and suggestions have guided us in all our efforts." What a bright and wholesome departure. Many grant-giving institutions in the arts, of course, "consult" artists in the course of their deliberations. The Fromm Foundation, in effect, has put the actual decision-making into the hands of artists. The approach has its obvious dangers, but equally obvious and treasurable benefits as well.

Also unusual is the very nature of the Fromm Foundation programs. "Rather than subsidizing institutions or supporting other, even more anonymous aspects of culture, the Fromm Foundation has chosen to focus its programs on individual artists, individual works and individual musical situations," Fromm wrtes. It is probably this policy, more than any other, that has magnified the effect of Fromm projects so far beyond the mere dollar amounts bestowed or the number of grants given.

It is Fromm's conviction that "the increasing imbalance between artistic and commercial values" has been largely responsible for the notorious gulf between the public and contemporary music. While this may be true in part, it is not the whole story.

Though Fromm declines to say so, there's no denying that some of the fault lies with composers, many of whom have become increasingly inbred and elitist in outlook, and excessively academic or abstruse in their methods.

Milton Babbitt's celebrated "Who cares if you listen" dictum, after all, is only a reflection of that "brass curtain" which has separated music-makers from music-lovers more and more since the end of the 19th century, bringing a return of the ivory tower concept almost as reflex, as composers strive to defend and justify their professional roles.

It is greatly to the credit of the Fromm Foundation that it has done its best to dismantle such barriers by attacking the problem at both ends and in the middle. It has tried to spread its commissions across as broad a spectrum of contemporary styles as possible, from radical to conservative, embracing works as divergent as Michael Colgrass' "As Quiet As," Ginastera's "Cantata Para America Magica," Harry Partch's "The Bewitched," Lukas Foss' "Echoi," Stanley Silverman's "Elephant Steps," and Babbitt's "Vision and Prayer."

There has also been a recognition that commissioning by itself isn't enough, that for new music to have any meaning for a nonprofessional public, the act of composition must be followed up by preparation of scores and parts, by assured performances in inviting contexts, by publication and recording. All of these functions have been heavily supported by Fromm.

The result has been that again and again, one project has touched off another, often supported by different auspices—chain reactions, of a particularly fruitful sort, set in. From the Fromm-supported Princeton Seminars in contemporary music under Roger Sessions in 1959 and 1960 came the invaluable periodical, "Perspectives of New Music." From the Fromm Fellowships in performance at Tanglewood have come such notable professional ensembles as the Dorian Woodwind Quintent and the Lenox String Quartet.

Looking toward the future, Fromm now feels that the foundation's activities have outgrown the one-man operation that has served it so well in the past. "We must move on to a new era, in which the Foundation must be able to exist independently of any one individual," he writes. To assure the organization's stability and strength beyond his own lifetime, therefore, Fromm has agreed to a new liaison with Harvard University, which will henceforth become the active headquarters. Starting Sept. 1 of this year, the foundation will be renamed "The Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard University," under the tripartite direction of Fromm, composer Gunther Schuller and musical scholar A. Tillman Merritt.

In addition, the Foundation will relinquish its 10-year-old subsidy of "Perspectives," and establish instead a new annual music journal which will concern itself with "music as an art, not a science." To insure a less abstruse and fictionalist periodical than "Perspectives" sometimes tended to be, each issue of the new publication will have a different editor.

It is heartening to know that continuity of effort will now be guaranteed, but also a bit sad to note the passing of the singularly personal, fervent outfit of old. In closing his pamphlet, Fromm quotes John Maynard Keynes: "The task of an official body in the arts is not to teach or censor, but to give courage, confidence and opportunity to artists." One can only hope that the foundation in its new basis will remain as mindful of those words in years to come as Paul Fromm has been in years past.

NEWS
WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS.
W. 1,289

AUG 3 1972

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood plans special Fromm events

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts ~~two concerts~~ by the orchestra during the weekend series stating tomorrow (Friday) and closing Sunday afternoon. Friday evening's program is part of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center, and the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, which is celebrating its 20th anniversary.

Friday's Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. in the Shed is devoted to Aaron Copland's music, and opens with "Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson" with soprano Phyllis Curtin and the composer at the piano. Next is Piano variations with Michael Tilson Thomas, pianist, and the prelude ends with Vitebsk, study on a Jewish theme, with Boston Symphony Chamber players Joseph Silverstein, violin; and Jules Eskin, cello; and the composer at the piano.

Mr. Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony at the 9 p.m. Shed concert, with violin soloist Paul Zukovsky. He opens with Ruggles' Evocations for orchestra, and Copland's "Eight Poems of Emily Dickinson," with Miss Curtin, soprano. Both are performed for the first time by the BSO. Next is the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin and orchestra, with soloist Paul Zukofsky, and closing number is Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

Aldo Cecceto, recently appointed principal conductor of the Detroit Symphony, conducts Saturday evening at 8:30 with soloist John Browning, pianist. Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 1 opens the program, followed by Prokofiev's Third piano concerto, and closes with Dvorak's Symphony No. 9, the "New World."

Sunday afternoon at 2:30, Mr. Thomas again is conductor, and soloist is Ralph Gomberg, principal oboeist of the BSO. The program is Haydn's Oboe concerto, and Mahler's Symphony No. 4.

Starting yesterday (Wednesday) the Music Theatre Project, part of the Berkshire Music Center (the BSO summer academy for advanced study of music), opened its season in the West Barn. Two other performances are being given, tonight (Thursday) and Sunday night at 8:30. Included is the world premiere of Robert Selig's Chocorua commissioned jointly by the Music Center and the Fromm Foundation, and Brecht-Weill's "The Yes Man."

John Neshling, Music Center conducting fellow, will conduct "The Yes Man," a rarely performed piece. Both productions are being directed by Ian Strasfogel. On Saturday, the Festival presents a Music Center vocal recital at 2:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Included will be Druckman's "Dark Upon the Harp," Kim's "Letters Found Near a Suicide," Powell's "Haiku Settings," and Carter's Robert Frost Songs.

Monday, the 7th, at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, College, the contemporary music ensemble of the BSO, presents Foss' "Time Cycle" (chamber version), Druckman's "Valentine," Crumb's Madrigals Books I and II, Puszatai's Nocturnes, and Davidovsky's Synchronisms no. 2.

Honoring the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Foundation, the special Berkshire Music Center Chamber Ensemble concert takes place Tuesday, Aug. 8, at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall with conductors Bruno Maderna and Gunther Schuller. Heard will be Berio's "Circles," Carter's Double Concerto, Schuller's Tre Invenzione, and Maderna's Giardino Religioso.

Wednesday, Aug. 9 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, the Music Center's chamber music concert includes, Imbrie's "To a Traveler," Kim's "rattling on..." Mather's Cantata II, and Erb's Brass Quintet.

Maderna conducts the final event of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music, leading the Music Center Orchestra Thursday, Aug 10, at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall in Webern's Variations for Orchestra, Op. 30; Shinohara's Piece for orchestra, world premiere of Fred Lerdahl's Chromorhythms, and Druckman's "Windows."

The Herald-News
PASSAIC, N. J.
D. 80,569

AUG 5 1972

Tanglewood features contemporary music

The 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music began today and will continue through Thursday at Tanglewood, the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass.

Sponsored by the center, the festival will celebrate the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation.

Often called a "festival-within-a-festival," the concerts turn Tanglewood into the contemporary music capital of the world during its annual presentation of new and challenging works, some commissioned especially for the festival, many heard in premiere performances.

This season the program will be expanded to include a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
S. 40,129

JUL 30 1972

New England Newsclip

Berkshire Festival plans contemporary program

By ALFRED W. BURKE
Sun Music Critic

Music

AARON COPLAND

LOWELL — The Fromm Music Foundation was brought to the American scene in 1952. This year, on the occasion of the Foundation's 20th anniversary, the Berkshire Festival has prepared a special observance.

The observance which will be a Festival of Contemporary Music will take place Aug. 4 through the 10th. Acting as sponsor is the Berkshire Music Center. The center is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music. All of this is in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. An affair such as this is often called a "Festival-within-a-Festival."

This Festival of Contemporary Music will for the seven days designated turn Tanglewood into the contemporary music capital of the world. The plans which call for a presentation of new and challenging works promise to create an atmosphere of excitement as well as a marvelous mixture of tonal colors and rhythmical patterns.

Among the festival highlights during "contemporary" week will be premiere performances of music by Wuorinen, Selig, Lerdahl, Schuller and Maderna. Many of the composition to be heard have been commissioned for the festival. This season, the Festival of Contemporary Music will expand its program, and will include, among other highlights, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

ON FRIDAY evening, Aug. 4, the festivities will open at 7 p.m., with a special weekend prelude. The program will be devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, Chairman Emeritus of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. To be performed will be Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson, with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtain who is one of the 1972 Tanglewood Granrud artists-in-residence, with Copland as pianist.

As part of the program there will be Piano Variations with Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas as pianist; and Viteebsk, Study on a Jewish theme, this to be performed by Boston Symphony Chamber Players Joseph Silverstin, violin, Jules Eskin, cello and Aaron Copland, pianist.

At 9 p.m., the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the regular Friday evening Festival concert. The concert will be held in the Shed and conducting will be Michael Tilson Thomas, with soloists soprano Phyllis Curtin and violinist Paul Zukofsky. The program will open with Carl Ruggles' Evocations for Orchestra (performed in memeory of the composer). This will be followed by the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin and orchestra. The Concerto was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation. The evening's concert will conclude with Thomas conducting a performance of Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring, also played in memory of the composer.

THE FESTIVAL of Contemporary Music will include a wide variety and range of programs. There will be performances by the Berkshire Music Center students, including vocal and chamber music programs, a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert, and by the Center's Music Theater project. There will also be a concert by Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

On Saturday, Aug. 5, the Festival presents a Berkshire Music Center vocal music recital at 2:30 p. m. This will be held in the Theater-Concert Hall. The program will include Druckman's Dark Upon the Harp, Kim's Letters Found Near a Suicide, Powell's Haiku Settings and Carter's Robert Frost Songs.

TRANSCRIPT
DEDHAM, MASS.
W. 7,209

JUL 27 1972

New England Newsclip

1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood Aug. 4-10

The 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood takes place this year from August 4 through 10. The Festival, celebrating the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, is sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music) in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Often called a "Festival-within-a-Festival", the concerts turn Tanglewood into the contemporary music capital of the world during its intensive and exciting annual presentation of new and challenging works, same commissioned especially for the Festival, many heard in premiere performances. This season, the Festival of Contemporary Music will expand its program, and will include, among other highlights, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Festival of Contemporary Music opens this year at the beginning of the sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, August 4 at 7:00 p.m. with a special Weekend Prelude concert devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, chairman emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Music to be performed is Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson, with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtin (one of the 1972 Tanglewood Granrud Artists-in-Residence), and Copland as pianist; Piano variations with Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas as pianist; and Vitebsk, study on a Jewish theme performed by Boston Symphony Chamber Players Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with Aaron Copland as pianist.

The 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Friday evening, Aug. 4 in the Shed is conducted by the Orchestra's Associate Conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, with soloists Soprano Phyllis Curtin, and violinist Paul Zukofsky. The concert opens with Carl Ruggles' Evocations for orchestra (performed in memory of the composer), followed by the orchestral version of the Poems of Emily Dickinson by Aaron Copland, with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtin. Paul Zukofsky next performs the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin and orchestra. The concerto was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation. The evening's concert concludes with Mr. Thomas conducting a performance of Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring, also played in memory of the composer.

The Festival of Contemporary Music continues through August 10 with a wide range of performances by Berkshire Music Center students, including vocal and chamber music programs, a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert, and performances by the Center's Music Theatre Project. There will also be a concert by Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

All concerts are events of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood, requiring a $1.50 donation per concert or Friends membership card. The opening Festival concert on August 4 is a regular Berkshire Festival concert for which Berkshire Festival tickets are required. For further information write to Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., 01240; or telephone (413) 637-1600.

140

SARATOGA SPRINGS, N. Y.
SARATOGIAN
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
D. 11,000

JUL 31 1972

Tanglewood posts Festival schedule

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass. — Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts two concerts by the orchestra as part of the sixth weekend Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Aug. 4 to 6.

The concerts Friday are part of the 1972 festival of contemporary music, sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music), and the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, which this year is celebrating its 20th anniversary.

The weekend prelude Friday at 7 p.m. in the Shed is devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, chairman emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. The Prelude opens with "Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson" with soprano Phyllis Curtin, and the composer at the piano. Next is "Piano variations" with Michael Tilson Thomas, pianist. The prelude closes with a performance of 'Vitebsk, study on a Jewish Theme," with Boston Symphony Chamber Players members Joseph Silverstein violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with the composer at the piano.

The 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Music Shed is conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas with violin soloist Paul Zukovsky.

This opening orchestral concert of the 1972 festival of contemporary music, sponsored by co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation, opens with Ruggles' "Evocations for orchestra," and Copland's "Eight poems of Emily Dickinson" with soprano Phyllis Curtin. Both works are performed for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Next is the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin, and orchestra with soloist Paul Zukofsky. The concerto was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation as part of its 20th anniversary celebration. The concert concludes with a performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

The season's sixth Saturday morning open rehearsal takes place at 10:30 a.m. Aug. 5. Tickets are $2.50 each, on sale at the festival ticket office two hours before the beginning of the open rehearsal. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefits the Boston Symphony Orchestra pension fund.

Aldo Ceccato, recently appointed principal conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Saturday evening, August 5 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist for this evening's concert is pianist John Browning. The concert opens with Mendelssohn's Symphony no. 1, followed by a performance of Prokofiev's Third piano concerto with soloist John Browning. The concert concludes with Dvorak's Symphony no. 9, the "New World."

Sunday afternoon, Aug. 6 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, Michael Tilson Thomas again conducts the Boston Symphony with soloist Ralph Gomberg, Principal Oboeist of the Boston Symphony. The concert is Haydn's Oboe concerto, and Mahler's Symphony no. 5.

Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Pops at Tanglewood this Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. The annual Boston Pops pension fund concert features the music of Lerner and Loewe with soloists Louis Russell sopano, Corinne Curry mezzo-soprano, Vahan Khanzadian tenor, Richard Fredricks baritone, with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director. The concert includes selections from "Camelot," "Gigi," "Brigadoon," "Paint Your Wagon," and "My Fair Lady." Also to be played is Lennon and McCartney's "Eleanor Rigby," a medley of Burt Bacharach tunes, and Melanie's "Look What They've Done to My Song." Ticket prices are from $3.50 to $8.50 with admission to the lawn at $3, on sale two hours before the concert. Tickets are available from the Festival Ticket Office at Tanglewood and at all Ticketron locations.

PEDDLER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
13,000

JUL 29 1972 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Festival notes an anniversary

Bos Sym

The 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood will take place from Aug. 4 through 10.

The Festival, celebrating the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, is sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music) in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. The program follows:

August 4

Weekend Prelude, 7 p.m. Shed. All-Copland concert.
"Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson" Phyllis Curtin, soprano, Aaron Copland, piano.
Piano variations, Michael Tilson Thomas, pianist.
"Vitebsk," study on a Jewish theme, Joseph Silverstein, violin, Jules Eskin, cello, Aaron Copland, piano.
Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert, 9 p.m. Shed.
Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor.
Ruffles: "Evocations for Orchestra".
Copland: "Eight Poems of Emily Dickinson", Phyllis Curtin, soprano.
Wuorinen: Concerto for amplified violin and orchestra, Paul Zukofsky, violin.
Stravinsky: "The Rite of Spring"

August 5

2:30 p.m. Theatre-Concert Hall, Berkshire Music Center Vocal Music Recital. Program to include: Druckman: "Dark Upon the Harp", Kim: "Letters Found Near a Suicide", Powell: "Haiku settings", Carter: "Robert Frost Songs"

August 6

8:30 p.m. West Barn, Berkshire Music Center Music Theatre Project. Selig: Chocorua, Brecht-Weill: "The Yes Man"

August 7

8:30 p.m. Theatre-Concert Hall
Collage, The Boston Symphony Orchestra Contemporary Music Ensemble Program to include: Foss: "Time Cycle;; (chamber version), Druckman: "Valentine", Crumb: "Madrigals," Books I and II, Pusztai: "Nocturnes", Davidovsky: "Synchronisms no. 2"

August 8

8:30 p.m. Theatre-Concert Hall, Concert honoring the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation Berkshire Music Center Chamber Ensemble, Bruno Maderna, conductor, Gunther Schuller, conductor.
Berio: "Circles", Carter: "Double concerto," Schuller: "Tre Invenzione", Maderna: "Giardino Reliquioso."

August 9

8:30 p.m. Theatre-Concert Hall, Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music Concert. Program to include: Imbrie: "To A Traveler", Kim: "rattling on...", Mather: "Cantata II", Erb: "Brass Quintet."

August 10

8:30 p.m. Theatre-Concert Hall, Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, Bruno Maderna, conductor.
Webern: "Variations for Orchestra, Op. 30.", Shinohara: "Piece for Orchestra", Lerdahl: "Chromorhythmos", Druckman: "Windows".

ITEM
CLINTON, MASS.
D. 4,150

JUL 24 1972 New England Newsclip

Music Festival at Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Massachusetts — The 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood takes place this year from August 4 through 10. The Festival, celebrating the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation is sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Sumphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music) in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Often called a "Festival-within-a-Festival", the concerts turn Tanglewood into the contemporary music capital of the world during its intensive and exciting annual presentation of new and challenging works, some commissioned expecially for the Festival, many heard in premiere performances. This season, the Festival of Contemporary Music will expand its program, and will include, among other highlights, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Festival of Contemporary Music opens this year at the beginning of the sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, August 4 at 7:00 p.m. with a special Weekend Prelude concert devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, Chairman Emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Music to be performed is Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson, with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtin (one of the 1972 Tanglewood Granrud Artists-in-Residence), and Mr. Copland as pianist; Piano variations with Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas as pianist; and Vitebsk, study on a Jewish theme performed by Boston Symphony Chamber Players Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with Aaron Copland as pianist.

The 9:00 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Friday evening, August 4 in the Shed is conducted by the Orchestra's Associate Conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, with soloists soprano Phyllis Curtin, and violinist Paul Zukofsky. The concert opens with Carl Ruggles' Evocations for orchestra (performed in memory of the composer), followed by the orchestral version of the Poems of Emily Dickinson by Aaron Copland, with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtin. Paul Zukofski next performs the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin and orchestra. The concerto was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation. The evening's concert concludes with Mr. Thomas conducting a performance of Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring, also played in memory of the composer.

The Festival of Contemporary Music continues through August 10 with a wide range of performances by Berkshire Music Center students, including vocal and chamber music programs, a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert, and performances by the Center's Music Theatre Project. There will also be a concert by Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Saturday, August 5, the Festival presents a Berkshire Music Center Vocal Music Recital at 2:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. The program includes Druckman's Dark Upon the Harp, Kim's Letters Found Near a Suicide, Powell's Haiku Settings, and Carter's Robert Frost Songs.

Sunday evening, August 6 at 8:30 p.m. in the West Barn, the Berkshire Music Center Music Theatre Project presents the world premiere of Robert Selig's Chocorua, commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation. Also to be performed on the same program is Brecht-Weill's The Yes Man. Chocorua is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by the Boston Poet Richard Moore. Its story, derived from actual events of the eighteenth century, tells of Indian Chief Chocorua who stays behind in New Hampshire when his tribe emigrates northward, to mingle with the English settlers with tragic results.

Monday evening, August 7 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presents a concert that includes Foss' Time Cycle (chamber version), Druckman's Valentine, Crumb's Madrigals, Books I and II, Pusztai's Nocturnes, and Davidovsky's Snychronisms no. 2.

The special Berkshire Music Center Chamber Ensemble concert honoring the 20th Anniversary fo the Fromm Music Foundation, takes place Tuesday evening, August 8 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Under the direction of conductors Bruno Maderna and Gunther Schuller (Artistic Director of the Berkshire Music Center), the ensemble performs Berio's Circles, Carter's Double concerto, Schuller's Tre Invenzione (a world premiere performance commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation in honor of its 20th Anniversary), and Maderna's Giardino Religioso, also a world premiere performance commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation honoring its 20th Anniversary.

Wednesday evening, August 9 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, the Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music concert scheduled includes Imbrie's To A Traveler, Kim's Rattling on..., Mather's Cantata II, and Erb's Brass quintet.

The final event of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music is a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert conducted by Bruno Maderna Thursday evening, August 10 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Mr. Maderna conducts the Orchestra in Webern's Variations for Orchestra, Op. 30, Shinohara's Piece for orchestra, the world premiere of Fred Lerdahl's Chromorhythmos (commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation), and, to conclude the concert, Druckman's Windows.

All concerts are events of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood, requiring a $1.50 donation per concert or Friends membership card. The opening Festival concert on August 4 is a regular Berkshire Festival concert for which Berkshire Festival tickets are required.

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 767,793 SUN. 1,016,275

AUG 6 1972

MUSIC

Getting with the 20th century —examples from both coasts

By LINDA WINER

If the plentitude of the Washington action doesn't make you feel left out, then you haven't already heard about the Fromm Foundation's annual contemporary music gala currently on at the Tanglewood Festival in Massachusetts thru Thursday. This year's series, in honor of the 20th anniversary of Paul Fromm's patronage, includes world premieres by Charles Wuorinen, Robert Selig, Fred Lerdahl, Gunther Schuller, and Bruno Maderna among its 27 pieces of modern music.

140

SARATOGA SPRINGS, N. Y.
SARATOGIAN
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
D. 11,000

JUL 31 1972

Tanglewood posts Festival schedule

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass. — Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts two concerts by the orchestra as part of the sixth weekend Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Aug. 4 to 6.

The concerts Friday are part of the 1972 festival of contemporary music, sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music), and the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, which this year is celebrating its 20th anniversary.

The weekend prelude Friday at 7 p.m. in the Shed is devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, chairman emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. The Prelude opens with "Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson" with soprano Phyllis Curtin, and the composer at the piano. Next is "Piano variations" with Michael Tilson Thomas, pianist. The prelude closes with a performance of 'Vitebsk, study on a Jewish Theme," with Boston Symphony Chamber Players members Joseph Silverstein violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with the composer at the piano.

The 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Music Shed is conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas with violin soloist Paul Zukovsky.

This opening orchestral concert of the 1972 festival of contemporary music, sponsored by co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation, opens with Ruggles' "Evocations for orchestra," and Copland's "Eight poems of Emily Dickinson" with soprano Phyllis Curtin. Both works are performed for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Next is the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin, and orchestra with soloist Paul Zukofsky. The concerto was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation as part of its 20th anniversary celebration. The concert concludes with a performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

The season's sixth Saturday morning open rehearsal takes place at 10:30 a.m. Aug. 5. Tickets are $2.50 each, on sale at the festival ticket office two hours before the beginning of the open rehearsal. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefits the Boston Symphony Orchestra pension fund.

Aldo Ceccato, recently appointed principal conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Saturday evening, August 5 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist for this evening's concert is pianist John Browning. The concert opens with Mendelssohn's Symphony no. 1, followed by a performance of Prokofiev's Third piano concerto with soloist John Browning. The concert concludes with Dvorak's Symphony no. 9, the "New World."

Sunday afternoon, Aug. 6 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, Michael Tilson Thomas again conducts the Boston Symphony with soloist Ralph Gomberg, Principal Oboeist of the Boston Symphony. The concert is Haydn's Oboe concerto, and Mahler's Symphony no. 5.

Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Pops at Tanglewood this Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. The annual Boston Pops pension fund concert features the music of Lerner and Loewe with soloists Louis Russell sopano, Corinne Curry mezzo-soprano, Vahan Khanzadian tenor, Richard Fredricks baritone, with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director. The concert includes selections from "Camelot," "Gigi," "Brigadoon," "Paint Your Wagon," and "My Fair Lady." Also to be played is Lennon and McCartney's "Eleanor Rigby," a medley of Burt Bacharach tunes, and Melanie's "Look What They've Done to My Song." Ticket prices are from $3.50 to $8.50 with admission to the lawn at $3, on sale two hours before the concert. Tickets are available from the Festival Ticket Office at Tanglewood and at all Ticketron locations.

PEDDLER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
13,000

JUL 29 1972 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Festival notes an anniversary

Bos Sym

The 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood will take place from Aug. 4 through 10.

The Festival, celebrating the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, is sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music) in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. The program follows:

August 4

Weekend Prelude, 7 p.m. Shed. All-Copland concert.
"Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson" Phyllis Curtin, soprano, Aaron Copland, piano.
Piano variations, Michael Tilson Thomas, pianist.
"Vitebsk," study on a Jewish theme, Joseph Silverstein, violin, Jules Eskin, cello, Aaron Copland, piano.
Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert, 9 p.m. Shed.
Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor.
Ruffles: "Evocations for Orchestra".
Copland: "Eight Poems of Emily Dickinson", Phyllis Curtin, soprano.
Wuorinen: Concerto for amplified violin and orchestra, Paul Zukofsky, violin.
Stravinsky: "The Rite of Spring"

August 5

2:30 p.m. Theatre-Concert Hall, Berkshire Music Center Vocal Music Recital. Program to include: Druckman: "Dark Upon the Harp", Kim: "Letters Found Near a Suicide", Powell: "Haiku settings", Carter: "Robert Frost Songs"

August 6

8:30 p.m. West Barn, Berkshire Music Center Music Theatre Project. Selig: Chocorua, Brecht-Weill: "The Yes Man"

August 7

8:30 p.m. Theatre-Concert Hall
Collage, The Boston Symphony Orchestra Contemporary Music Ensemble Program to include: Foss: "Time Cycle;; (chamber version), Druckman: "Valentine", Crumb: "Madrigals," Books I and II, Pusztai: "Nocturnes", Davidovsky: "Synchronisms no. 2"

August 8

8:30 p.m. Theatre-Concert Hall, Concert honoring the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation Berkshire Music Center Chamber Ensemble, Bruno Maderna, conductor, Gunther Schuller, conductor.
Berio: "Circles", Carter: "Double concerto," Schuller: "Tre Invenzione", Maderna: "Giardino Reliquioso."

August 9

8:30 p.m. Theatre-Concert Hall, Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music Concert. Program to include: Imbrie: "To A Traveler", Kim: "rattling on...", Mather: "Cantata II", Erb: "Brass Quintet."

August 10

8:30 p.m. Theatre-Concert Hall, Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, Bruno Maderna, conductor.
Webern: "Variations for Orchestra, Op. 30.", Shinohara: "Piece for Orchestra", Lerdahl: "Chromorhythmos", Druckman: "Windows".

ITEM
CLINTON, MASS.
D. 4,150

JUL 24 1972 New England Newsclip

Music Festival at Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Massachusetts — The 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood takes place this year from August 4 through 10. The Festival, celebrating the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation is sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Sumphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music) in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Often called a "Festival-within-a-Festival", the concerts turn Tanglewood into the contemporary music capital of the world during its intensive and exciting annual presentation of new and challenging works, some commissioned expecially for the Festival, many heard in premiere performances. This season, the Festival of Contemporary Music will expand its program, and will include, among other highlights, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Festival of Contemporary Music opens this year at the beginning of the sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, August 4 at 7:00 p.m. with a special Weekend Prelude concert devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, Chairman Emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Music to be performed is Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson, with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtin (one of the 1972 Tanglewood Granrud Artists-in-Residence), and Mr. Copland as pianist; Piano variations with Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas as pianist; and Vitebsk, study on a Jewish theme performed by Boston Symphony Chamber Players Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with Aaron Copland as pianist.

The 9:00 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Friday evening, August 4 in the Shed is conducted by the Orchestra's Associate Conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, with soloists soprano Phyllis Curtin, and violinist Paul Zukofsky. The concert opens with Carl Ruggles' Evocations for orchestra (performed in memory of the composer), followed by the orchestral version of the Poems of Emily Dickinson by Aaron Copland, with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtin. Paul Zukofski next performs the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin and orchestra. The concerto was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation. The evening's concert concludes with Mr. Thomas conducting a performance of Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring, also played in memory of the composer.

The Festival of Contemporary Music continues through August 10 with a wide range of performances by Berkshire Music Center students, including vocal and chamber music programs, a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert, and performances by the Center's Music Theatre Project. There will also be a concert by Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Saturday, August 5, the Festival presents a Berkshire Music Center Vocal Music Recital at 2:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. The program includes Druckman's Dark Upon the Harp, Kim's Letters Found Near a Suicide, Powell's Haiku Settings, and Carter's Robert Frost Songs.

Sunday evening, August 6 at 8:30 p.m. in the West Barn, the Berkshire Music Center Music Theatre Project presents the world premiere of Robert Selig's Chocorua, commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation. Also to be performed on the same program is Brecht-Weill's The Yes Man. Chocorua is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by the Boston Poet Richard Moore. Its story, derived from actual events of the eighteenth century, tells of Indian Chief Chocorua who stays behind in New Hampshire when his tribe emigrates northward, to mingle with the English settlers with tragic results.

Monday evening, August 7 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presents a concert that includes Foss' Time Cycle (chamber version), Druckman's Valentine, Crumb's Madrigals, Books I and II, Pusztai's Nocturnes, and Davidovsky's Snychronisms no. 2.

The special Berkshire Music Center Chamber Ensemble concert honoring the 20th Anniversary fo the Fromm Music Foundation, takes place Tuesday evening, August 8 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Under the direction of conductors Bruno Maderna and Gunther Schuller (Artistic Director of the Berkshire Music Center), the ensemble performs Berio's Circles, Carter's Double concerto, Schuller's Tre Invenzione (a world premiere performance commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation in honor of its 20th Anniversary), and Maderna's Giardino Religioso, also a world premiere performance commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation honoring its 20th Anniversary.

Wednesday evening, August 9 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, the Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music concert scheduled includes Imbrie's To A Traveler, Kim's Rattling on . . . Mather's Cantata II, and Erb's Brass quintet.

The final event of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music is a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert conducted by Bruno Maderna Thursday evening, August 10 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Mr. Maderna conducts the Orchestra in Webern's Variations for Orchestra, Op. 30, Shinohara's Piece for orchestra, the world premiere of Fred Lerdahl's Chromorhythmos (commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation), and, to conclude the concert, Druckman's Windows.

All concerts are events of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood, requiring a $1.50 donation per concert or Friends membership card. The opening Festival concert on August 4 is a regular Berkshire Festival concert for which Berkshire Festival tickets are required.

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 767,793 SUN. 1,016,275

AUG 6 1972

MUSIC

Getting with the 20th century —examples from both coasts

By LINDA WINER

If the plentitude of the Washington action doesn't make you feel left out, then you haven't already heard about the Fromm Foundation's annual contemporary music gala currently on at the Tanglewood Festival in Massachusetts thru Thursday. This year's series, in honor of the 20th anniversary of Paul Fromm's patronage, includes world premieres by Charles Wuorinen, Robert Selig, Fred Lerdahl, Gunther Schuller, and Bruno Maderna among its 27 pieces of modern music.

REGISTER
TORRINGTON, CONN.
D. 11,891

JUL 29 1972

New England

Madame Olga Koussevitzky talks with founder Paul Fromm, and Michael Tilson Thomas, who will play and conduct opening night

Tanglewood Festival of Contemporary Music

What to listen for

B SYM

By Franklin Coleman

LENOX, Mass.

The Fromm Music Foundation, world-famous in its promotion of contemporary music, celebrates its 20th anniversary this year. Founded in 1952 by a German-born Chicago wine importer, the foundation exists "to restore to the composer his rightful position at the center of musical life."

Unlike others such as the Ford, Rockefeller, Guggenheim and Koussevitzky, the Fromm Foundation has confined its attention to "individual artists, individual works and individual musical situations." Perhaps the most ambitious activity instituted by the foundation, therefore, is the commissioning program, which makes possible the creation and performance of new works by young, relatively unknown composers as well as established ones.

"All music is modern music in its own time," states founder Paul Fromm, "and music as an art will cease to exist if a living flow of musical creation no longer reaches a concerned and interested public. Our aim has been to stimulate the initiative of composers so that they can contribute more fully to the development of a living musical culture."

The commitment to commission these works extends to arranging performances, preparing scores for every instrumental and vocal part, and publishing and recording works. Nearly 100 works have been commissioned in this manner since 1952. Fromm Foundation activities also include fellowship programs for talented young musicians and for music critics at the Berkshire Music Center, seminars in advanced musical studies at Princeton University and journals and books on contemporary music.

The foundation has cooperated with the Berkshire Music Center since 1964 in presenting the Tanglewood Festival of Contemporary Music to introduce new music and present established contemporary works. The 1972 festival, to be held August 4 through 10, promises six works commissioned for the festival by the Fromm Foundation or by the Berkshire Music Festival. Two composers commissioned are associated with the Berkshire Music Center, Gunther Schuller and Bruno Maderna, both familiar names in contemporary music. Composers of the other newly commissioned pieces are Charles Wourinen, Robert Selig, Fred Lerdahl and Celso Garrido-Lecca. The eight concerts will include instrumental and vocal programs, music theatre and orchestral works, including a full concert by the Boston Symphony.

How does one best describe music potential concert-goers can expect to hear? It is safe to say that the programs are so well planned and diverse that there will be pieces appealing to almost every taste.

The 72-year-old American composer Aaron Copland will perform in a program Aug. 4 devoted exclusively to his works. Copland's "Vitebsk—Study on a Jewish Theme" (1929) is a one-movement trio for piano, violin and cello showing the jazz rhythms which characterize most of his works of this period. The quarter-tones in the strings symbolize the blowing of the Shofar; he uses Jewish folk themes throughout. His "Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson" for soprano and piano are in a decidedly different vein. I am particularly fond of the ninth poem, "I felt a funeral in my brain," as it seems to epitomize Copland's own musical thoughts about the meaning of Miss Dickinson's poetry.

Works of two other distinguished composers — Igor Stravinsky (1882-1971) and Carl Ruggles (1876-1971) — will be performed in their memory.

But what of music of those whose names are less familiar than Copland, Stravinsky and Ruggles? The noted composers Luciano Berio and Mario Davidovsky will each be represented by compositions commissioned by the Fromm Foundation in 1960 and 1964 respectively. (Davidovsky also received a Fromm commission in 1965 for a work he completed in 1967.)

Berio's "Circles," first performed when he was composer-in-residence at Tanglewood in 1960, is based on a poem of e.e. cummings and explores the free rhythmic possibilities of the voice and the sound values of the instruments used — a harp and percussion instruments.

The Davidovsky piece, "Synchronisms No. 2," is one of a series of short pieces in which conventional instruments — flute, violin, clarinet and cello — are used with taped electronic sounds.

Three works by the contemporary American composer Jacob Druckman will be played, one of them "Valentine" particularly provocative. "This is one of the most difficult works ever written for contrabass," the composer has commented, "and demands that the player attack the instrument with bow, tympani stick, alternating percussive tapping of the body of the instrument with pizzicato harmonics, while the voice sustains tones, sings counterpoints and punctuates accents. All of this necessitates the player's assaulting the instrument with an almost de Sade-like concentration — hence the title." I found the recording of the work fascinating and anticipate the live performance at the festival.

Many of the 30 or so works to be performed during the festival have not yet been recorded. Several have, however, and for those who might wish an armchair preview, I submit a partial discography. Happy listening!

Copland: Vitebsk—Study on a Jewish Theme (3-RCA Victor LSC-6167); Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson (Columbia M 30375); Piano Variations (Odyssey 32160040).

Druckman: Valentine (Nonsuch 71253) and Dark Upon the Harp (Composers Recordings, Inc. CRI-167).

Davidovsky: Synchronisms No. 2 (CRI-204).

Berio: Circles (Mainstream 5005).

Elliott Carter: Double Concerto (Columbia MS-7191).

Stravinsky: Le Sacre du Printemps (Many recordings available; Columbia MS-6319 is conducted by the composer).

Aaron Copland will play and hear Copland

Music Festival Takes On Extra Meaning This Year

The 10th annual festival of contemporary music at Tanglewood this year is sort of special because one of its sponsors is celebrating its own 20th anniversary.

The Fromm Foundation was started by Paul Fromm in Chicago in 1952 to sponsor the composition, study, publication, performance and recording of contemporary music. Of the 90 new works commissioned by the foundation, eight have been scheduled for this season's contemporary festival, five to be given their first performance.

The other sponsor is the Berkshire Music Center, The Boston Symphony Orchestra's academy for the advanced study of music founded in 1940 at Tanglewood by Serge Koussevitzky, then music director of the orchestra.

The festival's first event this year coincided with the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Friday concert conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas in the Shed, attended by 5345 listeners.

The seventh and last will be given Thursday by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra led by Bruno Maderna, an Italian conductor and avant-garde composer serving this summer, with others, as supervisor of student performance and instructor of composition.

Yesterday afternoon's program, the second in the series, was presented by the vocal department. It was made up of relatively old music: Haiku Settings (1961) by Mel Powell, six songs by Charles Ives (1907-23), two Robert Frost songs (1942) by Elliott Carter, "Letters Found Near a Suicide" (1954) by Earl Kim and "Dark Upon the Harp" (1962) by Jacob Druckman.

It was the 90-minute program of atonal music that sounds radical to listeners unacquainted with musical developments of the last 20 years and old-fashioned to most of those (about 300) who heard it Saturday in the lively (acoustically) little chamber-music hall at Tanglewood.

Beauty and serenity is not the purpose of this music. But certainly academic exercise is one of the interests of the composers, and the complex thematic structure and brilliant tonal coloration can provide stimulating intellectual attraction.

Including eight works receiving their first hearing during the seven-day festival - within - a - festival, there are 46 20th-century pieces ranging from simple songs to long, full-orchestral works and chamber operas.

Composers include famous names such as Copland, Stravinsky, Ruggles, Ives, Weill, Messiaen and Webern.

Tonight at 8.30 will be third performance of the opera, "Chocorua," by Robert Selig on the same bill with the Weill-Brecht "The Yes Man." They were staged last Wednesday and Thursday.

Monday the BSO Collage, a chamber group made up of young members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present a program including Lukas Foss's "Time Cycle" in the theatre-concert hall at 8.30, and there will be concerts in the same hall at the same time through Thursday offering varying combinations of instruments and voices.

REGISTER
TORRINGTON, CONN.
D. 11,891

JUL 29 1972

New England

Madame Olga Koussevitzky talks with founder Paul Fromm, and Michael Tilson Thomas, who will play and conduct opening night

Tanglewood Festival of Contemporary Music

What to listen for

By Franklin Coleman

LENOX, Mass.

The Fromm Music Foundation, world-famous in its promotion of contemporary music, celebrates its 20th anniversary this year. Founded in 1952 by a German-born Chicago wine importer, the foundation exists "to restore to the composer his rightful position at the center of musical life."

Unlike others such as the Ford, Rockefeller, Guggenheim and Koussevitzky, the Fromm Foundation has confined its attention to "individual artists, individual works and individual musical situations." Perhaps the most ambitious activity instituted by the foundation, therefore, is the commissioning program, which makes possible the creation and performance of new works by young, relatively unknown composers as well as established ones.

"All music is modern music in its own time," states founder Paul Fromm, "and music as an art will cease to exist if a living flow of musical creation no longer reaches a concerned and interested public. Our aim has been to stimulate the initiative of composers so that they can contribute more fully to the development of a living musical culture."

The commitment to commission these works extends to arranging performances, preparing scores for every instrumental and vocal part, and publishing and recording works. Nearly 100 works have been commissioned in this manner since 1952. Fromm Foundation activities also include fellowship programs for talented young musicians and for music critics at the Berkshire Music Center, seminars in advanced musical studies at Princeton University and journals and books on contemporary music.

The foundation has cooperated with the Berkshire Music Center since 1964 in presenting the Tanglewood Festival of Contemporary Music to introduce new music and present established contemporary works. The 1972 festival, to be held August 4 through 10, promises six works commissioned for the festival by the Fromm Foundation or by the Berkshire Music Festival. Two composers commissioned are associated with the Berkshire Music Center, Gunther Schuller and Bruno Maderna, both familiar names in contemporary music. Composers of the other newly commissioned pieces are Charles Wourinen, Robert Selig, Fred Lerdahl and Celso Garrido-Lecca. The eight concerts will include instrumental and vocal programs, music theatre and orchestral works, including a full concert by the Boston Symphony.

How does one best describe music potential concert-goers can expect to hear? It is safe to say that the programs are so well planned and diverse that there will be pieces appealing to almost every taste.

The 72-year-old American composer Aaron Copland will perform in a program Aug. 4 devoted exclusively to his works. Copland's "Vitebsk—Study on a Jewish Theme" (1929) is a one-movement trio for piano, violin and cello showing the jazz rhythms which characterize most of his works of this period. The quarter-tones in the strings symbolize the blowing of the Shofar; he uses Jewish folk themes throughout. His "Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson" for soprano and piano are in a decidedly different vein. I am particularly fond of the ninth poem, "I felt a funeral in my brain," as it seems to epitomize Copland's own musical thoughts about the meaning of Miss Dickinson's poetry.

Works of two other distinguished composers — Igor Stravinsky (1882-1971) and Carl Ruggles (1876-1971) — will be performed in their memory.

But what of music of those whose names are less familiar than Copland, Stravinsky and Ruggles? The noted composers Luciano Berio and Mario Davidovsky will each be represented by compositions commissioned by the Fromm Foundation in 1960 and 1964 respectively. (Davidovsky also received a Fromm commission in 1965 for a work he completed in 1967.)

Berio's "Circles," first performed when he was composer-in-residence at Tanglewood in 1960, is based on a poem of e.e. cummings and explores the free rhythmic possibilities of the voice and the sound values of the instruments used — a harp and percussion instruments.

The Davidovsky piece, "Synchronisms No. 2," is one of a series of short pieces in which conventional instruments — flute, violin, clarinet and cello — are used with taped electronic sounds.

Three works by the contemporary American composer Jacob Druckman will be played, one of them "Valentine" particularly provocative. "This is one of the most difficult works ever written for contrabass," the composer has commented, "and demands that the player attack the instrument with bow, tympani stick, alternating percussive tapping of the body of the instrument with pizzicato harmonics, while the voice sustains tones, sings counterpoints and punctuates accents. All of this necessitates the player's assaulting the instrument with an almost de Sade-like concentration — hence the title." I found the recording of the work fascinating and anticipate the live performance at the festival.

Many of the 30 or so works to be performed during the festival have not yet been recorded. Several have, however, and for those who might wish an armchair preview, I submit a partial discography. Happy listening!

Copland: Vitebsk—Study on a Jewish Theme (3-RCA Victor LSC-6167); Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson (Columbia M 30375); Piano Variations (Odyssey 32160040).

Druckman: Valentine (Nonsuch 71253) and Dark Upon the Harp (Composers Recordings, Inc. CRI-167).

Davidovsky: Synchronisms No. 2 (CRI-204).

Berio: Circles (Mainstream 5005).

Elliott Carter: Double Concerto (Columbia MS-7191).

Stravinsky: Le Sacre du Printemps (Many recordings available; Columbia MS-6319 is conducted by the composer).

Aaron Copland will play and hear Copland

Music Festival Takes On Extra Meaning This Year

The 10th annual festival of contemporary music at Tanglewood this year is sort of special because one of its sponsors is celebrating its own 20th anniversary.

The Fromm Foundation was started by Paul Fromm in Chicago in 1952 to sponsor the composition, study, publication, performance and recording of contemporary music. Of the 90 new works commissioned by the foundation, eight have been scheduled for this season's contemporary festival, five to be given their first performance.

The other sponsor is the Berkshire Music Center, The Boston Symphony Orchestra's academy for the advanced study of music founded in 1940 at Tanglewood by Serge Koussevitzky, then music director of the orchestra.

The festival's first event this year coincided with the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Friday concert conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas in the Shed, attended by 5345 listeners.

The seventh and last will be given Thursday by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra led by Bruno Maderna, an Italian conductor and avant-garde composer serving this summer, with others, as supervisor of student performance and instructor of composition.

Yesterday afternoon's program, the second in the series, was presented by the vocal department. It was made up of relatively old music: Haiku Settings (1961) by Mel Powell, six songs by Charles Ives (1907-23), two Robert Frost songs (1942) by Elliott Carter, "Letters Found Near a Suicide" (1954) by Earl Kim and "Dark Upon the Harp" (1962) by Jacob Druckman.

It was the 90-minute program of atonal music that sounds radical to listeners unacquainted with musical developments of the last 20 years and old-fashioned to most of those (about 300) who heard it Saturday in the lively (acoustically) little chamber-music hall at Tanglewood.

Beauty and serenity is not the purpose of this music. But certainly academic exercise is one of the interests of the composers, and the complex thematic structure and brilliant tonal coloration can provide stimulating intellectual attraction.

Including eight works receiving their first hearing during the seven-day festival - within - a - festival, there are 46 20th-century pieces ranging from simple songs to long, full-orchestral works and chamber operas.

Composers include famous names such as Copland, Stravinsky, Ruggles, Ives, Weill, Messiaen and Webern.

Tonight at 8.30 will be third performance of the opera, "Chocorua," by Robert Selig on the same bill with the Weill-Brecht "The Yes Man." They were staged last Wednesday and Thursday.

Monday the BSO Collage, a chamber group made up of young members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present a program including Lukas Foss's "Time Cycle" in the theatre-concert hall at 8.30, and there will be concerts in the same hall at the same time through Thursday offering varying combinations of instruments and voices.

142

TIME
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 3,473,000

AUG 21 1972

MUSIC

Modern Maecenas

The man across the table from Igor Stravinsky in Chicago's Union Station restaurant was an unlikely luncheon partner for a great composer to seek out on a stopover. He was a prosperous local wine importer, and his somber, heavy-set air evoked stocks and bonds rather than sharps and semiquavers. But when the man started to order coffee, Stravinsky insisted on champagne instead. "Contemporary music has many friends," Stravinsky toasted him, "but only a few lovers."

The man was Paul Fromm, and in the 14 years since that meeting he has continued to express his love of contemporary music in the most practical way. Each year he has set aside up to $100,000 and, through his Fromm Music Foundation, parceled it out in commissions to an international Who's Who of composers: Milton Babbitt, Alberto Ginastera, Alan Hovhaness, Ernst Krenek, Roger Sessions, Stefan Wolpe —some 90 names in all. Composer Gunther Schuller describes Fromm as "the single most important benefactor in the field of contemporary music."

Boos. "Composers," says Fromm, "are the sources of musical culture; yet their status in the musical world is uncertain. They are professionals without a profession." Fromm's efforts to offset this situation begin rather than end with his individual commissions ($1,000 for a piece by a young unknown, up to $5,000 for one by an established master). He befriends his composers—most often while they are still obscure —keeps in touch with them, sells wine to them. He makes sure that their works get performed and even subsidizes recordings. "There can be no living musical atmosphere," he insists, "without sympathetic interaction between composers, performers and listeners."

Nowhere is this interaction better exemplified than at the Fromm-supported Festival of Contemporary Music each summer at Tanglewood. Last week the festival marked the 20th anniversary of Fromm's foundation with a week of special concerts, forums and workshops, which, for Fromm, were fraught with both the perils and joys of being a modern Maecenas. When members of the Boston Symphony rehearsed for the première of Fromm's latest commission, an electronically amplified violin concerto by Charles Wuorinen, they disliked the piece so much that they booed. When the Tanglewood listeners heard it, some of them booed too.

Much more successful were reprises of two of the most important works ever commissioned by Fromm: Luciano Berio's Circles (1960) and Elliott Carter's Double Concerto for Harpsichord and Piano with Two Chamber Orchestras (1961). These performances flanked a rare public appearance by Fromm in which he pleaded eloquently for better integration of contemporary and traditional music rather than a mere "busing of indiscriminately chosen new music to the halls of Brahms and Beethoven."

The son of a cultured Bavarian wine merchant, Fromm learned enough piano as a child to join with his brother Herbert in four-handed transcriptions of Mahler symphonies. His first hearing of Stravinsky's Rite of Spring, he says, "made a 20th century man of me." But unlike Herbert, who became a composer, Fromm settled into the family vocation, and after immigrating to Chicago in 1938, used it to support music as a passionate avocation. Fromm and his wife live in an unpretentious apartment near the University of Chicago, where she teaches psychology (a field in which Fromm's cousin Erich has become prominent as the author of The Art of Loving). When a visiting Ford Foundation official asked to see Fromm's foundation offices and library, Fromm led him to a battered file cabinet in the corner of his wine firm's office and pulled open two drawers.

This year Fromm has shifted the administrative base of his foundation to Harvard University and passed the responsibility for making commissions to an expert committee of Schuller, Music Scholar A. Tillman Merritt and himself. At 65, he intends both steps as provisions against the future, hoping that the foundation will be able to continue and even extend his work after he is gone. Where new music is concerned, he likes to quote Mae West: "Too much of a good thing is wonderful."

CLEMENS KALISCHER

FROMM WITH SCHULLER AT TANGLEWOOD
Commissioning a Who's Who.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 5 1972

New England Newsclip

As I Hear It

Patrons of music

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

IN OUR ECONOMY government takes a minimum of responsibility for the support or propagation of culture or higher education. State universities are a happy phenomenon, which seems to be expanding healthily. But the arts, in general, thrive or struggle without state beneficence or subsidy.

The condition of our economy has put those in charge of our higher educational institutions, our orchestras and operas, our museums and libraries — and all projects dependent on eleemosynary sources in deep jeopardy. An article in a late issue of U.S. News and World Report, "The Return of The Givers," is thus as welcome as it is surprising and unexpected.

A record-breaking flood of money from private benefactors, it reports, is helping colleges and universities stay afloat in 1972. Gifts to higher education may top $2 billion this year, based on preliminary reports of gifts made by individuals, corporations and foundations. Much to the delight of many schools, private donors have been unusually generous. An anonymous philanthropist has pledged $15 million to Stanford University; Loyola University of Chicago has a pledge of $7 million; Juilliard, the training arm of the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts, specializing in music, drama and the dance, has one for $5 million.

* * * *

EVERY PERSON on this country's mailing lists is deluged with requests and solicitations for funds for innumerable worthy causes, political, health and welfare, for the underprivileged, for victims of natural catastrophies—who can list them all? But these, in general, would be content with smaller donations, hoping to arouse response from long rolls of interested well-wishers.

It must be tremendous gratification to see the good the money one may have acquired advance human welfare in any phase. Compassion is a motive in many cases. Personal conation may also impel a man to involve himself in projects in which he finds an engrossing magnetism.

* * * *

OUR BERKSHIRE communities have been the beneficiaries of many lavish endowments by citizens within our own enclave: families have distinguished themselves by the evidence of their concern. We have benefited by gifts of museums and libraries, institutions and edifices for the promotion of welfare of children and old people, parks and playgrounds, hospitals and sanatoriums, music schools and many less permanent efforts in the public behalf. None of these has been the merely indifferent signing of a check, but rather the expression of an individual's character and the result of long thought and study and concern for the brotherhood of man, in small or broad perspective.

The most fortunate of such patrons are those who involve themselves in the organizations they founded beyond the matter of their financial participation. Such a one was the late Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge whose stimulation and support of chamber music originated in Pittsfield but soon outgrew our city in its international scope.

Now looming increasingly important on our musical horizon for the last 20 years is Chicago-based, but Tanglewood-anchored Paul Fromm with the Foundation bearing his name, which devotes itself to the stimulation of musical creativity in its multiple forms.

* * * *

THE BERKSHIRE MUSIC Center at Tanglewood has made Fromm doubly welcome for this score of years because its large student body is the kind of fertile ground for the type of music Fromm's Foundation is eager to promote. Fromm appeared on the musical scene at an extremely propitious as well as difficult time. It is not easy to name the exact moment when the art of music as exemplified by Brahms, Strauss, Mahler and Debussy was considered in some quarters to have reached the terminus of its era. There was a faction that proclaimed the diatonic scale, the orchestra and its component instruments exhausted as means of expression. Every possible and potential combination of melodies, harmonies and rhythms had been used, this group maintained music must seek what Schumann a century and a half ago said that Brahms must seek. "Neue Bahnen," new paths.

Iconoclasm was the spirit of the day. Joyce and Cummings in literature, Picasso and Braque in painting, Lipschitz and Moore in sculpture and, in music, Schoenberg and Stravinsky abandoned all that we had come to consider artistic scriptures.

* * * *

BUT MEN continued to want to express themselves in sound, and they found obstacles and impediments everywhere. It was Fromm's Foundation, which opened the walls of protest and obstruction. It has been a sisyphean task — a commission to compose and the promise of a performance and then often a slide back down the hill to the shadows and obscurity. But Fromm's empathy has no limits and he personally follows through projects, which experienced artistic advisers suggest, not from an isolated cubicle but from on-the-spot involvement.

The list of individuals he has favored and the catalogue of events he has sponsored read like a Burke's peerage of music. His decision to place the Foundation in the hands of the Harvard Music Department and the department's apparently eager acceptance of the partnership show the respect in which Fromm is held in the musical community. It bids well for the future of musical creativity in this country and in all the Western World.

THE SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER &
THE SUNDAY RECORD AMERICAN
S. 415,000

JUL 16 1972

New England Newsclip

MUSIC

The future of Fromm

By ELLEN PFEIFER

The Fromm Music Foundation, since 1952 one of the most visible and generous benefactors of contemporary music and its makers, is shifting its base of operations from Princeton University to Harvard.

The move, announced in a few oblique paragraphs at the end of the Foundation's Twentieth Anniversary retrospective booklet, is meant to insure the organization's future, "to end the era in which it was simply an extension of myself," writes founder Paul Fromm, and "to assure a permanent role for the Foundation as a vital force in contemporary music."

To this end, "Harvard's institutional stability and vast ever-renewing human resources will add new strength to the organizational and functional structure of the Foundation."

That sounds very pat indeed until you stop to think that Princeton is a fairly stable institution and begin to wonder about the real reason behind the official explanation.

Fromm, a cultured, European-born wine importer and musical amateur created the foundation "to bridge the gap that exists between contemporary composers and society. The central purpose was to restore to the composer this rightful position at the center of musical life" through programs that focus "on individual artists, individual works and individual musical situations.

This commitment took several directions, "all concentrated on bringing about meaningful interactions among composers, performers and audiences."

Programs developed included the commissioning of works by young and relatively unknown composers as well as established ones; providing optimum performing conditions; co-sponsoring the annual Tanglewood Festival of Contemporary Music as part of a comprehensive program of study and performance of new music; subsidizing recordings and special radio programs; and sponsoring seminars for composers and critics and the magazine "Perspectives of New Music." program came some of the most distinguished new music of the last two decades — works such as Babbitt's "Vision and Prayer," Berio's "Circles," and Elliott Carter's Double Concerto. As a result of Fromm's encouragement, the University of Chicago Contemporary Chamber Players were formed in 1967 and have been presenting a regular series ever since.

And, at Princeton, a series of Seminars in Advanced Musical Studies was created as well as the journal "Perspectives." The university itself became a center for contemporary music attracting composers, theorists and students.

In recent years, that whole milieu has become more and more oriented to what Fromm calls "hard-core serialism," theory and technology. The magazine "Perspectives," became an organ for esoteric hypertheoretical articles, often related to serialsim (now somewhat out of fashion) and often by Princeton students.

And that is where Fromm had problems.

"Is music art or is music science," he asked over the telephone last week. "Music is a communicative art, but when structural relationships become impossible to understand that presents an overriding obstact for the listener."

"At Princeton, you have some profound minds but what they develop is a mode of discourse among specialists. Their over-riding concern is with materials, not any longer with communicative art," he told a New York Times reporter.

Then, too, Fromm "disagreed on editorial policy" with Benjamin Boretz, the "Perspectives" editor. "He overstressed the 12-tone system and underemphasized the spontaneous. The magazine became so sectarian; only one segment of the community was represented."

The last straw, according to a distinguished composer and writer who was told the story by a colleague close to the situation, was the proposed publication in "Perspectives" of an article "using all those words found in advanced magazines these days," that is, obscenities. The issue of the journal was devoted to Stravinsky and when "Fromm found out about the article, he felt the dignity of the situation had been injured. And Harvard was there to pick up the pieces."

While minimizing the situation, Fromm acknowledged the existence of the article referring to it as "outright frivolous" and typical of something in "a little under-the-counter magazine."

At Harvard, most of the Foundation programs will remain the same. However, "Perspectives" will not make the move, but is being left to Princeton which will have to find other sources of support after August.

In its place, Fromm would like to establish an annual dealing with "music as an art" and giving "theory peripherial treatment." Such an annual, he thinks, "would be more relevant to the contemporary arts scene." There would be a new editor for every issue and thus "no domination by a single-minded group."

The Fromm Foundation's move, then, parallels a trend which Fromm finds encouraging. "We have come to the point now where a number of composers are appearing who are again concerned with making music for people who want to listen to music." And the Foundation wants to make that as easy as possible.

Chicago's Fromm Music Foundation

Atonality Still in Disfavor Despite Its Noble Efforts

By WILLIAM J. NAZZARO
Of The Bulletin Staff

THE FROMM Music Foundation of Chicago has just completed celebrating its 20th anniversary with a week-long festival of contemporary music at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer home in Lenox, Mass. From Aug. 4 through Aug. 10, the festival presented eight concerts featuring five world premiere performances.

That certainly made for plenty of new works to contemplate, but the problem of the festival, and perhaps the generally unheralded tragedy of the Fromm Music Foundation, has been its failure to aid in creating any music that has entered the mainstream of our musical life. In a booklet commemorating his foundation's 20th anniversary, Paul Fromm states that "our aim in awarding commissions has been to stimulate the initiative of composers so they can contribute more fully to the development of a living musical culture."

The booklet catalogs some 98 works commissioned by the foundation since its birth, yet not one would be recognized by a regular concert goer, except perhaps by name. Despite the many well known composers in the list, not one work has touched the heart of the audience for serious music.

• • •

OBVIOUSLY THE Fromm Music Foundation is a noble enterprise. Without its aid many works would never have been composed. If the purpose of the Fromm Foundation is to encourage composers to write music, it has succeeded. But if its purpose is to encourage composers to write music that will be part of our musical life, it has been a failure.

This is hardly the fault of the foundation. It is simply a commentary on the quality of musical creation in recent years. Is it that we are in a fallow period that inevitably must give way when some genius bursts upon the scene? Or, is it rather a reflection of what has happened in music in the 20th century? I suspect the latter.

There was always an audience for new music up until the 1920's and 30's, when new music for some reason seemed to inspire less interest for the great mass of people who supported concerts and opera. In fact, the state of opera is even worse than symphonic music.

There has hardly been an opera written that has made the standard repertoire since the First World War. True, Alban Berg's "Wozzeck" flits in and out of the repertoire, but it is a special case and probably succeeds as much for the drama as for the music.

Many observers believe the blame lies directly with the interest of 20th century composers in atonal music. This system, developed by Arnold Schoenberg along with his disciples Berg and Anton Webern, has never received real audience support. Atonality seems to me almost anti-music in its final result. Some of the music of Schoenberg and his disciples undoubtedly appeals to the intellect, but who could ever call Beethoven's Ninth merely a work of intellectual interest?

• • •

MUSIC IS meant to stir the emotions; it's not simply a matter of mathematics, although mathematics are a very important part of any great work. And there is probably something else, too.

Up until the First World War, western civilization rested on a certain Judeo-Christian foundation that most men more or less accepted. But since that war, and especially since the end of World War II the foundation has not been so firm. We are not as confident as we once were.

Anyone listening to Handel's "Messiah" realizes that Handel knew exactly his place in the world and his relationship to his creator. This is music of supremely confident and secure man. But listen to Schoenberg's "Pierrot Lunaire," which is almost a nightmare set to music. "Wozzeck" is practically a nightmare, too.

So it may be that the composers who have gone the road of atonality are those who no longer can accept the basic foundations that have held western civilization together. For the same reason, they are saying, why accept the basic foundations that have held western music together?

The audience, however, has rebelled, and it doesn't go to concerts where this music is performed. Atonal music simply doesn't contain the elements to make it expressive and meaningful for the concert going audience. Verdi said, "Always watch the box office receipts, that's how you can tell if music is a success."

And he was probably right. Music should be written to please an audience, not to please boards of foundations. So much of today's music seems to be composed by a clique writing for each other's amusement. The audience gets left out in the cold, and the audience, too often, has decided to stay home.

• • •

THE MUSIC of this century that is listened to, that music lovers buy recordings of, that stirs the soul and excites the emotions, is the music of composers who have sternly resisted the school of Schoenberg. Ravel, De Falla, Prokofiev, Bartok, and, the greatest of them all, Stravinsky.

And when Stravinsky toyed with atonality the last few years of his life little of value resulted.

Who are the most popular composers of our day? Copland, Britten, Bernstein, Shostakovich. They are writing music for audiences, and they are performed.

But do you know Charles Wuorinen, or Milton Babbitt, or Bruno Maderna? Their works get performed, too — once.

It would not be fair to say that every Fromm commission has gone to atonal composers. There are conservatives on the list—Martinu, Hovhaness, Diamond—but unless our contemporary composers shake off the chains of atonality, and write music to be listened to, with the idea that after a performance 3,000 people will get up and cheer, then our concert life will continue to be the same standard masterpieces, repeated year in and year out. That way lies stagnation, and oblivion.

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 154,165 SUN. 311,112
JUL 9 1972

The Sunday Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
SUN. 701,743
AUG 13 1972

Fromm Foundation, Harvard to Make Music Together

By THOMAS PUTMAN

FOR 20 YEARS NOW the Fromm Music Foundation has supported music at its source by commissioning composers and assisting in the presentation of contemporary music concerts. Foundation director Paul Fromm defines his purpose: "Our primary objective over these years has been to bridge the gap that exists between contemporary composers and society . . . to restore to the composer his rightful position at the center of musical life."

To some it might appear that Fromm is off pitch. What's that about the composer being the center of musical life? What nonsense! Fromm must be forgetting that music is a social event, and that what really interests the public is the glamour of the star performer.

ANYWAY — WHO CARES about new music? Nobody understands it. Composers are writing for composers these days.

It is precisely this state of affairs that the Fromm Music Foundation is trying to correct through its dedication to "music as a living art." Music, Fromm states, is an interaction "among composers, performers and audiences."

His recently published statement of achievements and goals announces the new association between the foundation and Harvard University.

"The time has come to end the era in which the Fromm Music Foundation was simply an extension of myself." On Sept. 1 the foundation will become the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard University.

DIRECTORS OF THE foundation with Fromm are Gunther Schuller, the composer, conductor and president of the New England Conservatory of Music, and A. Tillman Merritt, for many years the chairman of the music department at Harvard.

The commissioning program of the foundation has involved young and relatively unknown composers as well as established composers. The list of commissions from 1952 to 1972 contains works by 88 composers. It seems unbelievable given the evidence of our present musical life that there exist so many working composers.

Some of the 88 are more less well known to a follower of the new music scene: Milton Babbitt, Luciano Berio, Easley Blackwood, Elliott Carter, Michael Colgrass, Ingolf Dahl, Mario Davidovsky, David Del Tredici, David Diamond, Irving Fine, Lukas Foss, Kenneth Gaburo, Alberto Ginastera, Bernhard Heiden, Robert Helps, Alan Hovhaness, Andrew Imbrie, Leon Kirchner, Ernst Krenek, Bruno Maderna, Donald Martino.

IT DOES NOT HURT to at least recite the names — if not the music, which is beyond the province of this column. The 88 also include Bohuslav Martinu, Salvatore Martirano, Lawrence Moss, Robert Palmer, Harry Partch, Oedoen Partos, Wallingford Riegger, George Rochberg, Gunther Schuller, Roger Sessions. Ralph Shapey, Stanley Silverman, Harvey Sollberger, Halsey Stevens, Richard Trythall, Ben Weber, Stefan Wolpe, Charles Wuorinen.

There is no questioning the importance of the commissioning program. "All music is modern music in its own time," writes Fromm, "and music as an art will cease to exist if a living flow of musical creation no longer reaches a concerned and interested public."

But the composer is suspect, someone to be feared, an outsider. Fromm recognizes in our culture "the increasing imbalance between artistic and commercial values" and the absurd situation in which our society is denied contact "with music that expresses its own sensibilities."

CONCERTS AND FESTIVALS under the auspices of the Fromm Foundation have taken place in such music centers as New York, Boston, Chicago, Los Angeles and San Francisco. Fourteen works were commissioned for a festival of contemporary arts in 1967 at the University of Illinois, and last year at the New England Conservatory of Music Gunther Schuller directed a festival of music by 46 New England composers, including some 19th Century music.

The annual composers program at the Marlboro Festival in Vermont is a result of a Fromm project in 1959, when one 20th Century work appeared on each program of the festival. Leon Kirchner directed the program and recordings under his direction of Schoenberg's Serenade and Suite are available from the Marlboro Recording Society. These performances demonstrate the value of careful preparation in the best performance situation (A recent program on Channel 17's "Vibrations" series showed Kirchner rehearsing Schoenberg at Marlboro; it was an excellent view of musical preparation involving very difficult music.)

At Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., the Fromm Music Foundation since 1956 has sponsored the Berkshire Music Center extensive contemporary music activities, including a commissioning program for young composers, a fellowship program for young performers, and an annual festival of contemporary music.

IMPORTANT COMPOSER-performer relationships have been developed at Tanglewood under this program.

The Tanglewood Festival of Contemporary Music was started in 1964. During the festival, which this year runs from Aug. 4 through Aug. 10, some 40 contemporary works are performed.

Michael Tilson Thomas, music director of the Buffalo Philarmonic, will conduct the opening program of the Tanglewood Festival of Contemporary Music on Aug. 4 with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program includes the first performance of Charles Wuorimen's Concerto for Amplified Violin and Orchestra, commissioned by the From Music Foundation, with Paul Zukofsky as soloist. Other works are Carf Ruggle's "Evocations for Orchestra" (which Thomas conducted here last season), and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," both played in memory of the composers, and Copland's Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson, with soprano Phyllis Curtin.

Tanglewood Concert Honors Fromm

By DONAL HANAHAN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 9—The arguing, booing and intra-fraternal name-calling that have enlivened or polluted (taste in these matters varies) this year's Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood were put aside last night. The at-least-temporary healing agent was a concert honoring the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, which cooperates with the Berkshire Music Center in putting on this annual celebration of newness in the very bosom of the conservative Boston Symphony Orchestra and its Tanglewood Festival.

Paul Fromm, the Chicago wine importer who has commissioned some 90 compositions during his foundation's life to date, accepted the audience's applause with a graceful speech in which he confessed the tendency of his group and others in recent decades to pit new music against old in an effort to integrate the two. Mr. Fromm added that the token integration thereby achieved often resulted in "mere busing of new works to the halls of Brahms and Beethoven." He urged instead a recognition of the need for coexistence of many types of music in our pluralistic society.

•

The concert aptly offered four works commissioned by the Fromm Foundation, including first performances of Gunther Schuller's "The Invenzione" (1972) and Bruno Maderna's "Giardino Religioso" (1972), both for chamber orchestra and both conducted by the composers. In a restrospective of sorts, Mr. Schuller also conducted two of the most important Fromm commissions of the last decade: Luciano Berio's "Circles" (1960), with Barbara Hocher as vocal soloist, and Elliott Carter's Double Concerto for Harpsichord and Piano with Two Chamber Orchestras, in which Ursula Oppens and Gilbert Kalish took the solo keyboard roles.

Both the 1972 pieces proved to be impressive additions to the Fromm collection of modern art. Mr. Schuller's prevailingly serial three-movement "inventions" employed 25 players divided into five quintets, none including strings. The first movement was a mosaic of small scraps hurtling about seemingly at random. The second moved from annunciatory clusters of thick, opaque chords into tightly interwoven patterns of high and low contrasts. The third, slipping into tonally oriented interludes now and then, provided the most fascination, with its staccato bursts and an antiphonal trading of the ideas among the spatially separated quintets.

•

The players, all Berkshire Music Center students, gave Mr. Schuller (who is artistic co-director of Tanglewood and therefore their musical guru) an alert and technically superlative performance.

Mr. Maderna's "Giardino Religioso" also dispersed its players in groups to exploit the mobile potential in his kind of open-form music, which permits a certain amount of controlled chance to operate. The conductor officiated in a priestly way over the ceremony, sometimes striking a triangle hanging at his podium, or moving into the orchestra's midst to give instructive sermonettes on bongos or celesta, which led to percussive jam sessions.

•

As it took shape, Mr. Maderna's "Religious Garden" moved from the barest wisps of string tone to a central section of all-out cacophony (too long and uninteresting, one felt) and ended with a distant elegy in which the two trumpets exchanged poignant statements that put one inevitably in mind of Ives's "The Unanswered Question."

In "Circles," the light-voiced Miss Hocher was sometimes hampered by an unreliable amplifying system that cut in and out at odd times, but she handled Berio's vocal gymnastics and phonetic jokes with surprising ease and panache.

LATHAM, N. Y.
TOWNSMAN
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
W. - CIRC. N. AVAIL.
JUL 27 1972

20th Anniversary Of Fromm Music Foundation

The 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood takes place this year from Aug. 4 through 10.

The Festival, celebrating the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, is sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music) in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Often called a "Festival-within-a-Festival," the concerts turn Tanglewood into the contemporary music capital of the world during its intensive and exciting annual presentation of new and challenging works, some commissioned especially for the Festival, many heard in premiere performances. This season, the Festival of Contemporary Music will expand its program, and will include, among other highlights, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Festival of Contemporary Music opens this year at the beginning of the sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, Aug. 4 at 7 p.m. with a special Weekend Prelude concert devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, chairman Emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Music to be performed is Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson, with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtin (one of the 1972 Tanglewood Granrud Artists-in-Residence). and Copland as pianist; Piano variations with Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas as pianist; and Vitebsk, study on a Jewish theme performed by Boston Symphony Chamber Players Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with Aaron Copland as pianist.

The 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Friday evening, Aug. 4 in the Shed is conducted by the Orchestra's Associate Conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, with soloists soprano Phyllis Curtin, and violinist Paul Zukofsky. The concert opens with Carl Ruggles' Evocations for orchestra (performed in memory of the composer), followed by the orchestral version of the Poems of Emily Dickinson by Aaron Copland, with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtin. Paul Zukofsky next performs the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin and orchestra. The concerto was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation. The evening's concert concludes with Thomas conducting a performance of Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring, also played in memory of the composer.

Chicago's Fromm Music Foundation

Atonality Still in Disfavor Despite Its Noble Efforts

By WILLIAM J. NAZZARO
Of The Bulletin Staff

THE FROMM Music Foundation of Chicago has just completed celebrating its 20th anniversary with a week-long festival of contemporary music at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer home in Lenox, Mass. From Aug. 4 through Aug. 10, the festival presented eight concerts featuring five world premiere performances.

That certainly made for plenty of new works to contemplate, but the problem of the festival, and perhaps the generally unheralded tragedy of the Fromm Music Foundation, has been its failure to aid in creating any music that has entered the mainstream of our musical life. In a booklet commemorating his foundation's 20th anniversary, Paul Fromm states that "our aim in awarding commissions has been to stimulate the initiative of composers so they can contribute more fully to the development of a living musical culture."

The booklet catalogs some 98 works commissioned by the foundation since its birth, yet not one would be recognized by a regular concert goer, except perhaps by name. Despite the many well known composers in the list, not one work has touched the heart of the audience for serious music.

• • •

OBVIOUSLY THE Fromm Music Foundation is a noble enterprise. Without its aid many works would never have been composed. If the purpose of the Fromm Foundation is to encourage composers to write music, it has succeeded. But if its purpose is to encourage composers to write music that will be part of our musical life, it has been a failure.

This is hardly the fault of the foundation. It is simply a commentary on the quality of musical creation in recent years. Is it that we are in a fallow period that inevitably must give way when some genius bursts upon the scene? Or, is it rather a reflection of what has happened in music in the 20th century? I suspect the latter.

There was always an audience for new music up until the 1920's and 30's, when new music for some reason seemed to inspire less interest for the great mass of people who supported concerts and opera. In fact, the state of opera is even worse than symphonic music.

There has hardly been an opera written that has made the standard repertoire since the First World War. True, Alban Berg's "Wozzeck" flits in and out of the repertoire, but it is a special case and probably succeeds as much for the drama as for the music.

Many observers believe the blame lies directly with the interest of 20th century composers in atonal music. This system, developed by Arnold Schoenberg along with his disciples Berg and Anton Webern, has never received real audience support. Atonality seems to me almost anti-music in its final result. Some of the music of Schoenberg and his disciples undoubtedly appeals to the intellect, but who could ever call Beethoven's Ninth merely a work of intellectual interest?

• • •

MUSIC IS meant to stir the emotions; it's not simply a matter of mathematics, although mathematics are a very important part of any great work. And there is probably something else, too.

Up until the First World War, western civilization rested on a certain Judeo-Christian foundation that most men more or less accepted. But since that war, and especially since the end of World War II the foundation has not been so firm. We are not as confident as we once were.

Anyone listening to Handel's "Messiah" realizes that Handel knew exactly his place in the world and his relationship to his creator. This is music of supremely confident and secure man. But listen to Schoenberg's "Pierrot Lunaire," which is almost a nightmare set to music. "Wozzeck" is practically a nightmare, too.

So it may be that the composers who have gone the road of atonality are those who no longer can accept the basic foundations that have held western civilization together. For the same reason, they are saying, why accept the basic foundations that have held western music together?

The audience, however, has rebelled, and it doesn't go to concerts where this music is performed. Atonal music simply doesn't contain the elements to make it expressive and meaningful for the concert going audience. Verdi said, "Always watch the box office receipts, that's how you can tell if music is a success."

And he was probably right. Music should be written to please an audience, not to please boards of foundations. So much of today's music seems to be composed by a clique writing for each other's amusement. The audience gets left out in the cold, and the audience, too often, has decided to stay home.

• • •

THE MUSIC of this century that is listened to, that music lovers buy recordings of, that stirs the soul and excites the emotions, is the music of composers who have sternly resisted the school of Schoenberg. Ravel, De Falla, Prokofiev, Bartok, and, the greatest of them all, Stravinsky.

And when Stravinsky toyed with atonality the last few years of his life little of value resulted.

Who are the most popular composers of our day? Copland, Britten, Bernstein, Shostakovich. They are writing music for audiences, and they are performed.

But do you know Charles Wuorinen, or Milton Babbitt, or Bruno Maderna? Their works get performed, too — once.

It would not be fair to say that every Fromm commission has gone to atonal composers. There are conservatives on the list—Martinu, Hovhaness, Diamond—but unless our contemporary composers shake off the chains of atonality, and write music to be listened to, with the idea that after a performance 3,000 people will get up and cheer, then our concert life will continue to be the same standard masterpieces, repeated year in and year out. That way lies stagnation, and oblivion.

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 154,165 SUN. 311,112
JUL 9 1972

The Sunday Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
SUN. 701,743
AUG 13 1972

Tanglewood Concert Honors Fromm

By DONAL HANAHAN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 9—The arguing, booing and intra-fraternal name-calling that have enlivened or polluted (taste in these matters varies) this year's Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood were put aside last night. The at-least-temporary healing agent was a concert honoring the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, which cooperates with the Berkshire Music Center in putting on this annual celebration of newness in the very bosom of the conservative Boston Symphony Orchestra and its Tanglewood Festival.

Paul Fromm, the Chicago wine importer who has commissioned some 90 compositions during his foundation's life to date, accepted the audience's applause with a graceful speech in which he confessed the tendency of his group and others in recent decades to pit new music against old in an effort to integrate the two. Mr. Fromm added that the token integration thereby achieved often resulted in "mere busing of new works to the halls of Brahms and Beethoven." He urged instead a recognition of the need for coexistence of many types of music in our pluralistic society.

•

The concert aptly offered four works commissioned by the Fromm Foundation, including first performances of Gunther Schuller's "The Invenzione" (1972) and Bruno Maderna's "Giardino Religioso" (1972), both for chamber orchestra and both conducted by the composers. In a restrospective of sorts, Mr. Schuller also conducted two of the most important Fromm commissions of the last decade: Luciano Berio's "Circles" (1960), with Barbara Hocher as vocal soloist, and Elliott Carter's Double Concerto for Harpsichord and Piano with Two Chamber Orchestras, in which Ursula Oppens and Gilbert Kalish took the solo keyboard roles.

Both the 1972 pieces proved to be impressive additions to the Fromm collection of modern art. Mr. Schuller's prevailingly serial three-movement "inventions" employed 25 players divided into five quintets, none including strings. The first movement was a mosaic of small scraps hurtling about seemingly at random. The second moved from annunciatory clusters of thick, opaque chords into tightly interwoven patterns of high and low contrasts. The third, slipping into tonally oriented interludes now and then, provided the most fascination, with its staccato bursts and an antiphonal trading of the ideas among the spatially separated quintets.

•

The players, all Berkshire Music Center students, gave Mr. Schuller (who is artistic co-director of Tanglewood and therefore their musical guru) an alert and technically superlative performance.

Mr. Maderna's "Giardino Religioso" also dispersed its players in groups to exploit the mobile potential in his kind of open-form music, which permits a certain amount of controlled chance to operate. The conductor officiated in a priestly way over the ceremony, sometimes striking a triangle hanging at his podium, or moving into the orchestra's midst to give instructive sermonettes on bongos or celesta, which led to percussive jam sessions.

•

As it took shape, Mr. Maderna's "Religious Garden" moved from the barest wisps of string tone to a central section of all-out cacophony (too long and uninteresting, one felt) and ended with a distant elegy in which the two trumpets exchanged poignant statements that put one inevitably in mind of Ives's "The Unanswered Question."

In "Circles," the light-voiced Miss Hocher was sometimes hampered by an unreliable amplifying system that cut in and out at ood times, but she handled Berio's vocal gymnastics and phonetic jokes with surprising ease and panache.

LATHAM, N. Y.
TOWNSMAN
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
W. - CIRC. N. AVAIL.
JUL 27 1972

Fromm Foundation, Harvard to Make Music Together

By THOMAS PUTMAN

FOR 20 YEARS NOW the Fromm Music Foundation has supported music at its source by commissioning composers and assisting in the presentation of contemporary music concerts. Foundation director Paul Fromm defines his purpose: "Our primary objective over these years has been to bridge the gap that exists between contemporary composers and society . . . to restore to the composer his rightful position at the center of musical life."

To some it might appear that Fromm is off pitch. What's that about the composer being the center of musical life? What nonsense! Fromm must be forgetting that music is a social event, and that what really interests the public is the glamour of the star performer.

ANYWAY — WHO CARES about new music? Nobody understands it. Composers are writing for composers these days.

It is precisely this state of affairs that the Fromm Music Foundation is trying to correct through its dedication to "music as a living art." Music, Fromm states, is an interaction "among composers, performers and audiences."

His recently published statement of achievements and goals announces the new association between the foundation and Harvard University.

"The time has come to end the era in which the Fromm Music Foundation was simply an extension of myself." On Sept. 1 the foundation will become the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard University.

DIRECTORS OF THE foundation with Fromm are Gunther Schuller, the composer, conductor and president of the New England Conservatory of Music, and A. Tillman Merritt, for many years the chairman of the music department at Harvard.

The commissioning program of the foundation has involved young and relatively unknown composers as well as established composers. The list of commissions from 1952 to 1972 contains works by 88 composers. It seems unbelievable given the evidence of our present musical life that there exist so many working composers.

Some of the 88 are more less well known to a follower of the new music scene: Milton Babbitt, Luciano Berio, Easley Blackwood, Elliott Carter, Michael Colgrass, Ingolf Dahl, Mario Davidovsky, David Del Tredici, David Diamond, Irving Fine, Lukas Foss, Kenneth Gaburo, Alberto Ginastera, Bernhard Heiden, Robert Helps, Alan Hovhaness, Andrew Imbrie, Leon Kirchner, Ernst Krenek, Bruno Maderna, Donald Martino.

IT DOES NOT HURT to at least recite the names — if not the music, which is beyond the province of this column. The 88 also include Bohuslav Martinu, Salvatore Martirano, Lawrence Moss, Robert Palmer, Harry Partch, Oedoen Partos, Wallingford Riegger, George Rochberg, Gunther Schuller, Roger Sessions. Ralph Shapey, Stanley Silverman, Harvey Sollberger, Halsey Stevens, Richard Trythall, Ben Weber, Stefan Wolpe, Charles Wuorinen.

There is no questioning the importance of the commissioning program. "All music is modern music in its own time," writes Fromm, "and music as an art will cease to exist if a living flow of musical creation no longer reaches a concerned and interested public."

But the composer is suspect, someone to be feared, an outsider. Fromm recognizes in our culture "the increasing imbalance between artistic and commercial values" and the absurd situation in which our society is denied contact "with music that expresses its own sensibilities."

CONCERTS AND FESTIVALS under the auspices of the Fromm Foundation have taken place in such music centers as New York, Boston, Chicago, Los Angeles and San Francisco. Fourteen works were commissioned for a festival of contemporary arts in 1967 at the University of Illinois, and last year at the New England Conservatory of Music Gunther Schuller directed a festival of music by 46 New England composers, including some 19th Century music.

The annual composers program at the Marlboro Festival in Vermont is a result of a Fromm project in 1959, when one 20th Century work appeared on each program of the festival. Leon Kirchner directed the program and recordings under his direction of Schoenberg's Serenade and Suite are available from the Marlboro Recording Society. These performances demonstrate the value of careful preparation in the best performance situation (A recent program on Channel 17's "Vibrations" series showed Kirchner rehearsing Schoenberg at Marlboro; it was an excellent view of musical preparation involving very difficult music.)

At Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., the Fromm Music Foundation since 1956 has sponsored the Berkshire Music Center extensive contemporary music activities, including a commissioning program for young composers, a fellowship program for young performers, and an annual festival of contemporary music.

IMPORTANT COMPOSER-performer relationships have been developed at Tanglewood under this program.

The Tanglewood Festival of Contemporary Music was started in 1964. During the festival, which this year runs from Aug. 4 through Aug. 10, some 40 contemporary works are performed.

Michael Tilson Thomas, music director of the Buffalo Philarmonic, will conduct the opening program of the Tanglewood Festival of Contemporary Music on Aug. 4 with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program includes the first performance of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for Amplified Violin and Orchestra, commissioned by the From Music Foundation, with Paul Zukofsky as soloist. Other works are Carf Ruggle's "Evocations for Orchestra" (which Thomas conducted here last season), and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," both played in memory of the composers, and Copland's Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson, with soprano Phyllis Curtin.

20th Anniversary Of Fromm Music Foundation

The 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood takes place this year from Aug. 4 through 10.

The Festival, celebrating the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, is sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music) in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Often called a "Festival-within-a-Festival," the concerts turn Tanglewood into the contemporary music capital of the world during its intensive and exciting annual presentation of new and challenging works, some commissioned especially for the Festival, many heard in premiere performances. This season, the Festival of Contemporary Music will expand its program, and will include, among other highlights, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Festival of Contemporary Music opens this year at the beginning of the sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, Aug. 4 at 7 p.m. with a special Weekend Prelude concert devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, chairman Emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Music to be performed is Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson, with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtin (one of the 1972 Tanglewood Granrud Artists-in-Residence). and Copland as pianist; Piano variations with Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas as pianist; and Vitebsk, study on a Jewish theme performed by Boston Symphony Chamber Players Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with Aaron Copland as pianist.

The 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Friday evening, Aug. 4 in the Shed is conducted by the Orchestra's Associate Conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, with soloists soprano Phyllis Curtin, and violinist Paul Zukofsky. The concert opens with Carl Ruggles' Evocations for orchestra (performed in memory of the composer), followed by the orchestral version of the Poems of Emily Dickinson by Aaron Copland, with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtin. Paul Zukofsky next performs the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin and orchestra. The concerto was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation. The evening's concert concludes with Thomas conducting a performance of Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring, also played in memory of the composer.

144

Tanglewood contemporary music festival continues

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASSACHUSETTS — Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts two concerts by the Orchestra as part of the sixth weekend Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, August 4, 5, and 6.

The concerts Friday evening, August 4 are part of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music), and the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, which this year is celebrating its 20th Anniversary.

The weekend Prelude Friday evening, August 4 at 7:00 p.m. in the Shed is devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, Chairman Emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. The Prelude opens with "Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson" with soprano Phyllis Curtin, and the composer at the piano. Next is "Piano variations" with Michael Tilson Thomas, pianist. The Prelude closes with performances of Vitebsk, "Study on a Jewish Theme", with Boston Symphony Chamber Players members Joseph Silverstein violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with the composer at the piano.

PHYLLIS CURTIN

The 9:00 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Music Shed is conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas with violin soloist Paul Zukovsky. This opening orchestral concert of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation, opens with Ruggles "Evocations for Orchestra", and Copland's "Eight Poems of Emily Dickinson" with soprano Phillis Curtin. Both works are performed for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Next is the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin, and orchestra with soloist Paul Zukofsky. The concerto was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation as part of its 20th Anniversary celebration. The concert concludes with a performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring".

The season's sixth Saturday morning open rehearsal takes place at 10:30 a.m. August 5. Tickets are $2.50 each, one sale at the Festival Ticket Office two hours before the beginning of the open rehearsal. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefits the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund.

JOHN BROWNING

Aldo Ceccato, recently appointed principal conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Saturday evening, August 5 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist for that evening's concert is pianist John Browning. The concert opens with Mendelssohn's Symphony no. 1, followed by performance of Prokofiev's Third piano concerto with soloist John Browning. The concert concludes with Dvorak's Symphony no. 9, the "New World."

Sunday afternoon, August 6 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, Michael Tilson Thomas again conducts the Boston Symphony with soloist Ralph Gomberg, principal oboeist of the Boston Symphony. The concert is Haydn's Oboe concerto, and Mahler's Symphony no. 5.

BOSTON POPS

Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Pops at Tanglewood Tuesday evening, August 1 at 8:30 p.m. The annual Boston Pops Pension Fund concert features the music of Lerner and Loewe with soloists Louis Russell soprano, Corinne Curry mezzo-soprano, Vahan Khanzadian tenor, Richard Fredricks baritone, with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director. The concert includes selections from Camelot, Gigi, Brigadoon, Paint Your Wagon, and My Fair Lady. Also to be played is Lennon and McCartney's 'Eleanor Rigby', a medley of Burt Bacharach tunes, and Melanie's 'Look What They've Done to My Song'. Ticket prices are from $3.50 to $8.50 with admission to the lawn at $3, on sale two hours before the concert. Tickets are available from the Festival Ticket Office at Tanglewood (413-637-1600) and at all Ticketron locations.

FESTIVAL CONTINUES

The Festival of Contemporary Music continues through August 10 with a wide range of performances by Berkshire Music Center students, including vocal and chamber music programs, a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert, and performances by the Center's Music Theatre Project. There will also be a concert by Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Saturday, August 5, the Festival presents a Berkshire Music Center Vocal Music Recital at 2:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. The program includes Druckman's 'Dark Upon the Harp', Kim's 'Letters Found Near a Suicide,' Powell's 'Haiku Settings,' and Carter's 'Robert Frost Songs.'

'CHOCORUA'

Sunday evening, August 6 at 8:30 p.m. in the West Barn, the Berkshire Music Center Theatre Project presents the world premier of Robert Selig's 'Chocorua,' commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation. Also to be performed on the same program is Brecht-Weill's 'The Yes Man.' 'Chocorua' is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by the Boston Poet Richard Moore. Its story, derived from actual events of the eighteenth century, tells of Indian Chief Chocorua who stays behind in New Hampshire when his tribe emigrates northward, to mingle with the English settlers with tragic results.

CONTEMPORARY MUSIC

Monday evening, August 7 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre Concert Hall, Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presents a concert that includes Foss' 'Time Cycle (chamber version), Druckman's 'Valentine', Crumb's 'Madrigals', Books I and II, Pusztai's 'Nocturnes,' and Davidovsky's 'Synchronisms no. 2.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

AUG 2 1972

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Lists Contemporary Music Festival

LENOX, Mass. — A festival of contemporary music will be featured at Tanglewood, Friday through Aug. 10. World premiere performances of works by Wuorinen, Selig, Lerdahl, Schuller and Maderna are included.

On Friday at 7 and 9 p.m., soprano Phyllis Curtin will perform Aaron Copland's "Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson."

Copland will accompany her on piano.

The 7 p.m. performance also includes "Piano Variations" featuring Michael Tilson Thomas and Vitebsk's "Study on a Jewish Theme."

The 9 p.m. performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Thomas, features "Evocations for Orchestra," Ruggles; "Concerto for Amplified Violin and Orchestra," Wuorinen and Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring."

On Saturday at 2:30 p.m. there will be a recital by the Berkshire Music Center Choir, including Druckman's "Dark Upon the Harp," Kim's "Letters Found Near A Suicide," Powell's "Haiku Settings" and Carter's "Robert Forst Songs."

On Sunday at 8:30 p.m., the Brecht-Weil collaboration, "The Yes Man," will be performed, and Selig's "Chocorus." This will be a Berkshire Music Center "theater project."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Contemporary Music Ensemble will present "College" on Monday at 8:30 p.m. The program includes Foss' "Time," Druckman's "Valentine," Crumb's "Madrigals," Pusztai's "Nocturnes" and Davidovsky's "Synchronisms No. Two."

On Tuesday, 8:30 p.m., the center's chamber ensemble, conducted by Bruno Maderna and Gunther Schuller, will do Berio's "Circles," Carter's "Double Concerto," Schuller's "Tre Invenzione" and Maderna's "Giardion Religioso."

On Wednesday, 8:30 p.m., the program includes Imbrie's "To A Traveler," Kim's "rattling on . . ." Mather's "Cantata II" and Erb's "Brass Quinetet."

The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, conducted by Maderna, will present music by Webern, Shinohara, Lerdahl and Druckman Thursday at 8:30 p.m.

Poughkeepsie Journal
POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
D. 35,739 SUN. 41,003
AUG 3 1972

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
S. 106,767
AUG 6 1972
New England Newsclip

Contemporary Music at Tanglewood

The Berkshire Music Center "campus" at Tanglewood will be the contemporary music capital of the world beginning tonight at 8:30 with the world premiere of Robert Selig's "Chocorua," commissioned by the center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation.

This "Festival-Within-a-Festival" celebrates the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Foundation, sponsored by Paul Fromm, Chicago businessman.

He is founder and president of Geeting & Fromm, Inc., wine importer which he described to us in an interview as "perhaps the smallest of the big firms in the field and surely the biggest of the small ones."

Since its founding 20 years ago, the Fromm Foundation has commissioned new works of 88 composers.

Tonight's program will include the Brecht-Weill "The Yes Man." Their more noted production is "The Threepenny Opera," concerning the nefarious activities of Mack the Knife.

Tomorrow night's Boston Symphony Orchestra Contemporary Music Ensemble program includes Lukas Foss' "Time Cycle," Druckman's "Valentine," and Davidovsky's "Synchronisms No. 2."

Two world premieres will be heard Tuesday night in Tanglewood's Shed, conducted by their composers — Gunther Schuller's "Tre Invenzione," and Bruno Maderna's "Giardino Religioso." Schuller is artistic director of the Berkshire Center and Madema has been teaching there this summer, as well as conducting the Boston Symphony in two concerns of the Berkshire Music Festival.

Wednesday night's chamber music concert in Tanglewood's Theater-Concert Hall, is Imbrie's To a Traveler," Kim's "rattling on," Mather's Cantata II, and Erb's Brass Quintet.

Maderna will conduct the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in the concluding program Thursday night — Webern's Variations for Orchestra Opus 30, Shinohara's Piece for Orchestra, Lerdahl's "Chromorhythmos," and Druckman's "Windows."

PIANIST Gina Bachauer has selected an unusually challenging program for the Weekend Prelude Friday at 7 p.m. The preludes are free to those who have tickets for the Berkshire Festival's Friday night concerts by the Boston Symphony, beginning at 9 p.m.

Mrs. Bachaeur will play Mozart's Piano Sonata in F major, K.332; Ravel's "Gaspard de la Nuit," and Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Paganini, Set 2, Opus 35.

The following night, Saturday, she will be soloist in Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto, with Colin Davis conducting the Boston Symphony.

TO HELP RAISE the standard of music criticism in this country, the Music Critics Association is again sponsoring a Music Critics Institute, in cooperation with the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts. It will take place in Washington, D.C., from Aug. 12 to Sept. 7.

The participants, selected from a national roster of candidates, are William R. Albright (La Jolla Light and Journal); Richard Covello (Chicago Lake-Shore Gazette); Susan Edelman (Bloomington Herald Telephone); Mary Ann Feldman (Minneapolis Star); John Harveith (Detroit Free Press); Laurie Modell (Rochester Democrat and Chronicle); David Moran (Boston After Dark); and John Van Rheim, (Akron Beacon Journal).

Each will receive a stipend of $1,000 and round-trip transportation to Washington, and will attend and report on important musical activity at the Kennedy Center, Filene Center, and other centers of music-making in the Washington area.

THE APPOINTMENT of Schuyler G. Chapin as acting general manager of the Metropolitan Opera brings to mind a Worcester connection.

Executive producer of Amberson Productions, 1865 Broadway, New York City, Schuyler Chapin is a second cousin of Louis Chapin, formerly of Worcester, who conducted a musical program on WTAG in the 1940's.

Art and theater, dance and music critic Louis Chapin has been published in High Fidelity, Christian Science Monitor, Musical America and Christian Herald. He has been a college instructor, and a director of radio (CBS) and dance and theater critic on TV.

Chapin gave a joint recital as a pianist, with contralto Marion Anusbigian at the Little Theater in October, 1943.

RAYMOND F. MORIN

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CANARSIE DIGEST
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 3,000
AUG 5 1972

Tanglewood Festival Opens

The 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood takes place this year from Aug. 4 through 10. The Festival, celebrating the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, is sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music) in co-operation with the From Music Foundation of Chicago. Often called a "Festival-within-a-Festival," the concerts turn Tanglewood into the contemporary music capital of the world during its intensive and exciting annual presentation of new and challenging works, some commissioned especially for the Festival, many heard in premiere performances. This season, the Festival of Contemporary Music will expand its program and will include, among other highlights, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEWS, ADVERTISER
WESTFIELD, MASS.
D. 5,000
JUL 23 1972
New England Newsclip

Contemporary Music Series Opens Aug. 4

LENOX — The 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood will take place this year from Aug. 4 through 10.

The Festival, celebrating the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, is sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music, in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

Often called a "Festival-within-a-Festival", the concerts turn Tanglewood into the contemporary music capital of the world during its intensive and exciting annual presentation of new and challenging works, some commissioned especially for the Festival, many heard in premiere performances. This season, the Festival of Contemporary Music will expand its program, and will include, among other highlights, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Festival of Contemporary Music opens this year at the beginning of the sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, Aug. 4 at 7 p.m. with a special Weekend Prelude concert devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, Chairman Emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

The 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Friday evening, Aug. 4 in the Shed is conducted by the Orchestra's Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, with soloists soprano Phyllis Curtin, and violinist Paul Zukofsky.

The Festival of Contemporary Music continues through Aug. 10 with a wide range of performances by Berkshire Music Center students, including vocal and chamber music programs, a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert, and performances by the Center's Music Theatre Project. There will also be a concert by Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SCARSDALE, N. Y.
INQUIRER
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 4,500
JUL 27 1972

Tanglewood Announces Festival

The 1972 Festival of Contempoarty Music at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. takes place this year from August 4 through 10. The Festival, celebrating the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, is sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music) in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Often called a "Festival-within-a Festival," the concerts turn Tanglewood into the contemporary music capital of the world during its intensive and exciting annual presentation of new and chellenging works, some commissioned especially for the Festival, many heard in premiere performances. This season, the Festival of Contemporary Music will expand its program, and will include, among other highlights, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Festival of Contemporary Music opens this year at the beginning of the sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, August 4 at 7 p.m. with a special Weekend Prelude concert devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, Chairman Emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Music to be performed is Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson, with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtin (one of the 1972 Tanglewood Granrud Artists-in-Residence), and Mr. Copland as pianist; Piano variations with Boston Symphony Orchestra Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas as pianist; and Vitebsk, sutdy on a Jewish theme performed by Boston Symphony Chamber Players Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with Aaron Copland as pianist.

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
W. 12,559
JUL 28 1972
New England Newsclip

1972 Festival of Contemporary Music At Tanglewood August 4 Through 10

The 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood takes place this year from August 4 through 10. The Festival, celebrating the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, is sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music) in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Often called a "Festival-within-a-Festival," the concerts present new and challenging works, some commissioned especially for the Festival, many heard in premiere performances. This season, the festival of contemporary Music will expand its program, and will include, among other highlights, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Festival opens this year at the beginning of the sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, August 4, at 7 pm with a special week-end prelude concert devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, chairman emeritus of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

The 9 pm Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Friday evening August 4, in the Shed is conducted by the Orchestra's associate conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, with soloists soprano Phyllis Curtin, and violinist Paul Zukofsky.

The Festival continues through August 10 with a wide range of performances by Berkshire Music Center students, including vocal and chamber music programs, a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert, and performances by the Center's Music Theatre Project. There will also be a concert by Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Saturday, August 5, the Festival presents a Berkshire Music Center Vocal Music Recital at 2:30 pm in the Theatre-Concert Hall.

Sunday evening, August 6, at 8:30 pm in the West Barn, the Berkshire Music Center Music Theatre Project presents the world premiere of Robert Selig's Chocorua, commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation. Also to be performed on the same program is Brecht-Weill's The Yes Man.

Monday evening, August 7, at 8:30 pm in the Theatre-Concert Hall, Collage, the contemporary music ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present a concert.

The special Berkshire Music Center Chamber Ensemble concert honoring the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, takes place Tuesday evening, August 8, at 8:30 pm in the Theatre-Concert Hall.

Wednesday evening, August 9, at 8:30 pm in the Theatre-Concert Hall, the Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music concert is scheduled. The final event of the 1972 Festival is a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert conducted by Bruno Maderna.

STAR
BRAINTREE, MASS.
W. 10,402
JUL 26 1972
New England Newsclip

Festival of Contemporary Music

The 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood is scheduled for August 4 through 10. The Festival celebrates the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation. Festival highlights include world premiere performances of Wuorinen, Selig, Lerdahl, Schuller and Maderna.

This season the Festival of Contemporary Music will expand its program, and will include, among other highlights, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

FREE PRESS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
W. 1,890
JUL 29 1972
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

The 1972 Festival of Contmeporary Music at Tanglewood takes place this year from August 4 through 10. The Festival, celebrating the 20th Anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, is sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music) in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Often called a "Festival - within - a - Festival", the concerts turn Tanglewood into the contemporary music capital of the world during its intensive and exciting annual presentation of new and challenging works, some commissioned especially for the Festival, many heard in premiere performances. This season, the Festival of Contemporary Music will expand its program, and will include, among other highlights, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Herald Statesman
YONKERS, N.Y.
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 49,614
AUG 4 1972

Tanglewood opens its 1972 festival of contemporary music this weekend with a week of new and challenging works, many in premiere performances. Highlights include world premiere performances of works by Wuorinen, Selig, Lerdahl, Schuller and Maderna. There'll also be an orchestra version of Poems of Emily Dickinson by Aaron Copland.

146

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 117,499

JUL 30 1972 New England Newsclip

AT TANGLEWOOD

Contemporary Music Featured

LENOX — Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct two concerts by the Orchestra as part of the sixth weekend Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Aug. 4, 5, and 6.

The concerts Friday evening, Aug. 4 are part of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music), and the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, which this year is celebrating its 20th Anniversary.

The Weekend Prelude Friday evening, Aug. 4 at 7:00 p.m. in the Shed will be devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, Chairman Emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

The Prelude will open with "Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson" with soprano Phyllis Curtin, and the composer at the piano. Next will be "Piano variations" with Michael Tilson Thomas, pianist. The Prelude will close with a performance of "Vitebsk, study on a Jewish Theme,'' with Boston Symphony Chamber Players members Joseph Silverstein violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with the composer at the piano.

The 9:00 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Music Shed will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas with violin soloist Paul Zukovsky. This opening orchestral concert of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will open with Ruggles "Evocations for orchestra," and Copland's Eight poems of Emily Dickinson" with soprano Phyllis Curtin.

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS

Both works will be performed for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Next will be the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin, and orchestra with soloist Paul Zukofsky.

The concerto was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation as part of its 20th Anniversary celebration. The concert will conclude with a performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

The season's sixth Saturday morning Open Rehearsal will takes place at 10:30 a.m. August 5. Tickets are $2.50 each, on sale at the Festival Ticket Office two hours before the beginning of the Open Rehearsal. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefits the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund.

Aldo Ceccato, recently appointed Principal Conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the Boston Symphony Saturday evening, August 5 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist for this evening's concert will be pianist John Browning.

The concert will open with Mendelssohn's "Symphony No. 1," followed by a performance of Prokofiev's Third piano concerto with soloist John Browning. The concert will conclude with Dvorak's "Symphony No. 9," the "New World".

Sunday afternoon, Aug. 6 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, Michael Tilson Thomas again will conduct the Boston Symphony with soloist Ralph Gomberg, Principal Oboeist of the Boston Symphony. The program will be Haydn's Oboe concerto, and Mahler's "Symphony No. 5."

Arthur Fiedler will conduct the Boston Pops at Tanglewood Tuesday evening, Aug. 1 at 8:30 p.m. The annual Boston Pops Pension Fund concert will feature the music of Lerner and Loewe with soloists Louis Russell soprano, Corinne Curry mezzo-soprano, Vahan Khanzadian tenor, Richard Fredricks baritone, with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director.

The concert will include selections from Camelot, Gigi, "Brigadoon," "Paint Your Wagon," and "My Fair Lady."

Also to be played will be Lennon and McCartney's Eleanor Rigby," a medley of Burt Bacharach tunes, and Melanie's "Look What They've Done to My Song."

Ticket prices are from $3.50 to $8.50 with admission to the lawn at $3, on sale two hours before the concert. Tickets are available from the Festival ticket office at Tanglewood (413-637-1600) and at all Ticketron locations.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,225

JUL 28 1972 New England Newsclip

Ormandy and Thomas next at Tanglewood

The 1972 Music Theatre Project at Tanglewood will present a world premiere and two rarely performed works in its second season as part of the training program of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for young musicians. Under the direction of Ian Strasfogel, newly appointed General Director of the Opera Society of Washington, D.C., the Music Theatre Project has assembled 10 of America's outstanding young operatic performers, both young professionals and advanced students, to explore the large, but little-known repertory of music theater. The activity is supported in part by grants from the National Opera Institute, and the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music.

On Aug. 2, 3, and 6, a double bill will feature the world premiere of "Chocorua" by Robert Selig, and "The Yes Man" by Bertolt Brecht and Kurt Weill. "Chocorua," a commission for the Berkshire Music Center's annual Festival of Contemporary Music, is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by the Boston poet Richard Moore. Its story, derived from actual events of the 18th century, tells of Indian Chief Chocorua who stays behind in New Hampshire when his tribe emigrates northward, to mingle with the English settlers with tragic results. "Chocorua" was commissioned jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

"The Yes Man," a translation by J. M. Potts of the 1930 Brecht — Weill Lehrstuck (or "instructional piece") Der Jasager, will be presented in conjunction with the Boston University Choral Institute at the Berkshire Music Center.

The final presentation of the season will be a controversial production of Monteverdi's masterpiece, "The Coronation of Poppea" on Aug. 13, 14, and 16. Bruno Maderna, the noted Italian composer-conductor who is serving as Head of Contemporary Music Activities at Tanglewood this summer, will conduct. Mr. Strasfogel has prepared a new version of this work that focuses exclusively on the social and political realities of the regime of the demented Emperor Nero and his decadent court.

All productions will be designed by Douglas Schmidt, and Jeanne Button, resident designers of the Music Theatre Project, and well-known for their work at the Lincoln Center Repertory Theatre, and the Juilliard School in New York City. Martin Smith, newly appointed chairman of the Opera Department at the New England Conservatory of Music, is head vocal coach for the Music Theatre Project.

Arthur Fiedler will conduct the Boston Pops during a special program Aug. 1 at 8.30 p.m. in the Tanglewood Shed. Other special events during August include a special Festival of Contemporary Music honoring the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation on Aug. 8 at 8.30 p.m. in the Shed and Tanglewood-on-Parade on Aug. 15.

Michael Tilson Thomas

The concert by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops on Aug. 1 features an evening of the music of Lerner and Loewe with soloists soprano Nancy Stokes, mezzo-soprano Corinne Curry, tenor Vahan Khanzadian, and baritone Richard Fredericks with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, Dicrector.

The concert features music from the Broadway shows of Lerner and Loewe, including "My Fair Lady," "Camelot," "Paint Your Wagon," "Brigadoon," and "Gigi." Following intermission, Mr. Fiedler conducts the Pops in Lennon and McCartney's "Eleanor Rigby," a medley of Burt Bacharach tunes, and Melanie's "Look What They've Done to My Song." There will also be the famous Pops extras.

The Festival of Contemporary Music concert on Aug. 8 honors the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, sponsor of Tanglewood's Festival of Contemporary Music which runs this year from August 4 through 10. The concert on August 8 features Elliott Carter conducting members of the Berkshire Music Center in his Double concerto for piano, harpsichord, and orchestra, and Luciano Berio conducting his Circles for soprano, harp, and two percussionists. The concert also will include newly commissioned works by Tanglewood Artistic Director for the Berkshire Music Center Gunther Schuller, and Bruno Maderna.

Tanglewood-on-parade on Aug. 15 begins at 2 p.m. with concerts all afternoon featuring ensembles of Berkshire Music Center students. Highlight of the day is the gala concert by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras at 8.30 p.m. in the Shed. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in music that includes Handel's Royal Fireworks Music, and Tchaikovsky's 1812 Overture, complete with canons and fireworks over the Stockbridge Bowl.

146

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 117,499

JUL 30 1972 New England Newsclip

AT TANGLEWOOD

Contemporary Music Featured

LENOX — Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct two concerts by the Orchestra as part of the sixth weekend Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Aug. 4, 5, and 6.

The concerts Friday evening, Aug. 4 are part of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center (the Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music), and the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, which this year is celebrating its 20th Anniversary.

The Weekend Prelude Friday evening, Aug. 4 at 7:00 p.m. in the Shed will be devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, Chairman Emeritus of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

The Prelude will open with "Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson" with soprano Phyllis Curtin, and the composer at the piano. Next will be "Piano variations" with Michael Tilson Thomas, pianist. The Prelude will close with a performance of "Vitebsk, study on a Jewish Theme," with Boston Symphony Chamber Players members Joseph Silverstein violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, with the composer at the piano.

The 9:00 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Music Shed will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas with violin soloist Paul Zukovsky. This opening orchestral concert of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will open with Ruggles "Evocations for orchestra," and Copland's Eight poems of Emily Dickinson" with soprano Phyllis Curtin.

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS

Both works will be performed for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Next will be the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for amplified violin, and orchestra with soloist Paul Zukofsky.

The concerto was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation as part of its 20th Anniversary celebration. The concert will conclude with a performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

The season's sixth Saturday morning Open Rehearsal will takes place at 10:30 a.m. August 5. Tickets are $2.50 each, on sale at the Festival Ticket Office two hours before the beginning of the Open Rehearsal. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefits the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund.

Aldo Ceccato, recently appointed Principal Conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the Boston Symphony Saturday evening, August 5 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist for this evening's concert will be pianist John Browning.

The concert will open with Mendelssohn's "Symphony No. 1," followed by a performance of Prokofiev's Third piano concerto with soloist John Browning. The concert will conclude with Dvorak's "Symphony No. 9," the "New World".

Sunday afternoon, Aug. 6 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, Michael Tilson Thomas again will conduct the Boston Symphony with soloist Ralph Gomberg, Principal Oboeist of the Boston Symphony. The program will be Haydn's Oboe concerto, and Mahler's "Symphony No. 5."

Arthur Fiedler will conduct the Boston Pops at Tanglewood Tuesday evening, Aug. 1 at 8:30 p.m. The annual Boston Pops Pension Fund concert will feature the music of Lerner and Loewe with soloists Louis Russell soprano, Corinne Curry mezzo-soprano, Vahan Khanzadian tenor, Richard Fredricks baritone, with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director.

The concert will include selections from Camelot, Gigi, "Brigadoon," "Paint Your Wagon," and "My Fair Lady."

Also to be played will be Lennon and McCartney's Eleanor Rigby," a medley of Burt Bacharach tunes, and Melanie's "Look What They've Done to My Song."

Ticket prices are from $3.50 to $8.50 with admission to the lawn at $3, on sale two hours before the concert. Tickets are available from the Festival ticket office at Tanglewood (413-637-1600) and at all Ticketron locations.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,225

JUL 28 1972 New England Newsclip

Ormandy and Thomas next at Tanglewood

The 1972 Music Theatre Project at Tanglewood will present a world premiere and two rarely performed works in its second season as part of the training program of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for young musicians. Under the direction of Ian Strasfogel, newly appointed General Director of the Opera Society of Washington, D.C., the Music Theatre Project has assembled 10 of America's outstanding young operatic performers, both young professionals and advanced students, to explore the large, but little-known repertory of music theater. The activity is supported in part by grants from the National Opera Institute, and the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music.

On Aug. 2, 3, and 6, a double bill will feature the world premiere of "Chocorua" by Robert Selig, and "The Yes Man" by Bertolt Brecht and Kurt Weill. "Chocorua," a commission for the Berkshire Music Center's annual Festival of Contemporary Music, is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by the Boston poet Richard Moore. Its story, derived from actual events of the 18th century, tells of Indian Chief Chocorua who stays behind in New Hampshire when his tribe emigrates northward, to mingle with the English settlers with tragic results. "Chocorua" was commissioned jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

"The Yes Man," a translation by J. M. Potts of the 1930 Brecht — Weill Lehrstuck (or "instructional piece") Der Jasager, will be presented in conjunction with the Boston University Choral Institute at the Berkshire Music Center.

The final presentation of the season will be a controversial production of Monteverdi's masterpiece, "The Coronation of Poppea" on Aug. 13, 14, and 16. Bruno Maderna, the noted Italian composer-conductor who is serving as Head of Contemporary Music Activities at Tanglewood this summer, will conduct. Mr. Strasfogel has prepared a new version of this work that focuses exclusively on the social and political realities of the regime of the demented Emperor Nero and his decadent court.

All productions will be designed by Douglas Schmidt, and Jeanne Button, resident designers of the Music Theatre Project, and well-known for their work at the Lincoln Center Repertory Theatre, and the Juilliard School in New York City. Martin Smith, newly appointed chairman of the Opera Department at the New England Conservatory of Music, is head vocal coach for the Music Theatre Project.

Arthur Fiedler will conduct the Boston Pops during a special program Aug. 1 at 8.30 p.m. in the Tanglewood Shed. Other special events during August include a special Festival of Contemporary Music honoring the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation on Aug. 8 at 8.30 p.m. in the Shed and Tanglewood-on-Parade on Aug. 15.

Michael Tilson Thomas

The concert by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops on Aug. 1 features an evening of the music of Lerner and Loewe with soloists soprano Nancy Stokes, mezzo-soprano Corinne Curry, tenor Vahan Khanzadian, and baritone Richard Fredericks with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, Dicrector.

The concert features music from the Broadway shows of Lerner and Loewe, including "My Fair Lady," "Camelot," "Paint Your Wagon," "Brigadoon," and "Gigi." Following intermission, Mr. Fiedler conducts the Pops in Lennon and McCartney's "Eleanor Rigby," a medley of Burt Bacharach tunes, and Melanie's "Look What They've Done to My Song." There will also be the famous Pops extras.

The Festival of Contemporary Music concert on Aug. 8 honors the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, sponsor of Tanglewood's Festival of Contemporary Music which runs this year from August 4 through 10. The concert on August 8 features Elliott Carter conducting members of the Berkshire Music Center in his Double concerto for piano, harpsichord, and orchestra, and Luciano Berio conducting his Circles for soprano, harp, and two percussionists. The concert also will include newly commissioned works by Tanglewood Artistic Director for the Berkshire Music Center Gunther Schuller, and Bruno Maderna.

Tanglewood-on-parade on Aug. 15 begins at 2 p.m. with concerts all afternoon featuring ensembles of Berkshire Music Center students. Highlight of the day is the gala concert by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras at 8.30 p.m. in the Shed. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in music that includes Handel's Royal Fireworks Music, and Tchaikovsky's 1812 Overture, complete with canons and fireworks over the Stockbridge Bowl.

Fromm
THE KANSAS CITY STAR
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 325,351 SUN. 396,682
JUL 16 1972

A Traditionalist Can Change

By Donal Henahan
New York Times News Service

If I.B.M. should announce tomorrow that it had nothing against computers but that in the future it would concentrate on producing hand-lettered volumes of modern poetry, eyebrows would raise. But hardly more than they are certain to lift in contemporary music circles over some recent decisions by Paul Fromm, founder and president of the Fromm Music Foundation.

Fromm, the Chicago wine importer whose foundation celebrated its 20th anniversary in April, is certainly one of the half-dozen most influential private patrons of music in the world.

At 65, he has chosen to put his foundation on a drastically new course, steering it away from what he calls "hard-core serialism" and composers who concern themselves obsessively with theory and technology.

Fromm has, in fact, withdrawn support from his famously cerebral Perspectives of New Music, the composers' journal that Princeton University published for the foundation for the last 10 years. He is also moving the foundation's base of operations out of the Princeton sphere, to Harvard. In new-music circles, this is like moving the papacy from Rome to Avignon.

In 20 years, the Bavarian-born merchant has decanted untold quantities of money into the pockets of composers and performers. At the moment, the list of Fromm-commissioned works runs to 96, and there is no end in view. For Fromm is not a fly-by-night patron. He is a loving connoisseur of new music and stands in awe of genuine creative talent.

Although only an amateur himself, he is steeped in music (his brother Herbert Fromm is a composer), and his fascination with composers goes back to his days in Germany where youngsters such as Bartok, Schoenberg and Stravinsky were trying to get a foot in the door. Like many another of his generation, he was bowled over by his first hearing of "The Rite of Spring." That was in Frankfurt in 1927, and "it made a 20th-century man of me," he says. Since coming to this country as a refugee from the Nazis in 1938, he has continued his love affair with new music.

So, in view of the foundation's 20th anniversary and the approach of another of the Tanglewood festivals of new music that the foundation has sponsored in conjunction with the Berkshire Music Center for 10 years, a talk with Fromm seemed indicated.

"I decided on the Harvard association last September when I reached the age of 65," Fromm said. "I had come to feel the foundation could no longer be dependent on one individual, that the time had come to end the era in which the foundation was simply an extension of myself."

Under the new arrangement, a committee of three will run the Fromm program: A. Tillman Merrit, the former chairman of Harvard's music department; Gunther Schuller, the composer and president of the New England Conservatory, and Fromm himself.

The shift to Harvard represents an apparent switch in Fromm's esthetic outlook, since it means moving out of the direct influence of the hypertheoretical group that coalesced around the Princeton Seminars into a more traditional milieu.

"Actually, I've always been a traditionalist," Fromm says, "and I haven't changed my attitudes as much in the last 25 years as most composers have."

Fromm has no intention of disparaging theorists and system builders. "I would not care to belittle that kind of exercise of the intellect. But it does tend to ignore the element of musical imagination —as Varese said, if every note has to be explained or can be explained, it's no longer music. At Princeton you have some profound minds but what they develop is a mode of discourse among specialists. Their over-riding concern is with materials, not any longer with communicative art."

Fromm no longer believes, as he once firmly did, that the university is the best place for composers. "After 20 years I have come to realize that the function of the university is to impart knowledge—but what cannot be taught is an artist's consciousness of the unknown. What the Princeton group does, you really can teach—the stringing of notes together." And that, Fromm insists, is a limited part of what we should ask of a composer.

Looking back at his 20 years as the Maecenas of the academic avant-garde, Fromm contends that "we as listeners were confused by the multiplicity of styles—electronic, chance, serialism, and so on. But we have come to the point now where a number of composers are appearing who are again concerned with making music for people who want to listen to music."

Fromm, though he insists he is a traditionalist, is anything but a reactionary in outlook or temperament. When the Boston Symphony presents its Fromm Foundation anniversary concert on Aug. 4, for instance, the program will include the latest Fromm commission, Charles Wuorinen's concerto for amplified violin and orchestra, with Paul Zukofsky as soloist.

The solo instrument, designed by a Boston Symphony violinist, may or may not work out, but in theory it doesn't bother Fromm a bit. "People used to think it was immoral to use an amplified guitar, but no instrument is intrinsically bad or good. A Stradivari can't compose or play music—for that you need a composer and a performer."

Fromm does believe, though, that creating a split between electronic instruments and traditional ones, including the voice, can result in very little good music. He is, you might say, a hard-core humanist in this respect.

Fromm does not shrink from admitting that the foundation has fallen short of some of its goals. "There is one big issue on which we have failed, and that is how to integrate the music written after 1910 with the standard repertory. I think Pierre Boulez approaches the problem in a much more creative way than we have done—by juxtaposing music of past and present and by profiling certain composers. Last season at the New York Philharmonic. Liszt and Berg, next season Haydn and Stravinsky."

Under its new Harvard tent, the foundation will continue most of its familiar projects—special concerts honoring respected but neglected composers, commissions, programs by the Fromm players at Tanglewood, seminars, the annual Tanglewood Festival of Contemporary Music, and so on.

And, in place of Perspectives of New Music, which was published twice a year, an annual journal that will, in Fromm's words, "stress creative and esthetic aspects of composing rather than the technological." The new magazine will be "concerned with music as an art, not a science, and to keep it from being dominated by any one faction each issue will have a different editor."

Those composers who contend that no audience can possibly be expected to understand their music because it is too mathematically or technologically advanced will be viewed with suspicion.

Fromm's fear is that without an active audience "music as a communicative art will atrophy. It will be in danger of becoming a self-indulgent exercise for composers who seek to replace musical creativity with the kinds of scientific investigations that are better left to acoustical engineers, physicists and mathematicians."

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
JUL 14 1972
New England Newsclip

Fromm Foundation moves to Harvard

The Fromm Music Foundation, established in 1952 by Paul Fromm, and until now based in Chicago, will become the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard University, as of Sept. 1, 1972.

Created by Mr. Fromm "to foster the understanding of contemporary music," the foundation has during the past 20 years commissioned works by known and unknown composers, aided in live and recorded performances of modern works, and since 1956, in cooperation with the Berkshire Music Center, sponsored at Tanglewood a "festival within a festival,"

At Harvard, a committee of three directors — Prof. A. Tillman Merritt, Gunther Schuller, and Mr. Fromm — will administer the foundation, allotting one quarter of its income to the furtherance of contemporary music at the university, and determining the use of the other three-quarters according to the musical purposes originally stated.

During the annual festival this summer at Tanglewood, which extends from Aug. 4 to 8, the Boston Symphony will present a 20th anniversary program on Aug. 4, under Michael Tilson Thomas's direction, at which Charles Wuorinen's commissioned Concerto for Amplified Violin and Orchestra (Paul Zukofsky, soloist) will have its premiere.

L. Sn.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
AUG 10 1972
New England

Paul Fromm speech

Toward evaluating contemporary music

The following speech was delivered yesterday at Tanglewood by Paul Fromm in honor of the 20th anniversary of his foundation, which commissions works and annually sponsors the contemporary music festival at Tanglewood.

The musical community has acknowledged the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Foundation so genuinely and so generously that I now feel a little like Mae West when she said: "Too much of a good thing is wonderful." I was waiting for someone to tell us where we failed, and as nobody did, I will now take on this task myself.

I am concerned about our failure, not in activity, but in aim. By this I mean that we have carried on our work with rather naive hopes as to its eventual effect on the contemporary art scene.

Six years ago when I addressed this audience — it was the occasion of the 10th anniversary of the association between the Fromm Foundation and the Berkshire Music Center — I spoke of the coexistence of separate audiences for contemporary music and the music of the past as a state of affairs implying some kind of cold war and involving a second-class existence for contemporary music. I hoped that it was only temporary; indeed, as I had characterized it, coexistence could only be temporary, and any kind of integration between the two musics and their audiences seemed better than the fragmentation that mere coexistence would engender.

Glib use of terms

I am embarrassed now at my rather glib use of the words "coexistence" and "integration" at that time. Coexistence with its political overtones had an altogether negative connotation and integration could not then have been viewed other than positively. By now we have begun to recognize that integration means more than shoving two things together, and we may even have learned that a pluralistic society is large enough to contain coexisting variety.

We all have experienced the typical orchestral concert in which an insignificant new work is insinuated into a program containing the Brahms Second Piano Concerto and the Beethoven Seventh Symphony. The Brahms and Beethoven lovers are irritated beyond endurance by the new work. The listeners who have come for the new piece are annoyed by the presentation of a weak example of contemporary literature and are bored by being over-exposed to the music of Brahms and Beethoven. Frequently, the limitations of the rehearsal schedule demand that the new work take up most of the rehearsal time and masterworks of the past are given under-rehearsed, indifferent performances. This irritates the traditionalists still further, and they blame contemporary music for an uneventful evening. Moreover, an audience of Brahms and Beethoven lovers that hears a contemporary work of much lesser musical stature than the works with which it has been programmed, can become so completely prejudiced against the whole idea of new music that it would be better for the reputation of contemporary music if the piece had not been played. This sort of mere busing of indiscriminately chosen new music to the halls of Brahms and Beethoven is surely not integration. I must remind you that in a reverse situation, Beethoven's greatness would be momentarily eclipsed if his feeble "Battle Symphony" would appear on the same program with Carter's "Variations for Orchestra" and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." "The great mistake," as Pierre Boulez noted, "is trying to devise menus to please everybody. That ends with all stomachs upset."

Whitestone

THE CANDLES are quickly extinguished as Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky watches Paul Fromm partake in yesterday's celebrations marking the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Foundation. The organization sponsors the annual Contemporary Music Festival at Tanglewood, which concludes at 8:30 tonight with a program conducted by Bruno Maderna.

Types of listeners

We have created the problem in part by pitting the audience for new music against the audience for music of the past. This is a false dichotomy. Music lovers don't really divide themselves chronologically or even that simply. They divide in two separate but mutually inclusive ways: adventurous listeners versus nonadventurous listeners, and listeners who are seeking merely an emotional experience as against listeners who are seeking both an emotional and intelligible experience. Thus, we have both conservative and adventurous music enthusiasts and both conservative and adventurous — shall we say — musical intelligentsia.

New music obviously attracts both kinds of adventurous listeners, but new music can mean not only contemporary music but also music that is new to that listener. That is, music with which he has not been surfeited — the neglected symphonies of Mozart and Haydn, most of the music of Johann Sebastian Bach, Renaissance polyphony, medieval music played on old instruments, oriental music. All of this is in that sense new music. The audience for contemporary music is frequently found at concerts of old non-19th-century works or performances including 19th century rarities. I could name quite a number of musicians, among them Boulez, Maderna, Ozawa, Schuller and Michael Tilson Thomas who have found the ideal concert format for this audience. They created coherence in programming by the performance of works of different styles and periods, which have the power to illuminate each other. That is real integration.

All share bewilderment

I have made a point of considering the conservative but intelligent music lover as someone quite distinct from the conservative music enthusiast because there is a prevailing attitude among the contemporary music elite that anyone who is conservative can't be intelligent. This is, of course, patently untrue. The intelligent conservative must be taken seriously. In the musical context, he holds out against what he thinks might be mere faddism and guards himself against a certain kind of esthetic promiscuity. This is honorable. His resistance grows in part out of bewilderment and, I think, this is the bewilderment that most of us have shared to some extent. Viewing the history of western music, he has observed that it is a history of dominant styles. So he asks himself which of the current proliferation of 20th century styles will prove to be triumphant?

For the conservative music lover and for the conservative part in all of us, there may be some comfort in the idea that if we are living in a pluralistic society, as historians, social scientists and philosophers increasingly believe that we are, then perhaps none of these styles will be finally dominant. They will, instead, all coexist, but not in the sense of a cold war, for they will not be threatened by each other — the new will not displace but be added on. The styles of late romanticism, primitivism, neo-classicism, aleatoric and totally or partially organized music have appeared to succeed one another in the 20th century, but that is an illusion. They have all continued in one form or another. None has really disappeared or been replaced. If, as it is now quite widely recognized, the present pluralism of coexisting styles is not a transitional state but a permanent condition, then the audience will have time to absorb styles and develop criteria for evaluating them. If that is so, then we may not be in a state of crisis.

BLANK PAGE

148

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

AUG 14 1972

New England Newsclip

149

Jeers and premieres at a musical milestone

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

Paul Fromm, who is the moving spirit of the Fromm Musical Foundation, which has just had its 20th anniversary observed at Tanglewood, made a speech at the Berkshire Music Center's commemorative concert with a suggestion as challenging as some of the music his foundation encourages. In essence his feeling is that music should progress beyond Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms to the point that, on a typical program they and their cohorts would be in the minority among our contemporaries.

His remarks came on the occasion of a concert by the orchestra of the Berkshire Music Center, cosponsor with the Fromm Foundation of Tanglewood's Festival of Contemporary Music, which began last week with a full-sized Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. Under Michael Thomas's direction, honoring the foundation's 20th milestone and the nine-year Fromm alliance with the Berkshire Festival, that program included as its centerpiece the world premiere of a Fromm-commissioned Concerto for Amplified Violin, with Paul Zukofsky as soloist, employing a normal violin bridge cum transducer to producer a sound of equal intensity to that of the unamplified orchestra. For an otherwise singularly ungimmicky piece, it created quite a stir.

Rumor hath it that some BSO players took exception at rehearsals not only to the concerto and the techniques it employed, but to the composer himself, and that the resultant grumbling and booing led to a negative assessment by Mr. Wuoronin of the orchestra's performance of his work.

Notwithstanding, there were listeners at the first performance unaware of these backstage contretemps who found both work and performance absorbing and significant. And at the Music Center concert, played by ensembles of young center fellowship musicians on the fringes of professionalism, there was no evidence that the rebellious attitudes of their peers had intruded, even though their own program consisted of two world premieres, conducted by their innovative composers, and two other works previously commissioned by the Fromm Foundation.

All of Tuesday's selections were equally taxing on performers and first-time listeners. Luciano Berio's "Circles" (1960) for soprano, harp, and percussion, is, program notes tell us, "an 'adventure' and 'exploration' of the human voice" aided and abetted by instrumental commentary and pitch extension. Texts by e. e. cummings are employed in this exercise but apparently as a means to illustrate the composer's preoccupation with contrasting sounds and means of producing them. Soprano Barbara Hocher, harpist Ariana Anca, and percussionists David Johnson and Gary DiPerna were the dazzling participants.

Both new works — Gunther Schuller's "Tre Invenzione" and Bruno Maderna's "Giardino Religioso" — are, as might be expected, expertly organized and crafted. The former, for five quintets of winds, brasses, and keyboard instruments, including harp, is chiefly impressive for its well ordered tonal contrasts; the "Giardino," with strings, brass, percussion, and two pianos and harps, is more expressive of emotional content, and permits the conductor to wander through his orchestra giving an assist here and there on various instruments —seen by the composer as "an act of belief." It also has "open" sections in which the use of musical materials is left to the discretion of the conductor, who thus maintains a dialogue with specified, "closed" forms.

The concluding Double Concerto for Harpsichord and Piano (1961) by Eliott Carter also has dialogic aspects, since each solo instrument has its own reinforcing chamber orchestra. Again the preoccupation is with matters of technical concern to the composer: relationships of pitched and nonpitched instruments, "reconciling . . . different responses ot the finger's touch." For the listener such subtleties are not immediately apparent, and the fact that they were explored at some length produced a degree of audience restiveness.

Mr. Schuller conducted the Carter work in which Ursula Oppens (harpsichord) and Gilbert Kalish (piano) were proficient soloists. Throughout the evening, the music center orchestra's playing, in its varying guises, continued to amaze, not only for its virtuosity, collectively and individually, but for its responsiveness to musical situations of unusual complexity.

The audience was large and well disposed, greeting everyone and everything with indiscriminate enthusiasm. If there was any special favorite, it would seem to have been Mr. Maderna who received continuing plaudits both from the listeners and the performers whom he had just taken for "a walk through his musical garden."

BSO's Collage group

A group called Collage is the newest adjunct of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it concentrates exclusively on contemporary expression. Of the nine members, six are BSO players — Frank Epstein, percussion; Ronald Feldman, cello; Paul Fried, flute; Ronald Knudsen, violin; Felix Viscuglia, clarinet; and Lawrence Wolfe, contrabass. They have been joined by Ina Hahn, dancer; Joan Heller, soprano; and Christopher Kies, piano. Appropriately enough Collage made what might be termed its big-time debut at Tanglewood on Monday evening in the current Festival of Contemporary Music.

Two works — Tibor Pusztai's "Nocturnes" and Jacob Druckman's "Valentine" for solo contrabass — are products of 1971 (a revision of an earlier work), and 1969, respectively — but the others are of earlier vintage, and one, Olivier Messiaen's "Le Merle Noir," a 1952 "antique." Mario Davidovsky's "Synchronisms" No. 2 (1964), George Crumb's Madrigals — books 1 and 2 (1965), and Lukas Foss's "Time Cycle" (1960) represent surviving samples of times and techniques already overripe.

The sputtering voice of the tape is once again heard in "Synchronisms," and seems now only to intrude on more interesting writing for violin, cello, flute, and clarinet; the Madrigals twitter, whisper, and shimmer via voice, flute, bass, and percussion in anticipation of more substantial Crumb pieces; and the Foss songs to texts by Auden, Housman, Kafka, and Nietzsche, now begin to emerge through the veils of '60's modern gimmickry at least with vague shape and meaning.

Mr. Pusztai conducted his own "Nocturnes" which employed all of Collage except clarinet and piano and formed a background for Miss Han's single danced contribution to the evening. It wandered pleasantly through some amorphous verses, which never quite found a place in the widely distributed screen of instrumental sound, and like so much of the programmed music, was vague in its aim either to involve or inform the audience of its purpose.

Comic relief of a sort was provided by Mr. Druckman's "Valentine," using as its exponent the double bass, which with the tuba and triangle have long since tickled the funnybones of composers. What "Valentine" is specifically about is never wholly clear, but it asked its very busy and adept player (Mr. Wolfe) to run through the catalog of wood-slapping, string slurring whispering, sighing, grunting, whisk-brushing, and mallet-tapping that yesterday's avant-gardists were heir to. It is amazing that it can be thought of, realized, and performed seriously since little more than the performers' virtuosity seemed to have intrinsic value at all.

Musical rewards, for those who expect some, were found in Messiaen's "Le Merle Noir," for flute and piano, superbly played by Mr. Fried with Mr. Kies accompanying. This of course was hardly in the same context as anything which preceded or followed it, but it displayed, if nothing more beyond its lyric line and disciplined form, a tonal adventurousness and resulting impact far greater than was achieved by all of the evening's devious means.

Collage's members were unexceptionable in their skill and professionalism. Miss Heller's wonderfully flexible voice (still waiting for a singable legato) and Mr. Epstein's wide-ranging percussive expertise, for instance, along with their colleagues, held the attention where less knowing performers would have made a travesty of much that was offered. One hopes that there is, or will be, more meaty, less trendy contemporary music still lying in wait for their engaging talents.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

AUG 20 1972

New England Newsclip

A Festival in Search of Itself

By DONAL HENAHAN

TANGLEWOOD'S Festival of Contemporary Music, which ended last week, struck one as a festival in search of itself. Paul Fromm, whose Fromm Music Foundation sponsors this annual get-together, confessed as much when he addressed the audience at a concert honoring his organization's 20th anniversary. "I am concerned about our failure, not in activity, but in aim. By this I mean that we have carried on our work with rather naive hopes as to its eventual effect on the contemporary art scene."

Modern music has not succeeded in joining the mainstream—at least not as the conservative majority of listeners would define the mainstream—but has, rather, become increasingly isolated in the last several decades, until now the works of the most intelligent composers (not necessarily the best) enjoy an audience composed chiefly of themselves and their closest colleagues.

In recognizing this and talking up about it, Fromm does himself only honor. Intellectual honesty seems to be rarer in the arts than elsewhere, and what Fromm is doing, in effect, is calling on his fellow members of the musical intelligentsia to reexamine a lot of accumulated myths and prejudices about contemporary music and music in general.

*

The "Fromm Week," therefore, had a certain tentative tone about it, as if the festival were moving toward some new coalition of ideas only half-formed as yet. If there were many big breakthrough works performed, one failed to notice them. There was, indeed, Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for Amplified Violin and Orchestra, which achieved instant celebrity of a sort by its radical decision to boost the violin's sound electronically and place it largely under the control of the composer himself, seated at an offstage console.

Mr. Wuorinen's piece also broke some ground, possibly, in the intensity of dislike that it bred in members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who booed it and the composer himself at the dress rehearsal. Whatever musical worth the concerto proves to have, when it finally is given a performance that the composer approves, one could at least give Mr. Wuorinen credit for trying to break out of old restraints. Another promising work, Alfred Lerdahl's "Chromorhythmos," presented such rehearsal difficulties that its performance by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, scheduled for the final evening of the festival, had to be canceled. Obviously, in these two instances, someone miscalculated either the abilities of the players or the time needed to prepare such taxing works adequately.

The best new pieces heard during the week, as opposed to those merely talked about, turned out to be Bruno Maderna's "Giardino Religioso," Gunther Schuller's "Tre Invenzione" and Jacob Druckman's "Windows" (this year's Pulitzer Prize winner in composition). Each took off in a different direction, but they were bound together by their careful workmanship and concern with breaking out of familiar patterns. Maderna originally intended to call his piece "Paul Fromm's Garden" but was talked out of it by the dedicatee ("religioso" is a fair translation into Italian of the German "fromm," however). In this one, the conductor stepped down into the orchestra and played at a couple of instruments, giving signals for improvisatory interludes and otherwise acting as catalyst. This sort of gestural theater also figured largely in Earl Kim's "Rattlin' On" and Donald Erb's "Three Pieces for Brass Quintet and Piano," both of which were almost as fascinating to watch as to hear.

*

The Schuller, a thoroughly abstract sound piece organized on freely serial lines, continued to show the composer's preoccupation with an orchestra made up of satellite ensembles, in this instance five quintets which tossed the musical material about from one to another with almost improvisatory abandon. Druckman's "Windows" threw up dense screens of orchestra sound which parted now and then to let through a scrap of music from the past. Phrases from Strauss and Ravel impinged on this listener's ear, but someone seated elsewhere in the hall might have heard a dozen other allusions. Oddly, a similarly Ivesian idea cropped out in the Maderna piece, too, with its faraway but persistent trumpet calls at the end recalling "The Unanswered Question."

But little one heard at Tanglewood on this occasion could be called radically new. In fact, a determined effort seemed to be made to balance freshly minted works with such elderly masterpieces as Berio's "Circles" and Carter's "Double Concerto for Harpsichord and Piano with Two Chamber Orchestras," both more than 10 years old. As Fromm pointed out in his talk, new music to a listener can mean "music with which he has not been surfeited."

There was nonetheless something fresh and invigorating about the festival this year, a feeling in the air of questioning about directions. In that sense, this may have been a pivotal festival in American contemporary music. In recent years, Tanglewood's "Fromm Week" had been degenerating into what Fromm himself has referred to as a kind of trade fair for university composers. They came to display their wares, to scout the new products of competitors, and to shop around for career advancement opportunities. Increasingly, Fromm discerned in this a recapitulation of the Darmstadt festivals of European avant-gardism in the forties and fifties and, while valuing those events, he saw no need to repeat them here and now.

Inextricably connected with Fromm's new attitude is his recent decision to affiliate his foundation with Harvard, moving out of the orbit of Princeton University, which for 10 years has published the foundation's journal of musical theory, Perspectives of New Music. Princeton is continuing with Perspectives, but Fromm is planning a new journal, an annual that would try to return the emphasis to music as an art rather than music as a branch of science. The addition of another influential voice in this area surely will not hurt.

In fact, contemporary music may not be in a period of decline but merely of upheaval, which is something different. With a new and wider view that refuses to see music as divided between stupid conservatives and intelligent avant-gardists, a better perspective may develop about our common interests: good music and the encouragement of the creative impulse.

These are the volatile times when things can happen in the arts, when old alliances break up and rigid new ones have yet to form. The question of what is new or modern becomes more pointless every day. One felt a stronger surge of contemporaneity, for instance, in the revival of the Weill/Brecht "Der Jasager" as presented by Ian Strasfogel's Music Theater Project than in most of the nominally new works played during the festival. And if you were looking for sheer contemporaneity, nothing came up to the Richard Foreman/Stanley Silverman theater piece at the Lenox Arts Center, "Doctor Selavy's Magic Theater."

Continued on Next Page

At Tanglewood

Continued from Page 11

Silverman, in theory at least, realizes in his score for "Selavy" what Paul Fromm recognizes: that no music is destined to replace any other music, and that artistic pluralism is as feasible and inevitable as political pluralism. "I feel that Kurt Weill must live as well as Webern," is Silverman's way of putting it. "In fact, my whole thing is based on that." Silverman is a sometime avant-garde musician and composer, too, and the whole idea that either Gershwin or Schoenberg should die because the other lives could not seem more ridiculous to him. "I like the idea of the two composers in me struggling with one another, and alternating." Among his contemporaries, he most admires those who, like Boulez, are continually "wrestling with the differences in themselves."

Out of this current uncertainty there could well come, to the consternation of dogmatists on all sides of the question, a more sensible and fruitful approach to the musics of our time—and of the past. The Fromm concerts have taken an important step in that direction, at any rate, by dropping the concept of the festival as an academic trade fair. What constellation of ideas may be formed as a substitute is not yet easy to predict, but the musical community—or communities, one should say—will be watching with interest for the first gleams.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
AUG 11 1972
New England Newsclip

Fromm Festival Review

Maderna takes on Druckman's rhythms

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE TERMINAL program of the 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music in the Theatre-Concert Hall at Tanglewood last night consisted of two compositions played by the Berkshire Music Center orchestra with the cooperation of the Fromm Music Foundation.

Jacob Druckman's "Windows" (1972) and Anton Webern's Variations for Orchestra, Op. 30, (1940) were played before the intermission under the direction of Bruno Maderna and repeated after intermission in reverse sequence.

* * *

DESPITE the generation which separates them, the two works are of a piece, although Webern weaves a texture with the warp and woof clearly disclosed. He makes a four-note introductory statement, assigning it to the unusual voice of the double basses, much as Stravinsky gives the bassoon the analogous charge in the "Sacre." But he then proceeds to develop the serial idiom, much as Bach developed his "Art of the Fugue," twisting and turning the motto in every possible way, in reverse, mirror-fashion, inverted, cancrizans (as a crab moves backwards), until it becomes a fascinating exercise in musical semantics.

Druckman's plan is not so obvious. It is more on the formula of Earle Brown, in an aleatory style governed by the judgment of the conductor, who designates which of a possible quintet of sentences, or paragraphs, he wishes the various sections to execute. This does not allow the audience to sit back insouciantly, take it or leave it, as it listens, but demands an alert participation in the imaginative processes of the composer.

* * *

THIS WAS commissioned by the Serge Koussevitzky Music Foundation in the Library of Congress and was composed for Maderna. A possible indictment of both works might be the poverty of the individual instrumental assignments. Each composition is a structurally viable confection, but the parts are musical crumbs. The various choirs are called upon for sporadic ejaculations of tremolos in the strings, eruptions of calls in the winds, and frenzied fitful outbursts in the percussion. Druckman writes in irregular rhythms, when there is a metrical pattern, but also at times gives the musicians a free rein to doodle, vamp till ready, or perform what in the trade is sometimes designated as noodle solos, until the conductor resumes responsibility and control.

Whitestone

Bruno Maderna

How out of all this seeming chaos there emerges a pleasant and stimulating reaction is a mark of the composer's talent and skill in orchestration. It is not immediately convincing that Druckman has not reiterated excessively, but if one is willing to follow Stockhausen's admonition for voluntary susceptibility in such a performance, there are sensuous rewards.

* * *

A THIRD work programmed for last night had to be abandoned because of the composition's particular difficulties and the rehearsal limitations under which the Berkshire Music Center necessarily works. This points up a specific significance to the music of our day. Its coherence is often so desiccated that the participants cannot fit nor match their parts to that of their fellows and subliminal relationships are not established.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549
AUG 13 1972
New England Newsclip

Music: A Tanglewood Replacement

Maderna Holds Back Work by Lerdahl

By DONAL HENAHAN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 11—Faced with a difficult new score, what does an orchestra do if it discovers as concert time nears that the players do not know the piece well enough to satisfy the composer or the conductor? Tanglewood provided two different answers to that one during the Festival of Contemporary Music that closed here last night.

On opening night of the festival a week ago, the Boston Symphony Orchestra went ahead with a performance of Charles Wuorinem's Concerto for Amplified Violin and Orchestra, despite a scandalous dress rehearsal at which some musicians booed the composer. Because the Boston Symphony is the Boston Symphony, the piece nevertheless sounded better than it had any right to do under such stressful conditions.

●

The other answer—surely a better one for all concerned—was given last night at the festival's final concert. Bruno Maderna, the conductor, announced from the stage that Alfred Lerdahl's "Chromorhythmos" would not be performed because the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra had not been able to master it in the allotted rehearsal time. The Lerdahl piece had been commissioned by the center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

The difficulties with the Lerdahl apparently revolved around its peculiar construction out of just three pitches, which had to be incessantly varied in rhythm and tone color. Before the dress rehearsal, it became apparent that the student orchestra, although highly proficient in handling the music, could not do justice to Mr. Lerdahl's score. That was that.

Forced to improvise, Mr. Maderna turned the crisis to advantage. He began with Jacob Druckman's "Windows" and went on to Webern's Variations for Orchestra. Then, in a species of programatic crab-canon, the Webern was repeated, and the concert closed with a reprise of Mr. Druckman's piece.

The Druckman, thus far unheard in New York, received this year's Pulitzer Prize for composition. It is a big steely work in one movement that sets its fragmentary ideas swirling at the start and never relaxes. The "windows" of the title are momentary openings in the dense orchestra texture through which one glimpses distorted images of older music—Strauss and Ravel most prominently. There is, in fact, a kind of pulsating breathlessness that, along with actual thematic allusions, puts one in mind of "La Valse," though Mr. Druckman never permits such allusions to develop past the germinal stage.

Presents Druckman's Pulitzer 'Windows'

●

The performance, under Mr. Maderna's assured direction, sounded first-class, though no doubt the Chicago Symphony, for which "Windows" was written, must have produced richer sonorities and more subtly shaded orchestral tones. "Windows" was received most cordially by the audience, although it is by no means an easily assimilated work.

The Webern Variations, while sometimes sounding tentative, demonstrated the high quality of the Music Center musicians in a piece that major orchestras still find problematical on those rare occasions when they take it up. Mr. Maderna did not try much for tone-color nuance but achieved an accurate, classical proportioned performance.

'Points of light . . . as the orchestral textures part'

Druckman's Pulitzer Prize 'Windows'

Bos Symphony

MICHAEL STEINBERG AT TANGLEWOOD

LENOX — Thursday morning I read a review by a California teenager who described Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" as "sort of an easy high," and I want to borrow that phrase for Jacob Druckman's "Windows," which Bruno Maderna conducted that night with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra at the last concert of the Fromm Foundation Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood.

"Windows," which won the 1972 Pulitzer Prize after its performance by Maderna with the Chicago Symphony, is a single 20-minute movement for a large orchestra. It is a quotation piece of the kind composers like George Crumb and George Rochberg had been fascinated with in recent years, though the rather engaging wrinkle in "Windows" is that its "Quotations" have actually been made up by Druckman.

His windows are "points of light which appear as the thick orchestral textures part:" at those moments you hear two violins saying something that suggests Ravel's "La valse," or an A minor pastoral bit for oboes, the march from "Wozzeck" read through someone else's glasses, and so on. And each time some eruption in the orchestra blocks it out again, like Scarpia slamming the window to shut out Tosca's cantata next door.

It is skillful manipulation, both of orchestral textures and of listeners' emotional responses to their memories. But the high is too easy because the procedures are so obvious and, after a while, so predictable; then also because the writing is rather untidy, conveying only a most generalized impression of a kind of wildly sonorous busyness.

Thursday's concert was to have included the premiere of Fred Lerdahl's "Chromorhythmos," but since it could not be prepared to anyone's satisfaction in the available time, it was withdrawn, an act of responsible professionalism which other organizations might think to emulate.

That left the Webern Variations for Orchestra, and Maderna's solution to the problem of getting a whole program out of 30 minutes of music was to have a first-half consisting of Druckman and Webern, and a second of Webern and Druckman, with the repeat performance of the Webern turned over to Bruce Hangen, one of this year's Conducting Fellows at the Berkshire Music Center.

When a difficult, unfamilar work is done twice at a concert, it is almost always attacked with more confidence the second time, and this was no exception. It is impossible fairly to assess Hangen's ability under these peculiar circumstances where he found himself conducting something rehearsed more by Maderna than by himself and performed under Maderna's direction a quarter of an hour earlier. I did, however, see Hangen as a conductor of impressive clarity of mind and gesture, and it was interesting that even under these conditions some sense of personality was in evidence, his performance being more hard-edged and sharply defined in rhythm than Maderna's more fluid, lyric one (an example: the almost Stravinskyian bite Hangen gave the string chords near the end of the first variation).

The orchestra, particularly the strings, made fairly heavy weather of the piece. I suspect just as many details were missed in "Windows," but it shows more in Webern's skeletal purity than in Druckman's lavishly poured impasto.

At Wednesday's chamber concert, which had something of an air of a throw-away affair, I heard Webern's Four Songs, opus 23. with a promising but unready soprano, and the "Rattling On" section of Earl Kim's "Exercises En Route" in a performance that was loud, coarse, and not together. The program which also included works by Donald Erb and Bruce Mather, began with something touching and beautiful, Andrew Imbrie's "To a Traveler." Written last year, it is a short movement a slow to fast to slow — for violin, clarinet and piano, frankly conservative and expressive, in a direct line of descent from Sessions, Schoenberg, and Brahms. It was attentively and attractively played by Paula Sisson, David Stern, and Ken Ziegenfuss.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
AUG 13 1972
New England Newsclip

Contemporary music day at Tanglewood

By Louis Snyder

What contemporary composers have been doing (or not doing) about the art of songwriting received a once-over-lightly nod in Tanglewood's Festival of Contemporary Music on Saturday. Vocal music by five composers, the latest written in 1962, was given by the Berkshire Music Center Singers, presumably to illustrate variations in style rather than to reveal "the newest" or "the best." Three of the composers are BMC faculty members, and the performers are all participants in the center's fellowship program.

Interestingly enough there was a song recital the next morning down the road at the Lenox Art Center by soprano Eleanor Steber, who included Beethoven cycle "An die ferne Geliebte," and songs by seven American composers who were writing before the 1920's.

At Tanglewood Earl Kim's "Letters Found Near a Suicide" (1954), Elliott Carter's settings of two Robert Frost poems (1942), Mel Powell's haiku settings (1961), five Charles Ives songs (composed from 1907 to 1923) and Jacob Druckman's "Dark Upon the Harp" (1962), a six part cycle using Biblical texts, were the choices.

Here it was the wedding of word and note that seemed the main preoccupation, with the performer sometimes coming in only for second consideration. The Powell haiku songs demand of vocalists instrumental kinds of leaps and bounds, the Kim the subtlest variations in an almost conversational line. It is conversation of a more expansive sort that Mr. Carter has translated into musical terms, with anything but ordinary results, and the Ives settings of verses of his own and of Ann Collins, Walt Whitman, and Louis Untermeyer, of course, anticipate them all, and many others besides.

* * *

The Druckman work for mezzo-soprano (D'Anna Fortunato), five brass players, and two percussionists, has as its basis, six psalms, which offer special opportunities for muscular, descriptive instrumental writing. The vocal part, almost operatic in its intensity, needs only to mention "the venom of a serpent" or turning "mourning into dancing" and percussion is there to reinforce the impression. Brass passages ornament and emphasize the primitive rhythmic progress of the texts, from the threats of the "strong bulls of Bashan" (Psalm 22) to the repose of Psalm 16 ("Yea, I have a goodly heritage"). And strong instrumental interludes between the second and third and fourth and fifth sections further implements the work's dramatic structure. Miss Fortunato coped well with the heavy vocal demands, and the composer conducted a cohesive performance by the instrumental ensemble.

The other singers — Susan Larson (Kim), Nancy Lee O'Brien (Carter), and Karen Komar (Powell) — made much of their varied opportunities, while Alexander Stevenson was a musicianly and empathic exponent of the Ives group. Leann Hillmer, Philip Morehead, and Dennis Helmrich provided solid support as accompanists.

* * *

Miss Steber, in the Lenox Arts chamber series, by coincidence offered a contrasting view of earlier American composers' attitudes towards singers. In many cases it was not the textual content for its own sake that motivated the melodic line (and melody was the order of those days), but the opportunity to use the singing voice as an instrument of gracious expression for emotions and ideas.

Miss Steber, who is 100 per cent professional, acknowledged the relative quaintness of many of these songs, then proceeded to sing them for all they are worth, which is more than you think.

George Chadwick's "Before the Dawn," with a bromidic verse is a vocalist's dream; Arthur Foote's "Ships That Pass in the Night," an exercise for singers in the expression of mood; Charles Griffes's "Waikiki" an impressionistic venture in new exoticism. There were also songs by Mrs. H.H.A. Beach, Rudolf Ganz, and John Alden Carpenter, as well as two by Charles Ives — still the common denominator with activities up the road at Tanglewood. The second "Old Time Day," sensitively sung by Miss Steber and played by Veronica Jochum, had the added dividend of a performance by the soprano of the piccolo part (no player available) at the upper end of the piano keyboard.

Previously Miss Steber and Mrs. Jochum had collaborated in a deeply felt performance of the Beethoven cycle, "An die ferne Geliebte," and the pianist was heard in a spirited idiomatic (and that's good) rendition of Bach's Fifth French Suite. A rapt audience in the informal setting of a converted barn off a rustic courtyard gave both artists a reception worthy of more elegant but no less congenial surroundings.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

AUG 11 1972

New England Newsclip

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

AUG 11 1972

Music Fete

A Tanglewood Concert Demonstrates a Split

By DONAL HENAHAN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 10— Composers of post-tonal music who do not come from the 20th-century Viennese tradition of Schoenberg, Berg and Webern often find it hard to suggest a sustained mood in their works. The peculiar atmosphere of hothouse oppressiveness that largely contributes to the power of "Pierrot Lunaire" and "Wozzeck," for instance, is rarely paralleled. From the Viennese trinity—and particularly from Webern, of course—later composers have learned to organize their pieces with unbreakable logic and formal purity; but somehow the deeper musical mysteries of audience appeal have been more difficult to solve.

One result of this impasse in recent years has been a rethinking of theatricality in such works as "Pierrot Lunaire," with its stress on strange and startling vocal and instrumental sonorities as integral elements in the drama. The formalism of pitch relationships has certainly not lost fascination for composers, but a significant number of newer works do seem to be deep into a kind of chamber music drama.

Last night's concert of chamber works at Tanglewood's Festival of Contemporary Music demonstrated the split rather neatly. Andrew Imbrie's "To a Traveler" (1971) was solid, familiar stuff, a trio for piano, violin and clarinet whose open textures and Oriental delicacies could be traced directly to Webern's influence. However, though it made its points with skill and taste, the piece lacked much individuality or profile. Mr. Imbrie's strictly instrumental trio was based, in ways not evident, on a poem of Su Tung P'o.

Webern's own Four Songs (Op. 13) were performed and then repeated, which seemed odd in view of their 1914-18 dating. As conducted by Tibor Pusztai, and interpreted rather blandly by the soprano Carolyn Weber, the songs made less impression than they should have, though the readings were conscientious and accurate.

Earl Kim's "Rattlin' On" (1970) went straight back to "Pierrot Lunaire" even to the point of darkening the theater except for music-stand lights. Joan Heller, a soprano precisionist, sang, spoke, declaimed, hummed and vocalized in bravura style to text drawn from Samuel Beckett, and suggested much of the hopelessness and wit of that author's endlessly gabbing nihilists. At one point, as Miss Heller was stuttering that there was "no voice left," theatricality took an aleatoric turn: The lights went out, leaving her to rattle on with utter aplomb in the blackness. Unfortunately this proved not to be a stroke of theater by Mr. Kim, but an inadvertently yanked electrical plug backstage.

The Kim work is part of a larger score that, in a staged version, calls for dance episodes. In this performance, the soprano seemed misplaced, too far to the rear of the stage, so that many of her words were unfocused and blanketed by the instruments.

The most immediately attractive piece of the night was Donald Erb's Three Pieces for Brass Quintet and Piano (1968), which exploited such by now familiar devices as percussive slapping of mouthpieces, blowing into mouthpieces to which no instrument was attached, drumming on piano strings, vocalizing into instruments and much else Mr. Erb made music out of these devices, however, and Charles Darden conducted a performance marked by extraordinary rhythmic excitement and propulsion. If one wished to draw up a catalogue of antecedents here, it would include at least Berio, Varèse and Ives. But the effect was brilliant.

Berio-like use of the voice in purely instrumental ways characterized Bruce Mather's "Madrigal II" (1968), in which a soprano (Rebecca Hayes), a contralto (Patricia Stedry) and a flutist (David Kramer) formed a trio in opposition to a quartet of harp, cello, viola and violin. Texts, drawn from poetry of St. Denys Garneau, were at first splintered by syllabic distortions, then moved into sustained lines through a maze of whispering, humming and vocalise. Although not invariably absorbing, Mr. Mather's piece made several nice points, such as his duets in which soprano sang while contralto hummed, or in which they joined in a whispered duet. Bruce Hangen conducted.

Contemporary art of songwriting

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

What contemporary composers have been doing (or not doing) about the art of songwriting received a once-over-lightly nod in Tanglewood's Festival of Contemporary Music on Saturday. Vocal music by five composers, the latest written in 1962, was given by the Berkshire Music Center Singers, presumably to illustrate variations in style rather than to reveal "the newest" or "the best." Three of the composers are BMC faculty members, and the performers are all participants in the center's fellowship program.

At Tanglewood Earl Kim's "Letters Found Near a Suicide" (1954), Elliott Carter's settings of two Robert Frost poems (1942), Mel Powell's haiku settings (1961), five Charles Ives songs (composed from 1907 to 1923) and Jacob Druckman's "Dark Upon the Harp" (1962), a six part cycle using Biblical texts, were the choices.

Here it was the wedding of word and note that seemed the main preoccupation, with the performer sometimes coming in only for second consideration. The Powell haiku songs demand of vocalists instrumental kinds of leaps and bounds, the Kim the subtlest variations in an almost conversational line. It is conversation of a more expansive sort that Mr. Carter has translated into musical terms, with anything but ordinary results, and the Ives settings of verses of his own and of Ann Collins, Walt Whitman, and Louis Untermeyer, of course, anticipate them all, and many others besides.

The Druckman work for mezzo-soprano (D'Anna Fortunato), five brass players, and two percussionists, has as its basis, six psalms, which offer special opportunities for muscular, descriptive instrumental writing. The vocal part, almost operatic in its intensity, needs only to mention "the venom of a serpent" or turning "mourning into dancing" and percussion is there to reinforce the impression. Brass passages ornament and emphasize the primitive rhythmic progress of the texts, from the threats of the "strong bulls of Bashan" (Psalm 22) to the repose of Psalm 16 ("Yea. I have a goodly heritage").

Contemporary Vocal Music Found Emotionally Barren

By RICHARD CONWAY

Regardless of how many programs of contemporary music I attend, listening to and trying to deal with the new ideas and techniques, almost without exception I come away feeling that while it may have been intellectually interesting, it was emotionally barren.

As open-minded as we may try to be, there are some things against which the mind, and especially the heart, simply rebels, and says a resounding "No". And all the logical arguments composers present cannot sway us.

For me, this is especially true when I have to deal with contemporary vocal music. Saturday afternoon at Tanglewood will provide an excellent case in point.

As part of this year's Festival of Contemporary Music, the Berkshire Music Center Vocal Department presented a program of works by 20th century composers. With the exception of Charles Ives, all of the composers are still living, and three of them are teaching at the Center this summer. In addition, none of the works is really new. The earliest dates from 1942; the latest from 1962.

The program opened with "Letters Found Near a Suicide," by Earl Kim. Composed in 1954, the three songs, about seven minutes in length, are not especially difficult to listen to, but neither are they especially moving. The singer's lines are reasonably melodic in a traditional sense, and the dissonant factors are not so pronounced as to disturb. There is little repetition of text, and the music is through-composed.

"Two Robert Frost Songs," composed in 1942 by Elliott Carter, come across as rather bland, although there is a gentle wit about "The Rose Family" that has an appeal.

By far the most interestingly different songs were the "Haiku Settings," written in 1961 by Mel Powell. The four pieces that make up the set are given musical interpretation that clearly reminds one of the Oriental concept of vocal production, and that seem clearly related to Japanese wind instrument playing. The vocal lines are often recitative in nature, and the pitch often wavers in quarter tone fashion. In effect, Powell has captured and conveyed the elusive qualities of Haiku poetry. Soprano Karen Komar and pianist Dennis Helmrich had a nice sensitivity for the songs.

"Six Songs" by Charles Ives were by far the most popular works sung Saturday. "The Greatest Man" and "The One Way" have great audience appeal, and tenor Alexander Stevenson made good contact with the audience in his performance. The songs were composed between 1907 and 1923.

Jacob Druckman's "Dark Upon the Harp," a 10 to 25 minute setting of six Psalms, closed the program. Composed in 1962, the piece is scored for mezzo-soprano, two trumpets, trombone, French Horn, tuba, and two percussionists.

The vocal line is often more recitative than melodic, and the instrumental accompaniment is frequently interjections of wildly thrashing sounds that give the impression that all Hell is breaking loose. At times this is appropriate to the text. Frequently, though, this seems to have little relation to the sense of the Psalms.

One recognizes the need for composers to seek new means of expression. One also realizes that the history of music is time and again a study of musicians whose work was not understood or accepted by contemporary critic and audience. Perhaps the music is indeed a reflection of its time.

Still the questions remain. Is this music that I would care to hear again? Is it music that I would want to perform? Has the experience been satisfying?

To the Power and the Ives songs, one could say "Yes." To the others, while we may pay tribute to the skill that produced them, we ultimately end up saying "So what?"

Contemporary music day at Tanglewood

By Louis Snyder

What contemporary composers have been doing (or not doing) about the art of songwriting received a once-over-lightly nod in Tanglewood's Festival of Contemporary Music on Saturday. Vocal music by five composers, the latest written in 1962, was given by the Berkshire Music Center Singers, presumably to illustrate variations in style rather than to reveal "the newest" or "the best." Three of the composers are BMC faculty members, and the performers are all participants in the center's fellowship program.

Interestingly enough there was a song recital the next morning down the road at the Lenox Art Center by soprano Eleanor Steber, who included Beethoven cycle "An die ferne Geliebte," and songs by seven American composers who were writing before the 1920's.

At Tanglewood Earl Kim's "Letters Found Near a Suicide" (1954), Elliott Carter's settings of two Robert Frost poems (1942), Mel Powell's haiku settings (1961), five Charles Ives songs (composed from 1907 to 1923) and Jacob Druckman's "Dark Upon the Harp" (1962), a six part cycle using Biblical texts, were the choices.

Here it was the wedding of word and note that seemed the main preoccupation, with the performer sometimes coming in only for second consideration. The Powell haiku songs demand of vocalists instrumental kinds of leaps and bounds, the Kim the subtlest variations in an almost conversational line. It is conversation of a more expansive sort that Mr. Carter has translated into musical terms, with anything but ordinary results, and the Ives settings of verses of his own and of Ann Collins, Walt Whitman, and Louis Untermeyer, of course, anticipate them all, and many others besides.

* * *

The Druckman work for mezzo-soprano (D'Anna Fortunato), five brass players, and two percussionists, has as its basis, six psalms, which offer special opportunities for muscular, descriptive instrumental writing. The vocal part, almost operatic in its intensity, needs only to mention "the venom of a serpent" or turning "mourning into dancing" and percussion is there to reinforce the impression. Brass passages ornament and emphasize the primitive rhythmic progress of the texts, from the threats of the "strong bulls of Bashan" (Psalm 22) to the repose of Psalm 16 ("Yea, I have a goodly heritage"). And strong instrumental interludes between the second and third and fourth and fifth sections further implements the work's dramatic structure. Miss Fortunato coped well with the heavy vocal demands, and the composer conducted a cohesive performance by the instrumental ensemble.

The other singers — Susan Larson (Kim), Nancy Lee O'Brien (Carter), and Karen Komar (Powell) — made much of their varied opportunities, while Alexander Stevenson was a musicianly and empathic exponent of the Ives group. Leann Hillmer, Philip Morehead, and Dennis Helmrich provided solid support as accompanists.

* * *

Miss Steber, in the Lenox Arts chamber series, by coincidence offered a contrasting view of earlier American composers' attitudes towards singers. In many cases it was not the textual content for its own sake that motivated the melodic line (and melody was the order of those days), but the opportunity to use the singing voice as an instrument of gracious expression for emotions and ideas. Miss Steber, who is 100 per cent professional, acknowledged the relative quaintness of many of these songs, then proceeded to sing them for all they are worth, which is more than you think.

George Chadwick's "Before the Dawn," with a bromidic verse is a vocalist's dream; Arthur Foote's "Ships That Pass in the Night," an exercise for singers in the expression of mood; Charles Griffes's "Waikiki" an impressionistic venture in new exoticism. There were also songs by Mrs. H.H.A. Beach, Rudolf Ganz, and John Alden Carpenter, as well as two by Charles Ives — still the common denominator with activities up the road at Tanglewood. The second "Old Time Day," sensitively sung by Miss Steber and played by Veronica Jochum, had the added dividend of a performance by the soprano of the piccolo part (no player available) at the upper end of the piano keyboard.

Previously Miss Steber and Mrs. Jochum had collaborated in a deeply felt performance of the Beethoven cycle, "An die ferne Geliebte," and the pianist was heard in a spirited idiomatic (and that's good) rendition of Bach's Fifth French Suite. A rapt audience in the informal setting of a converted barn off a rustic courtyard gave both artists a reception worthy of more elegant but no less congenial surroundings.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

AUG 11 1972

New England Newsclip

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

AUG 11 1972

Music Fete

A Tanglewood Concert Demonstrates a Split

By DONAL HENAHAN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 10—Composers of post-tonal music who do not come from the 20th-century Viennese tradition of Schoenberg, Berg and Webern often find it hard to suggest a sustained mood in their works. The peculiar atmosphere of hothouse oppressiveness that largely contributes to the power of "Pierrot Lunaire" and "Wozzeck," for instance, is rarely paralleled. From the Viennese trinity—and particularly from Webern, of course—later composers have learned to organize their pieces with unbreakable logic and formal purity; but somehow the deeper musical mysteries of audience appeal have been more difficult to solve.

One result of this impasse in recent years has been a rethinking of theatricality in such works as "Pierrot Lunaire," with its stress on strange and startling vocal and instrumental sonorities as integral elements in the drama. The formalism of pitch relationships has certainly not lost fascination for composers, but a significant number of newer works do seem to be deep into a kind of chamber music drama.

Last night's concert of chamber works at Tanglewood's Festival of Contemporary Music demonstrated the split rather neatly. Andrew Imbrie's "To a Traveler" (1971) was solid, familiar stuff, a trio for piano, violin and clarinet whose open textures and Oriental delicacies could be traced directly to Webern's influence. However, though it made its points with skill and taste, the piece lacked much individuality or profile. Mr. Imbrie's strictly instrumental trio was based, in ways not evident, on a poem of Su Tung P'o.

Webern's own Four Songs (Op. 13) were performed and then repeated, which seemed odd in view of their 1914-18 dating. As conducted by Tibor Pusztai, and interpreted rather blandly by the soprano Carolyn Weber, the songs made less impression than they should have, though the readings were conscientious and accurate.

Earl Kim's "Rattlin' On" (1970) went straight back to "Pierrot Lunaire" even to the point of darkening the theater except for music-stand lights. Joan Heller, a soprano precisionist, sang, spoke, declaimed, hummed and vocalized in bravura style to text drawn from Samuel Beckett, and suggested much of the hopelessness and wit of that author's endlessly gabbing nihilists. At one point, as Miss Heller was stuttering that there was "no voice left," theatricality took an aleatoric turn: The lights went out, leaving her to rattle on with utter aplomb in the blackness. Unfortunately this proved not to be a stroke of theater by Mr. Kim, but an inadvertently yanked electrical plug backstage.

The Kim work is part of a larger score that, in a staged version, calls for dance episodes. In this performance, the soprano seemed misplaced, too far to the rear of the stage, so that many of her words were unfocused and blanketed by the instruments.

The most immediately attractive piece of the night was Donald Erb's Three Pieces for Brass Quintet and Piano (1968), which exploited such by now familiar devices as percussive slapping of mouthpieces, blowing into mouthpieces to which no instrument was attached, drumming on piano strings, vocalizing into instruments and much else Mr. Erb made music out of these devices, however, and Charles Darden conducted a performance marked by extraordinary rhythmic excitement and propulsion. If one wished to draw up a catalogue of antecedents here, it would include at least Berio, Varèse and Ives. But the effect was brilliant.

Berio-like use of the voice in purely instrumental ways characterized Bruce Mather's "Madrigal II" (1968), in which a soprano (Rebecca Hayes), a contralto (Patricia Stedry) and a flutist (David Kramer) formed a trio in opposition to a quartet of harp, cello, viola and violin. Texts, drawn from poetry of St. Denys Garneau, were at first splintered by syllabic distortions, then moved into sustained lines through a maze of whispering, humming and vocalise. Although not invariably absorbing, Mr. Mather's piece made several nice points, such as his duets in which soprano sang while contralto hummed, or in which they joined in a whispered duet. Bruce Hangen conducted.

Contemporary Vocal Music Found Emotionally Barren

By RICHARD CONWAY

Regardless of how many programs of contemporary music I attend, listening to and trying to deal with the new ideas and techniques, almost without exception I come away feeling that while it may have been intellectually interesting, it was emotionally barren.

As open-minded as we may try to be, there are some things against which the mind, and especially the heart, simply rebels, and says a resounding "No". And all the logical arguments composers present cannot sway us.

For me, this is especially true when I have to deal with contemporary vocal music. Saturday afternoon at Tanglewood will provide an excellent case in point.

As part of this year's Festival of Contemporary Music, the Berkshire Music Center Vocal Department presented a program of works by 20th century composers. With the exception of Charles Ives, all of the composers are still living, and three of them are teaching at the Center this summer. In addition, none of the works is really new. The earliest dates from 1942; the latest from 1962.

The program opened with "Letters Found Near a Suicide," by Earl Kim. Composed in 1954, the three songs, about seven minutes in length, are not especially difficult to listen to, but neither are they especially moving. The singer's lines are reasonably melodic in a traditional sense, and the dissonant factors are not so pronounced as to disturb. There is little repetition of text, and the music is through-composed.

"Two Robert Frost Songs," composed in 1942 by Elliott Carter, come across as rather bland, although there is a gentle wit about "The Rose Family" that has an appeal.

By far the most interestingly different songs were the "Haiku Settings," written in 1961 by Mel Powell. The four pieces that make up the set are given musical interpretation that clearly reminds one of the Oriental concept of vocal production, and that seem clearly related to Japanese wind instrument playing. The vocal lines are often recitative in nature, and the pitch often wavers in quarter tone fashion. In effect, Powell has captured and conveyed the elusive qualities of Haiku poetry. Soprano Karen Komar and pianist Dennis Helmrich had a nice sensitivity for the songs.

"Six Songs" by Charles Ives were by far the most popular works sung Saturday. "The Greatest Man" and "The One Way" have great audience appeal, and tenor Alexander Stevenson made good contact with the audience in his performance. The songs were composed between 1907 and 1923.

Jacob Druckman's "Dark Upon the Harp," a 10 to 25 minute setting of six Psalms, closed the program. Composed in 1962, the piece is scored for mezzo-soprano, two trumpets, trombone, French Horn, tuba, and two percussionists.

The vocal line is often more recitative than melodic, and the instrumental accompaniment is frequently interjections of wildly thrashing sounds that give the impression that all Hell is breaking loose. At times this is appropriate to the text. Frequently, though, this seems to have little relation to the sense of the Psalms.

One recognizes the need for composers to seek new means of expression. One also realizes that the history of music is time and again a study of musicians whose work was not understood or accepted by contemporary critic and audience. Perhaps the music is indeed a reflection of its time.

Still the questions remain. Is this music that I would care to hear again? Is it music that I would want to perform? Has the experience been satisfying?

To the Power and the Ives songs, one could say "Yes." To the others, while we may pay tribute to the skill that produced them, we ultimately end up saying "So what?"

Contemporary art of songwriting

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

What contemporary composers have been doing (or not doing) about the art of songwriting received a once-over-lightly nod in Tanglewood's Festival of Contemporary Music on Saturday. Vocal music by five composers, the latest written in 1962, was given by the Berkshire Music Center Singers, presumably to illustrate variations in style rather than to reveal "the newest" or "the best." Three of the composers are BMC faculty members, and the performers are all participants in the center's fellowship program.

At Tanglewood Earl Kim's "Letters Found Near a Suicide" (1954), Elliott Carter's settings of two Robert Frost poems (1942), Mel Powell's haiku settings (1961), five Charles Ives songs (composed from 1907 to 1923) and Jacob Druckman's "Dark Upon the Harp" (1962), a six part cycle using Biblical texts, were the choices.

Here it was the wedding of word and note that seemed the main preoccupation, with the performer sometimes coming in only for second consideration. The Powell haiku songs demand of vocalists instrumental kinds of leaps and bounds, the Kim the subtlest variations in an almost conversational line. It is conversation of a more expansive sort that Mr. Carter has translated into musical terms, with anything but ordinary results, and the Ives settings of verses of his own and of Ann Collins, Walt Whitman, and Louis Untermeyer, of course, anticipate them all, and many others besides.

The Druckman work for mezzo-soprano (D'Anna Fortunato), five brass players, and two percussionists, has as its basis, six psalms, which offer special opportunities for muscular, descriptive instrumental writing. The vocal part, almost operatic in its intensity, needs only to mention "the venom of a serpent" or turning "mourning into dancing" and percussion is there to reinforce the impression. Brass passages ornament and emphasize the primitive rhythmic progress of the texts, from the threats of the "strong bulls of Bashan" (Psalm 22) to the repose of Psalm 16 ("Yea, I have a goodly heritage").

152

Tanglewood Concert Honors Fromm

By DONAL HANAHAN

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 9— The arguing, booing and intra-fraternal name-calling that have enlivened or polluted (taste in these matters varies) this year's Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood were put aside last night. The at-least-temporary healing agent was a concert honoring the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, which cooperates with the Berkshire Music Center in putting on this annual celebration of newness in the very bosom of the conservative Boston Symphony Orchestra and its Tanglewood Festival.

Paul Fromm, the Chicago wine importer who has commissioned some 90 compositions during his foundation's life to date, accepted the audience's applause with a graceful speech in which he confessed the tendency of his group and others in recent decades to pit new music against old in an effort to integrate the two. Mr. Fromm added that the token integration thereby achieved often resulted in "mere busing of new works to the halls of Brahms and Beethoven." He urged instead a recognition of the need for coexistence of many types of music in our pluralistic society.

●

The concert aptly offered four works commissioned by the Fromm Foundation, including first performances of Gunther Schuller's "The Invenzione" (1972) and Bruno Maderna's "Giardino Religioso" (1972), both for chamber orchestra and both conducted by the composers. In a restrospective of sorts, Mr. Schuller also conducted two of the most important Fromm commissions of the last decade: Luciano Berio's "Circles" (1960), with Barbara Hocher as vocal soloist, and Elliott Carter's Double Concerto for Harpsichord and Piano with Two Chamber Orchestras, in which Ursula Oppens and Gilbert Kalish took the solo keyboard roles.

Both the 1972 pieces proved to be impressive additions to the Fromm collection of modern art. Mr. Schuller's prevailingly serial three-movement "inventions" employed 25 players divided into five quintets, none including strings. The first movement was a mosaic of small scraps hurtling about seemingly at random. The second moved from annunciatory clusters of thick, opaque chords into tightly interwoven patterns of high and low contrasts. The third, slipping into tonally oriented interludes now and then, provided the most fascination, with its staccato bursts and an antiphonal trading of the ideas among the spatially separated quintets.

●

The players, all Berkshire Music Center students, gave Mr. Schuller (who is artistic co-director of Tanglewood and therefore their musical guru) an alert and technically superlative performance.

Mr. Maderna's "Giardino Religioso" also dispersed its players in groups to exploit the mobile potential in his kind of open-form music, which permits a certain amount of controlled chance to operate. The conductor officiated in a priestly way over the ceremony, sometimes striking a triangle hanging at his podium, or moving into the orchestra's midst to give instructive sermonettes on bongos or celesta, which led to percussive jam sessions.

●

As it took shape, Mr. Maderna's "Religious Garden" moved from the barest wisps of string tone to a central section of all-out cacophony (too long and uninteresting, one felt) and ended with a distant elegy in which the two trumpets exchanged poignant statements that put one inevitably in mind of Ives's "The Unanswered Question."

In "Circles," the light-voiced Miss Hocher was sometimes hampered by an unreliable amplifying system that cut in and out at odd times, but she handled Berio's vocal gymnastics and phonetic jokes with surprising ease and panache.

2 Original Works Premier at Tanglewood Concert

Bos Symphony

By RAYMOND MORIN

Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — Tuesday night's festival of contemporary music in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood was distinguished by two world premieres commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation in honor of its 20th anniversary.

They were Bruno Maderna's "Giardino Religioso" and Gunther Schuller's "Tre Invenzione."

Both were admirably performed by students of the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony's summer academy for the advanced study of music), conducted by the composers.

The 1,200-capacity hall was four-fifths' filled and overflowing with enthusiasm.

In introducing Paul Fromm, founder and director of the Fromm Foundation of Chicago, Schuller identified him as the man who has "done the most for contemporary music."

During the past 20 years, the Fromm Foundation has commissioned works by nearly 90 composers, some of them in conjunction with the Berkshire Music Center.

Second-Class Label

Noted for his candor, the Chicago industrialist expressed disappointment over "contemporary music's second-class existence."

He berated the common assumption that "anyone concerned with contemporary music can't be intelligent," pointed out that many concert-goers are bored by over-exposure to Brahms and Beethoven," and deplored the practice of "insinuating insignificant contemporary works into traditional programs" — for the purpose of protective custody.

"Contemporary music is not in a transitional stage," he asserted. "It is permanent. We are living in a pluralistic age. Different forms of contemporary music will survive."

Maderna's "Giardino" was described as a "walk through a musical garden." The conductor did some of the walking by leaving the podium periodically to join the 21 players as an instrumentalist.

He carried on a lively dialogue on bongo drums with the percussion section — played the triangle and celesta.

The work has some ethereally beautiful sounds in strings, fierce declamation in percussion and brass, and compelling elements of mysticism.

It called for cymbals to be dropped on the floor, pianist to produce tone clusters by applying both forearms to the keyboard, and striking the piano strings with drumsticks.

Original Sound

With or without Maderna's intended symbolisms, "Giardino" is a fascinating piece of music, insured against boredom, underivative, and an ingenious study in original sound production.

Schuller's "Inventions" were superbly played by his 25 instrumentalists, in widely separated groups comprising strings, woodwinds, brasses and percussion.

The "Capriccio" had jaunty, key-evaded melodies to which were affixed exclamations in wind and percussion. The "chorale" was initiated with ingenious low-ranged sounds that developed into piercing shrieks in stratospheric range. The concluding "Toccata" was a succession of blasting clashes, separated by brief interludes of lyricism and a few jazz inferences.

Here, again was a work of vital characteristics— undoubtedly irritating to some, but presented with clarity of form, styles that confirmed the titles, and individuality.

Music of Sixties

The balance of the program, also commissioned by the Fromm Foundation, was Berio's "Circles" (1960)P and Carter's Double Concerto for harpsichord, piano, and two chamber orchestras (19

Charter's work was more typical of the cacophanous expletives of the 1960s that have since served as a model for a small army of composers who seek attention through non-conformism but haven't enough talent of their own.

This was the fifth of the Contemporary Music Festival's seven concerts.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,977
AUG 10 1972
New England Newsclip

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
AUG 11 1972
New England Newsclip

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549
AUG 10 1972
New England Newsclip

Schuller, Maderna works premiere at Tanglewood

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

Paul Fromm, who is the moving spirit of the Fromm Musical Foundation, which has just had its 20th anniversary observed at Tanglewood, made a speech at the Berkshire Music Center's commemorative concert with a suggestion as challenging as some of the music his foundation encourages. In essence his feeling is that music should progress beyond Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms to the point that, on a typical program they and their cohorts would be in the minority among our contemporaries.

His remarks came on the occasion of a concert by the orchestra of the Berkshire Music Center, cosponsor with the Fromm Foundation of Tanglewood's Festival of Contemporary Music, which began last week with a full-sized Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. Under Michael Thomas's direction, honoring the foundation's 20th milestone and the nine-year Fromm alliance with the Berkshire Festival, that program included as its centerpiece the world premiere of a Fromm-commissioned Concerto for Amplified Violin, with Paul Zukofsky as soloist, employing a normal violin bridge cum transducer to producer a sound of equal intensity to that of the unamplified orchestra. For an otherwise singularly ungimmicky piece, it created quite a stir.

Rumor hath it that some BSO players took exception at rehearsals not only to the concerto and the techniques it employed, but to the composer himself, and that the resultant grumbling and booing led to a negative assessment by Mr. Wuoronin of the orchestra's performance of his work.

Notwithstanding, there were listeners at the first performance unaware of these backstage contretemps who found both work and performance absorbing and significant. And at the Music Center concert, played by ensembles of young center fellowship musicians on the fringes of professionalism, there was no evidence that the rebellious attitudes of their peers had intruded, even though their own program consisted of two world premieres, conducted by their innovative composers, and two other works previously commissioned by the Fromm Foundation.

All of Tuesday's selections were equally taxing on performers and first-time listeners. Luciano Berio's "Circles" (1960) for soprano, harp, and percussion, is, program notes tell us, "an 'adventure' and 'exploration' of the human voice" aided and abetted by instrumental commentary and pitch extension. Texts by e. e. cummings are employed in this exercise but apparently as a means to illustrate the composer's preoccupation with contrasting sounds and means of producing them. Soprano Barbara Hocher, harpist Ariana Anca, and percussionists David Johnson and Gary DiPerna were the dazzling participants.

Both new works — Gunther Schuller's "Tre Invenzione" and Bruno Maderna's "Giardino Religioso"— are, as might be expected, expertly organized and crafted. The former, for five quintets of winds, brasses, and keyboard instruments, including harp, is chiefly impressive for its well ordered tonal contrasts; the "Giardino," with strings, brass, percussion, and two pianos and harps, is more expressive of emotional content, and permits the conductor to wander through his orchestra giving an assist here and there on various instruments —seen by the composer as "an act of belief." It also has "open" sections in which the use of musical materials is left to the discretion of the conductor, who thus maintains a dialogue with specified, "closed" forms.

The concluding Double Concerto for Harpsichord and Piano (1961) by Elliott Carter also has dialogic aspects, since each solo instrument has its own reinforcing chamber orchestra. Again the preoccupation is with matters of technical concern to the composer: relationships of pitched and non-pitched instruments, "reconciling . . . different responses to the finger's touch." For the listener such subtleties are not immediately apparent, and the fact that hey were explored at some length produced a degree of audience restiveness.

Mr. Schuller conducted the Carter work in which Ursula Oppens (harpsichord) and Gilbert Kalish (piano) were proficient soloists. Through the evening, music center orchestra's playing, in its varying guises, continued to amaze, not only for its virtuosity, collectively and individually, but for its responsiveness to musical situations of unusual complexity.

The audience was large and well disposed, greeting everyone and everything with indiscriminate enthusiasm. If there was any special favorite, it would seem to have been Mr. Maderna who received continuing plaudits both from the listeners and the performers whom he had just taken for "a walk through his musical garden."

Tanglewood's festival within a festival

Contemporary music's turn

Bos Symphony

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — Quoting John Maynard Keynes, Paul Fromm has defined the aim of his Fromm Music Foundation as giving "courage, confidence and opportunity to artists." Its commissions to 88 composers representing all degrees of eminence and the most non-parochial variety of styles, are only the most endearing of the many ways in which the Fromm Foundation, by a wide margin, has made itself the most helpful and stimulating force in the world of contemporary music in the United States.

The Foundation's 20th anniversary is this year, and Tuesday night at Tanglewood, as part of the Berkshire Music Center Festival of Contemporary Music, a special concert was given in celebration. It included the premier of works commissioned for the occasion from Gunther Schuller and Bruno Maderna, bracketing them between two of the most original and vital of earlier Fromm commissions, Luciano Berio's "Circles" and Elliott Carter's double concerto. The annual Fromm Contemporary Festival here has been called "the festival within a festival":

Tuesday's concert surely was "the festival within the festival within the festival" as well as the most confident, joyous statement of "yes, thank you, music is very well indeed."

Schuller's new piece, "Tre Invencioni," is written for five quintets, one each of bright woodwinds and dark, bright brasses and dark, and one of keyboard plus harp. The second, "invention" which is slow and sustained, between movements that are faster and whose statements are more staccato, begins with subterranean shudders and seems for a long time to be going to use only the darker choirs.

Gradually, though, pitch, brightness and intensity all rise — as I recall it, the flugelhorn from the dark brass quintet smuggles in the trumpets from the bright one — until a climax is reached of high instruments screaming, and over no bottom at all. Suddenly all that is cut off, the first shudder returns, and the movement is over. It is simple and it is stunningly effective.

It may be the simplicity that makes it hit home so surely. The movement is the virtuosic realization of a drastically simple scenario and does not depend on that invention of highly characterized musical detail which is the least strong part of Schuller's equipment as a composer. The two quick movements do depend on it rather more, and they are correspondingly less consistently compelling. Both, however, are engaging, particularly the finale with its crazy stop-go, tonal-atonal humor. All of the work is enlivened by the virtuoso writing which proceeds from a subtle and an all-the-way-to-the-center knowledge of wind instruments which few living composers equal.

Maderna's "Giardino Religioso" for strings, percussion and pairs of horns, trumpets, harps, and pianos, comes from a very different musical world. While Schuller's completely written out, formally presented "invencioni" are traditional, Maderna wanders into the world of "open form," the improvised ordering of events, and the theatrics of a conductor who from time to time leaves his podium to engage in another sort of dialogue with his orchestra by playing on various percussion and keyboard instruments.

The walk through Maderna's musical garden begins in extreme quiet with the conductor calling on one string player after another to contribute some tiny musical fragment — the order of the calling is according to the conductor's choosing at that moment, while each player chooses a fragment from the sheet before him.

It progresses into an allegro donnybrook, (not improvised) which culminates in a percussion player's throwing his gong and cymbals to the floor, and returns again to quiet, now with two trumpets like from some romantic opera scene calling across the stage to each other over a receeding screen of string sounds. It is a curious and touching dream about what if Ives had been Italian, a work that is soft and lyrical and sometimes funny, and with a lovely atmosphere to it.

Working with Berkshire Music Center students, each composer got a really effective performance of his own piece. So another two strong pieces were added to the Fromm catalogue that night, and I mean no discredit to them by remarking that the Carter double concerto is in another league altogether. That was the more evident Tuesday for the beautifully flowing, lyric performance under Schuller's direction — he gets the sense of overlapping and intersecting waves and geysers best of any conductor — with Ursula Oppens and Gilbert Kalish as superb harpsichord and piano soloists. The evening's one disappointment was the pedestrian reading of Berio's potentially magical "Circles" (Barbara Hocher, soprano and Maderna conducting), one that was also disfigured by trouble with the electronics.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
AUG 11 1972
New England Newsclip

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

AUG 9 1972

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Continues Festival of Contemporary Music

By RICHARD CONWAY

The week - long Festival of Contemporary Music continued at Tanglewood Tuesday night with a concert honoring the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation. Two new works commissioned by the Foundation were given their world premieres, each conducted by its composer. In addition, two other works, previously commissioned by the foundation, were also performed.

The Fromm Music Foundation, founded and headed by Paul Fromm, is dedicated to the encouragement of new music and new composers. It seeks to provide composers with an opportunity to create, and to provide a platform on which the music can be played and heard.

Tuesday's program, attended by a crowd of several hundred in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood, began with a 1960 work called "Circles," written by Luciano Berio. Scored for soprano, harp, and two groups of percussion, the 18-minute long work, based on the poetry of e. e. cummings, is basically an exploration of vocal sounds and noises, with the harp serving as an extension of the voice, and the percussion commenting on the voice line by adding its own timbres, noises, and sounds.

The voice makes much of the vowel and especially the consonant sounds in the poetry. Thus, the vocal part is as much spoken as it is sung. Soprano Barbara Hocher did an excellent job with it.

Gunther Schuller's "Tre Invenzioni" was one of the newly commissioned works being heard for the first time. It is in three movements and takes about 14 minutes to perform.

The piece is scored for 25 players divided into five quintets. Spatially separated on stage, the groupings provide the composer with many possibilities for playing the different registers, timbres, and textures inherent in the instruments. There is also much dialogue between and among the different groupings.

"Giardino Religioso," by Bruno Maderna, was the second work having its premiere last night. The composer clearly intends it to have extra - musical connotations.

The roughly 18 minute work suggests the idea of walking through a garden — a garden of music. Indeed, the conductor at two or three points leaves the podium and plays a few of the instruments. Maderna sees this representing a total commitment, an act of belief, something very like a religious experience.

Some of the music is clearly set forth in the score, others sections are instigated by the conductor at the moment of performance. The result, especially toward the close of the piece, is something bordering on the mystical.

Maderna's work was received with a great deal of enthusiasm last night. The applause must have lasted easily five minutes.

Elliott Carter's "Double Concerto for Harpsichord and Piano, with Two Chamber Orchestras," composed in 1961, concluded the concert.

Again, the two performing ensembles are separated on stage. Their musical materials become more and more differentiated. Halfway through the work, they meet again only to separate once more. At the close, both groups slowly merge to the underlying polyrhythmic structure of the work. Heavy emphasis is given the percussive aspects, as the work calls for four percussionists.

Not having heard any of the works before, we can only note that the performances themselves seemed solid and definitive. Those who understand and can accept the intellectual and experimental aspects of contemporary music would surely have found last night's concert fascinating.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 9 1972

New England Newsclip

Fromm Festival Review

Schuller's 'Tre Invenzione' debut

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

A CONCERT honoring the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation was played last night in the Theatre-Concert Hall at Tanglewood and consisted entirely of commissions by the foundation.

Two commissions of this year were framed by two of the vintage of more than a decade ago which, if there is such an ordinance, would by now have attained their majority, a term not completely satisfactory since age in music can conceivably attain its minority by mere seniority.

Luciano Berio's "Circles" of 1960 thrives in its 12-year-old maturity. Its performance was immeasurably enhanced by the vocalism of soprano Barbara Hocher, whose execution of all the types of phonetics Berio indicates was remarkable.

Elliott Carter's Double Concert of 1961, for harpsichord and piano with two chamber orchestras, dispels its early mists with time. The composer came to the stage from his seat in the hall to receive the vociferous plaudits of a large and eagerly well-disposed audience.

* * *

IN A KEENLY sapient address, Paul Fromm, introduced by Tanglewood artistic director Gunther Schuller as the single most important benefactor of contemporary music, pointed out the difficulties of the coexistence and the integration of the established repertory and the music being conceived in this era.

* * *

THE TWO NEW commissions were conducted by their respective composers. Schuller offered the first performance of his "Tre Invenzions," so named, the program notes explained, in the sense in which the term was often used in the Renaissance to apply to freely conceived musical "inventions" which did not correspond to some already established forms.

The first movement, subtitled Capriccio, makes use of whimsical sonorities by means of floating wisps of sound. The second movement, a chorale, has little discernible metric progression but resorts to the extremes of the gamut from a piercing piccolo to a tenebrous tuba. The third section is a toccata of more general involvement in all ways.

* * *

BRUNO MADERNA'S "Giardino Religioso" is a genial work, conducive to euphoria. The composer made kindly gestures to his musicians, seemingly suggesting that their participation would be welcome at a certain moment if they agreed. At other subsidiary times, they are left to their own devices to insert phrases they consider suitable. The conductor wanders about the stage at times, himself sounding a percussion instrument or plucking the innards of a piano or executing a line at the celesta.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

AUG 10 1972

Tanglewood Concert Honors Fromm

By DONAL HANAHAN

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 9— The arguing, booing and intra-fraternal name-calling that have enlivened or polluted (taste in these matters varies) this year's Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood were put aside last night. The at-least-temporary healing agent was a concert honoring the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, which cooperates with the Berkshire Music Center in putting on this annual celebration of newness in the very bosom of the conservative Boston Symphony Orchestra and its Tanglewood Festival.

Paul Fromm, the Chicago wine importer who has commissioned some 90 compositions during his foundation's life to date, accepted the audience's applause with a graceful speech in which he confessed the tendency of his group and others in recent decades to pit new music against old in an effort to integrate the two. Mr. Fromm added that the token integration thereby achieved often resulted in "mere busing of new works to the halls of Brahms and Beethoven." He urged instead a recognition of the need for coexistence of many types of music in our pluralistic society.

●

The concert aptly offered four works commissioned by the Fromm Foundation, including first performances of Gunther Schuller's "The Invenzione" (1972) and Bruno Maderna's "Giardino Religioso" (1972), both for chamber orchestra and both conducted by the composers. In a restrospective of sorts, Mr. Schuller also conducted two of the most important Fromm commissions of the last decade: Luciano Berio's "Circles" (1960), with Barbara Hocher as vocal soloist, and Elliott Carter's Double Concerto for Harpsichord and Piano with Two Chamber Orchestras, in which Ursula Oppens and Gilbert Kalish took the solo keyboard roles.

Both the 1972 pieces proved to be impressive additions to the Fromm collection of modern art. Mr. Schuller's prevailingly serial three-movement "inventions" employed 25 players divided into five quintets, none including strings. The first movement was a mosaic of small scraps hurtling about seemingly at random. The second moved from annunciatory clusters of thick, opaque chords into tightly interwoven patterns of high and low contrasts. The third, slipping into tonally oriented interludes now and then, provided the most fascination, with its staccato bursts and an antiphonal trading of the ideas among the spatially separated quintets.

●

The players, all Berkshire Music Center students, gave Mr. Schuller (who is artistic co-director of Tanglewood and therefore their musical guru) an alert and technically superlative performance.

Mr. Maderna's "Giardino Religioso" also dispersed its players in groups to exploit the mobile potential in his kind of open-form music, which permits a certain amount of controlled chance to operate. The conductor officiated in a priestly way over the ceremony, sometimes striking a triangle hanging at his podium, or moving into the orchestra's midst to give instructive sermonettes on bongos or celesta, which led to percussive jam sessions.

●

As it took shape, Mr. Maderna's "Religious Garden" moved from the barest wisps of string tone to a central section of all-out cacophony (too long and uninteresting, one felt) and ended with a distant elegy in which the two trumpets exchanged poignant statements that put one inevitably in mind of Ives's "The Unanswered Question."

In "Circles," the light-voiced Miss Hocher was sometimes hampered by an unreliable amplifying system that cut in and out at odd times, but she handled Berio's vocal gymnastics and phonetic jokes with surprising ease and panache.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

AUG 9 1972

Music Fete

New Works Bring Out Varying Reactions

By DONAL HENAHAN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 8—American symphony orchestras, in case you haven't noticed, are not given to cuddling up with the avant-garde. Because of their nature and history, large orchestras are inherently conservative: They often may be led to the avant-garde waterby some resourceful conductor, but it is rare indeed that they really swallow it.

This week, debates have raged here among the professional and amateur gossips gathered at the Berkshire Festival for the annual Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, over whether the Boston Symphony Orchestra ever actually threatened mutiny before the first performance of Charles Wuorinen's strenuously difficult Concerto for Amplified Violin and Orchestra. The work went on as scheduled last Friday night, with Paul Zukofsky as soloist, but the composer was heard to say afterward that he thought the orchestra played poorly.

The Boston Symphony, of course, never did protest as a body; but at the final rehearsal, individual members and groups certainly expressed their displeasure with Mr. Wuorinen and their loathing for his piece by booing. That may have spawned rumors. In view of this contretemps, which soon became as highly amplified as the concerto itself, last night's concert by a group called Collage gave reassurance that the Boston Symphony can put forward new-music performers of the highest quality and professionalism. Collage, whose members are largely drawn from the orchestra's ranks, played an enormously difficult program of chamber music by Mario Davidovsky, George Crumb, Tibor Pusztai, Jacob Druckman, Olivier Messiaen and Lukas Foss.

All the music was performed well, and occasionally spectacularly well. Lawrence Wolfe gave a breath-taking demonstration of rhythmic virtuosity, vocalism and sheer ebullient wit in Mr. Druckman's "Valentine" (1969), an all-out love affair for double bass and double bassist that extends the instrument's musical and theatrical potential into new territories.

Mr. Crumb's early and seminal "Madrigals" (Books I and II), dating from 1965, enjoyed success, too. Joan Heller gave an instrumentally precise account of the soprano part. Though her pristine, transparent performance lacked a bit of dramatic weight in the reading of the dark Lorca texts, the spellbinding beauties of Mr. Crumb's music were caught by the ensemble, which included Paul Fried, flute; Frank Epstein, percussion, and Mr. Wolfe, double bass.

For so recently formed a group (Collage gave its first performance only last November), the Bostonians gave remarkably close-knit performances. The playings of the earliest of Mr. Messiaen's "Bird-Call" pieces "Le Merle Noir" (1952), might have let the blackbird take wing somewhat more fantastically, but Mr. Fried, the flutist, and Christopher Kies, the pianist, etched the creature in Audubonian detail, nonetheless. Mr. Davidovsky's "Synchronisms" No. 2 (1964), Mr. Pusztai's "Nocturnes" (197) and Mr. Foss's "Time Cycle" (1960) rounded out the program.

Mr. Pusztai's piece, with Miss Heller singing Rilke excerpts, amplified its instruments and spaced them about the theater by means of loudspeakers and wide physical separation on stage. The music itself was having some success in creating its trancelike mood until the entrance of a dancer (Ina Hahn) who, though accomplished enough, seemed too corporeal an intrusion into such a work.

Collage's other members were Ronald Feldman, cello; Ronald Knudsen, violin, and Felix Viscuglia, clarinet. If nothing else, they proved that even within the symphonic family, new music is not banned in Boston.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

AUG 10 1972

New England Newsclip

Collage: contemporary music executed with refinement

MICHAEL STEINBERG AT TANGLEWOOD

LENOX — Collage, founded last year, is an ensemble specialized in contemporary chamber music. Most of its members are more or less young Boston Symphony players — Frank Epstein, percussion, Ronald Feldman, cello, Paul Fried, flute, Ronald Knudsen, violin, Felix Viscuglia, clarinet, Lawrence Wolfe, contrabass — but there are also a few from outside the family — Ina Hahn, dancer, Joan Heller, soprano, and Christopher Kies, piano. Collage, which will give its first Boston Concert in Jordan Hall on Nov. 17, played a program Monday night at Tanglewood as part of the Berkshire Music Center-Fromm Foundation Festival of Contemporary Music.

Most of what they did was tried and familiar — Mario Davidovsky's Synchronisms No. 2 for flute, clarinet, violin, cello, and tape (a fine Fromm commission of eight years ago), the first two books of George Crumb's Madrigals (which get thinner and thinner the more you hear them), Messiaen's brilliant flute and piano study, "La merle noir," and "Time Cycle" by Lukas Foss. But the program also included Tibor Pusztai's Nocturnes and Jacob Druckman's Valentine for solo contrabass.

Pusztai, who is beginning to make a name as composer and conductor, wrote Nocturnes last year with Collage in mind, therefore using all of its personnel. Most of the text is drawn from Rilke's Duino Elegies, and the ornate vocal line is not so much surrounded by as made part of a dense, intricately worked, but always transparent textur The performers are separated from one another as much as available stage space allows, and the sounds they make are diffused through speakers along the sides of the room. Pusztai sets the contemplative texts effectively, but I was even more impressed by his ability to compose thoughtful and responsible music.

What was disconcerting, though, was the appearance of a dancer part-way through. To say that Pusztai's music does not need it is an understatement: it absolutely deserves better, for while Ina Hahn's dancing was neat, her choreography was an inane bunch of cliches. I hope that the inclusion in Collage (and therefore in a work like Nocturnes) is not just a trendy gesture in the direction of mixed media and so on, but for sure, if Collage is going to be serious about dance, it will have to do better than Miss Hahn. Otherwise, the performance, which the composer conducted, seemed excellent, and altogether, performance standards are high chez Collage, with everything carefully prepared, executed with refinement, though with some sacrifice of life to caution.

About his Valentine, Druckman says that the player must "assault the instrument with an almost de Sade-like concentration (hence the title)." Yes. It is a piece in the manner of Luciano Berio's more theatrical "Sequenze," the ones for trombone or voice, for example, with a good bit of fooling to surround the bravura exploitation of the bass and its player. The first three minutes are very funny, the next three not quite so welcome: it is hard repeatedly to serve what are essentially "funny once" jokes. There is nothing Sade-istic about Lawrence Wolfe — I could imagine Buell Neidlinger, for example, playing Valentine with some sinister overtones—but in his own open, eager way, he gave a superbly effective performance with no lack of flair, humor, and virtuosity.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 116,500

AUG 10 1972

Back to Back

Sounds that crash & wriggle

music

Tanglewood's week-long 1972 Festival of Contemporary Music, which began about an hour before sunset last Friday (the Sabbath of Judaism and Bobby Fischer), may turn out to be even more important and certainly more influential than most of its yearly predecessors. If it does, a good share of the credit must go to the special effort on everyone's part to celebrate not only the new and the brave in music but to celebrate equally the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, which has made the last several of Tanglewood's years a source of the adventure that had been so painfully absent in Lenox, Massachusetts, during the first post-Koussevitzky decade.

Paul Fromm and his foundation have done much and will probably do more, from their new headquarters at Harvard, to keep the history of music an open book, and the Berkshire Music Center, which is the sprawling, talent-cultivating, semi-public arm of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, is putting on a dazzling show of new opera, new chamber and orchestral music, and almost new but still kicking music of many types.

Last Friday's event was a double concert in front of about 5000 people. The first half was a recital-cum-chamber-music-concert entirely of Aaron Copland music, just to change the air of a Music Shed more used to reverberating to Beethoven and Brahms. Phyllis Curtin sang the "Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson," with the composer at the piano. Dating from 1949-1950, these songs are Copland in the final but most refined, most gently witty, and most technically resourceful time of his "Americana" period. The wonderful precision and range of the poems' moods and tempi are set off by music that enhances them in every bar. Copland seemed to have a great time with the keyboard bravura at the end of "There came a wind," and Curtin's long, lovely pianissimo on the last word of "Heart! We will forget him!" was only one example of how she could turn vocal technique to the larger purposes of art-song.

After the Dickinson cycle, Michael Tilson Thomas, who was to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a full program later in the evening, came out and played the Piano Variations (1930). He took some liberties with the music, especially by way of softening some dynamics about two-thirds the way through, but he played beautifully, drew up and executed an excitingly contrasty plan for this big piece, and finished it off with chords of thunder.

The chamber music on the program was "Vitebsk" (Study on a Jewish Theme), with the composer again at the piano behind Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin, first violinist and cellist, respectively, of the BSO. This popular bit of Hebraica still entertains, all the more so this time around because of Copland's knack at the keyboard of shoving a dance rhythm into the slightly surprised string texture of his colleagues.

The BSO portion of the evening had as its centerpiece the world premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for Amplified Violin and Orchestra, with Paul Zukofsky as soloist. Any appraisal of this new work whould begin with the statement that Wuorinen has once and for all desanctuarized the full-sized virtuoso concerto as the last haven for all those star soloists who seem to believe that the history of music ended in 1910. Whenever Mr. X, the composer who "still writes melodies," comes up with a best-selling concerto for Mr. Y, the best-selling great virtuoso, Mr. Y always tells the Sunday press, "If only these younger composers would follow X's example and give me something to sink my teeth into. They don't know anything about songfulness or bravura."

Well, Mr. Y and all others

Continued on next page

music

Continued from preceding page

whom it may concern, the Wuorinen concerto happens to be hair-raisingly virtuosic, but it's also very much about today, or at least about this morning before lunch. The language is what might be called super-rhapsodic-atonal. Tones are flung in dozens of directions; textures collide and combine like molten metal; tempi drift into and out of whirlpools—but the music sings throughout because Wuorinen is, above all else, a musician.

The solo violin is amplified so that the composer can be free of the chains of having to balance a stringed instrument with the orchestra and so treat that orchestra with all the freedom it deserves. And what that freedom brings about is one of the major glories of the concerto. At the very beginning, solo violin and orchestra crash in together, as if to grab all who can be grabbed. The solo instrument often takes on brassy, non-violinistic sounds along the way, and toward the end of the first movement the soloist's pizzicati begin to sound like something wriggling under water or in an echo-chamber.

Sometimes during the piece, the accompaniment becomes a matter of a few very soft strands, and then the amplifier is turned down to make way for some pure violin sound, which Zukofsky can produce with the best of them. But near the end of the finale, the solo violin, amplified strongly again, proceeds into a perpetual-motion type of dance, fast unaccompanied, and you could call it a cadenza except that the tempo is so regular. The orchestra returns, but the soloist keeps on his dizzy way, right up to a slam-bang ending.

On a technological note, amplification is by means of a Barcus-Berry bridge, containing a transducer that is wired to an electronic speaker set-up. The bridge itself is orthodox enough to fit on a regular, wooden violin.

Besides conducting the concerto with what looked like evangelistic but well-placed zeal, Thomas also programmed an orchestral version by Avram David of Carl Ruggles's piano suite, "Evocations," Copland's orchestral version of eight of the Dickinson songs, with Curtin again as the singer, and Stravinsky's "Sacre." The Ruggles music has an engaging mixture of rugged fresh-air dissonance and dusky, European late-romanticism, but I suspect the orchestration softens the edges a bit.

The orchestral treatment of the Dickinson poems made me wonder if Copland might not soon have second thoughts about the way the instruments seem to cover the voice so easily in some of the songs. Elsewhere, the orchestra was a delight, with the handling of a solo trumpet in "Going to heaven!" especially graceful and not in the least getting in the way of the singer.

When it came to the Stravinsky, conductor and orchestra gave it an all but unbeatable combination of power and precision. The string tone in the opening of the second part was both gauzy and rich, and the woodwinds were full of color and warmth at all times, but perhaps most remarkably, that upward sweep of the guiro at the very end was actually audible for perhaps the second time ever in my hearing.

—Leighton Kerner

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
JUL 15 1972
New England Newsclip

Ozawa treats Mahler with restraint, humor

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Satff

Bos Symphony

LENOX — Tanglewood this summer will close with Seiji Ozawa's performance of Mahler's 8th "Symphony of a thousand" in which enormous vocal and instrumental forces are enlisted to deal with the mideaval hymn "Veni Creator Spiritus," and the final scen of Goethe's "Faust" II. Ozawa has so far done no Mahler around here, and it was interesting, therefore, to get a preliminary look at how he lives in that style when, Thursday evening, he conducted the Berkshire Music CenterOrchestra in the 1st Symphony.

His living in it is a mixture of sympathy and its lack. He dealt comfortably with the expansive architecture of the work, and such things, as arrivals intorecapitulations or the long, gradual acceleration across the first movement exposition, were tellingly "placed."

He is a superb conductor of dance music and he has humor, and both qualities did a lot for the middle movements (Ozawa, by the way, chose Mahler's revised, four-movement version). His restraint was also a great help in those movements, and if the D-flat tune in the finale was not the last word in pianissimo, hush, at least, it didn't billow like Raschmaninoff.

With the restraint and a distaste for excess of pathos goes a liking for accents that have more sharpness than weight, and the resulting transparancy of texture of clarity of orchestral details are welcome. Many Mahler conductors, most famously Bernstein, ignore the need for such clarity just the way they go roughshod over Mahler's carefully planned relationships of speech. What makes Mahler difficult to perform is the need to find a way of making expressive gestures of considerable weight or pathos. or both, in perfectly controlled musical statements of the utmost transparancy.

Ozawa's unusually quick tempo for the second movement was by no means at odds with Mahler's metronome mark of 66 to the bar for scherzo and 54 in the trio.

I did, on the other hand, hear the sharpness of accent and the lightness between accents as at odds with the character of the piece, both as it explicitly indicated (Mahler writes that emotion must have power and not be too quick) and implicitly in the rtadition from which it stems and which it almost parodies, going back to Schubert and Haydn (whose wine-and-ale chorus in "The Seasons" Ozawa didnot get either.) And in the finale I would cite Ozawa's all but ignorning of the luftpause in the instant before the knockout return after a very long absence to the home key of D major as lack of sympathy.

Ozawa worked extremely effectiv.ly with the impressive student orchestra, all of whose playing was engaged and attentive, and much of which was handsomely virtuosic.

In the first half, two of this year's conducting fellows at the Berkshire Music Center led the orchestra. First, Phillip Lehrman (Los Angeles) conducted the Brahms "Tragic Overture," getting a performance that was coherent and energetic, but also rather anxious and tight. John Neschling (Rio de Janiero) took on a harder piece, Mozart's Prague Symphony, had intermittent successes with moments of grace and brio, but with a lot of what sounded like thoughtless skidding across the surface of the material as well.

The Boston Globe
(EVENING)
D. 195,032
JUL 28 1972
New England Newsclip

MAESTRO REFLECTS — Leonard Bernstein, eyes closed, listens to Charles Darden of Philadelphia conduct Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. Bernstein later conducted Mahler. (Globe photo by Ted Dully)

Tanglewood: a moving Mahler

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — Among the things that Leonard Bernstein's conducting the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Wednesday did was to solve one evening's worth of problems for just about every camp director in Berkshire County. What looked to be about 2000 camera-flashing, gum-popping, chatty teenagers got unloaded into Tanglewood, and the concert had to be moved from the Theater-Concert Hall to the Shed, which the audience easily filled as far back as the line of boxes and then some.

Bernstein conducted the third and fourth movements of Mahler's 9th Symphony. With his other commitments here — a Boston Symphony concert. making video-cassette tapes of two Brahms symphonies, conducting and composition seminars — he had only three rehearsals with the BMC Orchestra, and he chose well to teach two exceedingly difficult movements (actually close to 40 minutes together) very thoroughly. The specific choice of the Mahler 9th came, I believe, from the desire to dedicate the Adagio to the memory of Goeran Gentele, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera, who was to have directed the new production of "Carmen" which Bernstein will conduct in September.

"It was an astounding performance . . . Bernstein took risks before which most conductors would hesitate in front of the most virtuosic professional orchestras. He was right, absolutely on musical grounds.

It was an astounding performance, deeply moving as musical interpretation and as an act of teaching. By making the Burleske wildly fast and the Adagio hugely, immeasurably slow, Bernstein took risks before which most conductors would hesitate in front of the most virtuosic professional orchestras. He was right, absolutely on musical grounds, and right on technical and pedagogic terms, even though the student players, excited, at the beginning of the Burleske blurred a few details which they had managed in the comparative cool of the dress rehearsal.

I think I have never seen an orchestra and its conductor, more closely in touch than in the last minutes of the Adagio, that most terrible dying and farewell in all music. I have hardly ever heard it played with such purity of intonation and string tone, never so pianissimo. It must be so sustained and held in all its quiet, and the silences and the mo-

TANGLEWOOD, Page 14

Bernstein's moving Mahler 9th

★ TANGLEWOOD
Continued from Page 13

ments when a single note is suspended across the void must seem endless. Most people in most audiences are not interested in such things — at the rehearsal Bernstein at the last bar asked the orchestra, "Do you feel it? Do you hear what he is saying?" — and they cough, shuffle, begin to reach for their coats. Then the conductor gets scared, he hurries, the repose is lost and instantly the pianissimo with it. This audience coughed and racketed most infernally, but Bernstein held the music where it needed to be, timeless and nearly inaudible, and that so moving act of patience, that sense of absolute and unswerving undistractibility, was so compelling that the ending spoke in spite of all.

Bernstein shared the concert with two BMC Conducting Fellows. The first was Charles Darden (Philadelphia), a flashy character whose entrances, bows, and exits are the wildest in my experience. His conducting looks fairly extravagent, too, but what it produced astonishingly enough was a 100 percent sober, careful, even somewhat slow and heavy performance of Mozart's Haffner Symphony. It was musical, simple and unmanipulated, and informed by a nice sense of the operatic element in Mozart. It was also beautifully played, though one single calming gesture in the direction of the kettledrummer would have done wonders for the clarity of the sound. I recognize, of course, that the unscheduled move to the very bass-friendly Shed, where the student conductors had presumably never reherased an orchestra, was also an unscheduled difficulty and challenge.

Then John Neschling conducted Strauss's "Don Juan." He did it with lots of temperament, and the performance was full of effectively realized moments. It wanted, in the end, the control to make the last climax the clear high-point (one could tell both from looking from the preparatory breath that Neschling's intentions were right) — too much had been spent already. When his physical gestures were to the point, the orchestra played brilliantly for him; when he flailed, things got muzzy.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
JUL 15 1972
New England Newsclip

Ozawa treats Mahler with restraint, humor

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Satff

LENOX — Tanglewood this summer will close with Seiji Ozawa's performance of Mahler's 8th "Symphony of a thousand" in which enormous vocal and instrumental forces are enlisted to deal with the mideaval hymn "Veni Creator Spiritus," and the final scen of Goethe's "Faust" II. Ozawa has so far done no Mahler around here, and it was interesting, therefore, to get a preliminary look at how he lives in that style when, Thursday evening, he conducted the Berkshire Music CenterOrchestra in the 1st Symphony.

His living in it is a mixture of sympathy and its lack. He dealt comfortably with the expansive architecture of the work, and such things, as arrivals intorecapitulations or the long, gradual acceleration across the first movement exposition, were tellingly "placed."

He is a superb conductor of dance music and he has humor, and both qualities did a lot for the middle movements (Ozawa, by the way, chose Mahler's revised, four-movement version). His restraint was also a great help in those movements, and if the D-flat tune in the finale was not the last word in pianissimo, hush, at least, it didn't billow like Raschmaninoff.

With the restraint and a distaste for excess of pathos goes a liking for accents that have more sharpness than weight, and the resulting transparancy of texture of clarity of orchestral details are welcome. Many Mahler conductors, most famously Bernstein, ignore the need for such clarity just the way they go roughshod over Mahler's carefully planned relationships of speech. What makes Mahler difficult to perform is the need to find a way of making expressive gestures of considerable weight or pathos. or both, in perfectly controlled musical statements of the utmost transparancy.

Ozawa's unusually quick tempo for the second movement was by no means at odds with Mahler's metronome mark of 66 to the bar for scherzo and 54 in the trio.

I did, on the other hand, hear the sharpness of accent and the lightness between accents as at odds with the character of the piece, both as it explicitly indicated (Mahler writes that emotion must have power and not be too quick) and implicitly in the rtadition from which it stems and which it almost parodies, going back to Schubert and Haydn (whose wine-and-ale chorus in "The Seasons" Ozawa didnot get either.) And in the finale I would cite Ozawa's all but ignorning of the luftpause in the instant before the knockout return after a very long absence to the home key of D major as lack of sympathy.

Ozawa worked extremely effectiv.ly with the impressive student orchestra, all of whose playing was engaged and attentive, and much of which was handsomely virtuosic.

In the first half, two of this year's conducting fellows at the Berkshire Music Center led the orchestra. First, Phillip Lehrman (Los Angeles) conducted the Brahms "Tragic Overture," getting a performance that was coherent and energetic, but also rather anxious and tight. John Neschling (Rio de Janiero) took on a harder piece, Mozart's Prague Symphony, had intermittent successes with moments of grace and brio, but with a lot of what sounded like thoughtless skidding across the surface of the material as well.

The Boston Globe
(EVENING)
D. 195,032
JUL 28 1972
New England Newsclip

MAESTRO REFLECTS — Leonard Bernstein, eyes closed, listens to Charles Darden of Philadelphia conduct Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. Bernstein later conducted Mahler. (Globe photo by Ted Dully)

Tanglewood: a moving Mahler

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — Among the things that Leonard Bernstein's conducting the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Wednesday did was to solve one evening's worth of problems for just about every camp director in Berkshire County. What looked to be about 2000 camera-flashing, gum-popping, chatty teenagers got unloaded into Tanglewood, and the concert had to be moved from the Theater-Concert Hall to the Shed, which the audience easily filled as far back as the line of boxes and then some.

Bernstein conducted the third and fourth movements of Mahler's 9th Symphony. With his other commitments here — a Boston Symphony concert. making video-cassette tapes of two Brahms symphonies, conducting and composition seminars — he had only three rehearsals with the BMC Orchestra, and he chose well to teach two exceedingly difficult movements (actually close to 40 minutes together) very thoroughly. The specific choice of the Mahler 9th came, I believe, from the desire to dedicate the Adagio to the memory of Goeran Gentele, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera, who was to have directed the new production of "Carmen" which Bernstein will conduct in September.

"It was an astounding performance . . . Bernstein took risks before which most conductors would hesitate in front of the most virtuosic professional orchestras. He was right, absolutely on musical grounds.

It was an astounding performance, deeply moving as musical interpretation and as an act of teaching. By making the Burleske wildly fast and the Adagio hugely, immeasurably slow, Bernstein took risks before which most conductors would hesitate in front of the most virtuosic professional orchestras. He was right, absolutely on musical grounds, and right on technical and pedagogic terms, even though the student players, excited, at the beginning of the Burleske blurred a few details which they had managed in the comparative cool of the dress rehearsal.

I think I have never seen an orchestra and its conductor more closely in touch than in the last minutes of the Adagio, that most terrible dying and farewell in all music. I have hardly ever heard it played with such purity of intonation and string tone, never so pianissimo. It must be so sustained and held in all its quiet, and the silences and the mo-

TANGLEWOOD, Page 14

Bernstein's moving Mahler 9th

★ TANGLEWOOD
Continued from Page 13

ments when a single note is suspended across the void must seem endless. Most people in most audiences are not interested in such things — at the rehearsal Bernstein at the last bar asked the orchestra, "Do you feel it? Do you hear what he is saying?" — and they cough, shuffle, begin to reach for their coats. Then the conductor gets scared, he hurries, the repose is lost and instantly the pianissimo with it. This audience coughed and racketed most infernally, but Bernstein held the music where it needed to be, timeless and nearly inaudible, and that so moving act of patience, that sense of absolute and unswerving undistractibility, was so compelling that the ending spoke in spite of all.

Bernstein shared the concert with two BMC Conducting Fellows. The first was Charles Darden (Philadelphia), a flashy character whose entrances, bows, and exits are the wildest in my experience. His conducting looks fairly extravagent. too, but what it produced astonishingly enough was a 100 percent sober, careful, even somewhat slow and heavy performance of Mozart's Haffner Symphony. It was musical, simple and unmanipulated, and informed by a nice sense of the operatic element in Mozart. It was also beautifully played, though one single calming gesture in the direction of the kettledrummer would have done wonders for the clarity of the sound. I recoganize, of course, that the unscheduled move to the very bass-friendly Shed, where the student conductors had presumably never reherased an orchestra, was also an unscheduled difficulty and challenge.

Then John Neschling conducted Strauss's "Don Juan." He did it with lots of temperament, and the performance was full of effectively realized moments. It wanted, in the end, the control to make the last climax the clear high-point (one could tell both from looking from the preparatory breath that Neschling's intentions were right) — too much had been spent already. When his physical gestures were to the point, the orchestra played brilliantly for him; when he flailed, things got muzzy.

156

MICHAEL STEINBERG

The Stanislaw method

LENOX — Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, Music Director of the Minnesoto Orchestra, had his moment of greatest visibility at Tanglewood when, on the Saturday night of the season's first weekend, he conducted Bach, Beethoven, and Mozart with the Boston Symphony for an audience of over 8000. In all, though, Skrowaczewski spent three weeks at the Berkshire Music Center, engaged most of the time in the less public but no less important tasks of training the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, which means, to begin with, turning 98 young players, most of whom have never before worked together, into an orchestra and of helping the seven holders of fellowships in conducting to learn their metier.

There is some overlap because the Conducting Fellows observe Skrowaczewski and the other professionals—this year they include Leonard Bernstein, Bruno Maderna, Seiji Ozawa, and Joseph Silverstein — as they work with the BMC Orchestra (they also attend as many Boston Symphony rehearsals as they can). Then, with one or more of the professionals watching them, the Fellows rehearse the BMC Orchestra and conduct it at public concerts.

There are also seminars away from the orchestra at which questions from the most general ("What does 'knowing a score' really mean?") to the most particular (if you make a gesture at hip-level, the violins can see it, but the horns probably can't) are discussed.

One Saturday morning, I watched Skrowaczewski work with the BMC Orchestra on the last movement of the Brahms 1st Symphony. I was impressed by his sense of harmony, by his concern, therefore, for the bass lines which define the harmony, and, in a more general way, by an economy that led him to say [illegible] to say with sharp precision and also to know when to say nothing.

MUSIC, B-19

PART 2

Conductor knows when silence best

The Skowaczewski method

★ MUSIC
Continued from Page B-17

I also watched the student conductors watching Skrowaczewski, looking up from their scores as notorious trouble-spots approached — the pizzicato passages in the introduction, the difficult syncopations in the middle of the movement, the acceleration into the coda — and then writing notes to themselves or sometimes just smiling as each hurdle was cleared.

I asked permission to attend one of the seminars, and a few days later found myself in Hawthorne Cottage on the Tanglewood grounds, in a rather stark room with straight chairs around the walls, a grand piano, and a blackboard, and of course with lean, nervously energetic maestro and six of the Conducting Fellows. Eighteen notes were played on the piano, and the blackboard was used not at all. At least with respect to the piano, that session was atypical: normally, Skrowaczewski explained, there was analysis of scores—himself an able composer, he is highly organized about that sort of thing—as well as exercises when he sat at the keyboard and played according to the students' conducting. That evening, however, two students would be leading the BMC Orchestra in concert, they had just had their dress rehearsal, and a large part of the seminar would be given over to a post-mortem on the rehearsal.

Skrowaczerski began by praising Phillip Lehrman's well-chosen and well-maintained tempo for the Brahms Tragic Overture, but, he continued, the "piano" after the two slashing chords at the beginning was not Brahms's "piano sotto voce" but "piano indifferente." He made suggestions for how the piece could be made to go better that night even without benefit of further rehearsal: "Make pianissimo not with hips, elbows (he stood to demonstrate) but with hands and face . . . you look as though you're afraid the pianissimo will not be there . . . your face expresses doubt, so they cannot enjoy . . . always try to visualize your expression." The big viola tune, he assured him, "will come out warmer if you just ask for it . . . you have left hand, you can do." But elsewhere, "the beat not bigger, but more stinging."

More, though, Skrowaczewski commented on rehearsal technique, for future reference, as it were, always with an eye to economy. "If you can show it by gesture, it is better not to speak about . . . don't overact, they'll do it themselves very well." Later: "at a fortepiano, say how long, say 'piano after the first 16th,' 'first 8th,' or whatever . . . that replaces repeating, having to say 'not together' . . . but if at the beginning you say too many things without playing, you risk complet inattention." Then: "don't say 'it's not rhythmic enough,' then they don't know what's wrong . . . say 'you're playing triplets instead of dotted quarters and eights . . . use the word 'triplets' and then play it."

Then John Neschling and Mozart's Prague Symphony. Early on, this dialogue:

N.: "They were rushing."

S.: "No, sorry."

N.: "I was rushing."

S.: "Yes, sorry."

Always the motif, "they don't need your help, that goes automatically," and, about a series of eighth-notes too explicitly beaten for the violins, "don't bother them . . . of course don't abandon them either." On providing a beat that would be sufficiently clear for the slow introduction, but not chop things up either: "No, don't beat eighths, subdivide four." Later: "Your downbeat is rough, like for 'Elektra,'" and, analogous to the viola tune in the Brahms, "you've never really asked them to play this beautifully (the second theme in the first movement) . . . do it tonight and they will" (he did, and they did). And: "Don't just indicate 'too loud,' show who is too loud . . . but if you indicate it with your left hand very far down, then the violins will see it and they will go away, but the horns and trumpets who actually are too loud will not see it, and the balance will be worse than before."

SKROWACZEWSKI
'. . . don't beat eighths'

The discussion moved on to more general problems, for example, knowing a score enough to conduct it from memory, which, Skrowaczewski said, meant knowing it well enough to write it out and then some: "You must not be so busy remembering it that you cannot react as it goes by." On approaching a new score: pacing is the most essential part of articulating form, so from the beginning have the tempo clearly in mind. Almost the hardest part of conducting, Skrowaczewski said, is to have a tempo live in you so that at any time you can find it, at every rehearsal, performance, after each interruption of a recording session.

Recordings as a study tool have "very interesting possibilities. Yes, they are even OK, provided you don't conduct. Never conduct a record. You can only follow, and the essence of conducting is that you have to provoke it. Upbeats, the preparation, are so terribly important, and on records there are no upbeats." And he went on to describe a demonstration for a class at which George Szell had conducted a movement by indicating only the upbeats.

A student asked about opera, another about "difficult" soloists. It was upbeats again, the clear signal of what would happen next. The hazard in opera is not so much the prima donna ("the better they are the easier you can do things with them — really") as unmusical directors, not only those who interpret operas "against the music," but those with no feeling for moment-to-moment musical requirements, and he described trying to work out something as chamber-musical as "Komm', Hoffnung" in the Vienna production of "Fidelio" with a near-sighted Leonore whom the director had placed "at least 150 yards away and who could see me only on television, if at all." As for concerto soloists, even problematic ones can be stimulating — he cited an "Emperor" with Glenn Gould, "14 minutes slower than any I had ever conducted or heard, but with marvelous inner rhythm, though I wouldn't next time go to an orchestra and say, 'now, gentlemen, the tempo is . . .' And if you have a soloist who really makes you crazy" — he mentioned a violinist for whom he had recently conducted the Paganini B minor in Stuttgart in a performance which became "an exercise in acrobatics and quick response" — "You can treat it always as a very interesting experience."

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
S. 106,767

JUL 2 1972 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Center To Do Rare Works

By RAYMOND MORIN

Telegram Music Critic

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

Some of the most important musical news this summer at Tanglewood will be made at the Berkshire Music Center, school for advanced studies maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Programs for the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Festival, held in the Shed across the "campus" from the center, are largely standard, perennial, with a few adventurous exceptions.

Certainly equal in importance to the center's annual Festival of Contemporary Music is its second season presentation of the Music Theater Project.

The activity is supported in part by grants from the National Opera Institute and the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music.

A world premiere and two rarely performed works will comprise the project's second season at the summer academy for young musicians.

Music Theater

Ten of America's outstanding young operatic performers, both professionals and advanced students, have been assembled to explore the large, but little-known repertory of music theater.

On Aug. 2, 3 and 6, a double bill will feature the world premiere of "Chocorua," by Robert Selig, and the "Yes Man," by Bertold Brecht and Kurt Weill.

Commissioned for the center's Contemporary Music Festival, "Chocorua" tells of Indian Chief Chocorua who stays behind in New Hampshire while his tribe emigrated northward, to mingle with English settlers with tragic results.

It is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by the Boston poet Richard Moore.

Monteverdi Piece

Final presentation will be a controversial production of Monteverdi's masterpiece "The Coronation of Poppea" on Aug. 13, 14 and 16.

Direction will be by Bruno Maderna, the noted Italian composer-conductor who is serving as head of contemporary music at Tanglewood this summer.

Music Theater Project is under the direction of Ian Strasfogel, newly appointed general director of the Opera Society of Washington, D.C.

All production will be designed by Douglas Schmidt and Jeanne Button, resident designers of the Music Theater Project, and well-known for their work at the Lincoln Center Repertory Theater and the Juillard School in New York City.

ALTHOUGH FRIDAY is customarily the "off night," in size of the audience at Tanglewood, large crowds can be safely predicted for William Steinberg's two appearances this summer.

Following the example of several Boston Symphony conductors of the past, Steinberg has selected Beethoven's Ninth Symphony for his finale, at 8:30, July 15.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus will be prepared by John Oliver. Soloists are Jeannine Crader, soprano; Joanna Simon, contralto; Dean Wilder, tenor; Robert Hale, bass.

Steinberg will precede the Ninth with Beethoven's First Symphony.

July 14, at 9 p.m., Steinberg will conduct the Boston Symphony in Beethoven's Sixth and Fifth Symphonies, in that order.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 16,200

JUN 21 1972 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Music Center Offers World Premiere, 'Chocorua'

LENOX — The 1972 Music Theatre Project at Tanglewood will present a world premiere and two rarely performed works in its second season as part of the training program of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for young musicians.

Under the direction of Ian Strasfogel, newly appointed general director of the Opera Society of Washington, D. C., the Music Theatre Project has assembled ten of America's outstanding young operatic performers, both young professionals and advanced students, to explore the large, but little-known repertory of music theatre. The activity is supported in part by grants from the National Opera Institute, and the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music.

On Aug. 2, 3, and 6, a double bill will feature the world premiere of "Chocorua" by Robert Selig, and "The Yes Man" by Bertolt Brecht and Kurt Weill.

"Chocorua," a commission for the Berkshire Music Center's annual Festival of Contemporary Music, is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by the Boston poet Richard Moore. Its story, derived from actual events of the eighteenth century, tells of Indian Chief Chocorua who stays behind in New Hampshire when his tribe emigrates northward, to mingle with the English settlers with tragic results. "Chocorua" was commissioned jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

"The Yes Man", a translation by J. M. Potts of the 1930 Brecht — Weill Lehrstuck (or "instructional piece") "Der Jasager," will be presented in conjunction with the Boston University Choral Institute at the Berkshire Music Center.

The final presentation of the season will be a controversial production of Monteverdi's masterpiece, "The Coronation of Poppea" Aug. 13, 14, and 16. Bruno Maderna, the noted Italian composer-conductor who is serving as head of Contemporary Music Activities at Tanglewood this summer, will conduct. Strasfogel has prepared a new version of this work that focuses exclusively on the social and political realities of the regieme of the demented Emperor Nero and his decadent court.

All productions will be designed by Douglas Schmidt, and Jeanne Button, resident designers of the Music Theatre Project, and well-known for their work at the Lincoln Center Repertory Theatre, and the Juilliard School in New York City. Martin Smith, newly appointed chairman of the Opera Department at the New England Conservatory of Music, is head vocal coach for the Music Theatre Project.

The Indo-American Dance Company led by Matteo in a traditional Indian work. The company is scheduled for six performances July 4-8 at the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, Lee.

PRESS
BRISTOL, CONN.
D. 18,000

JUN 17 1972 New England Newsc

To Perform

'72 Tanglewood Music Center Season Listed

The 1972 Music Theatre Project at Tanglewood will present a world premiere and two rarely performed works in its second season as part of the training program of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for young musicians. Under the direction of Ian Strasfogel, newly appointed General Director of the Opera Society of Washington, D. C., the Music Theatre Project has assembled tne of America's outstanding young operatic performers, both young professionals and advanced students, to explore the large, but little - known repertory of music theatre. The activity is supported in part by grants from the National Opera Institute, and the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music.

On August 2, 3, and 6, 1972 a double bill will feature the world premiere of CHOCORUA bu Robert Selig, and THE YES MAN by Bertolt Brecht and Kurt Weill. CHOCORUA, a commission for the Berkshire Music Center's annual Festival of Contemporary Music, is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by the Boston poet Richard Moore. Its story, derived from actual events of the eighteenth century, tells of Indian Chief Chocorua who stays behind in New Hampshire when his tribe emigrates northward, to mingle with the English settlers with tragic results. CHOCORUA was commissioned jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

THE YES MAN, a translation by J. M. Potts of the 1930 Brecht — Weill Lehrstuck (or "instructional piece") DER JASAGER, will be presented in conjunction with the Boston University Choral Institute at the Berkshire Music Center.

The final presentation of the season will be a controversial production of Monteverdi's masterpiece, THE CORONATION OF POPPEA on August 13, 14, and 16. Bruno Maderna, the noted Italian composer - conductor who is serving as Head of Contemporary Music Activities at Tanglewood this summer, will conduct. Mr. Strasfogel has prepared a new version of this work that focuses exclusively on the social and political realities of the regieme of the demented Emperor Nero and his decadent court.

All productions will be designed by Douglas Schmidt, and Jeanne Button, resident designers of the Music Theatre Project, and well - known for their work at the Lincoln Center Repertory Theatre, and the Juilliard School in New York City. Martin Smith, newly appointed Chairman of the Opera Department at the New England Conservatory of Music, is Head Vocal Coach for the Music theatre Project.

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 154,165 SUN. 311,112

JUN 18 1972

Tanglewood to Give 2 Works World Premiere

BOSTON — The 1972 Music Theater Project at Tanglewood will present a world premier and two rarely performed works in its second season as part of the training program of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for young musicians.

Under the direction of Ian Strasfogel, newly appointed general director of the Opera Society of Washington, D.C., the Music Theater Project has assembled 10 of America's outstanding young operatic performers, to explore the little-known repertory of music theater.

THE ACTIVITY is supported in part by grants from the National Opera Institute, and the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music.

On Aug. 2, 3, and 6, a double bill will feature the world premiere of "Chocorua" by Robert Selig, and "The Yes Man" by Bertolt Brecht and Kurt Weill. "Chocorua," a commission for the Berkshire Music Center's annual Festival of Contemporary Music, is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by the Boston poet Richard Moore, telling of Indian Chief Chocorua who stays behind in New Hampshire when his tribe emigrates northward.

"THE YES MAN", a translation by J. M. Potts of the 1930 Brecht-Weill instructional piece "Der Jasager," will be presented in conjunction with the Boston University Choral Institute at the Berkshire Music Center.

The final presentation of the season will be a controversial production of Monteverdi's masterpiece, "The Coronation of Poppea" on Aug. 13, 14, and 16. Bruno Maderna, the noted Italian composer-conductor who is serving as head of contemporary music activities at Tanglewood this summer, will conduct.

Strasfogel has proposed a new version of this work that focuses exclusively on the social and political realities of the regieme of the demented Emperor Nero and his decadent court.

JOURNAL
MERIDEN, CONN.
D. 9,000

AUG 2 1972 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood offers a world premier

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The world premiere of "Chocorua" based on the true story of an 18th Century Indian Chief in New Hampshire, will be given at Tanglewood tonight as the Berkshire Music Center launches its 1972 Music Theater Project.

"Chocorua" was composed by Robert Selig on a commission from the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Also to be performed is Brecht-Weill's "The Yes Man."

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885

JUN 26 1972 New England Newsclip

A World Premiere Set for Tanglewood

The 1972 Music Theater Project at Tanglewood will present a world premier and two rarely performed works in its second season as part of the training program of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for young musicians.

Under the direction of Ian Strasfogel, newly-appointed General Director of the Opera Society of Washington, D.C., the Music Theater Project consists of 10 outstanding young operatic performers, both young professionals and advanced students.

The first production Aug. 2, 3 and 6 will be a double bill of Robert Selig's "Chocorua," in its world premiere, and "The Yes Man" (Der Jasager), by Kurt Weill. The former, a commissioned work for the annual Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music, is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by Boston poet Richard Moore. It deals with the life of Indian Chief Chocorua.

Monteverdi's "The Coronation of Poppea" will be the final production and is scheduled for Aug. 13, 14, 16. Bruno Maderna, who is serving as Head of Contemporary Music Activities at Tanglewood this summer, will conduct. The work will be presented in a new version by Strasfogel which focuses on the social and political realities of the regime of the demented Emperor Nero and his decadent court.

158

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

JUL 27 1972 New England Newsclip

Music Theatre Project Slated at Tanglewood

The Music Theatre Project at Tanglewood, part of the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music), opens its 1972 season Aug. 2 at 8:30 p.m. in the West Barn. Two other performances will also be given Aug. 3 and 6, also at 8:30 p.m. in the West Barn.

The performances include the world premiere of Robert Selig's "Chocorua" (commissioned jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation), and Brecht-Weill's "Tthe Yes Man."

Robert Selig's Chocorua is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by the Boston poet Richard Moore. Chocorua will be conducted by John Miner, a Berkshire Music Center conducting fellow.

The cast includes Timothy Nolen as Chocorua, William Neill as Hobbomoko, Jim Hooper as Leverett, Barbara Hocher as Leverett's wife Abagail, Willard White as the old chieftain, Ariel Bybee as a tribeswoman, and Raphael Sbarge as the chief's son.

"The Yes Man," a translation by J. M. Potts of the 1930 Brecht-Weill "Lehrstuck" (or, "instructional piece" Der Jasager) will be presented in conjunction with the Boston University Choral Institute at the Berkshire Music Center.

"The Yes Man" will be conducted by Berkshire Music Center conducting fellow John Neshling. The cast of this rarely performed piece includes: Jim Hooper (Aug. 3), and Lenis Carlson (Aug. 2 and 6) as the teacher, Doug Ahlstedt as the boy, Ariel Bybee as the mother, and Willard White, Roelof Oostwoud, and William Neill as the three boys.

Both productions will be directed by Ian Strasfogel, Douglass W. Schmidt and Jeanne Button and Joseph Pacitti, resident designers of the Music Theatre Project, will design scenery, costumes, and lighting for both productions.

Performances of "Chocorua" and "The Yes Man" are scheduled for Aug. 2, 3 and 6 at 8:30 p.m. in Tanglewood's West Barn. Reservations are required and may be made at the Friends Office at Tanglewood.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638

AUG 2 1972

Brecht-Weill Play, Indian Legend at Tanglewood

#6.

The 1972 Music Theatre Project at Tanglewood will present a world premiere and two rarely performed works in its second season as part of the training program of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for young musicians.

Under the direction of Ian Strasfogel, newly appointed General Director of the Opera Society of Washington, D. C., the Music Theatre Project has assembled ten of America's outstanding young operatic performers, both young professionals and advanced students, to explore the large, but little-known repertory of music theatre.

THE ACTIVITY is supported in part by grants from the National Opera Institute, and the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music.

Today, tomorrow and Sunday a double bill will feature the world premiere of Chocorua" by Robert Selig, and "The Yes Man" by Bertolt Brecht and Kurt Weill. "Chocorua," a commission for the Berkshire Music Center's annual Festival of Contemporary Music, is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by the Boston poet Richard Moore. Its story, derived from actual events of the eighteenth century, tells of Indian Chief Chocorua who stays behind in New Hampshire when his tribe emigrates northward to mingle with the English settlers with tragic results. "Chocorua" was commissioned jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

"THE YES MAN," a translation by J. M. Potts of the 1930 Brecht — Weill Lehrstuck (or "instructional piece") "Der Jasager," will be presented in conjunction with the Boston University Choral Institute at the Berkshire Music Center.

The final presentation of the season will be a controversial production of Monteverdi's masterpiece, "The Coronation of Poppea" on August 13, 14, and 16. Bruno Maderna, the noted Italian composer - conductor who is serving as Head of Contemporary Music Activities at Tanglewood this summer, will conduct. Mr. Strasfogel has prepared a new version of this work that focuses exclusively on the social and political realities of the regieme of the demented Emperor Nero and his decadent court.

PRESS-HERALD
PORTLAND, MAINE.
D. 54,974

AUG 17 1972 New England Newsclip

'Chocorua' Premiere On Tanglewood Stage

LENOX Mass. (AP) — The world premiere of "Chocorua," based on the true story of an 18th Century Indian Chief in New Hampshire, will be given at Tanglewood tonight as the Berkshire Music Center launches its 1972 Music Theater Project.

"Chocorua" was composed by Robert Selig on a commission from the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Also to be performed is Brecht-Weill's "The Yes Man."

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405

AUG 3 1972 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

Theater Project Schedules Two Shows

The Music Theatre Project at Tanglewood, part of the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music), has opened its 1972 season with performances scheduled for today (Thursday) Aug. 3 and Sunday, Aug. 6 at 8:30 p.m. in the West Barn.

The performances include the world premiere of Robert Selig's Chocorua (commissioned jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation), and Brecht-Weill's The Yes Man.

Robert Selig's Chocurua is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by the Boston poet Richard Moore. The story is derived from actual events of the 18th century and tells of Indian chief Chocorua who remains behind in New Hampshire when his tribe emigrates northward and mingles with the English settlers with tragic results.

Ian Strasfogel, newly appointed General Director of the Opera Society of Washington, D.C., and head of the Music Theatre Project, describes Cocorua's style as "conceived as a memory piece using short, almost cinematic flashbacks." Chocorua will be conducted by John Miner, a Berkshire Music Center conducting fellow.

The cast includes Timothy Nolen as Chocorua, William Neill as Hobbomoko, Jim Hooper as Leverett, Barbara Hocher as Leverett's wife Abigail, Willard White as the old chieftan, Ariel Bybee as a tribeswoman, and Raphael Sbarge as the chief's son. It is interesting to note that Timothy Nolen's great uncle was Chief Red Cloud of the Sioux Indians, who fought and defeated Custer at Custer's Last Stand at Little Big Horn.

The Yes Man, a translation by J.M. Potts of the 1930 Brecht-Weill Lehrstuck (or "instructional piece" Der Jasager) will be presented in conjunction with the Boston University Choral Institute. The Yes Man was written just before the collapse of the Wiemar Republic.

The Yes Man will be conducted by conducting fellow John Neshling. The cast of this rarely performed piece includes Jim Hooper (Aug. 3), and Lenis Carlson (Aug. 6) as the teacher, Doug Ahlstedt as the boy, Ariel Bybee as the mother, and Willard White, Roelof Oostwoud, and William Neill as the three boys.

Both productions will be directed by Ian Strasfogel, Douglass W. Schmidt, Jeanne Button and Joseph Pacitti, resident designers of the Music Theatre Project and well known for their work at the Lincoln Center Repertory Theatre and the Julliard School in New York City, will design scenery, costumes, and lighting for both productions.

Musical preparation was done by Martin Smith, Music Theatre Project Head Coach and newly appointed Chairman of the Opera Department of the New England Conservatory. His assistants are Paulette Haupt Nolen, and Dixie Neill.

PRESS
BRISTOL, CONN.
D. 18,000

AUG 1 1972 New England Newsclip

Music Theatre Project Opens Season At Tanglewood Wed.

The Music Theatre Project at Tanglewood, part of the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music), opens its 1972 season Wednesday at 8:30 p.m. in the West Barn. Two other performances will also be given Thursday and Sunday, also at 8:30 p.m. in the West Barn. The performances include the world premiere of Robert Selig's "Chocorua" (commissioned jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation), and Brecht-Weill's "The Yes Man."

Robert Selig's "Chocorua" is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by the Boston poet Richard Moore. The story is derived from actual events of the eighteenth century and tells of Indian chief Chocorua who remains behind in New Hampshire when his tribe emigrates northward, and mingles with the English settlers with tragic results.

Ian Strasfogel, newly appointed General Director of the Opera Society of Washington, D.C., and head of the Music Theatre Project, describes "Chocorua's" style as "conceived as a memory piece using short, almost cinematciflashbacks." "Chocorua" will be conducted by John Miner, a Berkshire Music Center Conducting Fellow.

The cast includes Timothy Nolen as Chocorua, William Neill as Hobbomoko, Jim Hooper as Leverett, Barbara Hocher as Leverett's wife Abagail, Willard White as the old chieftan, Ariel Bybee as a tribeswoman, and Raphael Sbarge as the chief's son. It is interesting to note that Timothy Nolen's great uncle was Chief Red Cloud of the Sioux Indians, who fought and defeated Custer at Custer's Last Stand at Little Big Horn.

"The Yes Man," a translation by J. M. Potts of the 1930 Brecht-Weill "Lehrstuck" (or "instructional piece" Der Jasager) will be presented in conjunction with the Boston University Choral Institute at the Berkshire Music Center. "The Yes Man" was written just before the collapse of the Wiehar Republic. Mr. Strasfogel describes "The Yes Man" as Brecht's warning against the blind following of orders.

"The Yes Man" will be conducted by Berkshire Music Center conducting fellow John Neshling. The cast of this rarely performed piece includes: Jim Hooper (August 3), and Lenis Carlson (August 2 and 6) as the teacher, Doug Ahlstedt as the boy, Ariel Bybee as the mother, and Willard White, Roelof Oostwoud, and William Neill as the three boys.

Both productions will be directed by Ian Strasfogel. Douglass W. Schmidt and Jeanne Button and Joseph Pacitti, resident designers of the Music Theatre Project, and well known for their work at the Lincoln Center Repetory Theatre, and the Juillard School in New York City, will desgin scenery, costumes, and lighting for both productions.

Performances of "Chocorua" and "The Yes Man" are scheduled for August 2, 3, and 6 at 8:30 p.m. in Tanglewood's West Barn.

NEWS-TIMES
DANBURY, CONN.
D. 31,285

AUG 1 1972 New England Newsclip

Full schedule at Tanglewood

The Music Theatre Project at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., part of the Berkshire Music Center, will open its 1972 season tomorrow at 8:30 p.m. in the West Barn.

Robert Selig's "Chocorua" and Brecht-Weill's "The Yes Man" will be performed tomorrow, Thursday and Sunday. The hour for the latter performances is also 8:30 p.m.

"Chocorua" is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by Boston poet Richard Moore.

"The Yes Man," a translation by J.M. Potts of Brecht-Weill's "Lehrstuck," will be presented in conjunction with the Boston University Choral Institute.

Both productions will be directed by Ian Strasfogel.

Reservations may be made at the Friends Office at Tanglewood.

Three concerts highlight the 1972 series of Tanglewood Tuesday Specials, beginning with the annual appearance of Arthur Fiedler conducting the Boston Pops tonight at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed.

A Festival of Contemporary Music concert Aug. 8 at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed will honor the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Music Foundation, sponsor of Tanglewood's Festival which runs Aug. 4 through 10.

The concert will feature Elliott Carter conducting members of the Berkshire Music Center and Luciano Berio conducting his Circles.

The third concert, Tanglewood-on-parade, will take place Aug. 15, beginning at 2 p.m. with concerts all afternoon featuring ensembles of Berkshire Music Center students. The combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras will perform at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, with Handel's Royal Fireworks Music and Tchaikovsky's 1812 Overture.

The Festival of Contemporary Music opens this year at the beginning of the sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening at 7 p.m. with a special weekend prelude concert devoted to the music of Aaron Copland, with soprano soloist Phyllis Curtin and Copland as pianist highlighting the program. The 9 p.m. concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas with Phyllis Curtin and violinist Paul Zukofsky.

The concert will include Carl Ruggles' "Evocations for Orchestra," "Poems of Emily Dickinson" by Copland and "The Rite of Spring," played in memory of the composer, Stravinsky.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 2 1972 New England Newsclip

'Yes Man,' 'Chocorua' open tonight

Brecht-Weil's "The Yes Man" and Robert Selig's "Chocorua" will open tonight at 8:30 in the west barn at Tanglewood.

The productions, which will also be presented Aug. 3 and 6, are being staged by the Music Theatre Project at Tanglewood. The project, headed by Ian Strasfogel, is part of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music.

"Chocorua" is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by Boston poet Richard Moore. It tells the story of Indian chief Chocorua, who stays behind in New Hampshire when his tribe migrates northward.

"Yes Man" was written before the collapse of the Weimar Republic in Germany and warns against the blind following of orders. It is being presented in conjunction with the Boston University Choral Institute directed by John Neshling.

Reservations are required for the three performances and may be made by contacting the Friends Office at Tanglewood.

Hudson Dispatch
UNION CITY, N. J.
D. 55,356

JUL 31 1972

Summer '72

Tanglewood Music Theater, part of the Berkshire Music Center of the Boston Symphony will open its Summer 1972 season with Brecht and Weill's "The Yes Man" and a world premiere of Boston poet Robert Selig's "Chocorua" at 8:30 p.m. Wednesday, Thursday and Sunday.

"The Yes Man" is presented in conjunction with the Boston University Choral Institute at the Massachusetts summer arts resort. "Chocorua" is based on the life of an 18th century Indian chief who remains in New Hampshire to mingle with English settlers after his tribe has moved northward.

Sets, costumes and lighting for both productions will be executed by Douglas Schmidt, Jeanne Button and Joseph Pacitti, who are known for their designs at the Lincoln Center Repertory and the Juilliard School.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 117,499

JUL 30 1972

New England
Newsclip

ROBERT SELIG

CHIEF ON STAGE

Chamber Opera 'Chocorua' By Composer Robert Selig Premiering at Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH
Republican Staff

LENOX — If the stress is put on the second syllable, probably it will sound all right — "Chocorua" — Choh-KOH'-roo-a.

That's the name of an Indian chief who is the central character of a new chamber opera of the same name which will be given its first performance Wednesday at 8.30 in the West Barn at Tanglewood by members of the Berkshire Music Center and six New York singers hired for the occasion.

The composer is Robert Selig, 33, a teacher of music theory and composition at the New England Conservatory in Boston. He includes an unproduced Broadway musical and a couple of years in New York as a commercial, folk-rock song writer among his informal credentials.

Face - to - face he presents an eager, personable, unpretentious manner (with thick shoulder - length black hair) which is half relaxed following the high tension of all-out, all-night labor to finish the opera (4 a.m. July 17) before the crisis deadline, and half up-right in final preparations for the world's first public performance of his work.

There will be three performances this week in Tanglewood's West Barn, off Hawthorne Street, Wednesday, Thursday and next Sunday, all at 8.30. On the same bill will be "The Yes Man," written in 1930 by Bertold Brecht and Kurt Weill.

The opera has eight scenes in one act designed to run about 25 minutes. The score calls for 12 instrumentalists and six solo singers who double as a chorus.

The first seven scenes were composed between March and June 15 (the first deadline) while Selig was living on a Guggenheim fellowship in the artist's studio at Serenak, Koussevitsky's estate near Tanglewood.

The eighth scene, which will be the longest at about seven minutes, was written in a few days of frenzy two weeks ago.

It uses a five-page libretto drawn by Richard Moore from a 10-page (typed single space) short

See CHIEF
LT 2

Chief On Stage

Continued From Page ~~DT1~~

story by Leo Bonfanti, an author and publisher in Reading who Selig says is a genius.

Bonfanti has written extensively about the history of Indians in New England and publishes and sells his own books.

Chocorua was a young (25-30) chief of the Pawtucket tribe which had moved from the area around Lowell to the White Mountains in New Hampshire, where there is a lake and a mountain, which figure in the opera, named for Chocorua.

In 1723 the Pawtuckets decided to move from New Hampshire into Canada because their lands and spirit were being destroyed by encroaching white settlements.

But Chocorua, with a six-year-old motherless son, elected to remain, and Bonfanti's story, with the facts of Chocorua's life as a foundation, weaves a tragic tale of classic conflict that is in the tradition of highly theatrical and mystical opera plots.

The plot structure is as close as "Chocorua" gets to traditional opera, however.

The other characters are Mr. Leverett (low baritone), a wise farmer of about 45 or 50; his wife, Abigail (soprano), an attractive girl of 18 or 20; an old Indian (bass), a girl whose efforts are confined to the chorus, Chocorua's son, who doesn't sing; and a god, Hobbomocko (tenor), who probably is the Pawtuckets' nearest equivalent to the Christians' devil. (Chocoura sings high baritone.)

The individual's historical conflict with relentlessly changing society is symbolized by Chocoura's ill-fated relationships with Mr. Leverett and his young wife.

The opera tells the story of the climactic moment in Chocorua's life in the first, fourth and eighth scenes. The others are flashbacks that set the stage for aspects of the climax.

It is a poetic libretto, full of mysticism. There is virtually no dialogue, says Selig, because the opera is too short for details.

The characters express their emotional reactions in generalized statements rather like soliloquies, and since Selig looks upon the opera more as a theatrical than a musical piece, he draws from any musical source that he feels best serves the dramatic moment.

There are elements of jazz in the score, he says, and 18th-century baroque, and a freely - melodic 12-tone pattern, and such techniques as harmonic cannons.

"Sometimes the word sequences generate their own rhythmic themes," he says, and two of the characters have their own theme - song melodies like the leitmotifs in Wagnerian opera.

The staging by Ian Strasfogel is highly colorful, says Selig considering the limited facilities and time for preparation.

And there will be extensive use of vivid, picturesque lighting and costuming.

Strasfogel is head of the Music Theater Project of the Berkshire Music Center and is the newly appointed general director of the Opera Society of Washington, D. C.

Scenery, costumes and lighting will be designed by Douglass W. Schmidt, Jeanne Button and Josseph Pacitti, resident designers of the project, and designers at the Lincoln Center Repertory Theater and the Juilliard School in New York.

BLANK PAGE

160

First performance of his 'Chocorua' on Tanglewood program Wednesday

Serious opera, pop songs: Selig's two musical worlds

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — Wednesday night at Tanglewood, Robert Selig will see and hear the first performance of his opera, or as he seems to prefer to call it, theatre piece, "Chocorua" on a double bill with the "Brecht-Weill Yes Man," with repeat performances scheduled Thursday and Sunday evenings, Aug. 3 and 6.

The 33-year-old Selig, who teaches at the New England Conservatory, is from Chicago and studied at Northwestern University. He counts the summer of 1966, which he spent at Tanglewood studying with Dr. Donald Martino and Gunther Schuller, as the turning point in his evolution as a composer. It was the moment at which it was clear to him that he wanted to and also could be a composer, and he returned for another summer to study there two years later.

On a Guggenheim grant, Selig spent March through July of this year in the studio at Serenac, the Kousevitsky house in Lenox, composing "Chacorua." He knows now what he had long suspected, that he wanted the main part of his youthful work to be for the theatre. He describes himself as having no gift with words and has long been frustrated because he couldn't be a playwright. "Chacorua" is his first "serious" work for the musical theatre. Before that he had written a musical comedy which never got produced, though some of his songs have been published separately.

EVOLUTION OF A COMPOSER — Robert Selig, 33, after studying at Tanglewood in 1966 decided he wanted to be a composer and returned to study at Tanglewood two summers later. This year he composed his opera "Chacorua" while on a Guggenheim grant in Lenox. (Globe photo by Ted Dully)

He hears what rock music he finds on his car radio, sometimes he finds things he likes very much — he mentions the song "Vincent" saying, "it's remarkable that such a thing could have come out of what is essentially a teen's culture" — but doesn't feel interest in any specific group.

As for working both sides of the street, he doesn't at all feel that it makes him two different people who ought perhaps to be writing under two names. In November, Collage, a contemporary music ensemble of Boston Symphony players, will give the first full performance of his "Quartet for the Three Seasons of Autumn." The middle movement of this piece for voice (no text, just scat syllables), flute, cello, and percussion, he says could virtually be recorded as a pop song as it stands.

When just the first two movements were performed a while ago, the audience was dumbfounded by the contrast between it and the "more abstract" first movement. In the complete work, says Selig, the effect will be different and better: "the whole problem with mixed styles interests me very much." Perhaps his major effort so far in mixing languages here has "a concerto for symphony orchestra and rock" written for the Eastern Music Festival, whose music director Sheldon Morganstern is a Northwestern classmate of Selig's, and performed also at the New England Conservatory at its American Music Festival in May 1971.

The ideas for "Chocorua" was given to Selig by Leo Bonfanti, the author of several books on New England Indians, and the story is a simple but gripping one of sexual and territorial conflicts between Indians in New Hampshire and white settlers. Bonfanti prepared the scenario, which was turned into a libretto by Cambridge poet Richard Moore.

Since all three were inexperienced in opera, they drew liberally on the advice of John Strasfogel, director of the Washington Opera, the opera department at New England Conservatory, and of the Tanglewood Theatre Project, as well as being the man who will stage the production here.

As an example of the kind of suggestions Strasfogel made, Selig cited the Hobbomocko, a devil-god who Selig first thought to make the conventional sonorous base, but who, on Strasfogel's advise, got turned into "a screaming tenor."

Coming out of his work on "Chocorua", Selig is convinced not only of his vocation as a theater composer, but specifically anxious to make this the beginning of an extended series of chamber operas on American historical subjects, particularly those having to do with the little known story of New England Indians.

Just as he sees no conflict between the world of "serious" and pop music, Selig thinks that the split according to which some composers are intellectual, others emotional, is a nonthing.

"The heart-head dichotomy is false. Anytime a composer writes a piece in no matter what style it's intellectual. Intellect is very important for expression," and he cited Mahler, whose 9th Symphony we had just heard Leonard Bernstein rehearse with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. "The more intellect, the more expression: look at Bach."

"Mahler," he went on, "writing with such intensity is almost enough to make you lay down your pen for ever." The overwhelming mountains of existing repertory as something for the young composer to compete against presents a scary prospect, Selig suggested, and the situation is made no easier by a figure like Bernstein; putting his enormous power and popularity behind Mahler, Brahms, using none of it to help young composers, being if anything "rather cynical" in his comments on contemporary composition. "I'm not attacking him for it, but I think it's a pity."

By way of contrast he mentioned Gunther Schuller. "But for him, many young composers in the country would not be composing today. I think none has done more," and he went on to express appreciation particularly for Schuller's non - partisan willingness to help composers of all styles and schools. "I hope his kindness and generosity will have an effect on my generation also as an example. I know it's made a difference to me and to the way I tried to help younger composers just starting."

Being, except for his pop songs, totally unpublished is bad. It cuts down the number of performances, and it means for the composer an enormous investment of energy in copying parts, wrapping packages and taking them to the post office, and so on. It is frustrating, too: "You write a piece, performers love it, it gets rave reviews, the audience goes wild" — Selig mentioned examples from his own work, including the rock-symphony concerto and the woodwind quartet, which he describes "one of the strongest pieces written for the medium."

"But it's like writing into a vacuum. You can't get the thing around. Publishers sit on it for two years, they don't write to say they like it, they don't like it, and if you tested them you could maybe get them to make noises about backlog."

"Yesterday the Bowling Green String Quartet was here and one of them said they wanted to commission a piece from an American composer and they'd been given the list of 44 prominent composers from which to choose. 'But you aren't on the list,' he said. What am I supposed to do? At least I'm Schwann Catalog in big letters, the way I used to dream when I was a kid. Next to Schumann."

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
JUL 30 1972
New England Newsclip

CALL
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
D. 32,000
AUG 2 1972
New England Newsclip

'Chocorua' Premiere Set

LENOX, Mass. (AP) —. The world premiere of "Chocorua," based on the true story of an 18th Century Indian Chief in New Hampshire, will be given at Tanglewood tonight as the Berkshire Music Center launches its 1972 Music Theater Project.

"Chocorua" was composed by Robert Selig on a commission from the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Also to be performed is Brecht-Weill's "The Yes Man."

Music Theater Project Opens With 'Chocorua'

LENOX — The Music Theater Project at Tanglewood, part of the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music), opens it's 1972 season August 2 at 8.30 p.m. in the West Barn. Two other performances will also be given August 3 and 6, also at 8.30 p.m. in the West Barn.

The performances include the world premiere of Robert Selig's "Chocorua" (commissioned jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and th Fromm Music Foundation), and Brecht-Weill's "The Yes Man."

Robert Selig's "Chocorua" is based on a scenario by Leo Bonfanti with text by the Boston poet Richard Moore. The story is derived from actual events of the eighteenth century and tells of Indian chief Chocorua who remains behind in New Hampshire when his tribe emigrates northward and mingles with the English settlers with tragic results.

Ian Strasfogel, newly appointed General Director of the Opera Society of Washington, D. C. and head of the Music Theatre Project, describes "Chocorua's" style as "conceived as a memory piece using short, almost cinematic flashbacks." "Chocorua will be conducted by John Miner, a Berkshire Music Center Conducting Fellow.

The cast includes Timothy Nolen as Chocorua, William Neill as Hobbomoko, Jim Hooper as Léverett, Barbara Hocher as Leverett's wive Abagail, Willard White as the old chieftan, Ariel Bybee as a tribeswoman and Raphael Sbarge as the chief's son. It is interesting to note that Timothy Nolen's great uncle was Chief Red Cloud of the Sioux Indians, who fought and defeated Custer at Custer's Land Stand at Little Big Horn.

"The Yes Man," a translation by J. M. Potts of the 1930 Brecht-Weill "Lehrstuck" (or "instructional piece" Der Jasager) will be presented in conjunction with the Boston University Choral Institute at the Berkshire Music Center. "The Yes Man" was written just before the collapse of the Wiemar Republic. Mr. Strasfogel describes "The Yes Man" as Brecht's warning against the blind following of orders.

"The Yes Man" will be conducted by Berkshire Music Center conducting fellow John Neshling. The cast of this rarely preformed piece includes: Jim Hooper (August 3), and Lenis Carlson (August 2 and 6) as the teacher, Doug Ahlstedt as the boy, Ariel Bybee as the mother, and Willard White, Roelof Oostwoud, and William Neill as the three boys.

Both productions will be directed by Ian Strasfogel. Douglass W. Schmidt and Jeanne Button and Joseph Pacitti, resident designers of the Music Theatre Project and well known for their work at the Lincoln Center Repetory Theatre, and the Juilliard School in New York City, will design scenery, costumes, and lighting for both productions.

Performances of "Chocorua" and "The Yes Man" are scheduled for August 2, 3, and 6 at 8.30 p.m. in Tanglewood's West Badn. Reservations are required and may be made at the Friends Office at Tanglewood.

REPORTER PRESS
NORTH CONWAY, N. H.
W. 3,964
AUG 10 1972
New England Newsclip

By Janet Hounsell

'CHOCORUA' PREMIERES IN MASSACHUSETTS

The world premiere of 'Chocorua,' based on the true story of an 18th century Indian Chief in New Hampshire, was given at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., the evening of August 2, 1972. The Berkshire Music Center launched its 1972 Music Theater Project that evening.

'Chocorua' was composed by Robert Selig on a commission from the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

JOURNAL
LEWISTON, MAINE
D. 14,019
AUG 2 1972
New England Newsclip

World Premiere Of 'Chocorua' To Be Given Tonight

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The world premiere of "Chocorua," based on the true story of an 18 Century Indian Chief in New Hampshire, will be given at Tanglewood tonight as the Berkshire Music Center launches its 1972 Music Theater Project.

"Chocorua" was composed by Robert Selig on a commission from the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Also to be performed is Brecht-Weill's "The Yes Man."

RECORDER GAZETTE
GREENFIELD, MASS.
D. 14,698
AUG 2 1972
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Premiere

LENOX, Mass (AP) — The world premiere of "Chocorua," based on the true story of an 18th Century Indian Chief in New Hampshire, will be given at Tanglewood tonight as the Berkshire Music Center launches its 1972 Music Theater Project.

"Chocorua" was composed by Robert Selig on a commission from the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Also to be performed is Brecht-Weill's "The Yes Man."

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
D. 84,000
AUG 2 1972
New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD OPENS 1972 MUSIC THEATER

LENOX, Mass. (AP) The world premiere of "Chocorua," based on the true story of an 18th Century Indian Chief in New Hampshire, will be given at Tanglewood tonight as the Berkshide Music Center launches its 1972 Music Theater Project.

"Chocorua" was composed by Robert Selig on a commission from the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Also to be performed is Brecht-Weill's "The Yes Man."

CITIZEN
LACONIA, N. H.
D. 6,800
AUG 2 1972
New England Newsclip

World Premiere Of 'Chocorua' At Tanglewood

LEONOX, Mass. (AP) — The world premiere of "Chocorua," based on the true story of an 18th Century Indian Chief in New Hampshire, will be given at Tanglewood tonight as the Berkshire Music Center launches its 1972 Music Theater Project.

"Chocorua" was composed by Robert Selig on a commission from the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Also to be performed is Brecht-Weill's "The Yes Man."

CITIZEN
WINSTED, CONN.
D. 4,600
AUG 2 1972
New England Newsclip

World Premier Of "Chocorua" At Tanglewood

LEOOX, Mass. (AP) — The world premiere of "Chocorua," based on the true story of an 18th Century Indian Chief in New Hampshire, will be given at Tanglewood tonight as the Berkshire Music Center launches its 1972 Music Theater Project.

"Chocorua" was composed by Robert Selig on a commission from the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Also to be performed is Brecht-Weill's "The Yes Man."

162

Impressive Selig opera 'Chocorua' premiered in Tanglewood

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — Last week the Music Theatre Project at Tanglewood presented a run of performances of a double bill of Kurt Weill's "The Yes Man" and Robert Selig's "Chocorua," the latter, commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center and the Forum Music Foundation, being heard and seen for the first time.

Selig is a 33-year-old composer who teaches at the New England Conservatory. Chocorua you may recognize as the name of a mountain and a lake in the White Mountains of New Hampshire, and for its subject, Selig went to Leo Vonfonti's selection of stories of the New England Indians.

Vonfonti outlined the scenario, and Richard Moore sharpened it into a verse libretto. The simple, poignant story is one of Indians and English settlers, in sexual, territorial and religious conflict, the protagoniist being the Indian chief, Chocorua, Leverett, an English farming settler, and his young wife, Abagail, with whom Chocorua falls in love, and whom he kills in a situation of mistaken identity.

Selig, who has had several instrumental works performed in Boston, including an extraordinarily successful go at an extremely perilous venture, a large work for rock group and symphony orchestra, clearly is a composer with a strong calling and gift for the theater. His sense of timing, his feeling for dramatic stress, for coloration, and lighting through music, are very much there, and they are the sine qua non of effective opera writing, the component that cannot be learned. "Chocorua" is impressive.

Selig uses an orchestra of only a dozen instruments — quite normal ones, too — and his writing for it is exciting, never just ingeniously economical (as one is apt to remark about chamber operas), but actively imaginative in the ways lines are passed from voice to voice.

Among many many telling theatrical effects, the music for the two shootings in "Chocorua" stand out: you are assaulted, not by the guns' report, but by terrifying, seemingly endless rollings of percussion that suggests the pressed chaos, the bewilderment of the victim's physical and psychic systems.

ROBERT SELIG
. . . opera instinct

If "Chocorua" has a fault, it is that of being too intense. Selig is superbly skillful at writing high pressure music, but in the half-dozen scenes of his 30-minute opera, he offers virtually nothing else. It is all climaxes, like one of those movies condensed out of a Dickens novel, and it badly wants some other kind of material to put the tragic main events into broader perspective, which would then actually set them into higher, more powerfully defined relief. It was a first venture in opera for the scenarist, librettist, and the composer. But nonetheless, to say it once more, "Chocorua" is impressive, and not just as a beginning.

It had a good performance. John Miner conducted, and the cast included Timothy Nolen (Chocorua), Barbara Hocher (Abagail), James Hooper (Leverett), and William Neill (the unseen god, Hobbomocko). Ian Strasfogel directed — I think without knowing the plot one would have been confused about the accidental shooting of Abagail, though otherwise his work was clear and efficient — and the production was designed and dressed respectively by Douglas W. Schmidt and Jeanne Button.

The Weill opera, written 1929-30, is a fiercely instructional piece, to a text by Bertolt Brecht about a boy on a difficult journey to fetch medicine for his mother, and who in line with "the tradition" chooses to be thrown off the mountain into the valey rather than force the party to turn back because of his weakness and slowness. Brecht must have meant it to be very upbeat and Marxian; Strassfogel, however, played it as a saga about bullying, blustering, Hitler youth types. Incidentally, "Yes Man" is not a completely happy translation of "Jasager" which carried more connotations of "yeasayer."

An effective production in its nasty way, excellently conducted by John Neschling, with another good cast including Douglas Ahlstedt in the impossible assignment of a grown man playing a boy (the part is for boy soprano in the original), Lenus Carlson (the teacher), Ariel Bybee (the mother), William Neill, Roelof Oostwoud, Willard White (three students in black berets) and a fine chorus from Boston University Choral Institute. The score itself, by the way, is mostly feeble self-plagiarism.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528
AUG 3 1972 New England Newsclip

New Chamber Opera Has An Impressive Premiere

By RICHARD CONWAY

A tightly - woven, concentrated, intense, powerful new chamber opera had an impressive premiere in Tanglewood's West Barn last night.

Composed by 33-year-old Robert Selig, a teacher of theory and composition at New England Conservatory, the one act, eight scene, 25 to 30 minute work, tells the story of an Indian chief named Chocorua (Choh-KOH-roo-a), which is the title of the opera.

Briefly, the story tells of Chocorua's decision to remain behind with his son, when the rest of his tribe decides to move from their mountain land in New Hampshire to Canada. The Indian is befriended by a middle-aged settler and his young wife. Chocorua and the young girl fall in love, but, leaving his son behind, he decides to rejoin his tribe in Canada. Returning once more to get his son, he finds the child has been accidently killed by eating some poison meant for killing foxes. Invoking his gods, he is told to kill the white man. Still in a trance, he shoots at a cloaked shape only to discover that he has killed the settler's wife. Leaving his necklace near her body, he climbs the mountain once more and waits for the settler to find and kill him.

Selig's music, contemporary in idiom, is strikingly effective. But it is helped in great measure by Douglas Schmidt's symbolic setting, and some highly imaginative lighting by Joseph Pacitti. The mountain is suggested by a series of steps that remind one of Indian burial platforms. Pancitti's lighting, playing on the effectively costumed figures, evokes an atmosphere, dark and grim, that hauntingly sustains throughout the opera.

Timothy Nolen is excellent in the title role. He has a strong, high baritone voice, and is a more than capable actor. Vocally, the opera is mostly his, and the young man is equal to its demands.

He receives fine support from Willard White, James Hooper, Barbara Hocher, William Neill, Ariel Bybee, and Ralphael Sbarge. John Miner conducts the orchestra with a firm hand, drawing out Selig's interesting scoring.

The Music Theater Project is also doing the Kurt Weill and Bertolt Brecht "The Yes Man." Composed in 1930, this work has deep, symbolic meanings that belie the fact that it was originally written for performance by secondary school students.

We found the singing to be very fine in this production, but the acting leaving something to be desired.

Lenus Carlson, Douglas Ahlstedt, Ariel Bybee, William Neill, Roelof Oostwound, and Willard White are the performers. John Neschling does an excellent job with the orchestra.

While the opera does make its point, one gets the impression that Ian Strasfogel, who directed both productions, lavished the majority of his care and attention on Selig's new work.

The chamber operas will be given again tonight and Sunday night at 8:30. "Chocorua" is worth the drive to the Berkshires.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885
AUG 5 1972 New England Newsclip

'Chocorua' At Tanglewood

By ELLEN PFEIFER

LENOX—The first production of the 1972 Tanglewood Music Theater Project, presented at the West Barn, Thursday night, was a double bill of Kurt Weill's "The Yes Man," and Robert Selig's "Chocorua," directed by Ian Strasfogel.

A very short, one-acter, the latter was commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Faromm Music Foundation. It is the first of several premieres to be presented at the annual Faromm Festival of contemporary music, which continues through next week.

"Chocorua," the first of Selig's projected series of chamber operas about American Indians, retells the legend of a brave who refuses to leave the New Hampshire territory with the rest of his tribe, which is fleeing the encroachment of English settlers.

The tribe predicts the English will "destroy the hunting grounds and spread plague, smallpox, and rum" among the Indians.

Chocorua believes in coexistence.

He co-exists to the point of taking a white mistress and entrusting his son to her while attending a tribal council. When he returns, the son is dead, having accidentally eaten the white man's fox poison.

In revenge, Chocorua kills his mistresses husband only to find, in a Rigoletto-like twist of fate, that in the dim light he has killed the woman herself.

Chocorua climbs the Dying Mountain and waits for the husband to take his revenge.

The action, except for Chocorua's death, proceeds as flashbacks, beginning and ending with Chocorua on the mountain mourning the events. In essence, he is the only character and the others are merely the one dimensional figures of his imagination.

He has far more singing to do and emotion to express than anyone; the role is quite a tour de force.

Selig's score is very listenable and exhibits a feel for instrumental colors and an artful way of combining timbres.

It shows a sure dramatic sense as well. And, like any good theater music, is tied to the stage events in such a way that one could never imagine it as an independent entity.

Timothy Nolen, a handsome young singer with a physique that for once fit the role, took on the music and made it sound as if it lay perfectly for his voice. An even greater achievment, though, was that he was able to give dignity and tragic dimension to the character without becoming pathetic—an all too dangerous potentiality.

Performances by Williard White, James Hooper, Barbara Hocher, Raphael Sbarge, Ariel Bybee in the other very limited roles were well done and Miss Hocher, in her perhaps 20 measures of music, displayed a lovely voice that one would centainly like to hear in a more extensive party.

John Miner, the conductor, produced the kind of precise and dramatic vocal-instrumental ensemble that is too frequently heard in opera.

The Weill piece, which completed the program, seemed all to much like filler material. It was very obvious which of the two operas received the most thought and rehearsal time.

There was pretty much of the standard opera acting in this one and minimal attention to set and costumes. Too bad, because this translation of a Japanese Noh-play can have an entrancing and moving effect.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
AUG 9 1972 New England Newsclip

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398
AUG 4 1972 New England Newsclip

'Chocorua' at Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

THE SPRINGFIELD UNION
AMUSEMENTS
14 Springfield, Mass., Friday, August 4, 1972

LENOX — There is nothing pretty in the chamber opera, "Chocorua," which was given its world premiere performance Wednesday in the West Barn at Tanglewood.

The setting and performance were impressive and the basic musical material seemed full of substance, but, on first view, there appeared to be a couple of basic flaws.

The opera was composed by Robert Selig on commission from the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

The center is the summer academy for advanced music students held at Tanglewood each summer by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Fromm Foundation sponsors contemporary music composition and performance. Its annual Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood will begin Friday and end Aug. 10.

"Chocorua" was scheduled to be given another performance Thursday and a third as part of the Fromm festival Sunday at 8.30.

Its basis flaws, in my view, lay in the challenge it set for itself . . . a challenge it didn't, probably couldn't, satisfy.

There are seven scenes intended to run a bit less than a half hour (Wednesday it was 34 minutes), and at the outset an extremely high level of emotional tension was set.

Chocorua, an Indian chief, in a soliloquy, is on the top of his mountain facing death, "I must die now," he screams several times. The rest of the little opera, in flashbacks, report what led to that moment.

There is his vain attempt to persuade his tribe to remain in New Hampshire (it is a true story from 1723), the confrontation with a white settler, the love scene with the settler's wife, the death of his son, the accidental killing of the settler's wife, and the revenge of the settler.

The music, virtually all of it appropriately atonal and despairing, is unrelenting in its passionate tension. And the libretto by Richard Moore from a story by Leo Bonfonti is equally unrelenting in its attention to the tragic sequence.

There is very little relief, with the consequence that the viewer's attention wanders: he seeks relief elsewhere and the impact of the events on stage lose their power.

It is virtually impossible to sustain tension on stage indefinitely.

It is especially difficult in a theater piece that has as little action as "Chocorua" does. Certainly adultery, a child's accidental death, miscegenation, the murder of a wrong victim and violent, bloody revenge seem active enough.

But there is virtually no exchange of dialogue; the events are symbolized in pageant - like scenes, and the emotions of the characters are expressed largely with a kind of out - loud thinking.

It is a theatrical device that can be very effective in moderation but which becomes static too soon.

In sum, "Chocorua" appears to lose the early impression it makes because its theatrical structure is tatic.

On the same bill is a performance of the seldom - seen "Der Jasager" (The Yes Man) by Kurt Weill and Bertolt Brecht, a 1930 adaptation of a Japanese Noh-Play.

Bonfanti has Ventured into The Opera Field

A former Wakefield native, Leo Bonfanti, now of Reading, has ventured into the opera field as a scenarist. He provided the outlines for the story used in a new opera "Chocorua," presented for the first time last week by the Music Theatre Project at Tanglewood in Lenox.

The opera was commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center and the Forum Music Foundation.

The composer, Robert Selig, teaches at New England Conservatory. He went to Bonfanti, who has published a magazine "New England Journeys," and a number of paperback books dealing with New England history, especially with the life of New England Indians.

As Globe music critic Michael Steinberg put it, "the simple, poignant story is one of Indians and English settlers, in sexual, territorial, and religious conflict, the protagonist being the Indian chief Chocorua, Leverett, an English farming settler, and his young wife, Abagail, with whome Chocorua falls in love, and whom he kills in a situation of mistaken identity."

After Bonfanti outlined the story for Selig, the librettist, Richard Moore, sharpened the plot into a verse libretto.

John Miner conducted the dozen instrument orchestra for the Tanglewood performance and Ian Strasfogel directed. The production was designed by Douglas W. Schmidt and Jeanne Button dressed the singers. Timothy Nolan took the role of Chocorua, Barbara Hocher was Abagail, James Hooper, Leverett, and William Neill was the unseen God Hobbomocko.

ITEM
WAKEFIELD, MASS.
D. 7,200
AUG 11 1972 New England Newsclip

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

AUG 12 1972 New England Newsclip

Opera: 'Chocorua' and 'Yes-Man'

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

Chocorua has been the name of a mountain and a town in New Hampshire for more than two centuries, and now it is the name of an opera which aims to bring some of its Indian history to musical life. "Chocorua," with score by Robert Selig to Richard Moore's text based on a scenario by Leo Bonfonti, was composed within the past year on a Berkshire Music Center-Fromm Music Foundation grant, and had its third of three performances last Sunday during Tanglewood's just-completed Festival of Contemporary Music. The producing organization was the center's Music Theater Project, now in its second season under Ian Strasfogel's direction, the Selig opera being the first piece specifically commissioned and tailored for its use.

This is Mr. Selig's first work for the stage, and a commendable first it is, if not an immediate crowd-pleaser. It is short (it occupied the second half of a double bill with the Brecht-Weill "The Yes-Man"), its eight continuous scenes progressed naturally in Mr. Strasfogel's fluid production and Douglas W. Schmidt's functional ramped setting, and both its vocal and instrumental writing remained free of any musical cliches which the relatively short American compositional tradition has labeled as Indian. This, in itself, is a good beginning.

The opera opens as a spotlight illuminates, on an oblong terra-cotta backdrop, what appears to be a hazy ringed golden sun, but which, momentarily at least, pinpoints the locale — Mt. Chocorua on a striated map of New Hampshire. Then,thanks to Joseph Pacitti's evocative lighting, it becomes a sun, or moon, again.

As Chocorua, an Indian brave, awaits death on a mountain deserted by his tribe as white settlers press closer, the tragedies of his past life torture him, and, in flashback scenes, form the substance of the piece. He has been widowed and left with a son; his tribe has migrated to the north and urged him to come, but he is impelled to stay, especially after he and the wife of a white settler fall in love. His son dies, he believes because of settlers' negligence, and at the command of an Indian god he mistakenly shoots his white mistress. Leaving a necklace to identify himself as her killer, he returns to the mountain to await inevitable retribution, a symbol of the sorrows of his native land.

Mr. Selig's score is stark and spare, strongly textured in a manner that belied the fact that its orchestra comprised only 12 players of 14 instruments. The vocal writing is demanding, particularly in the case of the title role — resplendently sung by Timothy Nolen — and for a group of fellow tribesmen who try his conscience as he befriends the settlers and loses his child. Though beautifully sung by Barbara Hocher, the white woman's role is emotionally pallid and a brief love scene more resultant from stage action than musical motivation. Seemingly the score convinces because of Mr. Selig's intense sympathy for its main character. Lacking is an equal desire to vivify the inescapable circumstances which make Chocorua a tragic figure.

Most importantly, however, "Chocorua" emerges as a declarative, self-affirming entity even with its faults of omission. It is a good start for Mr. Selig, who can be grateful for the Music Theatre Project's splendid overall production, and for the incisive musical direction by John Miner who conducted.

The Bertolt Brecht-Kurt Weill "Yes-Man" ("Der Jasager") is in the chilling decadence-crusted tradition of pre-World War II parables in which messages boomeranged in historical retrospect. This piece, produced for German secondary schools of the 1930's as an easy lesson in the ideology of collectivism, turned out to have a dour unintended meaning later on — survive under the decreed system or take the consequences.

"The Yes-Man," which, because of the circumstances of its original purpose, has a simple, jog-along Weill score, was given an icily effective production by the Music Theater. A school class, obediently responding to the day's lesson about a boy who said and did the "right thing" under prescribed circumstances, becomes the chorus as the parable is acted and sung for them.

An adored teacher, about to leave town on a dangerous expedition "over the mountains," subtly enlists a boy to leave his ailing mother and join him in the name of idealism. The journey proves too difficult for the untried boy, who has not the climbing experience of his companions, and ultimately he is expected to say yes to the proposition that he be destroyed rather than hinder the "progress" of his fellow travelers.

Obviously it is more striking as a history than as a music lesson.

The cast was exemplary: Lenus Carlson as the sonorous, unswerving teacher; Douglas Ahlstedt as the sacrificial boy; Ariel Bybee a self-effacing mother, and William Neill, Roelof Oostwoud, and Willard White as sturdy supporters who make the dangerous ideological journeys possible.

John Neschling kept the Strasfogel staging in persuasive musical motion from the pit.

Down the road at the Lenox Arts Center a sample of self-described Ontological-Hysteric Theater, "Doctor Selavy's Magic Theater," subtitled "The Mental Cure," has been performed on several weekends, with final showings on the one coming up. The rock score, which is almost continuously invigorating, is by Stanley Silverman, a Fromm commission alumnus, and was originally composed to fit the Canadian Stratford Festival's "Satyricon" production. The framework on which it is now hung is by Richard Foreman, who has devised a six-day series of cures through which a hapless patient (Barry Primus) is steered by the double-talking doctor (George McGrath).

Unfortunately a rather labored cuteness pervades much of the proceedings, with nonsequiturs being the order of the night. Except for Jessica Harper and Steve Menken, who are rock singers of some substance, the level of performance is more representative of goodwill than theatrical training. The band, however, which raised the low-slung roof of the intimate carriage house where "Dr. Selavy" ("c'est la vie," in case you wondered) is quartered, is thoroughly professional.

Whitestone Photo

Robert Selig's 'Chocorua' at Tanglewood

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 3 1972 New England Newsclip

Music Theatre

Commissioned work given high caliber performance

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

TANGLEWOOD'S Music Theatre Project opened its 1972 season last night with performances in the West Barn of a world premiere of "Chocorua," an opera with music by Robert Selig and text by Richard Moore and with the revival of a 1930 Brecht-Weill Lehrstuck (an instructional piece) called "Der Jasager" (The Yes Man).

The able head of the Tanglewood project is Ian Strasfogel who proved last night, with somewhat less than the most satisfactory working conditions, that highly stimulating performances can be presented in a very short time, given the exceptional talent the Berkshire Music Center makes available.

* * *

THE SELIG opera was commissioned jointly by the Center and the Fromm Music Foundation. The story concerns actual events of the 18th century and tells of Indian Chief Cocorua who remains behind in New Hampshire when his tribe emigrates northward.

A huge forward-tilted disc which practically covered the whole stage was the ingenious setting. Without any attempt at a musical prelude, Chocorua, kneeling as in supplication on an elevation at the apex of a circular ascending path, delivers a soliloquy in a monotone lament not unlike a Hebrew prayer. Selig's music provides a sympathetic basis but soon develops into more substantial and graphic expression as the action proceeds. It is effectively programmatic. With discreet use of a percussion section the Indian character is portrayed, and later in the action becomes remarkably suggestive, but the instrumental writing is worthy of hearing in its own right.

The voices were splendid. Timothy Nolen in the title role disclosed both a powerful voice and histrionic viridity. A small ensemble of Indian elders not only delivered their roles well, but were given assignments as of a minor Greek chorus. The orchestra composed of Center students was of a high caliber and the whole opera was tightly conducted by John Miner.

"Chocorua" is a tragedy of unrelieved somberness based on actual incidents of the shameful history of the European invasion of America. But within the cramped quarters of the West Barn stage the episode is conveyed with telling impact and with basic credit due the music, written in sophisticated but still transparent style, and the vivid singing of the young principals.

THE MUSIC Theatre Project of the Berkshire Music Center is made possible through the support of the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music and the National Opera Institute in cooperation with Mrs. Dewitt Wallace.

* * *

THE WEILL-BRECHT piece was created for presentation in the German secondary school system and, accordingly, features relatively simple vocal and orchestral writing. It is a word for word translation of a Japanese Noh drama. The program notes describe it as an optimistic celebration of an individual embracing the collective ideal, but, in effect, it seems like a cross between a Hitler-youth happening and an incident in the Nibelungen mythology.

The music, naturally, is easily identifiable. The characters are portrayed as mature Boy Scouts. The Teacher, the dominant but inflated character in the incident, was sung and acted with extremely capable voice and in a Draconian manner by Lenus Carlson. A chorus from the Boston University Choral Foundation comes on a stage to provide the background for the ensuing action and then moves to the side to provide at proper moments vocal reflections of the emotions involved in the pseudo-heroic action.

The performances are to be repeated this evening and on Sunday.

Whitestone

Scene from commissioned work "Chocorua" by Robert Selig and Richard Moore.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

AUG 8 1972

Music: 2 One-Act Operas at Berkshire

'The Yes Man' Teamed With Selig's 'Chocorua'

By DONAL HENAHAN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 7—Tanglewood's newest baby, the Music Theater Project directed by Ian Strasfogel, is only in its second summer, but well beyond the crawling stage. Last night at the West Barn of the Berkshire Music Center, it offered two one-act operas of fairly modest pretensions, but the young group will close its season next week with nothing less than Monteverdi's "The Coronation of Poppea," which is growing up in a hurry, operatically speaking.

The double bill of one-acters consisted of "The Yes Man," by Brecht and Weill, an English version of the 1930 propaganda piece known as "Der Jasager," and a work commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation, Robert Selig's "Chocorua." The Brecht-Weill work, intended as an "instructional piece" for neophyte Marxists, derives from Arthur Waley's translation and interpretation of a Japanese Noh play, liberally reworded by Brecht. It concerns a young man who sacrifices his life to the supposedly higher cause of the community rather than break with its totalitarian customs. "Chocorua," by contrast, depicts an 18th-century Indian chief who falls in love with a white woman and breaks with his tribe to stay behind and try to live among the English settlers. There is nice irony in the fact that both conformist and rebel die, but then opera is generally fatal to its heroes no matter what they do.

Mr. Selig's opera, obviously the work of a skilled musician, also shows a good sense of dramatic organization: partly a dream play, it shuttles in its eight scenes between present and past, telling its story concisely. But both as music and theater "Chocorua" falls considerably short of sustaining interest throughout.

●

Some of Mr. Selig's ideas seemed rather commonplace, such as the thunderous percussion shots that accompanied the shootings of the white woman (by the Indian chief) and the Indian chief (by her husband). The composer also made unrealistic demands on the voice, overstressing weighty declamation and sometimes forcing the noble Chocorua into an unseemly falsetto. Timothy Nolen, the tenor who played the chief, sounded strident and under heavy strain most of the time.

Mr. Selig's opera, however, was an obviously early effort that fails most honorably, and much of its somewhat Bergian orchestral writing conveys intentions most evocatively. Certain vocal ideas made sense, too, such as the taped voice of the god Hobbomocko and a trio in which the white husband (James Hooper) and the red chief declaimed their lines while the soprano (Barbara Hocher) spun a lyric line of connection between the antagonists. John Miner conducted with seeming expertness.

"The Yes Man," a thoroughly effective little piece that Mr. Strasfogel interprets as Brecht's warning against following orders rigidly (there are other, more ideological, ways to read the opera) went off smartly under John Neschling's baton. Lenus Carlson, as the Teacher, found a nice balance between pompous commissar and humane leader, and the Three Students (William Neill, Roelof Oostwoud and Willard White) were perfect in their personification of collective stupidity. Douglas Ahlstedt as the Boy and Ariel Bybee as his Mother also caught the proper mythic tone of the work without falling into the trap of portraying robots.

Ian Strasfogel Directs 2d Season of Projects

●

Earlier in the day at the Music Shed, Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Mahler Symphony No. 5 in an extroverted, generally cohesive reading that sagged in interest at times but showed that Mr. Thomas has come a long way in a short time as a Mahler interpreter. He managed the main trick of sprawling works, which is to keep moods shifting continually without losing the curve of the over-all line.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 130,857

AUG 13 1972 New England Newsclip

New Tanglewood Project

By DONAL HENAHAN
N.Y. Times Wire

NEW YORK — If Jane Austen were starting out now, her "Sense and Sensibility" probably would hit the paperback racks entitled "Sense and Sensuality," and Proust's "Remembrance of Flings Past" would come with a center fold-out of the Baron Charlus.

That explicitness does not necessarily enhance meaningfulness should be obvious; in fact, the current tendency of novelists and filmmakers to try to pass off cliches as insights, simpy because their characters utter them in bed, coud be reason enough to justify naming ours the age of hard-core cornography.

And yet, can sex and violence be all bad when they have given us Monteverdi's "L'Incoronazione di Poppea"?

Of course, "Poppea" is not quite new; it was written in 1642 when Monteverdi was 75 years old and might have been expected to have his mind on other matters.

But this singularly rich work has been getting staged all over the operatic lot since Gunther Rennert and Raymond Leppard revived it at the Glyndebourne Festival in 1962.

Julius Rudel has offered it twice at the Caramoor Festival, most recently only last month in Gerald Freedman's staging, using Leppard's modernized orchestration and somewhat bastardized edition.

And tonight in the West Barn of the Berkshire Music Center, Ian Strasfogel and his music theater project will introduce Poppea, Nero and their equally amoral friends to Tanglewood, in what Strasfogel promises will be a controversial production "in a new version that focuses exclusively on the social and political realities of the regime of the demented Emperor Nero and his decadent court."

(There are two other performances scheduled, tomorrow and Wednesday.)

Nor should it be the greatest surprise in the world, in view of his fondness for funkiness in opera, that Frank Corsaro will be staging yet another version of "Poppea" next April for the Opera Society of Washington, of which Strasfogel recently was appointed general director.

Given the nature of "Poppea" and its performance history, any production is likely to be controversial.

No one discusses "Poppea"; they batte over it.

Right off, a Monteverdi enthusiast's hackles may rise at the word that Strasfogel's version omits the prologue, in which the composer's allegorical arguments and his theory about conflicting passions are set forth.

In fact, in order to zero in on the seamily realistic side of the opera, Strasfogel planned to cut about half the music from the score, bringing his "Poppea" home in under two hours of playing time.

Clearly, Strasfogel must have larger things on his mind than authenticity and scholarly purity to risk manhanding one of the great works in operatic history.

And indeed he does, a talk with him before the first performance disclosed.

"This is a piece that can be done in many idfferent ways," he said. "I've set my 'Poppea' in futurist times as a kind of operatic 'Clockwork Orange,' emphasizing the grotesqueness of Imperial Rome.

The significant fact to remember is that this was one of the rare early operas to concern itsef with historical fact rather than mythoology."

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

AUG 14 1972 New England Newsclip

Nero Fiddles This Week at Tanglewood

LENOX—The 1972 Music Theatre Project in its second season at Tanglewood offers as its final presentation a new version of the Monteverdi masterpiece, The Coronation of Poppea with English translation by Georffrey Dunn and realization by Alan Curtis.

The opera will be presented tonight and Wednesday under the direction of Ian Strasfogel.

Italian conductor-composer Bruno Maderna, who is serving as head of contemporary music activities at Tanglewood this summer, will conduct tonight. Bruce Hagen, a conducting fellow at Tanglewood, will conduct Wednesday.

Strasfogel has prepared a new version of this work that focuses exclusively on the social and political realities of the regime of Nero and his decadent court.

He says of Poppea, "production will be set not in imperial Rome, but in some timeless totalitarian society."

Settings are designed by Douglas Schmidt and the costumes and make-up by Jeanne Button. Schmidt and Button are resident designers of the Music Theatre Project, and are known for their work at the Lincoln Center Repertory Threatre and the Julliard School in New York City. Lights and set construction are by Joseph Pacitti.

Reservations for The Coronation of Poppea must be made through the office of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood 637-1600, ext. 276. Admission is $2.50 for the general public and $1.00 for Freinds of Music at Tanglewood.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

AUG 11 1972 New England Newsclip

Theatre Offers 'Coronation of Poppea'

The 1972 Music Theatre Project in its second season at Tanglewood offers as its final presentation a new version of the Monteverdi work, "The Coronation of Poppea'' with English translation by Geoffrey Dunn and realization by Alan Curtis. The opera will be presented Sunday, Monday and Wednesday under the direction of Ian Strasfogel.

Italian conductor - composer Bruno Maderna, who is serving as head of contemporary music activities at Tanglewood this summer, will conduct Sunday and Monday. Bruce Hangen, a conducting fellow at Tanglewood, will conduct the Wednesday production.

Strasfogel has prepared a new version of this work tha focuses exclusively on th social and political realitie of the regime of Nero an his decadent court. He say of Poppea, "production wil be set not in imperial Rome but in some timeles totalitarian society."

Settings for Poppea ar designed by Douglas Schmid and the costumes and make up are designed by Jeanne Button. Both Schmidt and Button are resident designers of the Music Theatre Project, and are known for their work at the Lincoln Center Repertory Theatre and the Juillard School in New York City. Lights and set construction are by Joseph Pacitti.

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, AUGUST 13, 1972

Music Theatre

What! Never Seduced by 'Poppea' Even Once?

By DONAL HENAHAN

EVEN the most casual shopper in the supermarkets of the arts these days must have noticed that we are in the midst of what the London Observer, in a caption over a recent roundup of new novels, referred to as the "Copulation Explosion." If Jane Austen were starting out now, her "Sense and Sensibility" probably would hit the paperback racks entitled "Sense and Sensuality," and Proust's "Remembrance of Flings Past" would come with a center fold-out of the Baron Charlus. That explicitness does not necessarily enhance meaningfulness should be obvious; in fact, the current tendency of novelists and filmmakers to try to pass off clichés as insights, simply because their characters utter them in bed, could be reason enough to justify naming ours the age of hard-core cornography.

*

And yet, can sex and violence be all bad when they have given us Monteverdi's "L'Incoronazione di Poppea"? Of course, "Poppea" is not quite new; it was written in 1642 when Monteverdi was 75 years old and might have been expected to have his mind on other matters.

But this singularly rich work has been getting staged all over the operatic lot since Günther Rennert and Raymond Leppard revived it at the Glyndebourne Festival in 1962. Julius Rudel has offered it twice at the Caramoor Festival, most recently only last month in Gerald Freedman's staging, using Leppard's modernized orchestration and somewhat bastardized edition. And tonight in the West Barn of the Berkshire Music Center, Ian Strasfogel and his Music Theater Project will introduce Poppea, Nero and their equally amoral friends to Tanglewood, in what Strasfogel promises will be a controversial production "in a new version that focuses exclusively on the social and political realities of the regime of the demented Emperor Nero and his decadent court." (There are two other performances scheduled, tomorrow and Wednesday.) Nor should it be the greatest surprise in the world, in view of his fondness for funkiness in opera, that Frank Corsaro will be staging yet another version of "Poppea" next April for the Opera Society of Washington, of which Strasfogel recently was appointed general director.

Given the nature of "Poppea" and its performance history, any production is likely to be controversial. No one discusses "Poppea"; they battle over it.

Right off, a Monteverdi enthusiast's hackles may rise at the word that Strasfogel's version omits the Prologue, in which the composer's allegorical arguments and his theory about conflicting passions are set forth. In fact, in order to zero in on the seamily realistic side of the opera, Strasfogel planned to cut about half the music from the score, bringing his "Poppea" home in under two hours of playing time. Clearly, Strasfogel must have larger things on his mind than authenticity and scholarly purity to risk manhandling one of the great works in operatic history.

And indeed he does, a talk with him before the first performance disclosed. "This is a piece that can be done in many different ways," he said. "I've set my 'Poppea' in futurist times as a kind of operatic 'Clockwork Orange,' emphasizing the grotesqueness of Imperial Rome. The significant fact to remember is that this was one of the rare early operas to concern itself with historical fact rather than mythology."

The historical details of the Nero-Poppea affair are, of course, stunningly seamy, but this is not the first couple either in or out of opera to have resorted to murder for the sake of Love (on a sub-imperial level, it seems to happen every other week in Queens).

What upsets many persons about "Poppea" is the sensuous beauty and persuasiveness of Monteverdi's music, which they feel seduces the listener into sympathizing with the two unscrupulous lovers. A marvelously funny but significant running battle has been going on recently in Opera magazine over this sticky problem, set off by a new production by the Sadler's Wells Opera. One distinguished reviewer, Stanley Sadie, led off by proclaiming: "There is no doubt in my mind that 'L'Incoronazione di Poppea' is an opera to stand alongside 'Figaro' and 'The Ring' and many Shakespeare plays as a profound statement about the human condition." The review pointed out that "Poppea" is a subtle allegory about the power and triumph of love, not a cheap thriller, and that as in life "none of the characters is simple or straightforward; each is a mixture of good and evil."

> "There are better reasons for staging 'Poppea' than to inflame moralists"

Rodney Milnes, another Opera reviewer, replied in a subsequent issue with a raspberry. "Poppea" simply gives him the moral hives: "I know it is of enormous historical significance, that the characterization is superb, the music often brilliant. But to what purpose? It is the only artifact I know that approaches the obscene."

The poor fellow is torn between love and revulsion: "The sight of those two appalling creatures who have lied, whored and murdered their way to absolute power over the civilized world sitting in triumph upon the throne drooling with lust is bad enough, but if anything can win sympathy for them it is Monteverdi's music, and it is this combination that strikes me as far more liable to deprave and corrupt than 'Last Exit to Brooklyn,' 'Schoolkids' Oz,' 'Dorian Gray' and other such trivia." Why, he demands to know, "should anyone want to spend three-and-a-half hours in the company of these despicable people"?

*

To which one might throw out the easy answer: to be on hand for "Pur ti miro, pur ti stringo," the luscious duet between Poppea and Nero that closes the opera. But there is more to the battle over the morality of "Poppea" than that, and the Rodney Milneses of the world are not to be dismissed for wanting to thrash the matter out.

There is indeed a working relationship between art and society, though it is much more complicated than your average censor or White House resident seems to imagine. One suspects that we are seeing a revival of interest in "Poppea" as much because of a renewal of popular interest in the cynical uses of power as in the sweatier aspects of love. The Strasfogel type of conception, bearing down on "political realities," is thus very much to a point, if by no means the whole point, of "Poppea." After all, to the theorist, sex might be just another counter in the only game old men care about—politics.

What we used to call the Sexual Act, in the days before literature revealed to us that the noun was wildly plural, always did figure prominently in opera—in works such as "Rigoletto" and "La Traviata" it is the prime dramatic force. But everything used to take place before the curtain went up or during scene changes. Now, in our own high Roman period, directors are moving the bedrooms onstage with increasing frequency, sometimes to illuminate the drama, sometimes to no real dramatic purpose at all. We need to be careful—to encourage the illuminators; otherwise we may end up with aphrodisiacal ballet, not opera.

Few operas lend themselves to being exploited in this way so much as "Poppea," unfortunately, but if that is the price we must pay for the return of Monteverdi, it may be worth paying. There are better reasons for staging "Poppea" than to inflame moralists, though as a start that will do. What seems likely is that we will have an interim period during which this magnificent score will be cut and revised and diddled with, and in which the composer's own ideas may sometimes be overlooked in the rush to outfit him in contemporary clothes.

Eventually, if we outlive all this, we may come to value "Poppea" for its own moral and psychological subtleties and to cherish its sinfully potent score for the masterpiece it is. Perhaps then the Metropolitan Opera, which has never staged a Monteverdi work in its history, would even be tempted to take a chance. Or is that the dreamer in us?

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

AUG 14 1972 New England Newsclip

Music Theatre Project Does Fine Production of 'Coronation of Poppea'

Bos Symphony

By RICHARD CONWAY

Three hundred and thirty years after its first performance, Claudio Monteverdi's "The Coronation of Poppea" remains a remarkable operatic masterpiece. In a new production staged by the Music Theatre Project in the West Barn at Tanglewood, director Ian Strasfogel has put together a strong cast that does a fine job portraying the characters involved in the corrupt court of Nero.

While the production is quite good, although rather slow moving at times, due largely, I think, to the nature of the work itself, dealing more with character delineation than with action, it is the music itself that is astounding.

Written when Monteverdi was in his seventies, and having its first performance when opera was less than fifty years old, the modern listener has to be struck by the far-reaching innovations the aged master brought to this apex of his musical career.

The opera deals with real historical personages in a real setting. This was unheard of in Monteverdi's day, opera then dealing mostly with mythological gods and goddesses. Further, the Venetian genius portrays each of the characters in music with striking psychological insight. There is even a use of the leit-motif technique that Wagner, 200 years later, would carry to its ultimate development.

Monteverdi's harmonic language was daring in its own day, and amazes the listener ever now. True, much of the score is filled with the stylistic conventions of the day, and sounds stiff and stilted. But much of it is astonishingly fresh and powerfully moving. The music for the love scenes is quite sensuous.

Perhaps the most jarring note in the Theatre Project production is that the opera is sung in English. This is fine for one's understanding of what is going on, but, as with many English translations of foreign language works, the words put in the characters' mouths are frequently just plain silly, and certainly not realisitic.

There are some very fine performances. William Neill is outstanding as the demi-god Nero. His ringing tenor voice is complimented by a good acting sense.

Ariel Bybee is a visually and vocally stimulating Poppea, the ambitious prostitute. Joyce Castle has a couple of strong scenes as Octavia, fighting to remain as Rome's Empress.

Willard White's rich basso is impressive in his portrayal of the ill-fated philosopher Seneca. Timothy Nolen, who was outstanding as Chocorua, in the recent premiere of the chamber opera of that name, continues to impress in his role of Ottone. Barbara Hocher is appealing as Drusilla, who is in love with Ottone.

Conductor Bruno Maderna controls his youthful orchestra with a firm hand and gets some excellent results.

The production will be repeated tonight and Wednesday night at 8:30.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

AUG 15 1972 New England Newsclip

Opera: 'Poppea' at Lenox

Maderna Conducts Monteverdi Work Presented in a Futuristic Mode

Bos Sym

By DONAL HENAHAN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 14—It was a potentially brilliant idea to move Monteverdi's 330-year-old opera, "The Coronation of Poppea," into the indefinite but definitely scary future, as Ian Strasfogel's Music Theatre Project did last night at Tangelwood's West Barn.

The people and the problems brought to life so vividly by Monteverdi have reproduced themselves with depressing regularity since Nero's day. And Mr. Strasfogel obviously wanted to indicate that the world will have to contend with tyranny, brutal power politics, rapacity, greed, degeneracy and such like for some time to come.

•

The production, styled along the lines of the film "A Clockwork Orange," dressed its singers in a similar futuristic mode. The score itself was trimmed and pared so that only the realistic, historical elements remained. Gone was the Prologue, for instance, with its allegorical demigods.

In fact, about half the opera's characters are eliminated in this version in the interests of tightening the music and the plot. The set consisted chiefly of a kind of wraparound plastic shower curtain on which the androgynous face of Nero was repeated, á la Andy Warhol's painting of Marilwn Monroe. At stage center was a round, tilted wafer that served as Poppea's busy bed of love. Though plainly economical in execution, the ideas were basically good ones.

Still, one grew increasingly unhappy with this "Poppea" as the performance went along. The lusty wrestling was clumsy, which increased one's repugnance for the characters, as the director no doubt intended. But the heavy cutting of the score (the production was based on Alan Curtis's edition, shortened by about half) gave a choppy feeling to the dramatic line.

Bruno Maderna, who conducted the student orchestra, achieved good results with a 24-member ensemble of modern instruments that also included two harpsichords, organ and guitar to suggest the mixed sound palette of Monteverdi's time. Virtually eliminated were the peculiar trills on one note (the goat trills, they are sometimes called) that figure so importantly in most Monteverdi performances.

But it would be beside the point to belabor scholarly peculiarities in this production. Mr. Strasfogel wanted to throw into stark relief the dramatic aspects of "Poppea" that seemed to him both timeless and definitely of our time. To some extent, he succeeds, but to give the opera a sharply contemporary point, more rewriting of the libretto would be required. And then, at what point do you no longer have "Poppea" but another work? The English version used scored few points either for relevance or for Monteverdi, being particularly bad in the grand set pieces such as "Addio Roma" and "Pur ti muro."

•

The first performance labored somewhat owing to lack of proper rehearsal and difficulties with orchestral parts that failed to arrive in time (Mr. Maderna cooked up his own substitutes). However, Ariel Bybee made a persuasive Poppea, both vocally (in spite of rumors of illness) and physically (in spite of the ludicrous positions the staging forced her into on that hard, steeply canted bed).

William Neill's Nero had the physical bulk and proper sexual ambiguity, if not enough vocal flexibility. Timothy Nolen (Ottone) stood out clearly in all respects, and Lenus Carlson, Barbara Hocher and Douglas Ahlstedt also did capably. Many of the others were either immature vocally or simply miscast.

NEWSWEEK
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 1,935,000

AUG 28 1972

A Clockwork 'Poppea'

Its ingredients are adultery and assassination, suicide and seduction, horror and homosexuality. Its theme, the triumph of immorality. Yet ever since it was revived ten years ago at Britain's Glyndebourne Festival, most productions of Claudio Monteverdi's 330-year-old operatic masterpiece, "The Coronation of Poppea," have sacrificed seaminess for vocal splendor, perversions for pomp. Not so the production of the Music Theatre Project at the Tanglewood summer festival. In the drafty West Barn of the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass., last week, audiences were treated to a version that not only reaffirmed Monteverdi as the father of modern opera, but set out to prove him the father of futurist opera as well.

Using an English-language libretto and a ruthlessly stripped-down score, the Project's youthful performers tackled the tale of Nero's nefarious rule with the vehemence of Stanley Kubrick's droogs in "A Clockwork Orange." Imperial Rome was turned into a no-time environment lighted by Art Deco chandeliers and enclosed by a wraparound clear plastic curtain embossed with a Warhol-like repetition of Nero's androgynous face.

Clemens Kalischer

Bybee and Neill: Seduction, assassination, horror

The seat of power was a circular, metallic bed with a shaggy throw rug out of "Beyond the Valley of the Dolls" on which Poppea, the skimpily clad courtesan, writhed her way into Nero's heart and the empress's throne. The Roman guards looked like a skinhead trio of sadistic fetishists in skin-tight black jerseys and leather boots. Seneca, Nero's ill-fated mentor came on like a Greenwich Village guru in loose-fitting white shirt and sandals.

Lovingly: Often, the hijinks threatened to become High Camp—as when Nero and his poet friend Lucan wallowed lovingly on the shag rug during their second-act duet. Often they were annoyingly redundant—for few composers of any period have ever equaled Monteverdi's genius at using passionate melodic line to express his characters' psychological ups and downs. But under the supervision of conductor Bruno Maderna and his assistant Bruce Hangen, the 24 young members of the student orchestra crisply played Alan Curtis's "reconstruction" of the original music. And at least a few of the singers managed the demanding histrionics and recitatives and arias with superb dramatic effect—especially William Neill, who made the epicene, bisexual Nero genuinely frightening, and Ariel Bybee, whose Poppea was equally persuasive in both her sexual and vocal agility.

"If 'The Magic Flute' was the touchstone for the preceding generation of opera directors," says Ian Strasfogel, the head of Tanglewood's Music Theatre Project, "'Poppea,' I think, will become the touchstone for my generation of directors." Strasfogel, the 32-year-old son of Metropolitan Opera conductor Ignace Strasfogel, has just been named general director of the Opera Society of Washington. He explains his approach to the production as a combination of necessity and personal expression. "'Poppea' is like the 'Lear' or 'Hamlet' of operas," he says. "To express all its levels you'd have to do each scene six times. Perhaps this production is too angry in its politics, too aggressive in its sex, but I'd been doing gentle, lyrical things up to now, and I wanted to expand the other side of my work. Besides, I feel very strongly about imperial politics—of any age."

An ardent champion of "truly modern" opera, Strasfogel plans another production of "Poppea" for Washington next April, to be directed by the New York City Opera's Frank Corsaro. "I want to come back to it again and again," he says. "There is no definitive way to do 'Poppea,' there can only be versions, attempts. Everything we did here is in the score, is in the histories of the period by Suetonius and Tacitus. No 'updating' is necessary with Monteverdi [who wrote "Poppea" in 1642 at the age of 75], because he's a genuine contemporary." If it achieved nothing else, Strasfogel's audacious, appealingly vigorous first attempt at "Poppea" proved exactly that.

—CHARLES MICHENER

Poppea of the Space Age

The Music Theatre Project at Tanglewood performed Monteverdi's "The Coronation of Poppea" two weeks ago in a production that showed how far that group has progressed in two summers but also revealed certain administrative obstacles it must overcome if it is to grow and flourish.

The version used was basically that of Alan Curtis, expanded instrumentally from a chamber-music accompaniment into an orchestra of two dozen by Bruno Maderna, who also conducted. However, Mr. Maderna and Ian Strasfogel, director of the MTP and of this production, cut the opera by at least one-third, omitted the prologue in which Cupid somewhat humiliates the goddess of virtue with his story of crime and lust triumphant, eliminated some subplot material that ironically counterpoises the main plot in the original version, and emphasized the political as well as sexual aspect of the opera, partly by setting it in a 1984 world of science-fiction costumes, bed-sized mirrors, and Saran-wrap walls.

This futuristic approach was handled by Mr. Strasfogel and his designers—Douglas W. Schmidt for scenery, Jeanne Button for costumes, and Joseph Pacitti for lighting—with such apparent confidence and resourcefulness that the drama in this opera took on a good deal of contemporary power. Two or three of the most erotic love scenes in operatic history, those between Nero and Poppea, were lighted in hot colors of red and orange against the otherwise white stage background, and the lovers' costumes, while not particularly daring, were used to remarkable effect. The English translation, by Geoffrey Dunn, gave a clear idea of Francesco Busenello's libretto and preserved what to modern ears seems such an idiosyncratic sense of prosody on Monteverdi's part, consisting as it does of so many elisions of weak syllables at the ends of lines.

The cast for the August 13 opening night was on the whole adequate musically and more than that dramatically. William Neill, as Nero, is a big tenor with an imposing presence that might remind you of a younger Richard Cassilly. His voice and actions gave full scope to the anti-hero's gigantic ego and destructive mind. Nothing in his performance was thrown away, and the singing was wholly committed and convincing. Ariel Bybee, singing through a cold that had come close to postponing the show, came through well enough and was visually spectacular. Timothy Nolen's Ottone, Barbara Hocher's Drusilla (another obvious cold), Willard White's Seneca, Jan Curtis's not inappropriately music-hall Arnalta, and Lenus Carlson's stage-dominating Liberto were also responsible for much of the theatrical and musical strength of the production, but the principal hero, aside from Monteverdi himself, was Mr. Maderna, who conducted so sensitively all evening long, especially in that overpoweringly beautiful love duet that ends the opera.

But I mentioned administrative obstacles. This production of one of the recognized masterpieces of music had attracted enough advance attention to sell it out completely before rehearsals had run half their course, yet instead of letting it have the physical adequacy of the Theatre-Concert Hall, Tanglewood's powers-that-be kept it in the cramped West Barn, knocking out the possibility of brass instruments and full chorus for the coronation scene. So the audience was treated to a pre-taped coronation, prophesied by an extra duplicating prelude over the speakers. If this kind of step-child treatment of non-Boston-Symphony activity is going to prevail at Tanglewood in future summers, can a renewal of safe-repertory doldrums be far behind?

The last two evenings, August 9 and 10, of the Fromm-Berkshire Music Center contemporary-music festival at Tanglewood were far from climactic, considering the excitement of a couple of the preceding concerts, yet no one could reasonably charge a waste of time. The marvelous BMC Orchestra, which seems dedicated to erasing the line between the student and the professional, devoted the final night to Webern's Variations for Orchestra and Jacob Druckman's Pulitzer-Prize score of this year, "Windows," each played twice. The scheduled first performance of Alfred Lerdahl's "Chromorhythmos" had to be scratched because the BMC rehearsal schedule did not have room for satisfactory preparation, a circumstance not new in today's or yesterday's financially restricted musical world (remember what happened to Stefan Wolpe's Symphony at the New York Philharmonic eight years ago?) but still a situation that in all conscience must be corrected in the near future.

Mr. Maderna conducted both performances of "Windows," in which bits of "musical memory" in close imitation of Ravel, Richard Strauss, and others peep through occasional partings of a thick, swooshing Penderecklan curtain of sonority. Its acoustical skill is obvious right off, but there also seems to be a good deal of musical creativity behind it as well, and both performances of the score were dazzling.

Mr. Maderna took charge of the Webern the first time around, and one of the BMC student conductors, Bruce Hangen, from Rochester, New York, took over for the reprise. The orchestra seemed a bit off form for Mr. Maderna and in at least one place an entrance was jumped at too soon, but they gave him a reading that emphasized Webern's demands for a special shimmering lyricism. On the other hand, Mr. Hangen went after a more rhythmically incisive version, and the orchestra gave it to him with polish and clarity.

On the preceding night, chamber music held forth. Andrew Imbrie's violin-clarinet-piano trio, "To a Traveler," showed an affecting sense of lyricism in its beginning and end, but its middle section seemed dry and mechanical. Carolyn Weber was too bland and inexpressive in her singing of Webern's Four Songs, Opus 13, but Joan Heller made many emotional and musical points with Earl Kim's "rattlin' on . . . ," based on passages in English from Samuel Beckett's "The Unnamable." Donald Erb's Three Pieces for Brass Quintet and Piano deals for a good part of the time with playing through mouthpieces by themselves and playing directly on the piano strings, but not nearly so excitingly as with much earlier and later music by other composers, and Bruce Mather's "Madrigal II" builds some potent night music without making very comprehensible the French poetry that is its text. Charles Darden conducted the Erb piece excitingly, and Mr. Hangen presided over the fine musicians involved in Mr. Mather's piece.

—Leighton Kerner

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

AUG 14 1972 New England Newsclip

Music Theatre Project Does Fine Production of 'Coronation of Poppea'

By RICHARD CONWAY

Three hundred and thirty years after its first performance, Claudio Monteverdi's "The Coronation of Poppea" remains a remarkable operatic masterpiece. In a new production staged by the Music Theatre Project in the West Barn at Tanglewood, director Ian Strasfogel has put together a strong cast that does a fine job portraying the characters involved in the corrupt court of Nero.

While the production is quite good, although rather slow moving at times, due largely, I think, to the nature of the work itself, dealing more with character delineation than with action, it is the music itself that is astounding.

Written when Monteverdi was in his seventies, and having its first performance when opera was less than fifty years old, the modern listener has to be struck by the far-reaching innovations the aged master brought to this apex of his musical career.

The opera deals with real historical personages in a real setting. This was unheard of in Monteverdi's day, opera then dealing mostly with mythological gods and goddesses. Further, the Venetian genius portrays each of the characters in music with striking psychological insight. There is even a use of the leit-motif technique that Wagner, 200 years later, would carry to its ultimate development.

Monteverdi's harmonic language was daring in its own day, and amazes the listener ever now. True, much of the score is filled with the stylistic conventions of the day, and sounds stiff and stilted. But much of it is astonishingly fresh and powerfully moving. The music for the love scenes is quite sensuous.

Perhaps the most jarring note in the Theatre Project production is that the opera is sung in English. This is fine for one's understanding of what is going on, but, as with many English translations of foreign language works, the words put in the characters' mouths are frequently just plain silly, and certainly not realisitic.

There are some very fine performances. William Neill is outstanding as the demi-god Nero. His ringing tenor voice is complimented by a good acting sense.

Ariel Bybee is a visually and vocally stimulating Poppea, the ambitious prostitute. Joyce Castle has a couple of strong scenes as Octavia, fighting to remain as Rome's Empress.

Willard White's rich basso is impressive in his portrayal of the ill-fated philosopher Seneca. Timothy Nolen, who was outstanding as Chocorua, in the recent premiere of the chamber opera of that name, continues to impress in his role of Ottone. Barbara Hocher is appealing as Drusilla, who is in love with Ottone.

Conductor Bruno Maderna controls his youthful orchestra with a firm hand and gets some excellent results.

The production will be repeated tonight and Wednesday night at 8:30.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

AUG 15 1972 New England Newsclip

Opera: 'Poppea' at Lenox

Maderna Conducts Monteverdi Work Presented in a Futuristic Mode

By DONAL HENAHAN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 14—It was a potentially brilliant idea to move Monteverdi's 330-year-old opera, "The Coronation of Poppea," into the indefinite but definitely scary future, as Ian Strasfogel's Music Theatre Project did last night at Tangelwood's West Barn.

The people and the problems brought to life so vividly by Monteverdi have reproduced themselves with depressing regularity since Nero's day. And Mr. Strasfogel obviously wanted to indicate that the world will have to contend with tyranny, brutal power politics, rapacity, greed, degeneracy and such like for some time to come.

•

The production, styled along the lines of the film "A Clockwork Orange," dressed its singers in a similar futuristic mode. The score itself was trimmed and pared so that only the realistic, historical elements remained. Gone was the Prologue, for instance, with its allegorical demigods.

In fact, about half the opera's characters are eliminated in this version in the interests of tightening the music and the plot. The set consisted chiefly of a kind of wraparound plastic shower curtain on which the androgynous face of Nero was repeated, á la Andy Warhol's painting of Mariiwn Monroe. At stage center was a round, tilted wafer that served as Poppea's busy bed of love. Though plainly economical in execution, the ideas were basically good ones.

Still, one grew increasingly unhappy with this "Poppea" as the performance went along. The lusty wrestling was clumsy, which increased one's repugnance for the characters, as the director no doubt intended. But the heavy cutting of the score (the production was based on Alan Curtis's edition, shortened by about half) gave a choppy feeling to the dramatic line.

Bruno Maderna, who conducted the student orchestra, achieved good results with a 24-member ensemble of modern instruments that also included two harpsichords, organ and guitar to suggest the mixed sound palette of Monteverdi's time. Virtually eliminated were the peculiar trills on one note (the goat trills, they are sometimes called) that figure so importantly in most Monteverdi performances.

But it would be beside the point to belabor scholarly peculiarities in this production. Mr. Strasfogel wanted to throw into stark relief the dramatic aspects of "Poppea" that seemed to him both timeless and definitely of our time. To some extent, he succeeds, but to give the opera a sharply contemporary point, more rewriting of the libretto would be required. And then, at what point do you no longer have "Poppea" but another work? The English version used scored few points either for relevance or for Monteverdi, being particularly bad in the grand set pieces such as "Addio Roma" and "Pur ti muro."

•

The first performance labored somewhat owing to lack of proper rehearsal and difficulties with orchestral parts that failed to arrive in time (Mr. Maderna cooked up his own substitutes). However, Ariel Bybee made a persuasive Poppea, both vocally (in spite of rumors of illness) and physically (in spite of the ludicrous positions the staging forced her into on that hard, steeply canted bed).

William Neill's Nero had the physical bulk and proper sexual ambiguity, if not enough vocal flexibility. Timothy Nolen (Ottone) stood out clearly in all respects, and Lenus Carlson, Barbara Hocher and Douglas Ahlstedt also did capably. Many of the others were either immature vocally or simply miscast.

NEWSWEEK
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 1,935,000

AUG 28 1972

A Clockwork 'Poppea'

Its ingredients are adultery and assassination, suicide and seduction, horror and homosexuality. Its theme, the triumph of immorality. Yet ever since it was revived ten years ago at Britain's Glyndebourne Festival, most productions of Claudio Monteverdi's 330-year-old operatic masterpiece, "The Coronation of Poppea," have sacrificed seaminess for vocal splendor, perversions for pomp. Not so the production of the Music Theatre Project at the Tanglewood summer festival. In the drafty West Barn of the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass., last week, audiences were treated to a version that not only reaffirmed Monteverdi as the father of modern opera, but set out to prove him the father of futurist opera as well.

Using an English-language libretto and a ruthlessly stripped-down score, the Project's youthful performers tackled the tale of Nero's nefarious rule with the vehemence of Stanley Kubrick's droogs in "A Clockwork Orange." Imperial Rome was turned into a no-time environment lighted by Art Deco chandeliers and enclosed by a wraparound clear plastic curtain embossed with a Warhol-like repetition of Nero's androgynous face.

Clemens Kalischer

Bybee and Neill: Seduction, assassination, horror

The seat of power was a circular, metallic bed with a shaggy throw rug out of "Beyond the Valley of the Dolls" on which Poppea, the skimpily clad courtesan, writhed her way into Nero's heart and the empress's throne. The Roman guards looked like a skinhead trio of sadistic fetishists in skin-tight black jerseys and leather boots. Seneca, Nero's ill-fated mentor came on like a Greenwich Village guru in loose-fitting white shirt and sandals.

Lovingly: Often, the hijinks threatened to become High Camp—as when Nero and his poet friend Lucan wallowed lovingly on the shag rug during their second-act duet. Often they were annoyingly redundant—for few composers of any period have ever equaled Monteverdi's genius at using passionate melodic line to express his characters' psychological ups and downs. But under the supervision of conductor Bruno Maderna and his assistant Bruce Hangen, the 24 young members of the student orchestra crisply played Alan Curtis's "reconstruction" of the original music. And at least a few of the singers managed the demanding histrionics and recitatives and arias with superb dramatic effect—especially William Neill, who made the epicene, bisexual Nero genuinely frightening, and Ariel Bybee, whose Poppea was equally persuasive in both her sexual and vocal agility.

"If 'The Magic Flute' was the touchstone for the preceding generation of opera directors," says Ian Strasfogel, the head of Tanglewood's Music Theatre Project, "'Poppea,' I think, will become the touchstone for my generation of directors." Strasfogel, the 32-year-old son of Metropolitan Opera conductor Ignace Strasfogel, has just been named general director of the Opera Society of Washington. He explains his approach to the production as a combination of necessity and personal expression. "'Poppea' is like the 'Lear' or 'Hamlet' of operas," he says. "To express all its levels you'd have to do each scene six times. Perhaps this production is too angry in its politics, too aggressive in its sex, but I'd been doing gentle, lyrical things up to now, and I wanted to expand the other side of my work. Besides, I feel very strongly about imperial politics—of any age."

An ardent champion of "truly modern" opera, Strasfogel plans another production of "Poppea" for Washington next April, to be directed by the New York City Opera's Frank Corsaro. "I want to come back to it again and again," he says. "There is no definitive way to do 'Poppea,' there can only be versions, attempts. Everything we did here is in the score, is in the histories of the period by Suetonius and Tacitus. No 'updating' is necessary with Monteverdi [who wrote "Poppea" in 1642 at the age of 75], because he's a genuine contemporary." If it achieved nothing else, Strasfogel's audacious, appealingly vigorous first attempt at "Poppea" proved exactly that.

—CHARLES MICHENER

Poppea of the Space Age

The Music Theatre Project at Tanglewood performed Monteverdi's "The Coronation of Poppea" two weeks ago in a production that showed how far that group has progressed in two summers but also revealed certain administrative obstacles it must overcome if it is to grow and flourish.

The version used was basically that of Alan Curtis, expanded instrumentally from a chamber-music accompaniment into an orchestra of two dozen by Bruno Maderna, who also conducted. However, Mr. Maderna and Ian Strasfogel, director of the MTP and of this production, cut the opera by at least one-third, omitted the prologue in which Cupid somewhat humiliates the goddess of virtue with his story of crime and lust triumphant, eliminated some subplot material that ironically counterpoises the main plot in the original version, and emphasized the political as well as sexual aspect of the opera, partly by setting it in a 1984 world of science-fiction costumes, bed-sized mirrors, and Saran-wrap walls.

This futuristic approach was handled by Mr. Strasfogel and his designers—Douglas W. Schmidt for scenery, Jeanne Button for costumes, and Joseph Pacitti for lighting—with such apparent confidence and resourcefulness that the drama in this opera took on a good deal of contemporary power. Two or three of the most erotic love scenes in operatic history, those between Nero and Poppea, were lighted in hot colors of red and orange against the otherwise white stage background, and the lovers' costumes, while not particularly daring, were used to remarkable effect. The English translation, by Geoffrey Dunn, gave a clear idea of Francesco Busenello's libretto and preserved what to modern ears seems such an idiosyncratic sense of prosody on Monteverdi's part, consisting as it does of so many elisions of weak syllables at the ends of lines.

The cast for the August 13 opening night was on the whole adequate musically and more than that dramatically. William Neill, as Nero, is a big tenor with an imposing presence that might remind you of a younger Richard Cassilly. His voice and actions gave full scope to the anti-hero's gigantic ego and destructive mind. Nothing in his performance was thrown away, and the singing was wholly committed and convincing. Ariel Bybee, singing through a cold that had come close to postponing the show, came through well enough and was visually spectacular. Timothy Nolen's Ottone, Barbara Hocher's Drusilla (another obvious cold), Willard White's Seneca, Jan Curtis's not inappropriately music-hall Arnalta, and Lenus Carlson's stage-dominating Liberto were also responsible for much of the theatrical and musical strength of the production, but the principal hero, aside from Monteverdi himself, was Mr. Maderna, who conducted so sensitively all evening long, especially in that overpoweringly beautiful love duet that ends the opera.

But I mentioned administrative obstacles. This production of one of the recognized masterpieces of music had attracted enough advance attention to sell it out completely before rehearsals had run half their course, yet instead of letting it have the physical adequacy of the Theatre-Concert Hall, Tanglewood's powers-that-be kept it in the cramped West Barn, knocking out the possibility of brass instruments and full chorus for the coronation scene. So the audience was treated to a pre-taped coronation, prophesied by an extra duplicating prelude over the speakers. If this kind of step-child treatment of non-Boston-Symphony activity is going to prevail at Tanglewood in future summers, can a renewal of safe-repertory doldrums be far behind?

The last two evenings, August 9 and 10, of the Fromm-Berkshire Music Center contemporary-music festival at Tanglewood were far from climactic, considering the excitement of a couple of the preceding concerts, yet no one could reasonably charge a waste of time. The marvelous BMC Orchestra, which seems dedicated to erasing the line between the student and the professional, devoted the final night to Webern's Variations for Orchestra and Jacob Druckman's Pulitzer-Prize score of this year, "Windows," each played twice. The scheduled first performance of Alfred Lerdahl's "Chromorhythmos" had to be scratched because the BMC rehearsal schedule did not have room for satisfactory preparation, a circumstance not new in today's or yesterday's financially restricted musical world (remember what happened to Stefan Wolpe's Symphony at the New York Philharmonic eight years ago?) but still a situation that in all conscience must be corrected in the near future.

Mr. Maderna conducted both performances of "Windows," in which bits of "musical memory" in close imitation of Ravel, Richard Strauss, and others peep through occasional partings of a thick, swooshing Pendereckian curtain of sonority. Its acoustical skill is obvious right off, but there also seems to be a good deal of musical creativity behind it as well, and both performances of the score were dazzling.

Mr. Maderna took charge of the Webern the first time around, and one of the BMC student conductors, Bruce Hangen, from Rochester, New York, took over for the reprise. The orchestra seemed a bit off form for Mr. Maderna and in at least one place an entrance was jumped at too soon, but they gave him a reading that emphasized Webern's demands for a special shimmering lyricism. On the other hand, Mr. Hangen went after a more rhythmically incisive version, and the orchestra gave it to him with polish and clarity.

On the preceding night, chamber music held forth. Andrew Imbrie's violin-clarinet-piano trio, "To a Traveler," showed an affecting sense of lyricism in its beginning and end, but its middle section seemed dry and mechanical. Carolyn Weber was too bland and inexpressive in her singing of Webern's Four Songs, Opus 13, but Joan Heller made many emotional and musical points with Earl Kim's "rattlin' on . . . ," based on passages in English from Samuel Beckett's "The Unnamable." Donald Erb's Three Pieces for Brass Quintet and Piano deals for a good part of the time with playing through mouthpieces by themselves and playing directly on the piano strings, but not nearly so excitingly as with much earlier and later music by other composers, and Bruce Mather's "Madrigal II" builds some potent night music without making very comprehensible the French poetry that is its text. Charles Darden conducted the Erb piece excitingly, and Mr. Hangen presided over the fine musicians involved in Mr. Mather's piece.

—Leighton Kerner

BLANK PAGE

All photos by Whitestone Photo

Music Shed at Tanglewood—more catholicity of taste and more young people

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514
SEP 12 1972
New England Newsclip

Taking Tanglewood out of the woods

With bolder and more innovative programming, the Boston Symphony's 35th Berkshire Festival last month chalked up an 18 percent increase in attendance over 1971. Armed with better ecological manners (there was a marked decrease in litter) and a substantial musical curiosity, this year's audiences were obviously delighted to see some of the festival's traditional cobwebs brushed away.

By Louis Snyder
Christian Science Monitor News Service

Associate conductor Thomas and soprano Curtin

Conductor Colin Davis
. . . renewing his love feast with 26,730

Lenox, Mass.

OVER THE VAST GREEN EXPANSE of Tanglewood, the morning after the final Berkshire Festival concert doesn't seem to differ much from year to year. Gone are the warming-up sounds of a blossoming student oboist from the direction of Music Center headquarters; no longer faced with large, expectant crowds to please, the groundskeepers who are usually cutting grass and raking paths are out of sight, and bird families that nest in the rafters of the huge Music Shed finally have the place to themselves again.

Looking south through the pines, nothing obscures the serene, Glottesque landscape in which Lake Mahkeenac nestles — a view that admittedly often kept Nathaniel Hawthorne from writing when he spent more than a year within sight of it, here on the former Tappan estate in 1850-51.

On Aug. 21, 1972, the day after the Boston Symphony's 35th Berkshire Festival had ended, the Tanglewood scene, cool but drenched with sunshine, was predictably quiet. Yet only yesterday afternoon, 12,884 people had gathered here for Mahler's Eighth — the climax of a summer of almost unprecedented popularity.

Now the grounds were without as much as a discarded program or an empty picnic box to testify to even one concertgoer's presence. In fact Tanglewood's operations manager, James Kiley, is reported still amazed at the sudden ecological bent of this season's audiences: "Almost nothing to be picked up next day," he is quoted as saying.

An 'unbelieving squirrel'

But the return of good ecological manners wasn't the only distinguishing feature of the festival summer of '72, one recalled, as a lone squirred streaked unbelieving across the deserted lawn. For 24 scheduled BSO concerts, 8 open rehearsals, Tanglewood-on-Parade (an annual day of musicmaking), and Boston Pops at Tanglewood, more than 257,860 arrived to listen.

There were some, too, not included in this figure, who partook of recitals and concerts by Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center, others who crowded the West Barn for productions staged by the two-year-old Music Theater Project, and those who lent an ear to the five contemporary "festival-within-a-festival" concerts presented by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation, marking the latter's 20th anniversary.

The grand total attendance represented an 18.5 percent increase over 1971, and as one gazed at the empty, shadowy shed pondering why, the squirrel scampered back bearing an unidentifiable but substantial prize between his teeth.

New excitement in air

In retrospect, reawakened interest and burgeoning response came as no surprise. Almost from the beginning of this Tanglewood season, except for a few early rain-drenched concerts, a new spirit and excitement filled the Berkshire air. A Beethoven weekend, which reunited the whole orchestra for the summer, with retiring music director William Steinberg and director-elect Seiji Ozawa in charge, racked up a count of 26,903 listeners — the Saturday-evening audience for the Ninth Symphony being the largest (14,851) since 1963.

Leonard Bernstein's appearance in a Brahms program drew 13,374 devotees, either of the composer or the conductor or both; Eugene Ormandy, on two nights before opening his own Saratoga-Philadelphian festival, attracted more than 14,000 to hear him conduct the BSO; Colin Davis renewed his love-feast with the orchestra and 26,730 hearers in three concerts; and in single engagements, Aldo Ceccato, James Levine, Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, and Karel Ancerl, with noted soloists and tempting programs, made honorable showings.

It remained for BSO associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas to come forth with the two musical blockbusters of the summer — the premiere, in a BSO tribute to the Fromm Foundation, of Charles Wuorinen's Fromm-commissioned Concerto for Electrified Violin and Orchestra (with Paul Zukofsky as soloist), and the first repetition, in wider-open spaces than Boston's Symphony Hall, of Olivier Messiaen's "Et Expecto Resurrectionem Mortuorum," in which winds, brass, and particularly percussion anticipate the tonal terror and grandeur of Judgment Day.

Element of daring

Mr. Thomas, who has never given the impression of being a fearfully treading angel where challenging scores are concerned, rose mightily to both occasions, and in doing so contributed the element of daring on a large scale that finally brought Tanglewood programming out of the traditional woods.

Stories circulated at Tanglewood about the incompatibility of composer and some BSO musicians during rehearsals of the Wuorinen piece (age-old music history repeating itself), and indeed there were a few boos from the audience at the first performance.

So was it the music? The performances? The weather? The economy?

Thomas D. Perry Jr., the orchestra's manager since 1954, wryly admitted that he couldn't be sure. "Managers always know why things go wrong," he explained, "but when they go as well as they have this summer, we're nonplussed."

As might have been expected, Mr. Perry was not without his theories, however. Despite the tremendous cost of maintaining Tanglewood — the concert season is only eight weeks long — and the necessity for maintaining the musicians as though they were on tour ("after all, in Boston, they are at home, but here they must naturally receive per diem rates"), the festival represents a special challenge. To keep Tanglewood, like any finely attuned mechanism, in working order — a 707 aircraft was cited — it must be used often and to best advantage. Thus, for audiences' sake as well as its own, the BSO must not rely exclusively on repeats of its Boston programs (a general complaint several years back), but regard Tanglewood as a place where it can serve a new repertory and a new public.

For the past several years, Ozawa, as artistic director with Gunther Schuller at Tanglewood (Bernstein is its adviser), has been conscious of this need to appeal to audiences who are now coming armed with a substantial musical curiosity — not as a group of potluck listeners. Unusual works, ancient and modern, have crept into the regular festival programs, and for Tanglewood have been reserved a number of special ones, seldom undertaken because of their large musical demands, like the Berlioz "Damnation of Faust," Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, and this year's Eighth Symphony of Mahler.

The formation of a Tanglewood Festival Chorus, based in Boston, under John Oliver's direction, has also made such projects more feasible. And the obvious eagerness of listeners to hear these rarities live, under optimum conditions, is indicative of the catholicity of taste existent these days among record collectors.

Integral part restored

In forming the Music Theater Project two summers ago with Ian Strasfogel as its head, the Berkshire Music Center has restored an integral part of the festival scene to do what its name implies — present innovative staging of music drama, with the operatic cobwebs brushed away. In a small cleverly converted barn on the property, turn-away audiences have sought out short pieces by Harrison Birtwistle, Erik Satie, Ligeti, Offenbach, and this summer a tailor-made premiere — Robert Selig's "Chocorua" — along with the Brecht-Weill "Jasager" and Monteverdi's "Coronation of Poppea."

And during the Fromm events, Collage, an offshoot of the BSO itself, comprising six young orchestra members and three outside recruits, made a promising official debut in extraordinary performances of works in the contemporary idiom, which is their raison d'etre. Now if enough modern pieces can be found really worthy of their talents. . . .

"I sense a sea change in these audiences," Mr. Perry remarked. "It has been happening gradually, but it's very evident this summer. Many new people and more young ones are coming to the concerts — they really appreciate the sweep of Tanglewood and its very denial of the traditional concert-hall ritual. They come to absorb the beauty of the music and the place. And they obviously respect it from the way they treat it — plenty of applause when they're pleased, and almost no litter at all!"

So the shining statistics may spring from the "new audience," more favorable weather than usual, restored pride within the orchestra itself ("They're playing again with that 'we're-really-something' air," an old-timer noticed), fresh programming, the economy, or another coming of age for Tanglewood after some years of being taken for granted.

Whatever it is, Tanglewood in 1972 was full of the vitality and promise that must have prompted Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, the festival's tireless founder and advocate, to say in 1936: "There are all kinds of things that can be done musically. Let your imagination go as far as you like and you will not go too far."

The message, like Hawthorne's view, happily is still with us.

From maestro to maestro

Leonard Bernstein congratulates fellowship conductor Charles Darden at Tanglewood. Mr. Bernstein's one appearance during the Berkshire festival in an all-Brahms program drew 13,374 devotees — either of the composer or the conductor or both.

Seiji Ozawa
Music director-elect of BSO

168

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

AUG 22 1972

New England Newsclip

In Concert

Sounds from the Shed Silent Till Next Summer

By Peter M. Knapp

It's all over for the summer at Tanglewood, and the Berkshire community of Lenox and its surroundings can expect a rapid decrease in population.

The final notes of 1972 have sounded over the plushy lawns; the Boston Symphony Orchestra is on vacation (until the winter season opens Sept. 22), and the box office has counted up some cheering statistics — an attendance increase of 40,838 over last year's for all events at the Berkshire Festival, including 207,263 for the 24 Boston Symphony concerts in the shed. That's an astonishing average audience of more than 8,600.

Those final notes Sunday afternoon were hefty ones, the first performance by the orchestra of Gustav Mahler's massive choral Symphony No. 8 in E-flat, the so-called "Symphony of a Thousand." Seiji Ozawa, the next music director of the orchestra, conducted and 12,884 came to listen on a glowing afternoon appropriate for such a major event.

The Usual

It has been customary to end the Tanglewood season with a major undertaking, and Ozawa the last few years as co-artistic director has scheduled some big ones — the Berlioz Requiem and last year's "Damnation of Faust." So this year it was the Mahler, not the Austrian symphonist's last work but the last he was to premiere (in 1910) as a conductor and considered by him his greatest. "Imagine that the universe bursts into song," he exulted. "We hear no longer human voices, but those of planets and suns circling in their orbits."

To achieve this cosmic, if exaggerated, vision, Mahler deployed hundreds of singers and players — Sunday there were the combined voices of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Tanglewood Choir, St. Paul's School Boy Choir of Cambridge and eight soloists joining the orchestra.

The work is another example of Mahler's fondness for strange combinations — Part I of the symphony, nearly a half-hour long, is a setting of a medieval Latin hymn, "Veni, creator spiritus," celebrating God as the source of all love; Part II, nearly an hour's worth, is no less than the final scene of Goethe's "Faust," in German, describing the redemption of Faust's spirit.

And in truth, the ending of this symphony is a transcendental climax, one which Mahler begins collecting many pages beforehand gathering in the skeins of melody he has spun from the opening bars and culminating in the voice of the "Mater Gloriosa," a Straussian tenor solo with choral response, an instrumental passage that fades into shimmering lyricism, and finally, the climax, the radiant Chorus Mysticus, rounded off by separated brass choirs, one off-stage.

Ecstatic Moment

It is a moment of musical ecstasy which justifies Mahler's creative pride, and which was performed with stunning effect at Tanglewood. Fine as some of the other music is — notably the long, mysterious, scene-setting orchestral introduction to Part II, the "Jene Rosen" chorus of the Younger Angels, and the tenor solo for Dr. Marianus — nothing approaches this sublime climax, and yet so much of its effect is dependent on what has been heard previously. That being said, several of the vocal solos are ordinary, and a lot of the scene is a long procession of episodes, some not really relevant.

Ozawa seems to rise to the challenges of big works, and again in the Mahler he was a perceptive, steadying leader, guiding his forces through a performance of cumulative force and beauty. He was particularly effective in Part II, pacing the episodes well with their important linking passages, keeping the various choral groupings nicely controlled, and superbly building the orchestral introduction and especially the ending.

Part I seemed somewhat hectic, big and beefy enough with the kind of overwhelming sound that impresses by itself, but too fast for the choristers' comfort in its basic pacing and the linear counterpoint (and most of the words) often was lost in the tumult.

The soloists include Deborah O'Brien, Linda Phillips, Jane Bryden, Susan Clickner, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, William Dooley and Ara Berberian. Miss Phillips, Miss Bryden (placed on a catwalk above the stage in a neatly theatrical gesture as Mater Gloriosa, and fortunately having the soprano purity for the part), Alexander (the most ardent of the singers) and Dooley were the standouts in an octet not uniformly up to the challenges.

Saturday night, 9,652 came to hear Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas direct a program of Mozart's Symphony No. 31 in D, K. 297, the "Paris,"; Olivier Messiaen's "Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum"; and Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 in B-flat.

The 1964 Messiaen, heard for the first time at Tanglewood, provoked the most discussion, a few hisses, some laughs, and a good deal of applause — probably the usual reaction to an unusual composition at first hearing (Thomas and the BSO performed it in Symphony Hall in April as part of his "Spectrum" series). But like it or not, the audience did react.

Mystical

This is awesome, mystical music which speaks of expansive spaces and indeterminate time. In five sections, the work employs a stringless orchestra of woodwinds, brass and metallic percussion instruments, which may denote the Trinity — the work abounds with mystical and numerical symbolism. The composer notes, "Its instrumentation intends it for vast spaces: churches, cathedrals and even performances in the open air and on mountain heights . . ."

In the Tanglewood shed with its wide-open spaces, "Et exspecto . . . " had room for its spatial sonorities, whereas Symphony Hall seemed confining in the spring performance. (But the silences which are an important part of its spacing and effect, giving one the uneasy sense of isolation, were too often broken by audience rustling and coughing.)

One cannot adequately describe this music, which must be experienced to be meaningful. It is a piece of great diversity and scope, employing exotic bird calls, Asian rhythms, wide dynamic ranges. It is mystical and ritualistic to the point of repetition, and yet the points of monotony tend to reinforce the sense of timelessness.

It can be grim and mysterious, as in the brassy growls of the first section — "a cry from the abyss" — or sound like the celebration of a Hong Kong holiday with all the gong and tam tam work. There are two shattering tam tam rolls and dead silence at the extremes of its dynamic range, and the final section ("And I heard the voice of a great multitude") is one gradually climbing crescendo driven by a slow, relentless pulse. A work to be puzzled over . . . and on this occasion a performance that made one take notice.

Tanglewood . . . 'The final notes of 1972 have sounded over the plushy lawns' . . .

Earthbound

By comparison, the mighty Brahms concerto seemed earthbound and rarely reached the takeoff point. Generally, the performance lacked urgency and the unified sense of direction that makes events inexorable. While soloist Misha Dichter found few technical problems in this demanding score and played clearly, he seemed nervous and much of his tonal production sounded overly light and brittle instead of rich and sonorous.

In both the scherzo and the finale, Dichter sounded most at ease, and his light, graceful arabesques were most appropriate. But over-all one would have liked a meatier approach with a bigger line from both pianist and orchestra.

The Mozart symphony was spirited, deftly phrased, properly light-hearted but with some occasional loose ends in the largish ensemble. Thomas took the finale at a whirring pace, quite brilliant but challenging the string section.

It was dampish Friday evening on the Tanglewood grounds after an abrupt shower during the prelude, but Seiji Ozawa's program was anything but waterlogged. Alexis Weissenberg provided a glittering exhibition of sure-fingered pianism in Chopin's Concerto No. 1 in e minor, and there were the Tanglewood premiere of Gyorgy Ligeti's "Melodien" for orchestra, and an extroverted performance of Bela Bartok's Suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin."

Weissenberg was loudly applauded by the 5,392 in attendance for his assertive playing in the Chopin concerto — really a concerto for piano with orchestra rather than a partnership of the two forces. There was no pretense at anything else in this performance after the long orchestral introduction Ozawa managed to present in unusually poetic terms, avoiding the "clumpy" nature of the instrumental writing. Thereafter, the orchestra discreetly retired to form soft clouds of accompaniment to cushion the solo work.

Objective View

In the past, Weissenberg has sometimes given eccentric interpretations of standard concerti, but here the playing was objective and unsentimental. And technically it was very impressive piano playing indeed, with the most intricate passages cleanly fingered, more variety of touch and color in the Romanza and crackling rhythms in the Rondo.

Earlier in the evening, Weissenberg was the featured artist in the Weekend Prelude, performing the Mussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition" in another demonstration of his super-technique — all produced with minimum of motion and hands so close to the keyboard that one wonders how he produces such large sonorities. And he also joined with members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players in an elegant reading of Beethoven's Quintet in E-flat for piano and winds, Opus 16.

The Ligeti work was composed last year for the city of Nuremburg on the occasion of the 500th anniversary of the birth of Albrecht Duerer. For medium-sized orchestra, the piece again demonstrates the Hungarian composer's extraordinary ear for sound and textures, though in this case there is relatively greater stress on rhythm (and perhaps more actual motion) and on melodic motifs than in his previous works which sound suspended in an aural continuum.

Ligeti again has created a score of enormous complexity — he painstakingly stitches individual threads of sound and many changes in direction, density or intensity are initially imperceptible. Much of "Melodien" presents a serene sonic surface despite the hive of activity going on among the players; there are some episodes of evident agitation, and two major sections in which the melodic fragments respectively spiral downwards and ascend.

Explosive

"'The Miraculous Mandarin" was explosive in Ozawa's hot-blooded, choreographic presentation. "That sure sounds like Bartok," one listener remarked loudly as the players tuned up on snarls and whines after intermission. And indeed there is hardly another score like Bartok's ballet-pantomime about the power of sex with this music's lurid colors, insinuating, pulsating rhythms, and violent Van Gogh atmosphere.

The Boston Symphony has announced an important retirement after the Tanglewood season, that of Alfred Krips, assistant concert master since 1946, concertmaster of the Boston Pops, and a member of the orchestra since 1934. Krips will be succeeded by Jerome Rosen, who has been associate concertmaster of the Detroit Symphony and conductor of the Oak Park (Michigan) Symphony.

The orchestra has also announced the appointment of Charles Kavaloski, who joined the orchestra at the beginning of the Tanglewood season, as principal French hornist.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
AUG 21 1972
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood music festival reports its best season ever

By ANNE-GERARD FLYNN

The Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood this summer attracted the largest attendance in its 32-year history, setting an over-all record of 257,860 in eight weeks.

The record represents an 18.5 per cent increase over last year's 217,002. It exceeds the previous record of 257,419, set in 1970, by a scant 441 admissions, or less than two-tenths of 1 per cent.

Records at Tanglewood, which date back only to 1963, show the 1972 season as being the most popular of the past nine years. Eagle files concerning Tanglewood stretch back to 1934 and show the 257,860 attendance figure to be the highest in the history of the festival.

Heavy traffic

The figure includes the 24 Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, which drew a total of 207,263 persons; the eight BSO open rehearsals, 29,606; the Tanglewood - on - Parade festivities, 7,756, and the evening of the Boston Pops at Tanglewood, 13,235.

Traffic was jammed around Tanglewood yesterday afternoon as a crowd of 12,884 — largest of the season for a Sunday afternoon — came to hear conductor Seiji Ozawa conclude the season with Mahler's Symphony No. 8. The composer referred to this work as "The Symphony of a Thousand," and indeed there seemed that many performers assembled on stage — although the official count was 315. The audience at the conclusion gave Ozawa an enthusiastic ovation, and orchestra and singers joined in.

The over-all attendance for the weekend was 32,012. This was the second largest weekend of the summer, and it attracted 6,729 more than the final Tanglewood weekend of last year. The Friday night concert drew 5,392; the Saturday evening one, 9,682, and the Saturday open rehearsal, 4,054.

The weekend of July 14 had the highest attendance for the summer, with 41,337 present for all events. That weekend featured William Steinberg conducting Beethoven's Ninth Symphony before an audience of 14,851, the largest crowd for a single concert during the season. The second largest single crowd, 13,374, was present the following weekend of July 21 to hear Leonard Bernstein conduct an all Brahms program.

Ozawa credited

Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the BSO, attributed the record attendance in part to the "great series of programs" which were drawn up by Ozawa and which Perry said appealed to a variety of people. The manager also said he felt the BSO is receiving growing support from residents of Berkshire County.

The Berkshire Music Festival, originally organized by

Tanglewood
Continued on Page 1, 2nd Sec.

Whitestone

ORCHESTRA JOINS in ovation given conductor Seiji Ozawa at conclusion of yesterday's performance of Mahler's Eighth Symphony. The audience response, abetted by performers, was one of the season's loudest.

Tanglewood

Continued From Page 1

Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith of Glendale, dates back to 1934, when musicians, mainly from the New York Philharmonic, performed at the old Hanna Fram in Stockbridge. In 1936, concerts by the BSO under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky were given on an estate in Lenox which is now Foxhollow School. The following year, the concerts were given at Tanglewood, where the Shed was built in 1938 and the Berkshire Music Center school started in 1940. Dr. Charles Munch succeeded Koussevitzky in 1951, gradually extended the Tanglewood season, and worked for the inclusion of contemporary works on the program.

Alfred Krips, a member of the BSO since 1934, retired as assistant concertmaster as of yesterday's finale. Jerome Rosen has been named to succeed him. The appointment of Charles Kavaloski as principal horn was also announced.

Warren Fowler

CARS AND PEOPLE crowd parking lots and grounds of Tanglewood as the biggest Sunday crowd of season comes to Mahler's Eighth Symphony.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528
AUG 28 1972
New England Newsclip

Overtones

By RICHARD CONWAY

* * *

The 40,838 increase over their 1971 attendance at Tanglewood is quite a statistic. And to imagine that almost 13,000 people came to hear Mahler's "Eighth Symphony" the last Sunday.

Springfield Symphony Orchestra conductor Robert Gutter, who was among the crowd, shook his head a couple of times in amazement. He was delighted to see all those people listening to Mahler, of course, but he was still amazed. (So was I.)

* * *

The amazing part of the attendance figures is that the Boston Symphony Orchestra most certainly did not play down to its audience. That is, the music performed this summer was rather high - powered stuff. The BSO played many works for the first time this season.

* * *

At Tanglewood that Sunday, we also spoke with Mr. and Mrs. Morey Stearns and Mrs. Gloria Beaudreau of the Springfield Symphony Chorus. I understand that Mark Layne, the association's administrative director, was there also, but I did not see him.

* * *

In a summer season of many fine performances, I think the best was Haydn's "The Seasons." The chorus, which did fine work all along, although losing a little something toward the end, was simply superb that Sunday. I did not hear the performance of the Beethoven "Ninth Symphony," which I understand was tremendous, but it would have had to go some to top The Haydn.

* * *

Berkshire merchants are fuming over an article in one of the Boston papers calling the Tanglewood area a tourist trap, and rapping them for overpricing and poor service.

I can't say that I can really agree. The prices quoted in the article are not especially any higher than one might pay anywhere. And the place where I always eat, The Cork 'n' Hearth, just outside of Lee, has good food, service, and reasonable rates.

170

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638

SEP 5 1972

Music World's Masters Offer Area the Finest

By EDWARD FRENCH

After a busy summer of concert-going one thing is certain. No locality anywhere can offer a greater abundance of musical events than was offered within a 50-mile radious of the Albany-Schenectady-Troy area.

When there's a good season of offerings by major musicians, it is impossible to report "bests" of this or that. A listener can settle only for a spontaneous rising to the surface of what really stood out at the time, and what lasts in retrospect.

THE BERKSHIRE Festival at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony Orchestra had the longest run, from June 30 to Aug. 20. Seiji Ozawa, who becomes the music director of the Boston Orchestra in 1973, conducted six concerts. Of these the most striking was a beautifully paced and controlled rendition of Haydn's "The Creation" with the fine Tanglewood Chorus and Phyllis Curtin, Seth McCoy and Robert Hale as soloists.

This Tanglewood Chorus did outstanding work in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, William Steinberg conducting and Jeannine Crader, Joanna Simon, Dean Wilder and Robert Hale soloists. The soloists were good but the chorus was magnificent.

Outstanding solo performances included Claude Frank in the First Beethoven Piano Concerto, Alicia De Larroche in the Schumann Concerto and John Browning in the Prokofieff Piano Concert No. 3. These great artists were at their peak.

COLIN DAVIS who will be principal guest conductor for the coming winter season of the Boston Symphony gave a superlative reading of the Berlioz Te Deum.

"The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony Orchestra had the longest run. Seiji Ozawa, who becomes the music director of the Boston Orchestra in 1973, conducted six concerts."

The best orchestral playing of the Tanglewood season was in the two concerts Eugene Ormandy conducted. He received an ovation from the musicians, a rare tribute.

Other top performances were Leonard Bernstein's reading of the Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D, William Steinberg's mellow "Pastoral" Symphony by Beethoven and Karel Ancerl's Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 with its Czech thythms and melodies.

Modern composers represented included Messiaen, Ligeti, Ruggles, Wuorinen and Stravinsky.

"The best orchestral playing of the Tanglewood season was in the two concerts Eugene Ormandy conducted. He received an ovation from the musicians, a rare tribute."

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 23 1972

New England Newsclip

The sweet music at the box office

The Berkshire Music Festival has come back from its 1971 slump and has even slightly exceeded the all-time attendance record of 1970. This is good news for music lovers and also for those who profit in more material ways from the Boston Symphony Orchestra's presence. But why the sudden recovery?

The BSO has not issued any definitive explanation although Manager Thomas D. Perry Jr. did say that he believes the orchestra has been receiving more support from people who live in the Berkshires. He also cited the admirable series of programs drawn up for this year's concerts by Seiji Ozawa, the festival music director.

Undoubtedly these factors helped. So, doubtless, did the growing awareness of the ease of travel on new superhighways. But Tanglewood devotees may want to point to other factors perhaps equally important.

For one thing, there appeared to many observers to be more young people on hand. In part they were attracted, no doubt, by the more youthful flavor given the orchestra by such conductors as Michael Tilson Thomas, 27-year-old BSO associate conductor, and by the 37-year-old Ozawa himself.

But, more importantly, perhaps, there is a shift in the public mood. Rock may have lost some of its charm. The consumers of music in modern America, both young and old, find themselves subjected to a bewildering, sometimes unnerving variety of sounds. It takes an increasingly mature discernment to make any sense out of the tonal (and atonal) landscape. No wonder, then, that some listeners have been moving toward a higher level of consumership, no longer satisfied with the confections handed them by the popular promoters.

And then there may be a new verve shown by the orchestra itself, that mighty organization whose image has not always been free of stodginess and ponderosity. This change is symbolized most effectively by Ozawa, who has shown a capacity for injecting excitement into almost any piece of music that comes his way. The roar of applause that greeted the climax of Mahler's "Symphony of a Thousand" Sunday afternoon was a testimony to the electrical energy that animates this man, whom the wise old BSO has already chosen to become its chief musical leader in 1973.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

SEP 10 1972

Festivals Aiming to Please Reap Reward$

By RICHARD VINCENT
Music Critic

Our three biggest summer festivals are over and it is now the time to play the old numbers game.

Were the audiences bigger? Were the deficits smaller? Will the private and public monies be forthcoming next year?

THESE ARE basic factors in this game that must be played in every board room and executive suite wherein both the success and failures of the summer will be discussed, dissected and agonizingly analyzed.

It is unlikely that the general public has any conception of the time and money that is spent and public relations devices that are cunningly hatched, all for the purpose of enticing that great amorphous mass known as an audience into the playing area. It is apparent that the product cannot stand alone; regardless of its quality it must be sold and resold and sold again.

ONE CAN PICTURE the oak-panelled conference room awash with bright and beautiful people, brains humming at a high pitch, creative senses honed to a keen edge, their seductive ideas buttressed and proven by a clutch of computer print-outs in hand.

They are dedicated and articulate, not all motley and beads, or mutton chops and double knits. They are involved in a serious business, what they are hunting with the utmost dedication is you, the audience. Without you the game is over. No more festivals, no more considerations from the arts councils, no more benefits from the wealthy who, by nature, want nothing to do with losers.

THE REPORT this summer from both Saratoga and Tanglewood is that attendance was up, at Saratoga by 20 percent for both the New York City Ballet and the Philadelphia Orchestra. Rather than being only pleased and justified with their work, now the producers are plagued with the continuing question of why this was so.

Success brings as many and, in fact, the same questions as failure. Was it the programming? The weather? The economic condition? The beginning results of the effort towards education an audience? Improving public relations?

THE RUB is that no one, not the experts, the critics, nor the audience, can explain why exactly an audience in the aggregate goes to a concert.

The fact is that more of them did this summer, so someone is doing something right at Saratoga and Tanglewood. All should be well for another season and for this all the concert-goers in this area should be greatly pleased.

The third major Festival, the Lake George Opera Festival showed no increase in attendance and this fact suggests a possibility that cannot be ignored. Whereas the other two festivals continued on a well-traveled path in matters of programming, David Lloyd, general director of the Opera opted for what must be a considered a significant change.

WITH THE EXCEPTION of "Tosca," all of the productions this summer were by contemporary composers. Nothing else was changed. The orchestra was the same, the conductors able, the singers often outstanding, and the productions themselves professionally mounted as has been the case in the past.

But it is apparent that what opera going public there is around here was not particularly pleased and they showed it at the box office.

There are, of course, two apparently irreconcilable points of view here. The Box Office and the Music.

LLOYD, from the artistic point of view was not only absolutely correct in this programming, he showed considerable raw courage in going through with it. He is a professional in all matters, (including the dismal economics of operatic life) but he also believes that opera like any other art must be a continuing, creative act and instead of giving mere lip service to this undeniable concept, he implemented it.

The result was a season which was not an economic success, but was certainly an artistic success, which even the least sensible of us knows is not the same thing at all.

THE BATTLE for the public and private dollar being as fierce and unremitting as it is, tolerates no suggestion of if not failure, I only holding one's own. Growth at the box office is equated in the American mind with success even if the deficit is larger.

This is a fact of life, there is no advantage in flogging the point, what really matters is keeping this festival alive.

I DO NOT for a moment mean to imply that Lake George Opera is in any danger, it is not. But it is interesting to note that the season for next year will include not only another "Tosca," but a "Rigoletto," and "Carmen" to boot.

There is nothing wrong with that programming, they are all great works, firmly in any company's repertoire. It is almost certain, barring a sudden recession or other natural disasters, that Lake George will show a significant upturn at the box office. This might prove the importance of programming at least in terms of opera. Note the use of the subjunctive because then again, it might not. And here we go again.

But critically, socially and emotionally all of these major Festivals were a great success and I, for one don't know what we in the district would do without them.

170

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638

SEP 5 1972

Music World's Masters Offer Area the Finest

By EDWARD FRENCH

After a busy summer of concert-going one thing is certain. No locality anywhere can offer a greater abundance of musical events than was offered within a 50-mile radious of the Albany-Schenectady-Troy area.

When there's a good season of offerings by major musicians, it is impossible to report "bests" of this or that. A listener can settle only for a spontaneous rising to the surface of what really stood out at the time, and what lasts in retrospect.

THE BERKSHIRE Festival at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony Orchestra had the longest run, from June 30 to Aug. 20. Seiji Ozawa, who becomes the music director of the Boston Orchestra in 1973, conducted six concerts. Of these the most striking was a beautifully paced and controlled rendition of Haydn's "The Creation" with the fine Tanglewood Chorus and Phyllis Curtin, Seth McCoy and Robert Hale as soloists.

This Tanglewood Chorus did outstanding work in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, William Steinberg conducting and Jeannine Crader, Joanna Simon, Dean Wilder and Robert Hale soloists. The soloists were good but the chorus was magnificent.

Outstanding solo performances included Claude Frank in the First Beethoven Piano Concerto, Alicia De Larroche in the Schumann Concerto and John Browning in the Prokofieff Piano Concert No. 3. These great artists were at their peak.

COLIN DAVIS who will be principal guest conductor for the coming winter season of the Boston Symphony gave a superlative reading of the Berlioz Te Deum.

"The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony Orchestra had the longest run. Seiji Ozawa, who becomes the music director of the Boston Orchestra in 1973, conducted six concerts."

The best orchestral playing of the Tanglewood season was in the two concerts Eugene Ormandy conducted. He received an ovation from the musicians, a rare tribute.

Other top performances were Leonard Bernstein's reading of the Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D, William Steinberg's mellow "Pastoral" Symphony by Beethoven and Karel Ancerl's Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 with its Czech thythms and melodies.

Modern composers represented included Messiaen, Ligeti, Ruggles, Wuorinen and Stravinsky.

"The best orchestral playing of the Tanglewood season was in the two concerts Eugene Ormandy conducted. He received an ovation from the musicians, a rare tribute."

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 23 1972

New England Newsclip

The sweet music at the box office

The Berkshire Music Festival has come back from its 1971 slump and has even slightly exceeded the all-time attendance record of 1970. This is good news for music lovers and also for those who profit in more material ways from the Boston Symphony Orchestra's presence. But why the sudden recovery?

The BSO has not issued any definitive explanation although Manager Thomas D. Perry Jr. did say that he believes the orchestra has been receiving more support from people who live in the Berkshires. He also cited the admirable series of programs drawn up for this year's concerts by Seiji Ozawa, the festival music director.

Undoubtedly these factors helped. So, doubtless, did the growing awareness of the ease of travel on new superhighways. But Tanglewood devotees may want to point to other factors perhaps equally important.

For one thing, there appeared to many observers to be more young people on hand. In part they were attracted, no doubt, by the more youthful flavor given the orchestra by such conductors as Michael Tilson Thomas, 27-year-old BSO associate conductor, and by the 37-year-old Ozawa himself.

But, more importantly, perhaps, there is a shift in the public mood. Rock may have lost some of its charm. The consumers of music in modern America, both young and old, find themselves subjected to a bewildering, sometimes unnerving variety of sounds. It takes an increasingly mature discernment to make any sense out of the tonal (and atonal) landscape. No wonder, then, that some listeners have been moving toward a higher level of consumership, no longer satisfied with the confections handed them by the popular promoters.

And then there may be a new verve shown by the orchestra itself, that mighty organization whose image has not always been free of stodginess and ponderosity. This change is symbolized most effectively by Ozawa, who has shown a capacity for injecting excitement into almost any piece of music that comes his way. The roar of applause that greeted the climax of Mahler's "Symphony of a Thousand" Sunday afternoon was a testimony to the electrical energy that animates this man, whom the wise old BSO has already chosen to become its chief musical leader in 1973.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

SEP 10 1972

Festivals Aiming to Please Reap Reward$

By RICHARD VINCENT
Music Critic

Our three biggest summer festivals are over and it is now the time to play the old numbers game.

Were the audiences bigger? Were the deficits smaller? Will the private and public monies be forthcoming next year?

THESE ARE basic factors in this game that must be played in every board room and executive suite wherein both the success and failures of the summer will be discussed, dissected and agonizingly analyzed.

It is unlikely that the general public has any conception of the time and money that is spent and public relations devices that are cunningly hatched, all for the purpose of enticing that great amorphous mass known as an audience into the playing area. It is apparent that the product cannot stand alone; regardless of its quality it must be sold and resold and sold again.

ONE CAN PICTURE the oak-panelled conference room awash with bright and beautiful people, brains humming at a high pitch, creative senses honed to a keen edge, their seductive ideas buttressed and proven by a clutch of computer print-outs in hand.

They are dedicated and articulate, not all motley and beads, or mutton chops and double knits. They are involved in a serious business, what they are hunting with the utmost dedication is you, the audience. Without you the game is over. No more festivals, no more considerations from the arts councils, no more benefits from the wealthy who, by nature, want nothing to do with losers.

THE REPORT this summer from both Saratoga and Tanglewood is that attendance was up, at Saratoga by 20 percent for both the New York City Ballet and the Philadelphia Orchestra. Rather than being only pleased and justified with their work, now the producers are plagued with the continuing question of why this was so.

Success brings as many and, in fact, the same questions as failure. Was it the programming? The weather? The economic condition? The beginning results of the effort towards education an audience? Improving public relations?

THE RUB is that no one, not the experts, the critics, nor the audience, can explain why exactly an audience in the aggregate goes to a concert.

The fact is that more of them did this summer, so someone is doing something right at Saratoga and Tanglewood. All should be well for another season and for this all the concert-goers in this area should be greatly pleased.

The third major Festival, the Lake George Opera Festival showed no increase in attendance and this fact suggests a possibility that cannot be ignored. Whereas the other two festivals continued on a well-traveled path in matters of programming, David Lloyd, general director of the Opera opted for what must be a considered a significant change.

WITH THE EXCEPTION of "Tosca," all of the productions this summer were by contemporary composers. Nothing else was changed. The orchestra was the same, the conductors able, the singers often outstanding, and the productions themselves professionally mounted as has been the case in the past.

But it is apparent that what opera going public there is around here was not particularly pleased and they showed it at the box office.

There are, of course, two apparently irreconcilable points of view here. The Box Office and the Music.

LLOYD, from the artistic point of view was not only absolutely correct in this programming, he showed considerable raw courage in going through with it. He is a professional in all matters, (including the dismal economics of operatic life) but he also believes that opera like any other art must be a continuing, creative act and instead of giving mere lip service to this undeniable concept, he implemented it.

The result was a season which was not an economic success, but was certainly an artistic success, which even the least sensible of us knows is not the same thing at all.

THE BATTLE for the public and private dollar being as fierce and unremitting as it is, tolerates no suggestion of if not failure, I only holding one's own. Growth at the box office is equated in the American mind with success even if the deficit is larger.

This is a fact of life, there is no advantage in flogging the point, what really matters is keeping this festival alive.

I DO NOT for a moment mean to imply that Lake George Opera is in any danger, it is not. But it is interesting to note that the season for next year will include not only another "Tosca," but a "Rigoletto," and "Carmen" to boot.

There is nothing wrong with that programming, they are all great works, firmly in any company's repertoire. It is almost certain, barring a sudden recession or other natural disasters, that Lake George will show a significant upturn at the box office. This might prove the importance of programming at least in terms of opera. Note the use of the subjunctive because then again, it might not. And here we go again.

But critically, socially and emotionally all of these major Festivals were a great success and I, for one don't know what we in the district would do without them.

Tanglewood reflects Koussevitsky miracle

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
SEP 3 1972
New England Newsclip

By Jean Caldwell
Globe Correspondent

LENOX — "I remember meeting my uncle Koussevitzky when I was five years old." Olga Naumoff Koussevitzky looked over the waters of the Stockbridge Bowl, across the trees that hid the lawn of Tanglewood, past the Berkshire hills.

The question she had been asked was a brief one: What was Serge Koussevitzky's role in Tanglewood.

The answer to that short question took Olga Koussevitzky back a lifetime, across seven decades and an ocean.

She had been born to Russian aristocracy. A girl growing up in a house filled with music — as were all Russian homes, she remembers. Who could have guessed when her mother's sister first introduced her to her new uncle Koussevitzky that over the years she would become his secretary, then his second wife and then guardian of his dearest musical desire: to encourage and help young and promising musicians?

MRS. OLGA KOUSSEVITSKY

She was very young when her uncle chartered a steamer and for three summers carried the symphony orchestra down the Volga so that people along its banks "would know what an orchestra is and what it sounds like."

This was in 1910 when there were no radios, when recordings were scarce, and when only five cities in all the vastness of Russia had their own symphony orchestra.

Even then Koussevitzky was dreaming of what Tanglewood and the Berkshires were to become. "Before the First World War he envisioned — in connection with his Volga trips — a place which he liked to call 'a palace of the arts' where poets would recite poems — at that time we had some gifted young poets; where someone like Stanislavski would perform his magic; with music represented by a symphony orchestra, chamber ensemble, operas, choral works — all under the aegis of the musical festival. He had an architect make a design — but the war broke out and the plans were incomplete and never materialized."

As for her, the idyllic childhood days of the family gathered around the piano joining in song as grandmother played from the operas, came to an end. They were followed by "the years of revolution, the years of civil war, the years of exile" which ended when the family settled in Paris.

Then in 1929 her aunt and uncle invited her to come to the United States and she became Koussevitzky's secretary.

"I remember very clearly one of the first things he said to me: 'Take your pencil and let me dictate what I have in mind for a festival of the arts.' That was in the fall of 1929 and very shortly after the financial crash came about, so all such glorious plans had to be abandoned."

In 1934 Koussevitzky's dreams began to take shape again although he was unaware of it in the beginning.

He had come to Boston in 1924 to become musical director of the Boston Symphony. But each summer when the season was over, he would take his family to Europe. It was a kind of busman's holiday. He loved the mountains but more importantly he wanted to scout the musical talent to bring back to Boston. There was not adequate training for young musicians in this country 40 years ago, recalls Mrs. Koussevitzky, and first desk men particularly all came from Europe.

TANGLEWOOD, Page 37

w Tanglewood became a living monument to Koussevitsky

★ TANGLEWOOD
Continued from Page 35

While Koussevitzky was vacationing abroad, a group of Berkshire county residents organized a musical festival. Two concerts were given on the Hanna farm in Stockbridge.

Conductor Henry Hadley "collected" a group of musicians from New York. The affair was a great success. But the second year Hadley became very ill and had to resign.

The committee was wondering whether the idea should be abandoned when someone suggested inviting the Boston Symphony to come. The symphony manager was skeptical when he heard the plan. Maestro Koussevitzky liked to spend his summers in Europe.

Committee president Mrs. Robinson Smith was not a woman to accept a secondhand no. She went directly to Koussevitzky. Mrs. Koussevitzky smiled remembering how he replied. "He said, 'Splendid. Splendid. We will have not only a local festival but a national and an international one!' He was always like that."

So the third season of the Berkshire Symphonic festival was held on rented grounds under a huge tent. Crowds were so great that it took until 4 a.m. for the last car to leave the grounds after the third concert.

But then came more trouble. The festival had been presented on "borrowed" grounds for three years. No place had been found for the next year. Since months of advance planning were needed before the festival, it began to look as if it had to be abandoned.

Then Mrs. Gorham Brooks, "a dear friend" of Koussevitzky, asked for an appointment with him. He assumed she had some young musicians in mind that she wanted to help.

Mrs. Koussevitzky recalled: "It was a Sunday evening near Christmas time. The snow was deep all around. She said, 'Serge, I have been discussing with my aunt the question of our big estate in the Berkshires. We would like to give you this. I spoke with my trustees and they agreed. The place is known as Tanglewood.'

"Serge said, 'This is splendid. If we have the grounds, then it can really be not only national but international.' And he started to develop his old thoughts not only of the festival for the public but also as an educational center for music.

"The next morning he went to Symphmny Hall and asked the manager what he had heard from the festival people about a new site. 'Nothing, Dr. Koussevitzky, and I'm getting very nervous.'

"Koussevitzky asked, 'What do you think of the estate called Tanglewood?'

" 'Marvelous,' said the manager, 'but it will be a fortune to acquire it.'

"Kouhsevitzky said, 'I will present it to you. We HAVE IT!' "

So in 1937 the festival was held on the grounds of Tanglewood under a tent. All went well for two concerts. "But the third one a terrific storm came up. Wagner was absolutely drowned out by the storm. There was thunder and lightening. We thought the whole tent would collapse. It was really frightening.

"Koussevitzky rushed backstage and said to them, 'We'll have to have a building. Get up on the stage and request funds.' "

That was the start of the drive which raised $100,000 from music lovers.

The Tanglewood shed was built in the summer of 1938. Koussevitzky called on his friend Finnish architect Eliel Saarinen to design the open air building.

The war kept music lovers from the European festivals in 1940 and from around the country they flocked to Tanglewood.

In 1939 Koussevitzky had started work on plans for the school at which advanced students could study during the summer with the great professionals.

As if to show the Music Center was destined for big things Koussevitzky's first conducting pupil happened to be Leonard Bernstein.

With Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music Center established, it seemed only natural for Koussevitzky to acquire a permanent summer home close by.

But he had been shaken by his past experiences with homes. "I had a home in Moscow. I had a home in Paris. As soon as I would own a house, I would have to leave the country."

Cherished possessions had to be left behind when he was forced to abandon his Moscow home after the revolution and his Paris home when World War II broke out.

Mrs. Koussevitzky enjoys telling the story of how he changed his mind and came to buy Seranak in Lenox with its spacious rooms and its breakthtaking view.

"The owner, Miss Kate Buckingham had died two years before and the house had passed to the Art Institute of Chicago. That organization did not know what to do with the place. It was difficult to rent for the season. A friend suggested Koussevitzky look at the house. There was a cloudburst just as we came up the drive so he couldn't see the view.

"He liked the house and had a chance to meet with the president of the art institute who said, 'Mr. Koussevitzky, just make an offer.' They agreed on a nominal price. When he came to the house that he now owned in the spring, he discovered first the view and then that the house was completely furnished! It was like a dream."

The house became the scene of many happy parties. There was always a room for a guest composer or conductor. Today the Koussevitzky Music Foundation has built a small house and studio near the caretaker's cottage and from early spring until the snow comes it houses a contemporary composer.

Seranak was to become the one place in the world that Olga Koussevitzky was to think of as home. In 1947 five years after her aunt's death, she was married to Koussevitzky in a simple religious ceremony in this house.

Many of her memories are there on the walls of the music room: her mother's portrait; a floor-to-ceiling portrait of Koussevitzky with his double bass — the instrument despised by his conservatory classmates but on which he gained fame as a soloist — one of the few the musical world has ever known. There is a portrait of Koussevithky conducting with Scriabin at the piano playing the first performance of Scriabin's "Prometheus" in Moscow in 1911. The picture, painted by Boris Pasternak's father, disappeared when Koussevitzky was forced to leave Moscow after the revolution. Someone found it in Paris years later and returned it to him.

The spacious room still hears music. Mrs. Koussevitzky's nephews have been practicing here this summer. She loves to have her family come, especially the younger members. "It brings their uncle Serge home to those who did not have the joy and privilege of knowing him."

When the Tanglewood season is over, Mrs. Koussevitzky goes back to New York. There she is busy carrying on his work of helping young musicians and composers through the Koussebitzky Music Foundation of which she is president and through the UNESCO American International Music Fund.

But her heart is always in Lenox — at Tanglewood, at Seranak, and on the grounds of the Church on the Hill where Koussevitzky is buried. Students from Tanglewood come to the grave each year on his birthday to sing the "Tanglewood Alleluia" which Randall Thompson wrote for the inaugural of the Berkshire Music Center.

Olga Koussevitzky stopped her narrative: "This is how miracles happen in the United States. He never lost that dream. This is a living thing . . . a living monument to Koussevitzky.

"It is not being boastful but without him it would have never have taken place. The architect was his personal friend. Everything that happened in Tanglewood was through him, his innovativeness, his relations with various people in the world of art and particularly his own enthusiasm and his faith.

"The establishment of the Music Center gave incentive to other people to create summer festivals and summer schools like Aspen and others. This country is big enough to have more than one center of music but still Tanglewood is the most important center."

CHRONICLE
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
W. 13,735
SEP 7 1972
New England Newsclip

AWARD FOR TALENT: Seiji Ozawa, noted conductor who will take the baton of the Boston Symphony next year, presents the High Fidelity/Musical America Award to Joan Heller of Cambridge, for her work this summer at the Berkshire Music Center. Miss Heller, a vocalist, is a former music teacher in the Cambridge public schools.

172

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 26 1972

New England Newsclip

Memorable students

Tanglewood's other side

By Andrew L. Pincus

LENOX

THE INN corner, except for a few stragglers in out-of-state cars and an occasional bicyclist or backpacker passing through, is empty. It is again possible to eat a leisurely dinner in your favorite restaurant and go in for a Sunday paper without getting tangled up in traffic like flypaper. The summer visitors and fair-weather guests no longer knock at the door, looking for room and board or just a cool drink and bathroom on the way down from Vermont. ~~Tanglewood is~~ over and the tourists are gone.

The calm is illusory, of course. Soon the boarding-school students will come, bringing their parents (or vice versa), and that means the foliage-hunters and skiers will not be far behind. But for the moment the village belongs to those of us brave (or foolhardy) enough to bear the ice and mud while not feasting on music and theatre.

* * *

I HAVE taken no poll of my neighbors but there are probably few in town who mourn the crowds' exodus. Yet, for those who love music, the inescapable is at hand. Like squirrels hoarding nuts, we have been busy these eight weeks storing up sounds to sustain us through the lean times ahead. For another 10 months we must live on our memories and scrounge what music we can from records, from local amateur groups, from occasional visiting performers and from what seem increasingly difficult trips into the city.

Everybody who listens to music will have his own highlights from the season. Some speak in awe of the Brahms program conducted by Bernstein, which produced the monumental hour-long traffic jam in town. Others speak lovingly of Haydn's "Seasons." Still others revel in the Pops or "Tanglewood on Parade" with fireworks over the Bowl. The Mahler Eighth Symphony with which Ozawa closed the season occasioned the remarkable sight of a conductor greeted by a standing ovation in front and behind, with the audience applauding and yelling bravos before him while the 315-piece orchestra and chorus which he had just conducted were applauding and stamping their feet in back.

* * *

YET THERE is the other side of Tanglewood, largely invisible to the summer crowds, which gives it its special value and quality. Resounding as Ozawa's Mahler Eighth was, how can anyone who heard them forget the Mahler First, also conducted by Ozawa, and the Mahler Ninth in the last two movements led by Bernstein? The orchestra was not the Boston Symphony. The orchestra was students from the Berkshire Music Center, and they performed as memorably in their way as the professionals did in theirs.

More memorably, in a fashion. For these were not paid musicians responding routinely (and, let's face it, mediocrely) at times to music dulled by repetition and metronomic conductors. These were the young, many on scholarships, responding to the great works of the classic repertoire — and to new works like Druckman's "Windows" — with the intensity that comes of first love. It will be a long time before one hears another Shostakovitch Fifth as exciting as the one led by a conducting fellow, Phillip Lehrman, in the student orchestra's final concert. The Boston Globe's Michael Steinberg, certainly one of the most discerning critics to cover Tanglewood on a regular basis, said he had never heard the finale of the Mahler Ninth performed more tenderly than the students did it under Bernstein.

And if this can be said of the student orchestra, what can be said of the Festival Chorus, that marvelous agglomeration of amateurs, and of the student vocalists and instrumentalists who attempted such ambitious experiments as Monteverdi's "Poppea"?

* * *

NO, TANGLEWOOD is more than a bottle of wine on the lawn. It is a cooperative enterprise on behalf of music, but more than that, it is living proof of music's power. For where else on this well-trodden section of planet will one find such a gathering of young and old, of black and white, of local people and visitors, of straights and freaks and everything in between, united in listening to and producing music? On the lawn, in the Shed, in the rehearsal rooms — no doubt in the hotels and dormitories, too — for a season the music of the immortals lived, in spite of war, campus and urban upheavals, and talk of new cultures like rock.

Music, the cliché has it, is the universal language. And the surprising thing, as this summer's record - breaking attendance figures proved, is that it still is.

Tanglewood, we will miss you.

Bernstein with Tanglewood students rehearsing Mahler

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 1 1972

New England Newsclip

Our Berkshires

Tanglewood recollections

By Katharine H. Annin

RICHMOND

THERE ARE undoubtedly many people around the Berkshires more closely associated with Tanglewood than I am, but perhaps not many whose recollections go back as far as mine. I never enter the Shed without thinking even of the pre-Tanglewood years, when that name meant to most of us only the book of Hawthorne's tales we loved as children.

* * *

IN THE 1930s the idea began to grow in a number of people's minds that the Berkshires would be a pleasant spot for an outdoor festival of symphonic music. I am glad I was present for at least one of the three concerts that marked the first blossoming of this happy thought, the last weekend in August 1934.

Maybe I attended all three performances of the New York Philharmonic with Henry Hadley conducting, but what I remember most vividly was Sunday evening, when we heard Beethoven's Fifth on the lawn at the Hanna Farm, now the property of the Stockbridge School. We sat on wooden benches and I am not sure they even had backs to lean against; the orchestra may have had a rough wooden screen behind it to act as a sounding board, but I believe it was not until the next year that a rude sort of shell was erected.

Anyway, the enchantment of that evening is with me yet — the full moon soaring over the dark hills and wisps of mist gathering in the valley. There is a tradition that in the midst of the concert a wandering dog decided to bay at the moon, but if so he was quickly suppressed. There was no question but that the whole idea was such a success that it must be put on a permanent basis. Mr. Hadley's health failed after the second season, but at that point Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony stepped into the picture, and in 1936 the magnificent gift by the Tappan family of their 200-acre property called Tanglewood assured the future of the enterprise.

* * *

I DON'T know whether to say I missed, or was spared, the event of Aug. 12, 1937 which became known as the "$100,000 thunderstorm." Berkshire weather being the unpredictable factor it is, it had been deemed prudent to hold the concerts under a huge tent.

On this particular evening the heavens let loose with a fury that drowned out even the percussion instruments and brasses of an all-Wagner program. The tent leaked and reeled in the terrific gusts of wind and Koussevitzky brought the program to a halt. My mother-in-law, who was there, told us she thought her last hour had come and could only console herself with the thought that she had had a long and relatively happy life.

But when the storm subsided, an appeal from the stage instantly produced $20,000 in pledges toward the building of a permanent roof for the concerts, and by the next season the present Shed was ready for occupancy.

* * *

FROM THAT time forward, my own recollections are studded with episodes I greatly enjoyed. There were the times when the Bach and Mozart concerts at the beginning of each season were held in the Theatre-Concert Hall, so much better suited to the smaller orchestra than the vast Shed, to which they had to be moved later to accommodate the ever increasing audiences.

At least once in the theatre I sat in an overflow chair on the platform behind the performers and thus had the pleasure of facing Koussevitzky and observing his facial expressions, which conveyed as much to the players as did his hands and baton.

There was a night at a concert by students of the Music Center during which the electricity failed, whereupon Lukas Foss groped his way to a piano and enthralled the audience with one piece after another from his memory's repertoire until the lights were restored.

* * *

PERHAPS the most thrilling of all my memories is the time I actually found myself seated behind the orchestra ready for the fourth movement of Beethoven's Ninth. I was a humble member of a local choral group organized by Horace Hunt of Dalton, and we had been invited to participate. Our chairs were crowded together, and it was incredibly hot, but it was a great experience.

All this and more passed through my mind last week when I had an inside glimpse of Tanglewood 1972, under the impact of the electronic age. A filming of Brahms Second Symphony was to be made by Amberson Video and Unitel Productions, and the public was invited to supply an audience, no doubt to improve the acoustics.

Leonard Bernstein was the conductor, his hair now graying and his lithe movements on the podium refined from the extreme exuberance of the days of his youth when he was Koussevitzky's star pupil in the conducting department of the Music Center. He created informality with quips that made the audience laugh, and the microphones, strings of lights, and cameras cruising across the front of the stage were fascinating to watch.

* * *

THEN CAME, unexpectedly out of a sunny sky, a sharp thundershower to interrupt the proceedings for a time! History was repeating itself, and Nature asserting its predominance over Art.

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

174

END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 130

BSO
Pops

1972 - 1973

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Sept. 1972 – May 1973

BLANK PAGE

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

SEP 16 1972

New England Newsclip

Sights and Sounds of the Coming Season

Boston's cultural establishment is moving into high gear for the '72-'73 season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open its season Sept. 22, at Symphony Hall will have in addition to its music adviser, Seiji Ozawa, Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas as principal guest conductors. Other guest conductors will include: William Steinberg, Leonard Bernstein, Daniel Barenboim, Eugen Jochum, Lorin Maazel and Bernard Haitink. Guest soloists include: Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, Theodore Lettvin, Jerome Lowenthal, Joseph Silverstein, Janet Baker, Harold Wright, Kenneth Riegel, Ruggiero Rucci, Martina Arroyo, Lili Chookasian, Richard Cassilly, Robert Hale, Israela Margalin, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Zara Nelsova, and Nerine Barrett.

The opening concert, Sept. 22, 23, 26 and Oct. 10, will feature Michael Tilson Thomas conducting Doriot Anthony Dwyer on flute and Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A, Piston's Flute concerto (world premiere) and Prokoviev's Scythian suite "Ala and Lolli."

The Guests

The second concert series, Sept. 28, 39, 30 and Oct. 3, will feature William Steinberg conducting soprano Benita Valente, contralto Beverly Wolff and the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum. The program will include Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis and Mahler's Symphony no. 2 "Resurrection."

Leonard Bernstein will conduct Nov. 21, 22, 24, 25 and Dec. 5. His program will include Beethoven's Symphony no. 6 "Pastoral," Wagner's Siegfried's Rhine journey from "Die Gotterdammerung" and Berlioz' Three orchestral excerpts from "Romeo and Juliet."

Bernstein will also conduct Dec. 8 and 9. The program will include Bartok's Music for strings, percussion and celesta and Stravinsky's Oedipus rex. The Harvard Glee Club will be featured; soloists will be announced.

Leonard Bernstein will close the season, April 24 and 26 with the same selections as he'll conduct Dec. 8 and 9, and the Harvard Glee Club will again perform.

Seizi Ozawa will conduct only one group of concerts during the season, Feb. 15, 16 and 17, which will feature Joseph Silverstein on violin, Mozart's Serenade no. 7 "Haffner" and Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique.

Spectrum Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct three Spectrum Concert series. The first will be Oct. 6 and 7, entitled Variations on the Orchestra, which will feature works by Stamitz, Webern, Brahms, Charpentier and Mouret. The second series, a Salute to Diaghilev in two parts, will be Jan. 12 and 13. The first concert will feature Debussy's "Jeux poeme danse, Prokofiev's Sythian suite and Stravinsky's Les noces. During the second concert works of Chopin, Strauss, Satie etc. will be performed. The chorus and soloists will be announced.

The third Spectrum series, April 20 and 21, and entitled Venice, will feature works by Gabrieli, Schutz, Stravinsky and Bach.

BOSTON REVIEW OF THE ARTS
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY CIRC. N.AVAIL.

Boston Symphony Reveals Conductors

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced its conductors and programs for the 1972-73 season in Symphony Hall.

For this season Seiji Ozawa will preside as Music Adviser with Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas as Principal Guest Conductors.

Guest conductors for the season include William Steinberg, Leonard Bernstein, Daniel Baremboim, Eugen Jochum, Lorin Maazel and Bernard Haitink.

Soloists include Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, Theodore Lettvin, Jerome Lowenthal, Joseph Silverstein, Janet Baker, Harold Wright, Kenneth Riegel, Ruggiero Ricci, Martina Arroyo, Lili Chookasian, Richard Cassilly, Robert Hale, Israela Margalit, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Zara Nelsova, Nerine Barrett and more.

The season will open Sept. 22 at 2 p.m. with Michael Tilson Thomas conducting a program of Beethoven, Piston and Prokofiev.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,393

SEP 8 1972

New England Newsclip

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER &
SUNDAY ADVERTISER
S. 415,000

SEP 17 1972

New England Newsclip

Wide variety of musical events for new season

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

FOLLOWING A summer of rather disappointing repertory at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its season Friday with a rather low key program including Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Prokofiev's Scythian suite "Ala and Lolli", and the premiere of Walter Piston's Flute Concerto with Doriot Anthony Dwyer as soloist.

Next week, however, William Steinberg (who will still be very much in evidence this season) will conduct a real celebratory performance including Mahler's Symphony No. 2 ("Resurrection") with Benita Valente and Beverly Wolff as soloists and the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum.

Other performances will feature Janet Baker in Berlioz' "Nuits d'Ete"; Leonard Bernstein conducting Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex"; Seiji Ozawa in an unusual pairing of Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique and its sequel, "Lelio"; a performance of Verdi's Requiem with Martina Arroyo, Lili Chookasian, Richard Cassilly and Robert Hale; and a reprise of Wagner excerpts by Jessye Norman, who caused a great stir at Tanglewood this summer.

Michael Tilson Thomas will assemble a new Spectrum Series opening Oct. 6 with a program called Variations on the Orchestra. Music will include Stamitz, a Mannheim symphony; Webern, "Im Sommerwind"; Stockhausen, "Trans"; Brahms, Variations on a theme by Haydn; and Charpentier and Mouret, music of the court of Louis XIV.

On Jan. 12 and 13, the music is "A Salute to Diaghilev" and features music of ballets which the great impresario commissioned. Included are Debussy, Jeux; Prokofiev, Scythian Suite; Stravinsky, "Les Noces" on the first night and Chopin, "Les Sylphides"; Satie, "Parade"; and Ravel's two suites from "Daphnis et Chloe" on the second night.

On April 20 and 21, the works include Gabrieli, Canzoni in Ecclesiis; Schuetz, Motets; and Stravinsky, Canticum Sacrum and choral variations on "Von Himmel Noch."

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

SEP 18 1972

New England Newsclip

Sights and Sounds of the Coming Season

Boston's cultural establishment is moving into high gear for the '72-'73 season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open its season Sept. 22, at Symphony Hall will have in addition to its music adviser, Seiji Ozawa, Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas as principal guest conductors. Other guest conductors will include: William Steinberg, Leonard Bernstein, Daniel Barenboim, Eugen Jochum, Lorin Maazel and Bernard Haitink. Guest soloists include: Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, Theodore Lettvin, Jerome Lowenthal, Joseph Silverstein, Janet Baker, Harold Wright, Kenneth Riegel, Ruggiero Rucci, Martina Arroyo, Lili Chookasian, Richard Cassilly, Robert Hale, Israela Margalin, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Zara Nelsova, and Nerine Barrett.

The opening concert, Sept. 22, 23, 26 and Oct. 10, will feature Michael Tilson Thomas conducting Doriot Anthony Dwyer on flute and Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A, Piston's Flute concerto (world premiere) and Prokoviev's Scythian suite "Ala and Lolli."

The Guests

The second concert series, Sept. 28, 39, 30 and Oct. 3, will feature William Steinberg conducting soprano Benita Valente, contralto Beverly Wolff and the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum. The program will include Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis and Mahler's Symphony no. 2 "Resurrection."

Leonard Bernstein will conduct Nov. 21, 22, 24, 25 and Dec. 5. His program will include Beethoven's Symphony no. 6 "Pastoral," Wagner's Siegfried's Rhine journey from "Die Gotterdammerung" and Berlioz' Three orchestral excerpts from "Romeo and Juliet."

Bernstein will also conduct Dec. 8 and 9. The program will include Bartok's Music for strings, percussion and celesta and Stravinsky's Oedipus rex. The Harvard Glee Club will be featured; soloists will be announced.

Leonard Bernstein will close the season, April 24 and 26 with the same selections as he'll conduct Dec. 8 and 9, and the Harvard Glee Club will again perform.

Seizi Ozawa will conduct only one group of concerts during the season, Feb. 15, 16 and 17, which will feature Joseph Silverstein on violin, Mozart's Serenade no. 7 "Haffner" and Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique.

Spectrum Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct three Spectrum Concert series. The first will be Oct. 6 and 7, entitled Variations on the Orchestra, which will feature works by Stamitz, Webern, Brahms, Charpentier and Mouret. The second series, a Salute to Diaghilev in two parts, will be Jan. 12 and 13. The first concert will feature Debussy's "Jeux poeme danse, Prokofiev's Sythian suite and Stravinsky's Les noces. During the second concert works of Chopin, Strauss, Satie etc. will be performed. The chorus and soloists will be announced.

The third Spectrum series, April 20 and 21, and entitled Venice, will feature works by Gabrieli, Schutz, Stravinsky and Bach.

BOSTON REVIEW OF
THE ARTS
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY CIRC. N. AVAIL.

Boston Symphony Reveals Conductors

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced its conductors and programs for the 1972-73 season in Symphony Hall.

For this season Seiji Ozawa will preside as Music Adviser with Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas as Principal Guest Conductors.

Guest conductors for the season include William Steinberg, Leonard Bernstein, Daniel Baremboim, Eugen Jochum, Lorin Maazel and Bernard Haitink.

Soloists include Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, Theodore Lettvin, Jerome Lowenthal, Joseph Silverstein, Janet Baker, Harold Wright, Kenneth Riegel, Ruggiero Ricci, Martina Arroyo, Lili Chookasian, Richard Cassilly, Robert Hale, Israela Margalit, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Zara Nelsova, Nerine Barrett and more.

The season will open Sept. 22 at 2 p.m. with Michael Tilson Thomas conducting a program of Beethoven, Piston and Prokofiev.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS

SEP 2 1972

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER &
SUNDAY ADVERTISER
S. 415,960

SEP 17 1972

New England Newsclip

Wide variety of musical events for new season

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

FOLLOWING A summer of rather disappointing repertory at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its season Friday with a rather low key program including Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Prokofiev's Scythian suite "Ala and Lolli", and the premiere of Walter Piston's Flute Concerto with Doriot Anthony Dwyer as soloist.

Next week, however, William Steinberg (who will still be very much in evidence this season) will conduct a real celebratory performance including Mahler's Symphony No. 2 ("Resurrection") with Benita Valente and Beverly Wolff as soloists and the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum.

Other performances will feature Janet Baker in Berlioz' "Nuits d'Ete"; Leonard Bernstein conducting Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex"; Seiji Ozawa in an unusual pairing of Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique and its sequel, "Lelio"; a performance of Verdi's Requiem with Martina Arroyo, Lili Chookasian, Richard Cassilly and Robert Hale; and a reprise of Wagner excerpts by Jessye Norman, who caused a great stir at Tanglewood this summer.

Michael Tilson Thomas will assemble a new Spectrum Series opening Oct. 6 with a program called Variations on the Orchestra. Music will include Stamitz, a Mannheim symphony; Webern, "Im Sommerwind"; Stockhausen, "Trans"; Brahms, Variations on a theme by Haydn; and Charpentier and Mouret, music of the court of Louis XIV.

On Jan. 12 and 13, the music is "A Salute to Diaghilev" and features music of ballets which the great impresario commissioned. Included are Debussy, Jeux; Prokofiev, Scythian Suite; Stravinsky, "Les Noces" on the first night and Chopin, "Les Sylphides"; Satie, "Parade"; and Ravel's two suites from "Daphnis et Chloe" on the second night.

On April 20 and 21, the works include Gabrieli, Canzoni in Ecclesius; Schuetz, Motets; and Stravinsky, Canticum Sacrum and choral variations on "Von Himmel Noch."

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

SEP 16 1972

New England Newsclip

Sights and Sounds of the Coming Season

Boston's cultural establishment is moving into high gear for the '72-'73 season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open its season Sept. 22, at Symphony Hall will have in addition to its music adviser, Seiji Ozawa, Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas as principal guest conductors. Other guest conductors will include: William Steinberg, Leonard Bernstein, Daniel Barenboim, Eugen Jochum, Lorin Maazel and Bernard Haitink. Guest soloists include: Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, Theodore Lettvin, Jerome Lowenthal, Joseph Silverstein, Janet Baker, Harold Wright, Kenneth Riegel, Ruggiero Ricci, Martina Arroyo, Lili Chookasian, Richard Cassilly, Robert Hale, Israela to Diaghilev in two parts, will be Jan. 12 and 13. The first concert will feature Debussy's "Jeux poeme danse, Prokofiev's Sythian suite and Stravinsky's Les noces. During the second concert works of Chopin, Strauss, Satie etc. will be performed. The chorus and soloists will be announced.

The third Spectrum series, April 20 and 21, and entitled Venice, will feature works by Gabrieli, Schutz, Stravinsky and Bach.

BOSTON REVIEW OF
THE ARTS
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY CIRC. N.AVAIL.

Boston Symphony Reveals Conductors

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced its conductors and programs for the 1972-73 season in Symphony Hall.

For this season Seiji Ozawa will preside as Music Adviser with Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas as Principal Guest Conductors.

Guest conductors for the season include William Steinberg, Leonard Bernstein, Daniel Baremboim, Eugen Jochum, Lorin Maazel and Bernard Haitink.

Soloists include Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, Theodore Lettvin, Jerome Lowenthal, Joseph Silverstein, Janet Baker, Harold Wright, Kenneth Riegel, Ruggiero Ricci, Martina Arroyo, Lili Chookasian, Richard Cassilly, Robert Hale, Israela Margalit, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Zara Nelsova, Nerine Barrett and more.

The season will open Sept. 22 at 2 p.m. with Michael Tilson Thomas conducting a program of Beethoven, Piston and Prokofiev.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
SUNDAY ADVERTISER
S. 415,000

SEP 17 1972

New Eng'an Newscl

Wide va musical e for new

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

FOLLOWING A summer of rather disappointing repertory at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its season Friday with a rather low key program including Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Prokofiev's Scythian suite "Ala and Lolli", and the premiere of Walter Piston's Flute Concerto with Doriot Anthony Dwyer as soloist.

Next week, however, William Steinberg (who will still be very much in evidence this season) will conduct a rea'

From the publisher

Associate Editor Elinor M. Kane and Mr. Fisher

The rare ability to laugh at oneself, to see oneself clearly and humorously at the same time, is uniquely American. It is this quality that helps to give the American artist his opinionated style and strength. Regrettably most of America's culture merchants are sorely lacking in this respect. They just don't have it—they never have.

The late editor H. W. Ross was an opinionated genius. Pacing the corridors of the New Yorker, his latest miracle man in tow, he would explain, "Writers and artists—they're all children. They don't know anyone; they never go anywhere; they're antisocial. They get sinking spells." Ross's aesthetic sense dealt exclusively with practicalities, and though he could masterfully determine what was essentially creative, he clearly divided his world in two—Them and Us. Us had to hold hands while Them had sinking spells.

But that was 1929 and New York.

In 1972, at the Boston Review, we deal every month with artists. With Them, the men and women who make an occupation of composing music, of painting, dance, theater, film, architecture, photography. And we deal every month with their audience: the Us who are moved, whose lives often are fulfilled by the visions of these artists.

Unlike Ross and his original magazine, we cannot assign our writers and artists a "seen but not heard" role; we cannot invest a city or an audience with concern for contemporary culture. That concern is there, and felt by a community interested in what our artists have to say. For the goals of every man stretch into the same distance, toward the same limits. A community, then, can only suffer from ignorance, and for Boston, that fate is unlikely. The main concern of The Boston Review of the Arts is in bringing Us and Them closer together.

Ralph Earle

So Much for the Glorious Past

A year from now Seiji Ozawa will begin his tenure as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the thirteenth man to hold that post. While his connections with the BSO go back to 1964, when he was Charles Munch's student at Tanglewood, and currently include the positions of Guest Conductor, Artistic Director (with Gunther Schuller) of Tanglewood, and Music Adviser for this coming year, his elevation to Music Director, the person responsible for the artistic and financial success of the orchestra and all its related activities, truly marks "the end of an era." For with Ozawa's arrival, the "second generation" of conductors comes to Boston.

Stravinsky is gone, and the last of the great composers is dead. Michael Tilson Thomas has nominated Olivier Messiaen as the "greatest living composer"; Shostakovich is his only rival. Say and hear what you will of contemporary music, a great thrust of Western art has petered out, no longer being created, only being preserved.

From the day Jean Baptiste Lully began pounding the floor with his cane and demanding that the members of Louis XIV's les petits-violons bow up and down together, composing and conducting have been inexorably intertwined, particularly in the German school—Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Mendelssohn, Berlioz, Liszt, Wagner, Mahler, Strauss—all could and did shake a stick. And those who only conducted—Bülow, Dessoff, Richter, Seidl, Mottl, Walter, Furtwängler—worked alongside the great composers in presenting the premieres of their works.

That tradition has been broken; a young man now studies conducting with older conductors, not composers. In the breaking of that tradition, however, lie both a loss and a freedom. Are there no more pupils of a pupil of Liszt's? Then we shall have to decide for ourselves how Liszt should sound. Is there no one to show how Wagner conducted at Bayreuth? Then we shall have to listen to different interpretations and pick and choose.

I thought it would be fun to show this flow of music as it affects the Boston Symphony through a genealogy of its Music Directors, from Georg Henschel to Seiji Ozawa. Thanks to Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (1971, rev.) the major lineages are fairly easy to trace.

The "was a pupil of" lines are on the left of the column of Music Directors. As you can see, our orchestra's pedagogic ancestry goes back to Beethoven, by way of Ignaz Moscheles, the pianist, and Felix Otto Dessoff, the conductor. Dessoff was a prize pupil of Wagner's and taught Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur and, through Wilhelm Furtwängler, Charles Munch. Since Munch was Ozawa's musical "father," we are keeping alive Beethoven's paternity some two hundred years later. Erich Leinsdorf was an even more direct descendant of Beethoven, through only four generations, Carl Czerny, Theodor Leschetizsky, and Hedwig Kanner-Rosenthal, all pianists. Also through Leinsdorf we got our "in-laws" Chopin and Liszt; their pupil Moriz Rosenthal married Leinsdorf's teacher Hedwig Kanner. William Steinberg's teacher was a pupil of Clara Schumann's half-brother, Woldemar Bargiel, so Schumann is another in-law.

Georg Henschel and Wilhelm Gericke were both close friends of Brahm's. Gericke was a protégé of Hans Richter's, the protégé of Wagner. (Richter and Wagner started out as French horn players in the same orchestra.) And Gericke, on his own merits, conducted the first concert performance of Götterdämmerung under Wagner's supervision.

Baker's doesn't have much to say about Carl Muck, Max Fiedler, and Henry Rabaud. Harold C. Schonberg in The Great Conductors says that Muck

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

SEP 16 1972

New England Newsclip

Sights and Sounds of the Coming Season

Boston's cultural establishment is moving into high gear for the '72-'73 season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open its season Sept. 22, at Symphony Hall will have in addition to its music adviser, Seiji Ozawa, Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas as principal guest conductors. Other guest conductors will include: William Steinberg, Leonard Bernstein, Daniel Barenboim, Eugen Jochum, Lorin Maazel and Bernard Haitink. Guest soloists include: Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, Theodore Lettvin, Jerome Lowenthal, Joseph Silverstein, Janet Baker, Harold Wright, Kenneth Riegel, Ruggiero Rucci, Martina Arroyo, Lili Chookasian, Richard Cassilly, Robert Hale, Israela to Diaghilev in two parts, will be Jan. 12 and 13. The first concert will feature Debussy's "Jeux poeme danse, Prokofiev's Sythian suite and Stravinsky's Les noces. During the second concert works of Chopin, Strauss, Satie etc. will be performed. The chorus and soloists will be announced.

The third Spectrum series, April 20 and 21, and entitled Venice, will feature works by Gabrieli, Schutz, Stravinsky and Bach.

BOSTON REVIEW OF
THE ARTS
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY CIRC. N.AVAIL.

Boston Symphony Reveals Conductors

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced its conductors and programs for the 1972-73 season in Symphony Hall.

For this season Seiji Ozawa will preside as Music Adviser with Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas as Principal Guest Conductors.

Guest conductors for the season include William Steinberg, Leonard Bernstein, Daniel Baremboim, Eugen Jochum, Lorin Maazel and Bernard Haitink.

Soloists include Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, Theodore Lettvin, Jerome Lowenthal, Joseph Silverstein, Janet Baker, Harold Wright, Kenneth Riegel, Ruggiero Ricci, Martina Arroyo, Lili Chookasian, Richard Cassilly, Robert Hale, Israela Margalit, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Zara Nelsova, Nerine Barrett and more.

The season will open Sept. 22 at 2 p.m. with Michael Tilson Thomas conducting a program of Beethoven, Piston and Prokofiev.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
SUNDAY ADVERTISER
S. 415,000

SEP 17 1972

New England Newscli

A Musical Genealogy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Wide va musical e for new s

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

FOLLOWING A summer of rather disappointing repertory at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its season Friday with a rather low key program including Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Prokofiev's Scythian suite "Ala and Lolli", and the premiere of Walter Piston's Flute Concerto with Doriot Anthony Dwyer as soloist.

Next week, however, William Steinberg (who will still be very much in evidence this season) will conduct a rea'

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

SEP 16 1972

New England Newsclip

Sights and Sounds of the Coming Season

Boston's cultural establishment is moving into high gear for the '72-'73 season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open its season Sept. 22, at Symphony Hall will have in addition to its music adviser, Seiji Ozawa, Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas as principal guest conductors. Other guest conductors will include: William Steinberg, Leonard Bernstein, Daniel Barenboim, Eugen Jochum, Lorin Maazel and Bernard Haitink. Guest soloists include: Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, Theodore Lettvin, Jerome Lowenthal, Joseph Silverstein, Janet Baker, Harold Wright, Kenneth Riegel, Ruggiero Rucci, Martina Arroyo, Lili Chookasian, Richard Cassilly, Robert Hale, Israela to Diaghilev in two parts, will be Jan. 12 and 13. The first concert will feature Debussy's "Jeux poeme danse, Prokofiev's Sythian suite and Stravinsky's Les noces. During the second concert works of Chopin, Strauss, Satie etc. will be performed. The chorus and soloists will be announced.

The third Spectrum series, April 20 and 21, and entitled Venice, will feature works by Gabrieli, Schutz, Stravinsky and Bach.

Boston Symphony Reveals Conductors

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced its conductors and programs for the 1972-73 season in Symphony Hall.

For this season Seiji Ozawa will preside as Music Adviser with Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas as Principal Guest Conductors.

Guest conductors for the season include William Steinberg, Leonard Bernstein, Daniel Baremboim, Eugen Jochum, Lorin Maazel and Bernard Haitink.

Soloists include Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, Theodore Lettvin, Jerome Lowenthal, Joseph Silverstein, Janet Baker, Harold Wright, Kenneth Riegel, Ruggiero Ricci, Martina Arroyo, Lili Chookasian, Richard Cassilly, Robert Hale, Israela Margalit, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Zara Nelsova, Nerine Barrett and more.

The season will open Sept. 22 at 2 p.m. with Michael Tilson Thomas conducting a program of Beethoven, Piston and Prokofiev.

BOSTON REVIEW OF TI
BO
MO

TIGHT BINDING

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER &
SUNDAY ADVERTISER
S. 415,000

SEP 17 1972

New England Newscl

Wide va musical e for new s

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

FOLLOWING A summer of rather disappointing repertory at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its season Friday with a rather low key program including Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Prokofiev's Scythian suite "Ala and Lolli", and the premiere of Walter Piston's Flute Concerto with Doriot Anthony Dwyer as soloist.

Next week, however, William Steinberg (who will still be very much in evidence this season) will conduct a rea' was, with Strauss, Weingartner, and Toscanini, "one of the founders of the modern style, in which the printed note is the ultimate authority." Therefore, Muck represents the first crack in this person-to-person transmission.

---

Pierre Monteux was a pupil of Albert Lavigner's, who was in turn in good classroom company with Bizet, d'Indy, and Debussy under Charles Lenepveu.

The collaborative ties with composers are many. The genealogy lists only those works whose world premieres were conducted by BSO Directors; where a title of a work appears alone, it was a first performance. The most famous ones are Gericke's 150th Psalm by Bruchner; Monteux's Daphnis and Chloë and Pictures at an Exhibition by Ravel, and Petrouchka and Le Sacre du Printemps by Stravinsky; Koussevitsky's Prometheus by Scriabin, Fourth Symphony by Prokofiev, Symphony of Psalms by Stravinsky, Concerto for Orchestra by Bartók, and Symphony in G by Roussel (among many); and Steinberg's Wozzeck by Berg.

So much for the glorious past. The present sees a generation of new conductors, among them Colin Davis, Lorin Maazel, Zubin Mehta, Thomas Schippers, Michael Tilson Thomas, and Ozawa, who are separated from the great composers by a generation of teachers and conductors. This sequence of generations is depicted in the smaller genealogy, in which a fair sample of the conductors of recent memory appear. (I apologize for the obvious omissions; I simply chose the ones which came to mind to illustrate the point.)

The family ties are pretty clear. Bernstein learned from Koussevitsky and Walter, Leinsdorf from Walter and Toscanini, Steinberg from Klemperer. There are some notable "loners"—von Karajan, Stokowski, Mitropoulos, Reiner—so heredity isn't everything, but as the years have taken their toll, more and more men are learning their craft from other conductors; the music they must learn elsewhere.

Enter Ozawa.

It's a long, rainy, nervous drive out to Tanglewood to interview Ozawa. I have made the trip once before, also in the rain, only to have the interview canceled. Will he have to cancel again? Will he say anything? Will we hit it off? I am mindful of a disastrous interview in the New York Times a while ago. The interviewer wanted to know about his love life; Ozawa wasn't telling; the story was a study in barely polite frustration and anger. Well, all I can do is announce that I am here to interview him as a musician, that I am not after his personal life, and hope for the best.

The monitor in the press office falls silent; rehearsal is over. Mary Smith, an assistant manager, escorts me, friend, and photographer backstage. "How much time do I have?" "His next appointment is at two." Twenty-five minutes! It will take at least forty-five, at least.

Seiji is short and slight; his handshake is soft. He's relaxed, and almost embarrassingly courteous. He sits in a wicker chair with one shoeless foot tucked up. When the recorder threatens not to work, he is helpful and reassuring. We begin, and he is almost immediately On. For thirty-five minutes he laughs, moves, ponders, responds.

What was your early musical training like, in Japan?

I started music after the war, so I think it's almost the same as what American young people start like. I played piano first and my teacher was like a regular schoolteacher. Elementary school—there is a teacher for music to teach how to sing and do-re-mi-fa-sol-la-ti-do—solfège—nothing special. Then I got more interested in piano, so I went to a piano teacher to take private lessons.

The Conductors

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

SEP 16 1972

New England Newsclip

Sights and Sounds of the Coming Season

Boston's cultural establishment is moving into high gear for the '72-'73 season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open its season Sept. 22, at Symphony Hall will have in addition to its music adviser, Seiji Ozawa, Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas as principal guest conductors. Other guest conductors will include: William Steinberg, Leonard Bernstein, Daniel Barenboim, Eugen Jochum, Lorin Maazel and Bernard Haitink. Guest soloists include: Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, Theodore Lettvin, Jerome Lowenthal, Joseph Silverstein, Janet Baker, Harold Wright, Kenneth Riegel, Ruggiero Rucci, Martina Arroyo, Lili Chookasian, Richard Cassilly, Robert Hale, Israela to Diaghilev in two parts, will be Jan. 12 and 13. The first concert will feature Debussy's "Jeux poeme danse, Prokofiev's Sythian suite and Stravinsky's Les noces. During the second concert works of Chopin, Strauss, Satie etc. will be performed. The chorus and soloists will be announced.

The third Spectrum series, April 20 and 21, and entitled Venice, will feature works by Gabrieli, Schutz, Stravinsky and Bach.

Boston Symphony Reveals Conductors

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced its conductors and programs for the 1972-73 season in Symphony Hall.

For this season Seiji Ozawa will preside as Music Adviser with Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas as Principal Guest Conductors.

Guest conductors for the season include William Steinberg, Leonard Bernstein, Daniel Baremboim, Eugen Jochum, Lorin Maazel and Bernard Haitink.

Soloists include Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, Theodore Lettvin, Jerome Lowenthal, Joseph Silverstein, Janet Baker, Harold Wright, Kenneth Riegel, Ruggiero Ricci, Martina Arroyo, Lili Chookasian, Richard Cassilly, Robert Hale, Israela Margalit, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Zara Nelsova, Nerine Barrett and more.

The season will open Sept. 22 at 2 p.m. with Michael Tilson Thomas conducting a program of Beethoven, Piston and Prokofiev.

BOSTON REVIEW OF TI
BO
MO

TIGHT BINDING

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER &
SUNDAY ADVERTISER
S. 415,000

SEP 17 1972

New England Newscli

Wide va musical e for new s

By ELLEN PFEIFER

Music Critic

FOLLOWING A summer of rather disappointing repertory at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its season Friday with a rather low key program including Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Prokofiev's Scythian suite "Ala and Lolli", and the premiere of Walter Piston's Flute Concerto with Doriot Anthony Dwyer as soloist.

Next week, however, William Steinberg (who will still be very much in evidence this season) will conduct a rea'

To what extent was the music Western, or Japanese?

All Western. It was a kind of tragedy in my country that happened. All traditional music was dying. Now, in last three or four years, the people of Japan realize that we should keep traditional music, so they started—for instance, the National Radio started more regular programs of traditional music concerts, like No music, Shakohachi music, Biwa music. We had only kept the Kabuki well, that was the only thing. And all the other instruments hidden in the Imperial Court. Nothing in public, just there. We have no chance to hear them. Now for the first time they went out—they made a recording with me, the first time. Can you imagine? If you wanted to buy a record, you had to buy special record made in the Imperial Court! Now we made it, was big, big change for them, and we had to really work hard to get somebody in a high spot to give us permission to play in public.

(Ozawa's first, and last, piano teacher was a specialist in J. S. Bach; Ozawa played every one of Bach's keyboard works.)
What sort of impression did all this make on you?

I don't know. I lived with Bach so many years. Of course, I played a sonata of Beethoven, a sonata of Mozart, but my main training was Bach. I suppose I played, I don't remember, but I played all the piano pieces, starting with the Two-Part Inventions, the Three-Part Inventions, and the Twenty-four Preludes and Fugues. And then we have all the piano parts for the Partitas and the Sinfonie—all of those I played. Was very good training for me.

When did you first know you wanted to be a conductor?

When I was about fourteen, fifteen—end of junior high school. I broke my finger playing English football, Rugby football; I was in front, and I played for about two and a half years. Then, at the last moment, I had a very important game in a tournament, all-Japan tournament, and I broke two fingers in the same game. We lost the game. I couldn't play piano for about half a year; in the meantime I had to make my big decision, if I want to be a musician or not—forget about being pianist. It was very difficult. I made up my mind I wanted to be a musician somehow, and I went into composition, not conducting, because I didn't know anything about conducting. I took lessons in composition. Before that, I had already started a little bit—orchestration and the French method of harmony, and also the German harmony method, of course. About two years later—I think I was about sixteen, when I was in high school—I really wanted to be a conductor, so I started lessons.

Ozawa seems fearless as a musician; he has no apparent weaknesses for some composers or aversions to others. I ask him what are his strong points; he laughs.

I don't know that kind of thing yet, because, really, every day I have to try new things. When you are trying new things, you don't know when it's good or bad. If you repeat it many times, then you know what is good or bad, or sometimes you have to hear other people, too. Fortunately, I have lots of interest in hearing other people. I am connected with young people, which is very important. In this country, Tanglewood is a very good spot for me. I have a big chance to hear young people, young composers, young conductors, young players in the orchestra. But as to what's good about my music, or, the same thing, what do you like most in a music piece to conduct . . . If you come to the period of repeating many things after you have lots of repertoire, then you may say I'm conducting lots of such and such. But now, I'm doing first time a big thing like Haydn piece, first time a Mahler piece—you know those things are very difficult. You have to be like a student.

(Although he communicates beautifully, saying everything simultaneously with his strong-jawed face and lithe arms, he feels handicapped by a lack of grammatical precision.)

What I regret most is my language—not only English, though—sometimes when I want really to understand something noble, like a poem. Very difficult. And also when the conversation is very important, I want to know exactly what is meant. And when it becomes a little bit higher than my English level, I really have problems. And also a great problem for me are other languages, like Italian, German, French, Russian. And it's so much to do with music, like if I want to do an opera, I spend maybe few weeks more than usual conductor who speaks those languages. I have to study more.

Which composers' music do you feel you understand the best?

That's the same question that you gave me before—last week, for instance, I understood Haydn most! (laughs) I was living with Haydn from morning to night. And when you ask me same time Tschaikovsky, I couldn't say I like Tschaikovsky at all. It's like a student: when you have a test, you cannot spend your energy on other things. Right? If you have a mathematics test for this weekend, like Friday you have to concentrate on the mathematics.

But in choosing your repertoire, you don't have any preconceived notion of music that you feel you could do a good job with, as opposed to other composers whom you never really felt particularly close to?

Maybe I have now. For instance, I don't do much Dvořàk now; I never conducted more than two symphonies of Dvořàk. I'm studying a lot of Mahler—I studied lots of Dvořàk, but in my repertoire, I only conducted two symphonies of Dvořàk. Also I conducted one, two, three, four symphonies of Mahler. That shows very weak of Mahler. But I am studying. So sometime—maybe now, maybe next season, or two seasons from now—I think I will do lots of Mahler. So if you say choose to make repertoire for the concert, that's very different from what I'm at now. For instance, I studied Haydn a long time ago, The Creation and The Seasons. For a long time I wanted to do it, but for big period I never did it, for like four or five years—or six years, maybe. I never did do a big Haydn piece. Suddenly, I did. If you asked me the question before last week, like two years ago, I couldn't have mentioned about a big Haydn piece. But I studied Haydn though, before.

Well, what has prompted this interest in Mahler; you decide you want to study Mahler and get into it?

I might not do any Mahler—I study now, I want to know about Mahler. This is why I am studying it. But it does not mean that I might do or will not do—it doesn't make any difference. When you make a program, you sit with lots of scores; my way of making program is I buy lots of scores and I spend time studying, not like I am doing now. For instance, I was studying Haydn's Seasons last week. It is like every note, every German word I have to study. When you study this piece, one week for one Mahler, something like that, you want to really know this piece, really analyze the score. I do lots of scores like that. Then I put it on my desk or my shelf, and when I want to make a program with a particular symphony orchestra, I try to take off those things. It's not my repertoire yet.

You just let it cook inside you?

Yes. That should happen a few years before. Very rarely, when I go to some other people's concerts, I become like I'm in shock—I never knew this music! And then I go home and I order the book and I study it and maybe do it next season even.

When was the last time that happened?

That happened with Mahler's Second. When I heard Mahler's Second, Lenny [Bernstein] did it here, and I heard every rehearsal and performance. He really did that piece just as if he wrote the piece. I felt that way. I even told him. I felt that he wrote this piece and did it by himself. And I wanted to try, so I did Mahler's Second; I studied it right then. And I did it about three weeks ago, in Japan. First time in my life.

The arrival of a new Music Director is often looked upon as the beginning of a new era. How do you see yourself as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the orchestra of Henschel and Nikisch, of Monteux and Koussevitsky, of Munch and Leinsdorf?

Personally and sentimentally, I am very excited, because for me Charles Munch was, and still is, like my father in music. I think he lived one of the most beautiful musician's lives, and the way he made music was really extraordinary. Many things were said about him—that he didn't like rehearsals, for instance. But when he made music, and sometimes—many times—I don't think other people could ever make it the same way. It is something really special. To me, it gives me something big, like sun. (gestures) And this never died in my feeling. I never thought that I could study with him, or come to guest conduct his orchestra. I never dreamed that I would, but I conducted the Boston orchestra, and this orchestra still has that feeling, too. And to work seriously with this orchestra—I know after Munch, Maestros Leinsdorf and Steinberg—that line is there—but I feel still that sentimentally I am very excited about working with the Boston Symphony.

I don't know why, but I think this orchestra has a very special musical ability in it—maybe because of single players. For instance, the chamber group here is really first class. And when they play with the orchestra, also that works. That is very difficult. Many chamber groups don't fit in the big orchestra, but in this case, it fits very well.

Also, Boston, to me, is one of the most musical cities in North America. I think it has one of the most musical backgrounds. It's not because I became Music Director that I think Boston is this way, but before, always I thought Boston has a tradition of real music-making, and also there are always lots of good musicians and young composers around. And many universities. If you go to any other city in North America, you find people who got their first education as a music lover in Boston. They came to Boston as a student—of law, mathematics, economics, anything—then came open eyes and ears for music, and they went home or to work. And they will say, "I came from Boston."

Young musicians from Boston are really great. And also, as a city—many big cities have a big amount of musicians in the pool—but Boston is a very particular city in that those people are making really good music, not just for money. People don't come to Boston just to make money. That, I think, is a very good sign, that if you want to make great music there, people realize that, recognize it. And a musician feels that, and I feel that, and all the young people feel that, too.

Will you have any constraints on your choice of programs as Music Director? Will you have to worry about filling the house?

Of course, of course. I think that the maestro's job in America is big difference from Europe. If you're a maestro in Europe, of an orchestra like a German orchestra, then all the money comes from the government. And you don't have to worry really about the box office. If you have a half house, one program, because you have, say Transfigurations of Messiaen, you need rehearsals for about three weeks, and you could do two performances both for half house. But you should do it. Because this piece might come out really great, and half house means maybe 1500 people, but you really played for 1500 people, instead of 3000 people, but it still means a lot.

Can you do that here in Boston?

If you spend three weeks in rehearsal, and only do the two performances, you can't do it.

Bernstein once said, supposedly, that you can give them anything before intermission as long as you give them Tschaikovsky's Sixth afterwards.

Yeah, but this piece takes two hours, and also

continued on page 62

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

SEP 16 1972

New England Newsclip

Sights and Sounds of the Coming Season

Boston's cultural establishment is moving into high gear for the '72-'73 season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open its season Sept. 22, at Symphony Hall will have in addition to its music adviser, Seiji Ozawa, Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas as principal guest conductors. Other guest conductors will include: William Steinberg, Leonard Bernstein, Daniel Barenboim, Eugen Jochum, Lorin Maazel and Bernard Haitink. Guest soloists include: Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, Theodore Lettvin, Jerome Lowenthal, Joseph Silverstein, Janet Baker, Harold Wright, Kenneth Riegel, Ruggiero Rucci, Martina Arroyo, Lili Chookasian, Richard Cassilly, Robert Hale, Israela to Diaghilev in two parts, will be Jan. 12 and 13. The first concert will feature Debussy's "Jeux poeme danse, Prokofiev's Sythian suite and Stravinsky's Les noces. During the second concert works of Chopin, Strauss, Satie etc. will be performed. The chorus and soloists will be announced.

The third Spectrum series, April 20 and 21, and entitled Venice, will feature works by Gabrieli, Schutz, Stravinsky and Bach.

BOSTON REVIEW OF TI
BO
MO

TIGHT BINDING

Boston Symphony Reveals Conductors

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced its conductors and programs for the 1972-73 season in Symphony Hall.

For this season Seiji Ozawa will preside as Music Adviser with Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas as Principal Guest Conductors.

Guest conductors for the season include William Steinberg, Leonard Bernstein, Daniel Baremboim, Eugen Jochum, Lorin Maazel and Bernard Haitink.

Soloists include Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, Theodore Lettvin, Jerome Lowenthal, Joseph Silverstein, Janet Baker, Harold Wright, Kenneth Riegel, Ruggiero Ricci, Martina Arroyo, Lili Chookasian, Richard Cassilly, Robert Hale, Israela Margalit, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Zara Nelsova, Nerine Barrett and more.

The season will open Sept. 22 at 2 p.m. with Michael Tilson Thomas conducting a program of Beethoven, Piston and Prokofiev.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER &
SUNDAY ADVERTISER
S. 415,000

SEP 17 1972

New England Newscli

Wide va musical e for new s

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

FOLLOWING A summer of rather disappointing repertory at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its season Friday with a rather low key program including Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Prokofiev's Scythian suite "Ala and Lolli", and the premiere of Walter Piston's Flute Concerto with Doriot Anthony Dwyer as soloist.

Next week, however, William Steinberg (who will still be very much in evidence this season) will conduct a rea'

"GLORIOUS PAST"
continued from page 19

rehearsals require maybe minimum of ten. And ten rehearsals mean, in America, two weeks. And maybe three weeks we need. Then what do you do? You can't do it.

Is this a piece you'd like to do?

No. I'm talking about this as an example. But there is one other piece that I would really love to do. I did Turangalila-Symphonie of Messiaen in Canada. We spent three weeks in rehearsals, but spread out. We started rehearsals in October, and the performance was in March. And all those times when I had one rehearsal extra, I did one movement. There are ten movements. And when performance time came, we spent seven, eight rehearsals all together, packed—which means almost double the usual number of rehearsals. In America regular rehearsals means four rehearsals. And then we got a grant from the government. But here in America, it is very rare to get some money, especially from the government, to come to art. Very difficult, isn't it?

Do you have any plans to educate the Boston audience? Are there any pieces that we haven't heard that you feel we should hear?

I don't think so, I don't think so. I think the Boston audience is one of the most educated, or most sophisticated audiences in many ways, not only in the traditional music, but the young people are absolutely ready to hear any kind of music. For instance, Michael Tilson Thomas did the Spectrum series—great success. And Boston is ready for this kind of program. I know many other cities tried this kind of direction for music, and they are having a hard time. It should be successful for every city, but they are having a hard time. And I tried for other cities—it's not very easy. Boston is ready. And Boston has a Pops tradition; the orchestra plays in Pops for many weeks every year, and it seems to be working out very well, and you have enough audience for that, too. So I have a great kind of hope for the city itself.

What do you like most about conducting?

You see, being a conductor is a terribly difficult job, difficult, difficult job. I'm not saying that conducting is difficult because you have to study lots of scores—that's difficult, too. But conductors sometimes have to be between the musician and the association, or the musician and money problems. And the musicians' musical problems—somebody becomes low, or somebody becomes suddenly much better—you have to do something, right?

But a conductor must be like a gauge, he has to move with the reactions from outside or from the orchestra. That's very difficult—like a doctor. You have to know what's going on. Not only studying at home, that's also very much—so many scores, new music coming up. I think already I am too busy to study scores of people who have died. They left so many scores I have to study. But at the same time, now, a new score is finished this moment. Somebody has to see it, otherwise we leave those things somewhere, right? We lose, we lose chances to do that. So that is really a pressure-time. You have to find out—maybe out of ten, or out of a hundred new scores, maybe one great score might come up. If you don't see those scores, they never have a chance. I'm talking about the contemporary. That is a difficult life.

And the difficult life, as I told you, other than scores, is to be between the musician and the city, or musician and association of orchestra. I think a conductor must be born to be ready for that, and also he must learn the situation in every different city. And I am absolutely new to Boston. I must learn the situation here—what is a problem and what is good about the Boston orchestra . . . That's difficult.

Then he laughs.

But the joy, when all those things disappear in my mind, and I come to music, once in a while—one hopes many times a year—once in a while, music becomes like music should be. I can explain easier if I use an opera house example. In an opera house you have to work more problems: stage; sometimes terrible singers, sometimes good, sometimes too bad; orchestra sometimes hates rehearsals, sometimes orchestra doesn't give me rehearsal time. But when Mozart, let's say a Mozart opera, goes well, you find a line, you really feel a line from my finger to the singer, my finger to these violin players, my finger to oboe player, my finger to timpani player, my finger even for the backstage man, electric man. Then, to be a conductor in this spot for even two minutes, even for one piece of music—you know, one short series—you are the happiest man in the world. And I am feeling that once in a while.

For instance, I did Haydn last Sunday. Few spots—we didn't have enough rehearsals; we have only two and a half rehearsals for this long two-hour piece—I felt that. And that is—I can forget all trouble that I have to face, or if we have to have meeting, and after meeting for time or money or problem in union or managing, or my problem. I prefer to be musician, or conductor, that's a joy. This I count, maybe if I am lucky, maybe few—ten times a year. I don't know how many concerts I give, I don't know, how about hundred? Maybe five times that happens. I am not talking only about opera, though—that was only an example. Sometimes even with string orchestra that happens.

And this Boston orchestra has a style already. I think I should not talk comparing it as an orchestra, but it has a style of playing. I am not talking about a Mozart style or Haydn style or Tschaikovsky, but the orchestra knows that music has a style, and they have the ability to fit those styles. At least, they try very hard on each style. In other words, they play Tschaikovsky one way, and when they come to Mozart, they play another way, and when they see the Haydn parts in front of them they play differently. That I call style. They have that. So I think, if we get together more often, I think this joy moment should happen more often. And that really I am waiting for.

I hope we have exciting programs as well as, you know, the traditional programs in Boston. As I said, Boston is ready for so many things. I'm sure I could use, try more things than in any other city. That is my feeling.

2.

PHOENIX
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 25,000

SEP 5 1972 New England Newsclip

Mausoleums, Music Hall, and Comic Muse

By Richard Buell

Erich Leinsdorf with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There is an MBTA subway stop named "Symphony" and it's on the Arborway-via-Huntington line that has such lousy service. (The sadists who operate this line often instruct drivers not to stop to pick up passengers at Park Street, but to rattle on through. You have been warned.) Upstairs from Symphony station at Massachusetts and Huntington Avenues is one of the best-sounding concert halls anywhere, Symphony Hall. One Dr. Sabine of the turn-of-the-century Harvard faculty was responsible for its fine acoustics. Those niches above the second balcony housing the Greek nudes are there for the purpose of transmitting sound, which they certainly do. The escutcheon over the stage, with its crudely lettered BEETHOVEN, is not functional. Symphony Hall is the place where visiting medium-to-large instrumental and choral ensembles perform (also small groups and solo performers with large fees), but primarily it's the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The BSO was founded in 1881 and has at times been a supremely great orchestra. This season the men will be without a captain and without a rudder, and guest conductors, some of them eminent, will be in and out. Seiji Ozawa takes over as Music Director next year. The least lively thing about the BSO is its "traditions." The Friday afternoon concerts are a quaint and chilling example. Several hundred genteel and carefully tailored ladies are transported from exurbia by Mercedes-Benz bus and limousine to partake of some not overly stimulating musical uplift for a period not exceeding two and a quarter hours. Any deviations from this regimen will cause them to express disapproval by means of rattling their programs, their jewelry and their dentures.

That's not the whole story, of course. Expensive subscriptions and medium-priced subscriptions are and always will be available for the purposes of conspicuous cultural consumption, but there are accommodations for you and me by way of short series, student tickets, and "rush" seats. The BSO has recently been after the untraditional in its "Spectrum" series, the brainchild of Michael Tilson Thomas. Look into that.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
S. 195,767

SEP 3 1972 New England Newsclip

WPI's Spectrum Series Is Tops

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

WHEN JEROME ROSEN takes his place as the new assistant concertmaster of the Boston Symphony this month, he will look familiar to Worcester audiences. He will also be concertmaster of the Boston Pops Orchestra.

Rosen has appeared for several years at the Worcester Festival as associate concertmaster of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra.

He fills the post vacated by Alfred Krips who has retired as assistant concertmaster of the Boston after 38 years with the orchestra.

EAGLE
WESTFORD, MASS.
W. 2,000

SEP 21 1972 New England Newsclip

Mr. William Gibson of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Corley play an Alpine horn (right) and a long herald trumpet (left).

Demonstration and Concert of Ancient Brass Instruments

HARVARD — Mr. William Gibson principal trombonist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will demonstrate and give a concert of ancient brass instruments on Friday, September 22 in Bromfield Lecture Hall at 8 p.m. The public is cordially invited by The Warner Free Lecture Fund to attend this first program of their Fall series.

As the program for 1972-73 Warner Free Lecture Fund is not complete, notices have not been sent to townspeople. Therefore, we would appreciate readers notifying others whom they feel might be interested in this program.

ENNIS, TEXAS
NEWS
D. 4,600

SEP 19 1972

The 72-73 season of the Dallas Civic Music will present four of the world's top musical artists and an outstanding chamber ensemble. It will open Nov. 8 with the keyboard talents of Lili Kraus, (5) renowned Hungarian pianist. Native-born American soprano, Marilyn Horne, (2), of the Metropolitan Opera graces the McFarlin Auditorium stage (where all Civic Music concerts are held), Dec. 6. Concert No. 3, Feb. 3, will present the brilliant Metropolitan Opera tenor, Luciano Pavarotti, (1) who will amaze with his range and power. Filling the 4th concert bill on March 13, will be Stephen Bishop, (3) an English pianist highly acclaimed by European audiences. The season closes strongly with an ensemble of twelve first-deck musicians from the Boston Symphony Orchestra known as the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. They will provide the final program on Apr. 30.

PRESS
MIDDLETOWN, CONN.
D. 19,775

SEP 15 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO, Godspell At Bushnell:

Michael Tilson Thomas, above, brings the Boston Symphony to Hartford on Jan. 16. A staging of the rock musical "Godspell" right, begins on Dec. 29. Series tickets for symphony, ballet, opera, concerts, musicals and travel films are available at the Bushnell.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

SEP 23 1972 New England Newsclip

ALL STRUNG OUT — Rubin Green, a violist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took time out from yesterday's opening day of the orchestra's 1972-73 season to check a new viola, one of many on display at Back Bay store specializing in stringed instruments. (Globe photo by Ted Dully)

4

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
SEP 22 1972
New England Newsclip

IN CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra — Symphony Hall, official opening today at 2, and Sept. 23 at 8:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the B.S.O. in selections including the world premiere of Walter Piston's Flute Concerto, Beethoven's 7th Symphony, and Prokofiev's Scythian Suite. Featured on flute for the Piston work will be Doriot Anthony Dwyer.

SUBURBAN PRESS
AND RECORDER
NATICK, MASS.
W. 5,300
SEP 21 1972
New England Newsclip

THE BEST -- The Boston Symphony launches its season Sept. 22 with Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, a world premiere of Piston's Flute Concerto, and Prokofiev's Scythian Suite, "Ala and Lolli." The Friday performance is at 2 p.m., a Saturday performance is at 8:30, and the program will be repeated Sept. 26 at 7:30 p.m. and Oct. 10 at 8:30 p.m. Call 266-1492 for information. Featured Sept. 28, 29, 30 and Oct. 3 are Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis, and Mahler's Second Symphony.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
SEP 22 1972
New England Newsclip

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
SEP 12 1972
New England Newsclip

Back at Symphony Hall

Now one of the Boston Symphony's two principal guest conductors, Michael Tilson Thomas opens the orchestra's 92nd season on Friday afternoon, Sept. 22 (preceded by an open rehearsal the evening before) with works by Beethoven, Walter Piston, and Prokofiev. The program will be repeated, with flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer as soloist, on Sept. 23 and 26, and Oct. 10.

INFORMAL TRIO — Doriot Dwyer, principal flutist of the Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas (rear), and Walter Piston read the score for Piston's new flute concerto. Thomas will conduct BSO in world premiere of Piston's concerto today at Symphony Hall. (Globe photo by Ted Dully)

BSO to premiere Piston flute concerto

By Thomas Dotton
Globe Staff

Michael Tilson Thomas will tonight conduct the world premiere of a flute concerto by Boston composer Walter Piston at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 92d season.

The concerto, completed in the past year after what the composer called "20 years' thought and association with flutists," is the newest of a long list of Piston compositions written for first performance with the BSO.

Piston was the Walter M. Naumberg professor emeritus of Music of Harvard University. The late Serge Koussevitsky was responsible for the debut of many of Piston's works including the Third Symphony for which he won the 1948 Pulitzer Prize.

Charles Munch continued the friendship by commissioning The Sixth Symphony for Piston's 75th birthday. BSO violinist Joseph Silverstein was soloist part at the Boston debut of the Violin Concerto.

And Erich Leinsdorf directed the premiere of Piston's Eighth Symphony.

"In fact, the sound of the BSO is the sound I hear when I compose," Piston said, "Every note I put down on paper I hear played by the orchestra.

"My experience with the BSO is a unique experience for a composer, with the orchestra at one point performing a new work of mine every year for 13 years. I have been left with the pleasant problem of writing for particular players."

The flute concerto, he explained, grew out of a promise made to Thomas and BSO flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer to compose a new work for them.

"I made the promise on a radio talk show with Michael, so I had to write the work," he said, adding that for many years he wanted to compose for Mrs. Dwyer, who in 1952 became the first woman principal with the BSO.

"It's the same old Piston, which means that it's mine but that everything I do is a new experience for me. There are new sounds in the piece. I made progress. And I am more or less pleased with the work," he said.

However, he was reticent about the music.

"All I can say is that it's a three-movement piece. There is one movement which is an exercise in growth controlled by design, but I can't explain how the work should be performed or what the music is about," he added.

He said his ideas about the piece are now "irrelevant," because once a work is finished it is no longer his.

His ultimate pleasure, he explained, would be, "To sit and see an audience of thousands of people listening to my music, knowing each person would have his own individual response. And I would know each response would be just as valid because a person can only get a message from music in terms of his own background."

He said, "I have absolute confidence in Thomas. And Mrs. Dwyer is one of the best flutists around. She's amazing."

"What they do with the work will be according to their vision. The performance will stand. The public has the right and the responsibility to decide about the music I've written."

The 78-year-old Piston, said he has several unfinished projects, hopes to have a cello and piano composition completed "in a month or two." It is a promised piece.

ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
CITIZEN ITEM
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 8,900
SEP 21 1972
New England Newsclip

Symphony opens concert pairs

Michael Tilson Thomas, Principal Guest Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony in the first pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, Friday afternoon, Sept. 22 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Sept. 23 at 8:30 p.m. Thomas conducts the same program on Tuesday evening, Oct. 10 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist for these concerts is Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Principal Flute for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mrs. Dwyer, the soloist for these concerts, joined the Orchestra in 1952. She is a member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. The work by Walter Piston was dedicated to Mrs. Dwyer.

The concert opens with Thomas conducting Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A, followed by Walter Piston's Flute Concerto with Doriot Anthony Dwyer as soloist. The work was composed in 1971 by Piston in his Belmont home and is dedicated to Mrs. Dwyer. The program closes with Prokofiev's Scythian suite, "Ala and Lolli."

Thomas is well known to Boston audiences. This year he continues to direct the Boston Symphony's Spectrum Concerts, which he created. During the past two years, Thomas has conducted many of the major orchestras in this country, and in Europe and Japan. This season he returns for guest engagements with the Israel Philharmonic, the London Symphony, the New Philharmonia, and the New York Philharmonic, with which he begins his first season as Music Director of the nationally-televised "Young People's Concerts." He also makes his debut with the Lincoln Center Chamber Music Society, begins his second year with the Buffalo Philharmonic and assumes the position of Visiting Adjunct Professor of Music at the State University of New York in Buffalo.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549
SEP 24 1972
New England Newsclip

Our Dinosaurs' Are Very Alive

By RAYMOND ERICSON

AMERICA'S symphony orchestras, harassed by deficits and by critics who call them musical dinosaurs, persevere. They are, in fact, among this nation's glories, and many of them are expanding —not contracting—their activities. These are the days when they are tuning up for a new season, beginning to rehearse and perform the programs that were planned by their music directors as long as a year and a half ago.

Browsing through the orchestras' schedules does not provide any surprises or suggest any strong trends. The repertory remains basically the same, with some works such as the symphonies of Bruckner and Mahler more firmly established than ever before. Beethoven cycles or festivals have not disappeared by any means. Some composers are getting substantial retrospectives—Stravinsky and Haydn by the New York Philharmonic, Berlioz by the Montreal Symphony, for example. Anniversaries are being observed—1973 is the 100th of Rachmaninoff's birth, and it will mean more performances than ever of his popular piano concertos, with a few revivals of his Second Symphony, Symphonic Dances and "The Bells."

There seems to be a growing interest in presenting opera in concert versions, especially those not likely to be staged in the orchestra's home city—all or parts of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," (Continued on Page 29)

Continued from Page 17

"Tannhäuser" and "Götterdämmerung," Pfitzner's "Palestrina," Rossini's "Count Ory," Falla's "Vida Breve." And in concert scheduling, Cincinnati's Friday morning series was successfully copied in Detroit last season and is being continued, with Cleveland trying it out this season.

The list of world or American premieres seems smaller than last year, but there are some works that look promising enough to become repertory items. The Philadelphia Orchestra, long a Shostakovich proponent, will give the first performance this side of the Atlantic of the composer's 15th Symphony on Thursday and will bring it to New York on Oct. 2. The New York Philharmonic will have a world premiere in Luciano Berio's Two-Piano Concerto on March 15.

*

In its opening concert this past Friday, the Boston Symphony was set to introduce a new Flute Concerto by Walter Piston, with the orchestra's first flutist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, as soloist.

SUBURBAN PRESS
NATICK, MASS.
W. 3,500
SEP 14 1972
New England Newsclip

Music lovers

THE BEST -- The Boston Symphony launches its season Sept. 22 with Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, a world premiere of Piston's Flute Concerto, and Prokofiev's Scythian Suite, "Ala and Lolli." The Friday performance is at 2 p.m., a Saturday performance is at 8:30, and the program will be repeated Sept. 26 at 7:30 p.m. and Oct. 10 at 8:30 p.m. Call 266-1492 for information. Featured Sept. 28, 29, 30 and Oct. 3 are Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis, and Mahler's Second Symphony.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,385
SEP 20 1972
New England Newsclip

Harold Banks

The BSO's first flautist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, [illegible] be expected to outdo her usual virtuoso performances [illegible] weekend. She'll be soloist in the world premiere of [illegible] "Flute Concerto" that double Pulitzer Prize winner, Wal[illegible] Piston, Harvard professor emeritus, wrote for her. [illegible] about as high a compliment a composer can pay to [illegible] performer...

4

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
SEP 22 1972
New England Newsclip

IN CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra — Symphony Hall, official opening today at 2, and Sept. 23 at 8:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the B.S.O. in selections including the world premiere of Walter Piston's Flute Concerto, Beethoven's 7th Symphony, and Prokofiev's Scythian Suite. Featured on flute for the Piston work will be Doriot Anthony Dwyer.

SUBURBAN PRESS
AND RECORDER
NATICK, MASS.
W. 5,300
SEP 21 1972
New England Newsclip

THE BEST -- The Boston Symphony launches its season Sept. 22 with Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, a world premiere of Piston's Flute Concerto, and Prokofiev's Scythian Suite, "Ala and Lolli." The Friday performance is at 2 p.m., a Saturday performance is at 8:30, and the program will be repeated Sept. 26 at 7:30 p.m. and Oct. 10 at 8:30 p.m. Call 266-1492 for information. Featured Sept. 28, 29, 30 and Oct. 3 are Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis, and Mahler's Second Symphony.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
SEP 22 1972
New England Newsclip

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
SEP 12 1972
New England Newsclip

Back at Symphony Hall

Now one of the Boston Symphony's two principal guest conductors, Michael Tilson Thomas opens the orchestra's 92nd season on Friday afternoon, Sept. 22 (preceded by an open rehearsal the evening before) with works by Beethoven, Walter Piston, and Prokofiev. The program will be repeated, with flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer as soloist, on Sept. 23 and 26, and Oct. 10.

INFORMAL TRIO — Doriot Dwyer, principal flutist of the Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas (rear), and Walter Piston read the score for Piston's new flute concerto. Thomas will conduct BSO in world premiere of Piston's concerto today at Symphony Hall. (Globe photo by Ted Dully)

BSO to premiere Piston flute concerto

By Thomas Dotton
Globe Staff

Michael Tilson Thomas will tonight conduct the world premiere of a flute concerto by Boston composer Walter Piston at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 92d season.

The concerto, completed in the past year after what the composer called "20 years' thought and association with flutists," is the newest of a long list of Piston compositions written for first performance with the BSO.

Piston was the Walter M. Naumberg professor emeritus of Music of Harvard University. The late Serge Koussevitsky was responsible for the debut of many of Piston's works including the Third Symphony for which he won the 1948 Pulitzer Prize.

Charles Munch continued the friendship by commissioning The Sixth Symphony for Piston's 75th birthday. BSO violinist Joseph Silverstein was soloist part at the Boston debut of the Violin Concerto.

And Erich Leinsdorf directed the premiere of Piston's Eighth Symphony.

"In fact, the sound of the BSO is the sound I hear when I compose," Piston said, "Every note I put down on paper I hear played by the orchestra.

"My experience with the BSO is a unique experience for a composer, with the orchestra at one point performing a new work of mine every year for 13 years. I have been left with the pleasant problem of writing for particular players."

The flute concerto, he explained, grew out of a promise made to Thomas and BSO flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer to compose a new work for them.

"I made the promise on a radio talk show with Michael, so I had to write the work," he said, adding that for many years he wanted to compose for Mrs. Dwyer, who in 1952 became the first woman principal with the BSO.

"It's the same old Piston, which means that it's mine but that everything I do is a new experience for me. There are new sounds in the piece. I made progress. And I am more or less pleased with the work," he said.

However, he was reticent about the music.

"All I can say is that it's a three-movement piece. There is one movement which is an exercise in growth controlled by design, but I can't explain how the work should be performed or what the music is about," he added.

He said his ideas about the piece are now "irrelevant," because once a work is finished it is no longer his.

His ultimate pleasure, he explained, would be, "To sit and see an audience of thousands of people listening to my music, knowing each person would have his own individual response. And I would know each response would be just as valid because a person can only get a message from music in terms of his own background."

He said, "I have absolute confidence in Thomas. And Mrs. Dwyer is one of the best flutists around. She's amazing."

"What they do with the work will be according to their vision. The performance will stand. The public has the right and the responsibility to decide about the music I've written."

The 78-year-old Piston, said he has several unfinished projects, hopes to have a cello and piano composition completed "in a month or two." It is a promised piece.

ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
CITIZEN ITEM
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 8,900
SEP 21 1972
New England Newsclip

Symphony opens concert pairs

Michael Tilson Thomas, Principal Guest Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony in the first pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, Friday afternoon, Sept. 22 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Sept. 23 at 8:30 p.m. Thomas conducts the same program on Tuesday evening, Oct. 10 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist for these concerts is Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Principal Flute for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mrs. Dwyer, the soloist for these concerts, joined the Orchestra in 1952. She is a member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. The work by Walter Piston was dedicated to Mrs. Dwyer.

The concert opens with Thomas conducting Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A, followed by Walter Piston's Flute Concerto with Doriot Anthony Dwyer as soloist. The work was composed in 1971 by Piston in his Belmont home and is dedicated to Mrs. Dwyer. The program closes with Prokofiev's Scythian suite, "Ala and Lolli."

Thomas is well known to Boston audiences. This year he continues to direct the Boston Symphony's Spectrum Concerts, which he created. During the past two years, Thomas has conducted many of the major orchestras in this country, and in Europe and Japan. This season he returns for guest engagements with the Israel Philharmonic, the London Symphony, the New Philharmonia, and the New York Philharmonic, with which he begins his first season as Music Director of the nationally-televised "Young People's Concerts." He also makes his debut with the Lincoln Center Chamber Music Society, begins his second year with the Buffalo Philharmonic and assumes the position of Visiting Adjunct Professor of Music at the State University of New York in Buffalo.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549
SEP 24 1972
New England Newsclip

Our 'Dinosaurs' Are Very Alive

By RAYMOND ERICSON

AMERICA'S symphony orchestras, harassed by deficits and by critics who call them musical dinosaurs, persevere. They are, in fact, among this nation's glories, and many of them are expanding —not contracting—their activities. These are the days when they are tuning up for a new season, beginning to rehearse and perform the programs that were planned by their music directors as long as a year and a half ago.

Browsing through the orchestras' schedules does not provide any surprises or suggest any strong trends. The repertory remains basically the same, with some works such as the symphonies of Bruckner and Mahler more firmly established than ever before. Beethoven cycles or festivals have not disappeared by any means. Some composers are getting substantial retrospectives—Stravinsky and Haydn by the New York Philharmonic, Berlioz by the Montreal Symphony, for example. Anniversaries are being observed—1973 is the 100th of Rachmaninoff's birth, and it will mean more performances than ever of his popular piano concertos, with a few revivals of his Second Symphony, Symphonic Dances and "The Bells."

There seems to be a growing interest in presenting opera in concert versions, especially those not likely to be staged in the orchestra's home city—all or parts of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," (Continued on Page 29)

Continued from Page 17

"Tannhäuser" and "Götterdämmerung," Pfitzner's "Palestrina," Rossini's "Count Ory," Falla's "Vida Breve." And in concert scheduling, Cincinnati's Friday morning series was successfully copied in Detroit last season and is being continued, with Cleveland trying it out this season.

The list of world or American premieres seems smaller than last year, but there are some works that look promising enough to become repertory items. The Philadelphia Orchestra, long a Shostakovich proponent, will give the first performance this side of the Atlantic of the composer's 15th Symphony on Thursday and will bring it to New York on Oct. 2. The New York Philharmonic will have a world premiere in Luciano Berio's Two-Piano Concerto on March 15.

*

In its opening concert this past Friday, the Boston Symphony was set to introduce a new Flute Concerto by Walter Piston, with the orchestra's first flutist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, as soloist.

SUBURBAN PRESS
NATICK, MASS.
W. 3,500
SEP 14 1972
New England Newsclip

Music lovers

THE BEST -- The Boston Symphony launches its season Sept. 22 with Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, a world premiere of Piston's Flute Concerto, and Prokofiev's Scythian Suite, "Ala and Lolli." The Friday performance is at 2 p.m., a Saturday performance is at 8:30, and the program will be repeated Sept. 26 at 7:30 p.m. and Oct. 10 at 8:30 p.m. Call 266-1492 for information. Featured Sept. 28, 29, 30 and Oct. 3 are Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis, and Mahler's Second Symphony.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 212,885
SEP 30 1972
New England Newsclip

Harold Banks

The BSO's first flautist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, can be expected to outdo her usual virtuoso performances this weekend. She'll be soloist in the world premiere of the "Flute Concerto" that double Pulitzer Prize winner, Walter Piston, Harvard professor emeritus, wrote for her. It's about as high a compliment a composer can pay to a performer...

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
SEP 23 1972
New England Newsclip

Thomas conducts BSO's 92d opening concert

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

With Michael Tilson Thomas in charge — he shares with Colin Davis the title of Principal Guest Conductor — the Boston Symphony Orchestra started its 92d season yesterday afternoon. There was Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite" for a brilliant and loud beginning, and the Beethoven Seventh for a brilliant and pretty loud finish. Between them came the first performance of Walter Piston's Concerto for Flute and Orchestra, written for and played by Doriet Anthony Dwyer. That, by the way is the only piece written within the last 15 years which the orchestra will play on a regular (that is non-Spectrum) subscription program.

Piston has written a chamber-music work in three linked movements, going from a declamatory, recitative-like opening, through slower music in more sustained style, to what I should like to call paradoxically an interrupted perpetuum mobile. It is a grateful virtuoso piece, in which, perhaps surprisingly, the slower music near the beginning provides a more effective show of the player's brilliance and taste than the fireworks later on. The virtuoso demands are of a conventional sort: no double-stops, key-clackings, and so on.

The orchestral writing is beautifully conceived and managed. The ensemble is fairly small, but its sounds are so delicate, so carefully chosen, and there is so nearly complete an avoidance of tutti style, that it sounds still smaller than it is. The sounds the orchestra makes are attractive and, in all their conservatism, wonderfully fresh. Sometimes an accompanist, the orchestra most of the time offers the soloist partners in dialogue. Or, to tell it another way, the soloist passes herself around to be conversed or played with in an almost balletic manner like, for example, the princess with her four cavaliers in the "Sleeping Beauty" Rose Adagio, or Siefgried moving among the six princesses in the ballroom scene of "Swan Lake."

Piston warned an interviewer that the flute concerto was going to be "the same old Piston." For the finale, perhaps yes. For the beginning, no, with its arresting melodic shapes and its fine play of textures, he found his way to a place that is new for him. The end I thought perfunctory and therefore, disappointing; for the first two thirds or so of his new concerto, he worked not only with the immaculate craftsmanship that has been the hallmark of his work for half a century now, but also at an imposing level of intellectual concentration and vigor — inspiration, if you like. The performance was a brilliantly effective one.

For the Beethoven Seventh, Thomas re-seated the orchestra in the pre-Stokowski arrangement, with second violins on the right, opposite the firsts, with viola an cellos respectively left and right of center (Kempe who will be here with the Royal Philharmonic Oct. 29, and Boult are, so far as I know, the only conductors who do that regularly). It delightfully clarified the scoring of the second movement, making much of the addition to low strings first of second violins on one side, and only later of first violins on the other, or of the special sonorous character of the duet for first violins and violas. It also produced some telling moments in the other movements. I wonder to what extent the effectiveness was visual (could I tell the difference blindfolded?), but looking is after all a real part of concert experience for most people, and for a performer to address his audience's eyes as well as its ears is legitimate, subject though it is to horrendous abuse.

There was in any case plenty for the ear in this intelligent, hugely energetic performance (though I am only half persuaded that the finale wants to be quite so wild). For the most part it was beautifully played, with a bright, open, aerated sound — there is still, as a hangover from Leinsdorf's rhythmic slackness, some dissension about the trochees in the scherze, a faction of winds led by Mrs. Dwyer making the long syllable rather too short, and with strings tending to over compensate.

The "Scythian Suite" which stands up as one of Prokofiev's strongest, most original pieces, sounded gorgeous in its controlled gaudiness. The program is repeated tonight and on two Tuesdays, Sept. 26 and Oct. 10 all at 8:30.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885
SEP 23 1972
New England Newsclip

Symphony Review

92nd Season Opens

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 92nd season yesterday afternoon and marked the occasion with the premiere of Walter Piston's Flute Concerto, Doriot Anthony Dwyer as soloist. However, the real celebratory event of the the concert — if one goes by musical quality and stunning performance — was, unbelievably, the Beethoven Seventh Symphony.

If the BSO can be said to have a composer-in-residence or composer laureate, it is Piston, whose association with the orchestra goes back to the Koussevitzky regime. His concerto is one of a long string of works he has written with the BSO and/or its solo players in mind.

Conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, it proved to be a brief all-in-one-movement showpiece for Ms. Dwyer, offering plenty of passage work, trills, leaps and assorted varieties of coloratura. The idiom, which the composer would call "the same old Piston," is conservative; the harmonies probably wouldn't offend any Friday afternoon listeners with their low dissonance tolerance, and the form is fairly traditional (three discernible sections corresponding to movements and a cadenza for the soloist).

The orchestra is deployed in something of a chamber-like manner with colors chosen and blended with economy and deliberation. The solo flute remains almost entirely i nthe forefront of the proceedings.

As for the engagingness of the music, I have the usual reservations about precipitate judgements, but my initial impression is of a perky final section and some attractive lyric moments in the second, but an overall dryness and shallowness not really conpensated by the brilliance of the solo part.

Thomas' conducting of the Beethoven was a real surprise, not so much because he brought any eccentric or even unusual ideas to the performance, but because he insisted on polished playing and serious attitude. It was most definitely not one of those hack jobs that results when a conductor programs something "the boys can throw together in one run-through" in order to concentrate rehearsal time on a newer or more difficult piece. In fact, to Thomas' credit, the entire concert sounded as if everything had been carefully re-thought.

The Beethoven seemed astonishingly fresh — in the way a piece can that has been put away for years and then ressurrected. Dynamic contrasts one hasn't heard in a long time were there (real pianissimos), the articulation was sharp and the pacing very exciting.

The players seemed quite turned-on and performed beautifully in Piston and Beethoven as well as in the Prokofiev "Scythian Suite," which is too ugly to deserve it. Taken from an abortive ballet about a primitive tribe, the suite is brutal (and brutish) and Thomas exploited every shred of savagery in it, concluding with an ear-blowing climax.

POST GAZETTE
(ANGLO-ITALIAN)
BOSTON, MASS.
14,900
SEP 22 1972
New England Newsclip

Doriot Anthony Dwyer Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra

Michael Tilson Thomas, Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted the Boston Symphony in the first pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, this afternoon, tomorrow evening, September 23 at 8:30 p.m. Mr. Thomas will conduct the same program on Tuesday evening, October 10 at 8:30 p.m. Mr. Thomas will conduct the same program on Tuesday evening, October 10 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist for these concerts is Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Principal Flute for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert opened with Mr. Thomas conducting Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A, followed by Walter Piston's Flute Concerto with Doriot Anthony Dwyer as soloist. The work was composed in 1971 by Mr. Piston in his Belmont home and is dedicated to Mrs. Dwyer. The program closed with Prokofiev's Scythian Suite, "Ala and Lolli."

Mr. Thomas is well known to Boston audiences. This year he continues to direct the Boston Symphony's Spectrum Concerts, which he created. During the past two years, Mr. Thomas has conducted many of the major orchestras in this country, and in Europe and Japan. This season he returns for guest engagements with the Israel Philharmonic, the London Symphony, the New Philharmonia, and the New York Philharmonic, with which he begins his first season as Music Director of the nationally-televised "Young People's Concerts". He also makes his debut with the Lincoln Center Chamber Music Society, begins his second year with the Buffalo Philharmonic and assumes the position of Visiting Adjunct Professor of Music at the State University of New York in Buffalo.

Mrs. Dwyer, the soloist for these concerts, joined the Orchestra in 1952. She is a member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525
SEP 28 1972
New England Newsclip

In Concert

Some Things New

By Peter M. Knapp

So it's fall again already and the Boston Symphony is back in town, opening its 92nd season.

There are changes. William Steinberg is gone, and the orchestra is temporarily without a music director. Seiji Ozawa takes the job next season, but this year he's otherwise committed and is serving as "music adviser."

Most of the conducting will be done by Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas, the principal guest conductors. It's not an ideal arrangement, having no permanent hand on the helm, but apparently the best that could be worked out.

More changes: The BSO program book is now Tanglewood-sized, and 8½ by 11-inch magazine-type format replacing the familiar smaller, meaty booklets, and the orchestra expects more advertising revenue as a result; the picture gallery on the second floor is being remodeled as the Cabot-Cahners Room for meetings, receptions and occasional dining, and the corridors are to be carpeted (neither project finished yet because of a delay in supplies); and there's a new man in the No. 2 chair, Jerome Rosen from Detroit, replacing the retiring veteran Alfred Krips as assistant concertmaster.

So on to the music-making. Michael Tilson Thomas was on the podium for the opening series, choosing Prokofiev's Scythian Suite "Ala and Lolli," Walter Piston's new Concerto for Flute and Orchestra, dedicated to and performed by Doriot Anthony Dwyer, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A.

Early Pagan

At Tuesday night's performance, The Scythian Suite was the most interesting. Not that it is Prokofiev's best. It is an early work by the Russian composer, at 23 fresh out of the conservatory and evidently buffeted by varying influences. Diaghilev had commissioned the young talent to write a ballet, and Prokofiev used a scenario based on a Slav myth in which an evil spirit (marvelously named Chuzhbog) steals a wooden idol (Ala) which eventually is rescued by the Scythian warrior Lolli.

It's all very elemental and pagan, and Prokofiev turned to with evident relish, using a large orchestra, vivid sound effects, grinding harmonies, barbaric rhythms . . . apparently intending to prove he could be as primitive as Moussorgsky, as exotic as Rimsky-Korsakoff, as revolutionary and colorful as Stravinsky. Well, Diaghilev turned down the ballet, but Prokofiev rescued the suite.

Prokofiev wrote better music than this extroverted, exotic score, but despite its purple cliches and orchestral costume jewelry, some of it is quite effective, and Thomas gave it a vivid, exuberant showing.

Maine native, long-time Harvard professor, two-time Pulitzer Prize winner, Walter Piston for many years has been associated with the Boston Symphony, and the audience gave him affectionate standing applause after the performance of his Flute Concerto, completed last year. Though known as a craftsman of traditional orientation, Piston in this work employs more "progressive" elements than one usually encounters in his music and the writing seems atypical of him — not necessarily a fault.

Walter Piston

The concerto is in three sections, linked in one continuous movement. Piston notes, "I have wished to compose communicative music suited to the instrument and exhibiting some of its resources in combination with the orchestra, the latter being conceived as a partner, not simply an accompanist."

The soloist gets most of the work, though, and the orchestral part often seems to serve more as punctuation than independent exposition. The flute part is generally elaborate and trilly, which suits the instrument, though there is a ruminative middle section where the soloist carries an attractive legato line. In contrast, most of the orchestral writing is spare, upper strings usually separated from the lower and having a Hindemith flavor. At first hearing, I can't honestly say the work made a deep impression, but Miss Dwyer's playing was characteristically skillful and agile.

For the Beethoven Seventh, Thomas rearranged his orchestra European style, with the celli, in front of him, second violins to his right (where the celli normally reside). Persumably it was to provide a different aural mixture, but most of the performance sounded loud, fast and jumpy, at times screechy.

Thomas evidently sought additional vigor and energy, but most of the symphony sounded super-heated and driven at the expense of detail and comfort, and the last movement exceeded the speed limit.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
SEP 23 1972
New England Newsclip

Thomas conducts BSO's 92d opening concert

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

With Michael Tilson Thomas in charge — he shares with Colin Davis the title of Principal Guest Conductor — the Boston Symphony Orchestra started its 92d season yesterday afternoon. There was Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite" for a brilliant and loud beginning, and the Beethoven Seventh for a brilliant and pretty loud finish. Between them came the first performance of Walter Piston's Concerto for Flute and Orchestra, written for and played by Doriet Anthony Dwyer. That, by the way is the only piece written within the last 15 years which the orchestra will play on a regular (that is non-Spectrum) subscription program.

Piston has written a chamber-music work in three linked movements, going from a declamatory, recitative-like opening, through slower music in more sustained style, to what I should like to call paradoxically an interrupted perpetuum mobile. It is a grateful virtuoso piece, in which, perhaps surprisingly, the slower music near the beginning provides a more effective show of the player's brilliance and taste than the fireworks later on. The virtuoso demands are of a conventional sort: no double-stops, key-clackings, and so on.

The orchestral writing is beautifully conceived and managed. The ensemble is fairly small, but its sounds are so delicate, so carefully chosen, and there is so nearly complete an avoidance of tutti style, that it sounds still smaller than it is. The sounds the orchestra makes are attractive and, in all their conservatism, wonderfully fresh. Sometimes an accompanist, the orchestra most of the time offers the soloist partners in dialogue. Or, to tell it another way, the soloist passes herself around to be conversed or played with in an almost balletic manner like, for example, the princess with her four cavaliers in the "Sleeping Beauty" Rose Adagio, or Siefgried moving among the six princesses in the ballroom scene of "Swan Lake."

Piston warned an interviewer that the flute concerto was going to be "the same old Piston." For the finale, perhaps yes. For the beginning, no, with its arresting melodic shapes and its fine play of textures, he found his way to a place that is new for him. The end I thought perfunctory and therefore, disappointing; for the first two thirds or so of his new concerto, he worked not only with the immaculate craftsmanship that has been the hallmark of his work for half a century now, but also at an imposing level of intellectual concentration and vigor — inspiration, if you like. The performance was a brilliantly effective one.

For the Beethoven Seventh, Thomas re-seated the orchestra in the pre-Stokowski arrangement, with second violins on the right, opposite the firsts, with viola an cellos respectively left and right of center (Kempe who will be here with the Royal Philharmonic Oct. 29, and Boult are, so far as I know, the only conductors who do that regularly). It delightfully clarified the scoring of the second movement, making much of the addition to low strings first of second violins on one side, and only later of first violins on the other, or of the special sonorous character of the duet for first violins and violas. It also produced some telling moments in the other movements. I wonder to what extent the effectiveness was visual (could I tell the difference blindfolded?), but looking is after all a real part of concert experience for most people, and for a performer to address his audience's eyes as well as its ears is legitimate, subject though it is to horrendous abuse.

There was in any case plenty for the ear in this intelligent, hugely energetic performance (though I am only half persuaded that the finale wants to be quite so wild). For the most part it was beautifully played, with a bright, open, aerated sound — there is still, as a hangover from Leinsdorf's rhythmic slackness, some dissension about the trochees in the scherze, a faction of winds led by Mrs. Dwyer making the long syllable rather too short, and with strings tending to over compensate.

The "Scythian Suite" which stands up as one of Prokofiev's strongest, most original pieces, sounded gorgeous in its controlled gaudiness. The program is repeated tonight and on two Tuesdays, Sept. 26 and Oct. 10 all at 8:30.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885
SEP 23 1972
New England Newsclip

Symphony Review

92nd Season Opens

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 92nd season yesterday afternoon and marked the occasion with the premiere of Walter Piston's Flute Concerto, Doriot Anthony Dwyer as soloist. However, the real celebratory event of the the concert — if one goes by musical quality and stunning performance — was, unbelievably, the Beethoven Seventh Symphony.

If the BSO can be said to have a composer-in-residence or composer laureate, it is Piston, whose association with the orchestra goes back to the Koussevitzky regime. His concerto is one of a long string of works he has written with the BSO and/or its solo players in mind.

Conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, it proved to be a brief all-in-one-movement showpiece for Ms. Dwyer, offering plenty of passage work, trills, leaps and assorted varieties of coloratura. The idiom, which the composer would call "the same old Piston," is conservative; the harmonies probably wouldn't offend any Friday afternoon listeners with their low dissonance tolerance, and the form is fairly traditional (three discernible sections corresponding to movements and a cadenza for the soloist).

The orchestra is deployed in something of a chamber-like manner with colors chosen and blended with economy and deliberation. The solo flute remains almost entirely i nthe forefront of the proceedings.

As for the engagingness of the music, I have the usual reservations about precipitate judgements, but my initial impression is of a perky final section and some attractive lyric moments in the second, but an overall dryness and shallowness not really conpensated by the brilliance of the solo part.

Thomas' conducting of the Beethoven was a real surprise, not so much because he brought any eccentric or even unusual ideas to the performance, but because he insisted on polished playing and serious attitude. It was most definitely not one of those hack jobs that results when a conductor programs something "the boys can throw together in one run-through" in order to concentrate rehearsal time on a newer or more difficult piece. In fact, to Thomas' credit, the entire concert sounded as if everything had been carefully re-thought.

The Beethoven seemed astonishingly fresh — in the way a piece can that has been put away for years and then resurrected. Dynamic contrasts one hasn't heard in a long time were there (real pianissimos), the articulation was sharp and the pacing very exciting.

The players seemed quite turned-on and performed beautifully in Piston and Beethoven as well as in the Prokofiev "Scythian Suite," which is too ugly to deserve it. Taken from an abortive ballet about a primitive tribe, the suite is brutal (and brutish) and Thomas exploited every shred of savagery in it, concluding with an ear-blowing climax.

POST GAZETTE
(ANGLO-ITALIAN)
BOSTON, MASS.
14,900
SEP 22 1972
New England Newsclip

Doriot Anthony Dwyer Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra

Michael Tilson Thomas, Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted the Boston Symphony in the first pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, this afternoon, tomorrow evening, September 23 at 8:30 p.m. Mr. Thomas will conduct the same program on Tuesday evening, October 10 at 8:30 p.m. Mr. Thomas will conduct the same program on Tuesday evening, October 10 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist for these concerts is Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Principal Flute for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert opened with Mr. Thomas conducting Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A, followed by Walter Piston's Flute Concerto with Doriot Anthony Dwyer as soloist. The work was composed in 1971 by Mr. Piston in his Belmont home and is dedicated to Mrs. Dwyer. The program closed with Prokofiev's Scythian Suite, "Ala and Lolli."

Mr. Thomas is well known to Boston audiences. This year he continues to direct the Boston Symphony's Spectrum Concerts, which he created. During the past two years, Mr. Thomas has conducted many of the major orchestras in this country, and in Europe and Japan. This season he returns for guest engagements with the Israel Philharmonic, the London Symphony, the New Philharmonia, and the New York Philharmonic, with which he begins his first season as Music Director of the nationally-televised "Young People's Concerts". He also makes his debut with the Lincoln Center Chamber Music Society, begins his second year with the Buffalo Philharmonic and assumes the position of Visiting Adjunct Professor of Music at the State University of New York in Buffalo.

Mrs. Dwyer, the soloist for these concerts, joined the Orchestra in 1952. She is a member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525
SEP 28 1972
New England Newsclip

In Concert

Some Things New

By Peter M. Knapp

So it's fall again already and the Boston Symphony is back in town, opening its 92nd season.

There are changes. William Steinberg is gone, and the orchestra is temporarily without a music director. Seiji Ozawa takes the job next season, but this year he's otherwise committed and is serving as "music adviser."

Most of the conducting will be done by Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas, the principal guest conductors. It's not an ideal arrangement, having no permanent hand on the helm, but apparently the best that could be worked out.

More changes: The BSO program book is now Tanglewood-sized, and 8½ by 11-inch magazine-type format replacing the familiar smaller, meaty booklets, and the orchestra expects more advertising revenue as a result: the picture gallery on the second floor is being remodeled as the Cabot-Cahners Room for meetings, receptions and occasional dining, and the corridors are to be carpeted (neither project finished yet because of a delay in supplies), and there's a new man in the No. 2 chair, Jerome Rosen from Detroit, replacing the retiring veteran Alfred Krips as assistant concertmaster.

So on to the music-making. Michael Tilson Thomas was on the podium for the opening series, choosing Prokofiev's Scythian Suite "Ala and Lolli," Walter Piston's new Concerto for Flute and Orchestra, dedicated to and performed by Doriot Anthony Dwyer, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A.

Early Pagan

At Tuesday night's performance, The Scythian Suite was the most interesting. Not that it is Prokofiev's best. It is an early work by the Russian composer, at 23 fresh out of the conservatory and evidently buffeted by varying influences. Diaghilev had commissioned the young talent to write a ballet, and Prokofiev used a scenario based on a Slav myth in which an evil spirit (marvelously named Chuzhbog) steals a wooden idol (Ala) which eventually is rescued by the Scythian warrior Lolli.

It's all very elemental and pagan, and Prokofiev turned to with evident relish, using a large orchestra, vivid sound effects, grinding harmonies, barbaric rhythms . . . apparently intending to prove he could be as primitive as Moussorgsky, as exotic as Rimsky-Korsakoff, as revolutionary and colorful as Stravinsky. Well, Diaghilev turned down the ballet, but Prokofiev rescued the suite.

Prokofiev wrote better music than this extroverted, exotic score, but despite its purple cliches and orchestral costume jewelry, some of it is quite effective, and Thomas gave it a vivid, exuberant showing.

Maine native, long-time Harvard professor, two-time Pulitzer Prize winner, Walter Piston for many years has been associated with the Boston Symphony, and the audience gave him affectionate standing applause after the performance of his Flute Concerto, completed last year. Though known as a craftsman of traditional orientation, Piston in this work employs more "progressive" elements than one usually encounters in his music and the writing seems atypical of him — not necessarily a fault.

Walter Piston

The concerto is in three sections, linked in one continuous movement. Piston notes, "I have wished to compose communicative music suited to the instrument and exhibiting some of its resources in combination with the orchestra, the latter being conceived as a partner, not simply an accompanist."

The soloist gets most of the work, though, and the orchestral part often seems to serve more as punctuation than independent exposition. The flute part is generally elaborate and trilly, which suits the instrument, though there is a ruminative middle section where the soloist carries an attractive legato line. In contrast, most of the orchestral writing is spare, upper strings usually separated from the lower and having a Hindemith flavor. At first hearing, I can't honestly say the work made a deep impression, but Miss Dwyer's playing was characteristically skillful and agile.

For the Beethoven Seventh, Thomas rearranged his orchestra European style, with the celli, in front of him, second violins to his right (where the celli normally reside). Persumably it was to provide a different aural mixture, but most of the performance sounded loud, fast and jumpy, at times screechy.

Thomas evidently sought additional vigor and energy, but most of the symphony sounded super-heated and driven at the expense of detail and comfort, and the last movement exceeded the speed limit.

6.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

SEP 27 1972 New England Newsclip

Steinberg will conduct Boston Symphony this week

BOSTON — William Steinberg, former Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the second weekend of the winter season, with concerts on Thursday, September 28 at 8:30 p.m., Friday September 29 at 2:00 p.m., Saturday September 30 at 8:30 p.m. and Tuesday, October 3 at 7:30 p.m.

For his first appearance in Symphony Hall since his retirement, Mr. Steinberg chose the works of Vaughn Williams and Gustav Mahler. Mr. Steinberg opens the concert with Vaughn Williams and Gustav Mahler. Mrs. Steinberg opens the concert with Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, in honor of the centenary of the composer's birth. Following that, the Orchestra, soloists and choir perform Mahler's Second Symphony, "Resurrection". Solists for the "Resurrection" are Benita Valente, soprano; Beverly Wolff, contralto; and the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum, F. John Adams, director.

In the past years, William Steinberg has become a very well known figure in Boston for the fine things he has done with the Boston Symphony. Under his leadership, the Boston Symphony has continued its steady progress as one of the foremost musical organizations in, the world. He led concerts not only in Boston, in New York and in many other American cities, but also in the music centers of England, Germany, Austria, Italy and Spain and France. His recordings and broadcast and telecast appearances have reached millions all over the world.

Benita Valente, who has appeared with the Boston Symphony in the past, comes from Delano, California. In 1960 she won the Metropolitan Opera Auditions; two years later she began a successful European career, appearing with several opera companies. Her repertoire ranges for the baroque to the avant-garde; she has more than forty operatic roles in her repertoire and sings nearly forty Bach Cantata, as well as rarely heard concert arias by Haydn and Mozart. Miss Valente's recordings are on the Columbia, Candide and CRI labels.

Beverly Wolff has appeared on many occasions with the Boston Symphony, both in Symphony Hall and at Tanglewood. During the past two seasons, Miss Wolff has appeared in Florence and Venice. Among her American engagements have been appearances with the Atlanta Symphony and Buffalo Philharmonic, and the Handel Society of New York. Miss Wolff records for Columbia, RCA, Westminster and MGM.

The Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum was formed in the autumn of 1971 by F. John Adams, a doctoral candidate in music at Harvard. Dedicated to the performance of the finest music in the choral repertoire, the choir has already made many appearances, including a visit to Canada. The Collegium Musicum is entirely student managed. The choir appeared with the Boston Symphony last season at a Spectrum concert in music by Bach, Del Tredici and Josquin Des Prez.

PUBLIC SPIRIT
AYER, MASS.
W. 5,150

SEP 28 1972 New England Newsclip

Former Symphony Director To Conduct Mahler And Williams

AREA - William Steinberg, former Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the second weekend of the winter season, with concerts on Thursday, September 28 at 8:30 p.m., Friday September 29 at 2:00 p.m., Saturday September 30 at 8:30 p.m., and Tuesday, October 3 at 7:30 p.m.

For his first appearance in Symphony Hall since his retirement, Mr. Steinberg chose the works of Vaughan Williams and Gustav Mahler. Mr. Steinberg opens the concert with Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, in honor of the centenary of the composer's birth. Following that, the Orchestra, soloists and choir perform Mahler's Second Symphony, "Resurrection". Soloists for the "Resurrection" are Benita Valente, soprano; Beverly Wolff, contralto; and the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum, F. John Adams, director.

In the past years, William Steinberg has become a very well known figure in Boston for the fine things he has done with the Boston Symphony. Under his leadership, the Boston Symphony has continued its steady progress as one of the foremost musical organizations in the world. He led concerts not only in Boston, in New York and in many other American cities, but also in the music centers of England, Germany, Austria, Italy and Spain and France. His recordings and broadcasts and telecast appearances have reached millions all over the world.

Benita Valente, who has appeared with the Boston Symphony in the past, comes from Delano, California. In 1960 she won the Metropolitan Opera Auditions; two years later she began a successful European career, appearing with several opera companies. Her repertoire ranges for the baroque to the avant-garde; she has more than forty operatic roles in her repertoire and sings nearly forty Bach Cantatas, as well as rarely heard concert arias by Haydn and Mozart. Miss Valente's recordings are on the Columbia, Candide and CRI labels.

Beverly Wolff has appeared on many occasions with the Boston Symphony, both in Symphony Hall and at Tanglewood. During the past two seasons, Miss Wolff has appeared in Florence and Venice. Among her American engagements have been appearances with the Atlanta Symphony and Buffalo Philharmonic, and the Handel Society of New York. Miss Wolff records for Columbia, RCA, Westminster and MGM.

The Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum was formed in the autumn of 1971 by F. John Adams, a doctoral candidate in music at Harvard. Dedicated to the performance of the finest music in the choral repertoire, the choir has already made many appearances, including a visit to Canada. The Collegium Musicum is entirely student managed. The choir appeared with the Boston Symphony last season at a Spectrum concert in music by Bach, Del Tredici and Josquin Des Prez.

THE LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 8,000

SEP 29 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO's former director returns for concert series

William Steinberg, former music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the second weekend of the winter season, with concerts on Friday September 29 at 2 p.m., Saturday, September 30 at 8:30 p.m. and Tesday, October 3 at 7:30 p.m. The concerts opened yesterday.

For his first appearance in Symphony Hall since his retirement, Steinberg chose the works of Vaughan Williams and Gustav Mahler. Steinberg opens the concert with Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, in honor of the centenary of the composer's birth. Following that, the Orchestra, soloists and choir perform Mahler's Second Symphony, "Resurrection". Soloists for the "Resurrection" are Benita Valente, soprano: Beverly Wolff, contralto; and the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum, F. John Adams, director.

In the past years, William Steinberg has become a very well known figure in Boston for the fine things he has done with the Boston Symphony. Under his leadership, the Boston Symphony has continued its steady progress as one of the foremost musical organizations in the world. He led concerts not only in Boston, in New York and in many other American cities, but also in the music centers of England, Germany, Austria, Italy and Spain and France. His recordings and broadcast and telecast appearances have reached millions all over the world.

Benita Valente, who has appeared with the Boston Symphony in the past, comes from Delano, California. In 1960 she won the Metropolitan Opera Auditions; two years later she began a successful European career, appearing with several opera companies.

Beverly Wolff has appeared on many occasions with the Boston Symphony, both in Symphony Hall and at Tanglewood.

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
S. 40,129

SEP 24 1972 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony '72-73 season well underway

By ALFRED W. BURKE
Sun Music Critic

Music

LOWELL — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has opened its 1972-73 season.

During the coming year there will be an impressive list of guest conductors. Seiji Ozawa is presiding as Music Adviser, and the principal guest conductors will be Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas.

Listed to assume the podium during the year will be William Steinberg, Leonard Bernstein, Daniel Barenboim, Eugen Jochum, Lorin Maazel and Bernard Haitink. Guest soloists will be Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, Theodore Lettvin, Jerome Lowenthal, Joseph Silverstein and Janet Baker. Also appearing as guest artists will be Harold Wright, Kenneth Riegel, Ruggiero, Ricci, Martina Arroyo, Lili Coekasian, Richard Casilly, Robert Hale, Israela Margalit, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Zara Nelsova and Nerine Barrett, Names of other invited guest artists will be announced later in the season.

Seiji Ozawa will conduct the concerts of Feb. 13-15-16 and 17. At the Feb 13 concert which will be in the Thursday series he will have a guest soloist, the Boston Symphony's concert master, Joseph Silverstein.

This week there will be concerts on Thursday evening, and the second programs in the Friday and Saturday series. William Steinberg will conduct. Guest soloists will be Benita Valente, soprano and Beverly Wolff, contralto. The Harvard—Radcliffe Collegium Musicum, F. John Adams, director, will participate. To be performed will be the Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis (Vaughn Williams), and the Symphony No. 2 "Resurrection" by Mahler. This program will be repeated in the first program of the Tuesday B. series on Oct. 3.

In all, William Steinberg will make six appearances during the season. At one will be a presentation of Verdi's Manzoni "Requiem." The dates will be Friday and Saturday, March 16-17.

SUBURBAN PRESS
NATICK, MASS.
W. 3,500

SEP 28 1972 New England Newsclip

Music lovers

HE'S BACK -- William Steinberg returns to the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct Mahler's Second Symphony. "Resurrection" and Vaughn Williams Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis on Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Tuesday, Sept. 28, 29, 30 and Oct. 3. At Symphony Hall, Mass. Ave., Boston.

The Boston Globe
(EVENING)
D. 195,032

SEP 27 1972 New England Newsclip

Enough Haydn for almost anyone

QUODLIBET / By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Because William Steinberg's conducting schedule has become more crowded than his physician thinks it ought to be, Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster and Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the orchestra's concert Saturday evening. The program: Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis and the Mahler 2nd Symphony, the latter with Beverly Wolff and Benita Valente as soloists and with the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum.

6.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

SEP 27 1972 New England Newsclip

Steinberg will conduct Boston Symphony this week

BOSTON — William Steinberg, former Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the second weekend of the winter season, with concerts on Thursday, September 28 at 8:30 p.m., Friday September 29 at 2:00 p.m., Saturday September 30 at 8:30 p.m. and Tuesday, October 3 at 7:30 p.m.

For his first appearance in Symphony Hall since his retirement, Mr. Steinberg chose the works of Vaughn Williams and Gustav Mahler. Mr. Steinberg opens the concert with Vaughn Williams and Gustav Mahler. Mrs. Steinberg opens the concert with Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, in honor of the centenary of the composer's birth. Following that, the Orchestra, soloists and choir perform Mahler's Second Symphony, "Resurrection". Solists for the "Resurrection" are Benita Valente, soprano; Beverly Wolff, contralto; and the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum, F. John Adams, director.

In the past years, William Steinberg has become a very well known figure in Boston for the fine things he has done with the Boston Symphony. Under his leadership, the Boston Symphony has continued its steady progress as one of the foremost musical organizations in, the world. He led concerts not only in Boston, in New York and in many other American cities, but also in the music centers of England, Germany, Austria, Italy and Spain and France. His recordings and broadcast and telecast appearances have reached millions all over the world.

Benita Valente, who has appeared with the Boston Symphony in the past, comes from Delano, California. In 1960 she won the Metropolitan Opera Auditions; two years later she began a successful European career, appearing with several opera companies. Her repertoire ranges for the baroque to the avant-garde; she has more than forty operatic roles in her repertoire and sings nearly forty Bach Cantata, as well as rarely heard concert arias by Haydn and Mozart. Miss Valente's recordings are on the Columbia, Candide and CRI labels.

Beverly Wolff has appeared on many occasions with the Boston Symphony, both in Symphony Hall and at Tanglewood. During the past two seasons, Miss Wolff has appeared in Florence and Venice. Among her American engagements have been appearances with the Atlanta Symphony and Buffalo Philharmonic, and the Handel Society of New York. Miss Wolff records for Columbia, RCA, Westminster and MGM.

The Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum was formed in the autumn of 1971 by F. John Adams, a doctoral candidate in music at Harvard. Dedicated to the performance of the finest music in the choral repertoire, the choir has already made many appearances, including a visit to Canada. The Collegium Musicum is entirely student managed. The choir appeared with the Boston Symphony last season at a Spectrum concert in music by Bach, Del Tredici and Josquin Des Prez.

PUBLIC SPIRIT
AYER, MASS.
W. 5,150

SEP 28 1972 New England Newsclip

Former Symphony Director To Conduct Mahler And Williams

AREA - William Steinberg, former Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the second weekend of the winter season, with concerts on Thursday, September 28 at 8:30 p.m., Friday September 29 at 2:00 p.m., Saturday September 30 at 8:30 p.m., and Tuesday, October 3 at 7:30 p.m.

For his first appearance in Symphony Hall since his retirement, Mr. Steinberg chose the works of Vaughan Williams and Gustav Mahler. Mr. Steinberg opens the concert with Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, in honor of the centenary of the composer's birth. Following that, the Orchestra, soloists and choir perform Mahler's Second Symphony, "Resurrection". Soloists for the "Resurrection" are Benita Valente, soprano; Beverly Wolff, contralto; and the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum, F. John Adams, director.

In the past years, William Steinberg has become a very well known figure in Boston for the fine things he has done with the Boston Symphony. Under his leadership, the Boston Symphony has continued its steady progress as one of the foremost musical organizations in the world. He led concerts not only in Boston, in New York and in many other American cities, but also in the music centers of England, Germany, Austria, Italy and Spain and France. His recordings and broadcasts and telecast appearances have reached millions all over the world.

Benita Valente, who has appeared with the Boston Symphony in the past, comes from Delano, California. In 1960 she won the Metropolitan Opera Auditions; two years later she began a successful European career, appearing with several opera companies. Her repertoire ranges for the baroque to the avant-garde; she has more than forty operatic roles in her repertoire and sings nearly forty Bach Cantatas, as well as rarely heard concert arias by Haydn and Mozart. Miss Valente's recordings are on the Columbia, Candide and CRI labels.

Beverly Wolff has appeared on many occasions with the Boston Symphony, both in Symphony Hall and at Tanglewood. During the past two seasons, Miss Wolff has appeared in Florence and Venice. Among her American engagements have been appearances with the Atlanta Symphony and Buffalo Philharmonic, and the Handel Society of New York. Miss Wolff records for Columbia, RCA, Westminster and MGM.

The Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum was formed in the autumn of 1971 by F. John Adams, a doctoral candidate in music at Harvard. Dedicated to the performance of the finest music in the choral repertoire, the choir has already made many appearances, including a visit to Canada. The Collegium Musicum is entirely student managed. The choir appeared with the Boston Symphony last season at a Spectrum concert in music by Bach, Del Tredici and Josquin Des Prez.

THE LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 2,000

SEP 29 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO's former director returns for concert series

William Steinberg, former music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the second weekend of the winter season, with concerts on Friday September 29 at 2 p.m., Saturday, September 30 at 8:30 p.m. and Tesday, October 3 at 7:30 p.m. The concerts opened yesterday.

For his first appearance in Symphony Hall since his retirement, Steinberg chose the works of Vaughan Williams and Gustav Mahler. Steinberg opens the concert with Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, in honor of the centenary of the composer's birth. Following that, the Orchestra, soloists and choir perform Mahler's Second Symphony, "Resurrection". Soloists for the "Resurrection" are Benita Valente, soprano: Beverly Wolff, contralto; and the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum, F. John Adams, director.

In the past years, William Steinberg has become a very well known figure in Boston for the fine things he has done with the Boston Symphony. Under his leadership, the Boston Symphony has continued its steady progress as one of the foremost musical organizations in the world. He led concerts not only in Boston, in New York and in many other American cities, but also in the music centers of England, Germany, Austria, Italy and Spain and France. His recordings and broadcast and telecast appearances have reached millions all over the world.

Benita Valente, who has appeared with the Boston Symphony in the past, comes from Delano, California. In 1960 she won the Metropolitan Opera Auditions; two years later she began a successful European career, appearing with several opera companies.

Beverly Wolff has appeared on many occasions with the Boston Symphony, both in Symphony Hall and at Tanglewood.

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
S. 40,129

SEP 24 1972 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony '72-73 season well underway

By ALFRED W. BURKE
Sun Music Critic

Music

LOWELL — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has opened its 1972-73 season.

During the coming year there will be an impressive list of guest conductors. Seiji Ozawa is presiding as Music Adviser, and the principal guest conductors will be Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas.

Listed to assume the podium during the year will be William Steinberg, Leonard Bernstein, Daniel Barenboim, Eugen Jochum, Lorin Maazel and Bernard Haitink. Guest soloists will be Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, Theodore Lettvin, Jerome Lowenthal, Joseph Silverstein and Janet Baker. Also appearing as guest artists will be Harold Wright, Kenneth Riegel, Ruggiero, Ricci, Martina Arroyo, Lili Coekasian, Richard Casilly, Robert Hale, Israela Margalit, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Zara Nelsova and Nerine Barrett, Names of other invited guest artists will be announced later in the season.

Seiji Ozawa will conduct the concerts of Feb. 13-15-16 and 17. At the Feb 13 concert which will be in the Thursday series he will have a guest soloist, the Boston Symphony's concert master, Joseph Silverstein.

This week there will be concerts on Thursday evening, and the second programs in the Friday and Saturday series. William Steinberg will conduct. Guest soloists will be Benita Valente, soprano and Beverly Wolff, contralto. The Harvard—Radcliffe Collegium Musicum, F. John Adams, director, will participate. To be performed will be the Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis (Vaughn Williams), and the Symphony No. 2 "Resurrection" by Mahler. This program will be repeated in the first program of the Tuesday B. series on Oct. 3.

In all, William Steinberg will make six appearances during the season. At one will be a presentation of Verdi's Manzoni "Requiem." The dates will be Friday and Saturday, March 16-17.

SUBURBAN PRESS
NATICK, MASS.
W. 3,500

SEP 28 1972 New England Newsclip

Music lovers

HE'S BACK -- William Steinberg returns to the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct Mahler's Second Symphony. "Resurrection" and Vaughn Williams Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis on Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Tuesday, Sept. 28, 29, 30 and Oct. 3. At Symphony Hall, Mass. Ave., Boston.

The Boston Globe
(EVENING)
D. 195,032

SEP 27 1972 New England Newsclip

Enough Haydn for almost anyone

QUODLIBET / By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Because William Steinberg's conducting schedule has become more crowded than his physician thinks it ought to be, Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster and Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the orchestra's concert Saturday evening. The program: Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis and the Mahler 2nd Symphony, the latter with Beverly Wolff and Benita Valente as soloists and with the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

SEP 30 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO: Mahler revisited

By Louis Snyder

In this period of Mahlerian resurgence, it is surprising to realize that the great Symphony No. 2 in C minor ("Resurrection") hadn't, until last Thursday, been played by the Boston Symphony in Symphony Hall since 1960, when Richard Burgin was the conductor. True, there was a memorable Tanglewood performance, high-geared emotionally by Leonard Bernstein, during the summer of 1970. But Boston subscribers waited until this weekend to encounter it again on home ground.

William Steinberg, who recently retired as music director of the orchestra, returned to the podium Thursday evening and yesterday afternoon, and will conduct again on Tuesday. Assistant conductor Joseph Silverstein takes over tonight's concert.

Mr. Steinberg's Mahler doesn't wear its heart on its sleeve, as his realization of previous of the composer's works here has demonstrated. It is a strong selfless concept, not overly weighted with remnants of the composer's own implications, first proferred then withdrawn, of programmatic content.

Thus one isn't immediately swept off his feet by the power of Mr. Steinberg's interpretation over and above the impact of the music itself. As marked by the composer, the opening Allegro maestoso emerged indeed "serious and solemn," and the Andante con moto "very leisurely." But it soon became apparent that the conductor's overall plan was rolling ahead with locomotive force, so that by the time the first solo and choral passages were reached, one could properly be overwhelmed by an all-enveloping finale of sumptuous tonal splendor.

Aiding and abetting what thus turned into a deeply satisfying listening experience were the orchestra musicians who did Mr. Steinberg the honor of some particularly refined playing; mezzo-soprano Beverly Wolff and soprano Benita Valente, both in splendid voice, which otherwise means impeccable; and F. John Adams's populous Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum, living up to its new title by proving it had learned its lessons well—the pianissimo beginning of the "Aufersteh'n" was an impressive introduction to some superb choral singing.

* * *

The first half of the program was devoted to another viable piece of music — Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis — absent from the BSO repertory since 1963. Played as a commemorative tribute to the composer on the centenary of his birth, it was a further reminder, and a rather poignant one, of the inexplicable role that time plays in general recognition of a composer's music and message.

Vaughan Williams, although more slowly than Mahler, is being rediscovered, and perhaps the Fantasia, even more readily than the symphonies, can be a good persuader for the wary.

Mr. Steinberg led an affectionate performance, while the body of strings, as well as the solo quartet — Mr. Silverstein, Jerome Rosen, Burton Fine, and Jules Eskin — added their votes for "Uncle Ralph . . . the Grand Old Man of English music."

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 281,942 SUN. 566,377

SEP 29 1972 New England Newsclip

7.

Mabler's 2d Symphony highlighted

Steinberg at Symphony Hall

By Michael Steinberg

William Steinberg, who retired last season as the Boston Symphony's music director, came back to Symphony Hall last night for the first of five programs in which he will conduct the orchestra between now and March. The music for last night was the Vaughan Williams Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis and Mahler's Symphony No. 2.

It was like the halves of two different concerts. After the second movement of the Mahler there was a pause for the members of the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum to file on and for the alto and soprano soloists, Beverly Wolff and Benita Valente, to take their places just in front of the conductor.

Steinberg has a sort of half-bench on which to half-sit during such breaks, and this time when he got up after the singers were installed, he was like a different man. I don't know whether he had been consciously saving himself for the taxing, unbroken sequence of scherzo, song, and finale, or whether the sudden doubling of the stage population informed him with a sense of occasion which fired an extra measure of vitality into him; whatever, though, from that point to the end, there was in the conducting a physical energy and precision of gesture, and from the performers, a clarity and unanimity of response of which there had scarcely been a trace earlier in the evening.

Steinberg conducted a pretty understated Mahler. It leaves me longing sometimes for more bite, for a more pronounced sense of pleasure taken in the dissonances of Mahler's surprising polyphony or the eccentricities of his scoring, but that Steinberg does not look for his own glory in Mahler (to borrow Stravinsky's tribute to Monteux as an interpreter of "Le sacre") is a cause for gratitude. There is no self-indulgence in Steinberg's work, no loving things to death, no milking of the moment at the expense of the whole. At almost every Bernstein performance of the Second, the audience has made the mistake of bursting into applause in the middle of the first movement where the recapitulation comes in, so emphatic, so final has that arrival sounded: no audience could mistake it for an ending in a reading as ordered as Steinberg's. A pity, though, that in the first two movements the surface was so rough.

The vocal part of the performance was beautiful. The Harvard-Radcliffe voices are young and lightweight, and the big passages did show that Mahler had a more massive sound in mind than students with unfinished, turn-of-twenty voices can supply. To their credit and that of their director, F. John Adams, the singers never forced, and their quiet singing had a fine transparence of pitch and tone. Beverly Wolff sang with passion, intelligence, and exciting, highly individual vocal quality. Benita Valente provided a radiant top to the vocal texture.

The Mahler would have made a stronger program by itself, handsome-sounding and grandly solemn though the Vaughan Williams Tallis Fantasy is. Yesterday's performance, through which the strings had to make their way without much help from the conductor, did not make at all a persuasive case for it. The Fantasy was put on the program in commemoration of the anniversary of the composer's birthday (Thursday week after next), but that, I must say, really seems like miserable tokenism.

1972 is almost over, but perhaps the Boston Symphony can make a belated but more substantial tribute to this interesting, and just now very neglected, composer. My vote would go to that wonderful Walt Whitman extravaganza, the "Sea Symphony."

The program is repeated this afternoon, Saturday and Tuesday evenings, Saturday's performance to be conducted by Joseph Silverstein.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885

SEP 30 1972 New England Newsclip

Vitality and Excitement

BSO Performs Mahler

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

After closing its Tanglewood Season with the Mahler Eighth Symphony and following in just over a month with his Second ("Resurrection"), the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one would think, will have gotten apocalyptic vision, to say nothing of magnificent vulgarity, out of its system for a long time.

The "Resurrection," performed Thursday night and yesterday afternoon with William Steinberg conducting, is, like the Eighth, an enormous structure inspired by Mahler's herculean despairs and equally grandiose visions of Reconciliation and Transformation.

LIKE THE EIGHTH, it is incredibly pretentious, occasionally gross (occasionally delicate and well-bred as in the Second movement) and of a variety of too muchness that I personally like to indulge in on occasion — guilt feelings or not.

Questions of taste aside, the symphony is a fascinating translation of thought into music that results in a sombre, fatalistic first movement that contains within it the musical germs of resurrection.

Or in the marvelous cynical Fourth movement (taken from an earlier song about an audience of Fish who listen raptly to a sermon by St. Anthony and then ignore its message) flanked by two innocent and child-like statements of optimism and faith.

Mahler's amazing feeling for sonorities is apparent in moments such as the choir's first entrance, pianissimo, that emerges from what seems like a vast empty space after a series of bird-like calls on flute and off-stage brass fanfares.

THE COMPOSER'S major lapses of taste occur in moments such as the finale where bells, organ, tam-tam and huge orchestra join in great fortissimo chords as the gates of heaven open.

The BSO's performance yesterday (it was preceded by Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis which made the afternoon a bit long) was one of great vitality and excitement if rather short on really ethereal moments—pianissimos, for one thing, were scarce.

Steinberg seemed to find the work congenial to his temperament and brought out a good deal of the score's subtleties — although his interpretation is not so detailed or overt as George Solit's Mahler performances. The orchestra, in so far as tone goes, played beautifully for him although the players seemed to have some trouble following him.

The Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum sang beautifully as did the soprano Benita Valente in her rather thankless, brief role. Beverly Wolff, who did the contralto solos, appeared somewhat uncertain rhythmically, due, perhaps, to Steinberg's vague beat. However, she sang with great involvement and excitement.

STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
S. 63,259

OCT 8 1972 New England Newsclip

E. J. DIAS

A Look At the Arts

Boston Symphony begins Tuesday 'B' series

The opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series in Symphony Hall last week was conducted by the veteran William Steinberg, who chose to devote his program to just two works — Ralph Vaughan Williams "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis" and Mahler's gargantuan "Symphony No. 2" the "Resurrection."

Steinberg and his players were in first-rate form in the Williams "Fantasia," one of the loveliest and most engaging works in the repertoire for string orchestra. Using a melody created by Tallis, who was a 16th-Century British composer of church music, Williams, with a series of expanding and tranforming variations, creates a genuine master work.

I must confess, however, that the lengthy Mahler made the evening seem over-long. Never a composer noted for succinctness, Mahler was addicted to huge orchestral scores to sometimes interminable passage of steadily-mounting sonorities, to the use of almost every instrument known to man except the kazoo.

The "Symphony No. 2," for example, requires, besides the usual complement of strings, four flutes, four piccolos, four obes, two English horns, five clarinets, two E-flat clarinets, a bass clarinet, four bassoons and double-bassoons, six horns, six trumpets, four trombones, a tuba, two sets of timpani, a bass drum, one snare drum, cymbals, small and large tam-tams, a triangle, a glockenspiel, three bells, a ruthe (bundle of sticks), two harps, an organ, a soprano, a contralto, and a mixed chorus—the latter three represented in Symphony Hall by Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, and the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum.

Naturally, from all this musical paraphernalia, some remarkable sound is produced—and the Boston Symphony, as everyone knows, is capable of thrilling tone quality. I thought that Steinberg's beat was sometimes uncertain, but on the whole, he shaped the massive architecture of the work well. And that rousing finale, with Mahler expressing his affirmation in a series of sustained fortissimo chords, shook the ancient rafter of said Symphony Hall.

STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
D. 72,971

OCT 4 1972 New England Newsclip

E. J. Dias review

BSO's 'Fantasia' delicately done

William Steinberg was on the podium on Tuesday night in Symphony Hall to inaugurate the current "B" Series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program devoted to only two works — Ralph Vaughan Williams' "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis" for string orchestra and Mahaler's gigantic "Symphony No. 2 (The "Resurrection.")

Williams' "Fantasia" is, of course, a master work. Utilizing one of Tallis' tunes (Tallis was a 16th-Century British church composer), Williams subjects it to enlargement and transformation. The melody grows, expands, now antiphonally, now contrapuntally, sometimes in passing statements by solo instruments so that a mood of tranquillity is created which is never permitted to lapse.

Always a great favorite in the symphonic repertoire, the work was given a beautiful reading by Steinberg and his musicians—precise in phrasing, lovely in tone quality, enormously engaging.

As for the Mahler, the symphony evidences his interest in cosmic problems, his delight in using an over-size orchestra, his addiction to giant scores that in this case even includes a soprano, a contralto, and a mixed chorus.

The last word in Wagnerian romanticism, the symphony features a somber, rather ominous first movement; a rather ironic fourth one, and Mahler's customary sonorities, passages that mount to peaks of excitement, good utilization of pianissimo effects in the chorus, and a rousing finale in which the organ, bells, tam-tam, and the full orchestral voice join in sustained fortissimo chords meant to express Mahler's eventual affirmation.

Aiding in the performance were soprano Benita Valente, contralto Beverly Wolff, and the fine voices of the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum. The orchestra itself played with considerable color and vigor under Steinberg's baton.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

SEP 30 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO: Mahler revisited

By Louis Snyder

In this period of Mahlerian resurgence, it is surprising to realize that the great Symphony No. 2 in C minor ("Resurrection") hadn't, until last Thursday, been played by the Boston Symphony in Symphony Hall since 1960, when Richard Burgin was the conductor. True, there was a memorable Tanglewood performance, high-geared emotionally by Leonard Bernstein, during the summer of 1970. But Boston subscribers waited until this weekend to encounter it again on home ground.

William Steinberg, who recently retired as music director of the orchestra, returned to the podium Thursday evening and yesterday afternoon, and will conduct again on Tuesday. Assistant conductor Joseph Silverstein takes over tonight's concert.

Mr. Steinberg's Mahler doesn't wear its heart on its sleeve, as his realization of previous of the composer's works here has demonstrated. It is a strong selfless concept, not overly weighted with remnants of the composer's own implications, first proferred then withdrawn, of programmatic content.

Thus one isn't immediately swept off his feet by the power of Mr. Steinberg's interpretation over and above the impact of the music itself. As marked by the composer, the opening Allegro maestoso emerged indeed "serious and solemn," and the Andante con moto "very leisurely." But it soon became apparent that the conductor's overall plan was rolling ahead with locomotive force, so that by the time the first solo and choral passages were reached, one could properly be overwhelmed by an all-enveloping finale of sumptuous tonal splendor.

Aiding and abetting what thus turned into a deeply satisfying listening experience were the orchestra musicians who did Mr. Steinberg the honor of some particularly refined playing; mezzo-soprano Beverly Wolff and soprano Benita Valente, both in splendid voice, which otherwise means impeccable; and F. John Adams's populous Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum, living up to its new title by proving it had learned its lessons well—the pianissimo beginning of the "Aufersteh'n" was an impressive introduction to some superb choral singing.

* * *

The first half of the program was devoted to another viable piece of music — Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis — absent from the BSO repertory since 1963. Played as a commemorative tribute to the composer on the centenary of his birth, it was a further reminder, and a rather poignant one, of the inexplicable role that time plays in general recognition of a composer's music and message.

Vaughan Williams, although more slowly than Mahler, is being rediscovered, and perhaps the Fantasia, even more readily than the symphonies, can be a good persuader for the wary.

Mr. Steinberg led an affectionate performance, while the body of strings, as well as the solo quartet — Mr. Silverstein, Jerome Rosen, Burton Fine, and Jules Eskin — added their votes for "Uncle Ralph . . . the Grand Old Man of English music."

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

SEP 29 1972 New England Newsclip

Mabler's 2d Symphony highlighted

Steinberg at Symphony Hall

By Michael Steinberg

William Steinberg, who retired last season as the Boston Symphony's music director, came back to Symphony Hall last night for the first of five programs in which he will conduct the orchestra between now and March. The music for last night was the Vaughan Williams Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis and Mahler's Symphony No. 2.

It was like the halves of two different concerts. After the second movement of the Mahler there was a pause for the members of the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum to file on and for the alto and soprano soloists, Beverly Wolff and Benita Valente, to take their places just in front of the conductor.

Steinberg has a sort of half-bench on which to half-sit during such breaks, and this time when he got up after the singers were installed, he was like a different man. I don't know whether he had been consciously saving himself for the taxing, unbroken sequence of scherzo, song, and finale, or whether the sudden doubling of the stage population informed him with a sense of occasion which fired an extra measure of vitality into him; whatever, though, from that point to the end, there was in the conducting a physical energy and precision of gesture, and from the performers, a clarity and unanimity of response of which there had scarcely been a trace earlier in the evening.

Steinberg conducted a pretty understated Mahler. It leaves me longing sometimes for more bite, for a more pronounced sense of pleasure taken in the dissonances of Mahler's surprising polyphony or the eccentricities of his scoring, but that Steinberg does not look for his own glory in Mahler (to borrow Stravinsky's tribute to Monteux as an interpreter of "Le sacre") is a cause for gratitude. There is no self-indulgence in Steinberg's work, no loving things to death, no milking of the moment at the expense of the whole. At almost every Bernstein performance of the Second, the audience has made the mistake of bursting into applause in the middle of the first movement where the recapitulation comes in, so emphatic, so final has that arrival sounded: no audience could mistake it for an ending in a reading as ordered as Steinberg's. A pity, though, that in the first two movements the surface was so rough.

The vocal part of the performance was beautiful. The Harvard-Radcliffe voices are young and lightweight, and the big passages did show that Mahler had a more massive sound in mind than students with unfinished, turn-of-twenty voices can supply. To their credit and that of their director, F. John Adams, the singers never forced, and their quiet singing had a fine transparence of pitch and tone. Beverly Wolff sang with passion, intelligence, and exciting, highly individual vocal quality. Benita Valente provided a radiant top to the vocal texture.

The Mahler would have made a stronger program by itself, handsome-sounding and grandly solemn though the Vaughan Williams Tallis Fantasy is. Yesterday's performance, through which the strings had to make their way without much help from the conductor, did not make at all a persuasive case for it. The Fantasy was put on the program in commemoration of the anniversary of the composer's birthday (Thursday week after next), but that, I must say, really seems like miserable tokenism.

1972 is almost over, but perhaps the Boston Symphony can make a belated but more substantial tribute to this interesting, and just now very neglected, composer. My vote would go to that wonderful Walt Whitman extravaganza, the "Sea Symphony."

The program is repeated this afternoon, Saturday and Tuesday evenings, Saturday's performance to be conducted by Joseph Silverstein.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885

SEP 30 1972 New England Newsclip

Vitality and Excitement

BSO Performs Mahler

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

After closing its Tanglewood Season with the Mahler Eighth Symphony and following in just over a month with his Second ("Resurrection"), the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one would think, will have gotten apocalyptic vision, to say nothing of magnificent vulgarity, out of its system for a long time.

The "Resurrection," performed Thursday night and yesterday afternoon with William Steinberg conducting, is, like the Eighth, an enormous structure inspired by Mahler's herculean despairs and equally grandiose visions of Reconciliation and Transformation.

LIKE THE EIGHTH, it is incredibly pretentious, occasionally gross (occasionally delicate and well-bred as in the Second movement) and of a variety of too muchness that I personally like to indulge in on occasion — guilt feelings or not.

Questions of taste aside, the symphony is a fascinating translation of thought into music that results in a sombre, fatalistic first movement that contains within it the musical germs of resurrection.

Or in the marvelous cynical Fourth movement (taken from an earlier song about an audience of Fish who listen raptly to a sermon by St. Anthony and then ignore its message) flanked by two innocent and child-like statements of optimism and faith.

Mahler's amazing feeling for sonorities is apparent in moments such as the choir's first entrance, pianissimo, that emerges from what seems like a vast empty space after a series of bird-like calls on flute and off-stage brass fanfares.

THE COMPOSER'S major lapses of taste occur in moments such as the finale where bells, organ, tam-tam and huge orchestra join in great fortissimo chords as the gates of heaven open.

The BSO's performance yesterday (it was preceded by Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis which made the afternoon a bit long) was one of great vitality and excitement if rather short on really ethereal moments—pianissimos, for one thing, were scarce.

Steinberg seemed to find the work congenial to his temperament and brought out a good deal of the score's subtleties — although his interpretation is not so detailed or overt as George Solit's Mahler performances. The orchestra, in so far as tone goes, played beautifully for him although the players seemed to have some trouble following him.

The Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum sang beautifully as did the soprano Benita Valente in her rather thankless, brief role. Beverly Wolff, who did the contralto solos, appeared somewhat uncertain rhythmically, due, perhaps, to Steinberg's vague beat. However, she sang with great involvement and excitement.

STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
S. 63,259

OCT 8 1972 New England Newsclip

E. J. DIAS

A Look At the Arts

Boston Symphony begins Tuesday 'B' series

The opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series in Symphony Hall last week was conducted by the veteran William Steinberg, who chose to devote his program to just two works — Ralph Vaughan Williams "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis" and Mahler's gargantuan "Symphony No. 2" the "Resurrection."

Steinberg and his players were in first-rate form in the Williams "Fantasia," one of the loveliest and most engaging works in the repertoire for string orchestra. Using a melody created by Tallis, who was a 16th-Century British composer of church music, Williams, with a series of expanding and tranforming variations, creates a genuine master work.

I must confess, however, that the lengthy Mahler made the evening seem over-long. Never a composer noted for succinctness, Mahler was addicted to huge orchestral scores to sometimes interminable passage of steadily-mounting sonorities, to the use of almost every instrument known to man except the kazoo.

The "Symphony No. 2," for example, requires, besides the usual complement of strings, four flutes, four piccolos, four obes, two English horns, five clarinets, two E-flat clarinets, a bass clarinet four bassoons and double-bassoons, six horns, six trumpets, four trombones, a tuba, two sets of timpani, a bass drum, one snare drum, cymbals, small and large tamtams, a triangle, a glockenspiel, three bells, a ruthe (bundle of sticks), two harps, an organ, a soprano, a contralto, and a mixed chorus—the latter three represented in Symphony Hall by Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, and the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum.

Naturally, from all this musical paraphernalia, some remarkable sound is produced—and the Boston Symphony, as everyone knows, is capable of thrilling tone quality. I thought that Steinberg's beat was sometimes uncertain, but on the whole, he shaped the massive architecture of the work well. And that rousing finale, with Mahler expressing his affirmation in a series of sustained fortissimo chords, shook the ancient rafter of said Symphony Hall.

STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
D. 72,971

OCT 4 1972 New England Newsclip

E. J. Dias review

BSO's 'Fantasia' delicately done

William Steinberg was on the podium on Tuesday night in Symphony Hall to inaugurate the current "B" Series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program devoted to only two works — Ralph Vaughan Williams' "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis" for string orchestra and Mahaler's gigantic "Symphony No. 2 (The "Resurrection.")

Williams' "Fantasia" is, of course, a master work. Utilizing one of Tallis' tunes (Tallis was a 16th-Century British church composer), Williams subjects it to enlargement and transformation. The melody grows, expands, now antiphonally, now contrapuntally, sometimes in passing statements by solo instruments so that a mood of tranquillity is created which is never permitted to lapse.

Always a great favorite in the symphonic repertoire, the work was given a beautiful reading by Steinberg and his musicians—precise in phrasing, lovely in tone quality, enormously engaging.

As for the Mahler, the symphony evidences his interest in cosmic problems, his delight in using an over-size orchestra, his addiction to giant scores that in this case even includes a soprano, a contralto, and a mixed chorus.

The last word in Wagnerian romanticism, the symphony features a somber, rather ominous first movement; a rather ironic fourth one, and Mahler's customary sonorities, passages that mount to peaks of excitement, good utilization of pianissimo effects in the chorus, and a rousing finale in which the organ, bells, tamtam, and the full orchestral voice join in sustained fortissimo chords meant to express Mahler's eventual affirmation.

Aiding in the performance were soprano Benita Valente, contralto Beverly Wolff, and the fine voices of the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum. The orchestra itself played with considerable color and vigor under Steinberg's baton.

The people who perform in an orchestra

ALISON ARNOLD

Gourmet cooks, nuclear physicists, licensed airplane pilots, wood carvers and a minister will perform at the opening concert of the 92d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday afternoon, in Symphony Hall.

Surprising? Not if you have seen the new booklet compiled by the Council of Friends. It will be on sale beginning Friday for one dollar and provides a "mini" biography as well as a photograph of each of the Boston Symphony musicians.

The introduction of the booklet explains its purpose. We live in a world of computers and numbers, a world in which the opportunity to know each other as human beings is fast disappearing. As this tendency to group people by numbers increases, a need is growing to relate to others on a person-to-person basis.

The members of the orchestra are superb musicians, but could you call any of them by name if you met them on the street? The booklet is designed with the hope that the musicians and their audience will get to know each other as good friends, for they share a love of music and the wish to see the orchestra continue to command the respect it has always enjoyed from the rest of the world.

The committee responsible for writing and compiling the booklet consists of Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, Newton Center; Mrs. Giles M.S. Tod, Hingham; and Mrs. Roger Voisin, Jamaica Plain. The New England Merchants National Bank has helped to make possible the publication of the booklet.

Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the opening concert in works of Beethoven, and Piston and Prokofiev.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
SEP 18 1972 New England Newsclip

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885
SEP 18 1972 New England Newsclip

Rose Walsh

Getting to Know The BSO

Music isn't the only talent that individual members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra possess. They are adept at a variety of skills but you would never know it unless someone told you. The Council of Friends of the BSO, which is dedicated to the world-famed Orchestra decided they would do the telling so that audiences at the many concerts performed throughout the year would get to know the musicians as human beings.

They would know which one was a gourmet cook, or a nuclear physicist, a licensed airplane pilot, a wood carver, a minister, just to mention a few of the avocations.

The Council went to work on their bright idea and after months of research has come up with a 24-page publication entitled "Know Your Orchestra" which provides a "mini biography" as well as a clear photograph of each of the BSO players. It will be on sale — and only $1 — in time for the opening concert of the 92nd season this month.

Mrs. Robert M.P. Kennard of Newton Center, Mrs. Giles M.S. Tod of Hingham and Mrs. Roger Voisin of Jamaica Plain is the committee who may take a bow for the writing and compiling of the booklet. The New England Merchants National Bank gets a kudo for making its publication possible.

The Boston Globe
(EVENING)
D. 195,032
SEP 22 1972 New England Newsclip

ALISON ARNOLD

Antiques and China

★

Box luncheons in the basement of Symphony Hall with members of the orchestra as speakers have become so popular that there'll be a double series this year. The behind-the-scenes atmosphere seems to appeal to the Symphony's Friends as last year's lectures were over-subscribed and two series are planned this year.

The co-chairmen are Mrs. Anatole Haemmerle and Mrs. Donald Sinclair. The first series will begin Oct. 13, and the second, Oct. 20. Cecylia Arzewski, first violinist, will be the speaker.

The Table Talk Suppers at Symphony Hall before the evening concerts also have had such wide appeal that this series has been expanded, too. Mrs. William K. Russell is general chairman. She points out that husbands can come right from the office to meet the wives at the stage door entrance and enjoy a pleasant supper before the concert.

In addition to the Tuesday series under the chairmanship of Mrs. Samuel Ryburn and Mrs. John Thorndike, and the Thursday series in charge of Mrs. Albert Pagliarulo, there will be additional suppers before the Cambridge series of Tuesday concerts, with Mrs. George Clowes Jr. in charge, and another Tuesday series with Mrs. K. Peabody Brewster as chairman.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885
SEP 26 1972 New England Newsclip

Rose Walsh

Part of the popularity of the evening Stage Door Lectures sponsored by the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was that husbands could come right from the office to meet their wives at the Stage Door entrance to Symphony Hall, and enjoy a relaxing and entertaining get-together before the concert.

Last year the Lectures were over-subscribed. But the clever planning Council has solved that difficulty this year. The series has been expanded and Mrs. William K. Russell is the general chairman.

A double series of the Friday Stage Door Lectures has also been planned under the co-chairmanship of Mrs. Anatole A. Haemmerle and Mrs. Donald B. Sinclair.

Mrs. George Lee Sargent is chairman of the Council which has an interesting program of activities planned for the 1972-73 Symphony season.

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

The end results of nine months of hard work on the part of a small committee will be visible at the opening concert the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Small in size, its color bright red, it, nevertheless, should show up brilliantly against the white marble of the venerable old hall in which members of the committee will be displaying it. It is a long-in-preparation booklet about the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

As far back as last Christmas the suggestion was put forward that a booklet about the individual members of Boston's great contribution to the musical world, the BSO, would be of interest. How often, it was said, have audiences wondered about the musicians seated before them on the stage as they entertained them with their superb music, and equally, in turn, how often have the musicians wondered about their audiences? It was discovered that no biography of the members of the complete orchestra was available under one cover, and so the members of the Council of Friends of the BSO set about compiling one.

They first set up a series of photographic sessions with the different sections of the orchestra in the Cabot-Cahners Room of Symphony Hall, inviting the musicians to have a clear portrait taken for the booklet. At the same time the members of the orchestra were asked to fill out a form giving their backgrounds and special hobbies and interests.

To the delight of the committee a fact emerged that they had suspected from the beginning of the project as the forms were returned. It became apparent that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is made up of members who are not only superb musicians but extremely interesting personalities in their own right.

How many of the thousands who attend the concerts at Symphony Hall and Tanglewood knew, for instance, that both bass player Joseph Hearne and second violinist William Waterhouse built their own houses, or that Spencer Larrison, also of the second violin section, lists gliding which he calls soaring, as his hobby. Principal violinist Burton Fine could be called doctor for he has a Ph.D. from the Illinois Institute of Technology, and worked for nine years with the National Space and Aeronautics Administration in Cleveland. The new assistant concertmaster, Jerome Rosen, who joined the orchestra this summer, is another scientist in the group, in his case in math and philosophy, as is the new principal horn, Charles Kavalovski, who holds a Ph.D. in experimental nuclear physics.

The fact that trumpet player, Roger Voisin, was known as the boy signaller who, with his trumpet, recalled the audience and the orchestra at the Esplanade Concerts long ago emerges in the booklet. He subsequently joined the BSO at aged 17, the youngest musician ever to join the orchestra. Gourmet cooking is a favorite hobby with many of the men of the BSO, as are all kinds of sports. Several are licensed airplane pilots while others have hobbies clearly connected with music, such as making or repairing violin bows and other instruments.

Called "Know Your Orchestra" the 24 page booklet identifies each musician with a clear head-and-shoulders photograph, together with a brief biography giving, often in his own words, his interests and background. The center pages show a silhouette drawing of the entire orchestra, with each figure keyed to a chart below for easy identification.

The foreword consists of a letter from president of the trustees of the BSO, Talcott Banks; an introduction from the Council of Friends and the names of those who worked on the booklet committee. These consist of Mrs. George Lee Sargent, chairman of the Council of Friends of the BSO; Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard of Newton Center, Mrs. Giles M. S. Tod of Hingham, Mrs. Charles F. Toppan of Cambridge and Mrs. Roger Voisin of Jamaica Plain.

On sale for the nominal sum of one dollar at the opening concert and thereafter at all series concerts at Symphony Hall, "Know Your Orchestra" will seem to fill a need in these days of a growing identification by numbers, and, the Council of Friends sincerely hopes, will help to draw audience and orchestra together in a person-to-person relationship

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525
SEP 18 1972 New England Newsclip

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525
SEP 13 1972 New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

Although for many in the social world the new season traditionally starts with the opening of Symphony during the latter half of September, there are many organizations which plan events for their members before this date. They don't seem to worry that their supporters are still enjoying their summer hideaways in the country or by the seashore, and so will not return until the not-to-be-missed first Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are assured by the knowledge that their members are loyal and will come great distances to be present at a special event whatever the time of year.

PASTE OVER

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525
SEP 25 1972
New England Newsclip

In the garden of Mrs. John D. Brewer, Jr. of Hingham, members of the South Shore Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gather around their area chairman, Mrs. C. Russell Eddy of Duxbury (second from right) to discuss the Symphony Spiral parties to be given during the next six weeks for the benefit of the orchestra. They are from left to right Mrs. Frederick S. Lane, Mrs. L.L. Eldridge, Mrs. Joseph R. Watkins, all of Hingham, Mrs. Eddy and the hostess, Mrs. Brewer. (Vin Alabiso)

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

They sold like traditional hotcakes, those red and white booklets about the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the Council of Friends of the orchestra had prepared and had printed. At times the scene in the lobbies of Symphony Hall resembled bargain day at Filene's Basement as the Friday afternoon audience crowded around the tables containing stacks of the brilliantly colored books.

It was a welcome sight for the members of the committee who had worked long and hard to produce this mini-biography of each member of the orchestra. Apparently the price was right too, for the dollar bills were fluttering from gloved hands onto the tables like manna from heaven, each of which meant another dollar for the coffers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For the thousands of women who poured through the doors of Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon this was the official start of the new season. No event that is held before the opening of Symphony is considered official, and it is by the date of the first Friday afternoon concert that plans are made to close summer places and move back to town.

Once again this year one wondered what had happened to all those little milliners so beloved of the proper Bostonians of the past. There was hardly a hat to be seen in the entire audience and even those of the older generation who a few years ago would not have felt decent without one, came hatless to what to them is a sacred event.

The conversation at intermission was, in addition to the new "Know Your Orchestra" booklet, and the brand new program format, a larger version colored a deep beautiful blue, about the Council of Friend's newest idea of fund raising for the BSO, the Spiral Party. Patterned on the chain letter idea these events will start with seven members of the Council attending a luncheon at Symphony Hall. They in turn will each invite to a party of their own seven more pepole, who, in turn, will invite seven to each of their parties, etc., etc. Each guest contributes two dollars to the BSO and accepts an invitatition to attend only on the condition that they will give a party in turn, thus ensuring the continuation of the chain, or spiral. To be completed within the next six weeks the Council of Friends by this method hope to raise an incredible $80,000 to help the orchestra with its annual deficit.

The plans of the South Shore Council of Friends of the BSO for a series of Spiral parties is already underway. All kinds of parties from tennis to coffee eventually involving hundreds of guests are being planned. Mrs. C. Russell Eddy of Duxbury is the area chairman of the South Shore group, and among those working with her on these benefits are Mrs. John D. Brewer, Jr., Mrs. L.L. Eldridge, Jr., Mrs. Frederick S. Lane and Mrs. Joseph R. Watkins, all of Hingham.

TOWNSMAN
WELLESLEY, MASS.
W. 8,500
SEP 28 1972
New England Newsclip

Residents Host Symphony Parties

Mrs. Howard Hansen of Wellesley Hills and Mrs. Erick Kauders of Marblehead are co-chairmen of "Symphony Spirals"-- a series of informal parties, sponsored by the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, designed to raise over $80,000 for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Symphony Spirals" originated at a luncheon at Symphony Hall. The co-chairmen invited eight members of the Council of Friends to the luncheon. Each of the eight guests donated $2 to the Orchestra and presented lists of seven people they planned to invite to the "Kick-off" Spiral Party of 56 guests held last week.

Between September 29 and October 6, each of the 56 guests of the second Spiral invite six guests each and act as hosts for the third set of parties. This makes a total of 336 guests who will act as hosts for the fourth set of Spiral parties to take place between October 6 and 13.

The Spirals continue through the seventh and final Spiral when between October 27 and November 3, 20, 160 hosts entertain two guests each for a total of 40, 320 guests. Each contributes $2 to the Orchestra making a grand total of $80,640 raised-if the Spiral is not broken.

Many Spiral Parties have been planned by Wellesley residents during the next few weeks. A partial list of hostesses include Mrs. Murray Harvey, Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Gilman Conant, Mrs. Frederic Stare and Mrs. Thomas Franks.

The individual parties given by the hosts of each Spiral may be in any form of entertainment, such as picnics, cocktail parties, teas, coffee hours, or bridge, tennis or tailgate parties. The success of each Spiral is dependant on each guest contributing $2 to the Orchestra, and then becoming a host and inviting guests to her own party. If you would like to participate in the Symphony Spirals, contact Mrs. Howard E. Hansen,(235-0514), or the Fund Office at Symphony Hall (266-1492).

CRICKET
MANCHESTER, MASS.
W. 1,598
SEP 29 1972
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Friends Host Spiral Parties

The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have organized "Symphony Spirals" — a series of informal parties with a goal of $80 thousand to help reduce the increasing annual deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Local area chairmen are Mrs. George Blagden of Beverly and Mrs. Robert W. Emmons of Manchester. Among those giving parties in Manchester will be: Mrs. R. W. Emmons, Jr., Mrs. Paul D. Shuwall, Mrs. Josiah A. Spaulding, Mrs. John H. Bradley and Mrs. Thomas S. Walker.

The "Symphony Spirals" originated at a noontime luncheon in the Ancient Instrument Room of Symphony Hall, Friday, September 22, 1972. The Co-Chairmen, Mrs. Howard Hansen and Mrs. Erich Kauders, invited the eight ladies who hosted the kick-off party for the second turn of the Spiral. Each of the eight invited guests to the luncheon donated $2 to the Orchestra and brought a list of seven people they plan to invite to the second Spiral Party of 56 guests to be held in the basement in Symphony Hall, Friday, September 29, at 12 o'clock noon.

Between September 29 and October 6, each of the 56 guests of the second Spiral invite six guests each and act as hosts for the third set of parties. This makes a total of 336 guests who will act as hosts for the fourth set of Spiral parties to take place between October 6 and 13.

The Spirals continue through the seventh and final Spiral when between October 27 and November 3, 20,160 hosts entertain two guests each for a total of 40,320 guests. Each contributes $2 to the Orchestra realizing a total of $80,640.

The individual parties given by the hosts of each Spiral may be in any form of entertainment, such as picnics, cocktail parties, teas, coffee hours, or bridge, tennis or croquet parties. The success of each Spiral is dependant on each guest contributing $2 to the Orchestra, and then becoming a host and inviting guests to her own party. Participation in the Symphony Spirals can be arranged through Mr. Steven L. Solomon in the Development Office of Symphony Hall (266-1492).

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
SEP 27 1972
New England Newsclip

ALISON ARNOLD

Helpful leisure time

The large group of women who call themselves Friends of the Boston Symphony have organized series of informal parties with a goal of $80,000 to help reduce the increasing annual deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

These parties, called "Symphony Spirals" originated at a noon luncheon in the Ancient Instruments Room of Symphony Hall, last Friday. The co-chairman, Mrs. Howard Hansen, Wellesley Hills, and Mrs. Erick Kauders, Marblehead, invited eight women who will be hostesses for the second turn of the Spiral. Mrs. William J. Mixter Jr., Dedham, is chairman of the Areas of the Boston Council of Friends.

Each of the eight invited guests to the luncheon donated $2 to the orchestra and brought a list of seven they plan to invite to the second party of 56 guests, to be held in the basement of Symphony Hall, Friday noon.

Between then and Oct. 6, each of the 56 guests of the second luncheon will invite six guests each and be hostesses for the third set of parties. This makes a total of 336 guests who will be hostesses for the 4th set of Spiral parties to take place between Oct. 6 and 13.

The Spirals will continue through the seventh and final Spiral when between Oct. 27 and Nov. 3, 20,160 hostesses entertain two guests each for a total of 40,320 guests. Each contributes $2 to the orchestra, realizing a total of $80,640. (I hope their arithmetic is correct!)

Guests invited to the first Spiral party were Mrs. George Blagden, Mrs. Thomas Hansen, Mrs. George Draper, Mrs. C. Russell Eddy, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Samuel A. Levine and Mrs. Gordon Smith.

SOUTH MIDDLESEX DAILY NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MA.
D. 24,000
OCT 3
New

THE LEDGER
BROOKL MASS
W. 8,500
SEP 28

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 10,200
SEP 28 1972
New England Newsclip

Symphony spirals aim for $80,000

The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have organized "Symphony Spirals", a series of informal parties designed to produce a revenue of $80,000 to offset the increasing annual deficit of the orchestra.

The "spirals" began at a noontime luncheon in the Ancient Instrument Room of the Symphony Hall Sept. 22. At this meeting eight ladies were invited, each contributing $2, and each sponsoring a party for the second turn of the spiral. The 56 guests at each party will invite six guests they plan to invite to the next round.

If the spiral parties continue through seven rounds, 40,320 guests will have raised the anticipated $80,640 by contributing $2 each.

The Spiral Parties may take the form of picnics, cocktail parties, coffee hours, or tennis and croquet parties. Participation in the Spirals can be arranged through Steven L. Solomon in the Development Office of Symphony Hall (266-1492). Guests will be assigned to a party in their area, to which they must bring a list of people to invite to the next event.

RECORD TRANSCRIPT
MILTON, MASS.
W. 5,735
SEP 28 1972
New England Newsclip

Friends Of Boston Symphony Host Spiral Party In Milton Tuesday

BOSTON -- The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have organized "Symphony Spirals" - a series of informal parties with a goal of $80 thousand to help reduce the increasing annual deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Co-Chairmen of the fund-raising event are Mrs. Howard Hansen of Wellesley Hills, and Mrs. Erick Kauders of Marblehead. Assisting the Co-Chairmen is Mrs. William J. Mixter, Jr. of Dedham, Chairman of the Areas of the Boston Council of Friends.

The first Spiral Party in the Milton-Quincy area will start at the home of Mrs. Lewis W. Kane, Chairman of the South Shore Council of Friends, on October 3. Her guests will include Mrs. Theodore Jones, Mrs. C. Rodgers Burgin, Mrs. Frederick Tudor, Mrs. Robert Daley, all of Milton; Mrs. Charles Lyman of Canton and Mrs. James O'Hare of Quincy.

The "Symphony Spirals" originated at a noontime luncheon in the Ancient Instrument Room of Symphony Hall Friday, September 22. The Co-Chairmen, Mrs. Hansen and Mrs. Kauders, have invited the eight ladies who hosted the kick-off party for the second turn of the Spiral. Each of the eight invited guests to the luncheon donates $2 to the Orchestra and brings a list of seven people they plan to invite to the second Spiral Party of 56 guests to be held in the Basement in Symphony Hall on Friday, September 29, at 12 o'clock noon.

Between September 29 and October 6, each of the 56 guests of the second Spiral invite six guests each and act as hosts for the third set of parties. This makes a total of 336 guests who will act as hosts for the fourth set of Spiral parties to take place between October 6 and 13.

The Spirals continue through the seventh and final Spiral when between October 27 and November 3, 20,160 hosts entertain two guests each for a total of 40,320 guests. Each contributes $2 to the Orchestra realizing a total of $80,640.

The individual parties given by the hosts of each Spiral may be in any form of entertainment, such as picnics, cocktail parties, teas, coffee hours, or bridge, tennis or croquet parties. The success of each Spiral is dependent on each guest contributing $2 to the Orchestra, and then becoming a host and inviting guests to her own party.

Participation in the Symphony Spirals can be arranged through Mr. Steven L. Solomon in the Development Office of Symphony Hall (266-1492). Guests will be assigned to a party in their area to which they must bring a list of people they plan to invite to continue the Spiral.

TOWNSMAN
WELLESLEY, MASS.
W. 8,500
SEP 28 1972
New England Newsclip

Youth Concert Deadline is Monday, October 2

Richard W. Drew, Town Chairman for Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, announced today that subscriptions for the 1972-73 season must be returned by Monday.

The Youth Concerts, with Harry Ellis Dickson conducting members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sold out for the past 13 seasons since their founding in 1959. Three concerts are presented at 11:00 a.m. Saturday mornings at Symphony Hall. The concert dates are November 11, 1972; January 27 and March 24, 1973.

The programs are specifically prepared for young people with the added benefit of hearing classical and contemporary works performed in the tradition - filled atmosphere of Symphony Hall by men of the Boston Symphony.

Application blanks have been distributed to all students in grades 5 and 6 by the Wellesley elementary music specialists. Application blanks are also available to all Junior High School students, grades 7-9.

Tickets are available for the Series only at $7.00 for the three concerts. Bus transportation for three concerts is also available at $3.00.

For further information and ticket applications, please contact R. W. Drew at the Music Office, 235-7250, ext. 46.

SOUTH SHORE MIRROR
SCITUATE, MASS.
W. 10,000
SEP 28 1972
New England Newsclip

GINO CAPPILLETTI TO NARRATE YOUTH CONCERT

Gino Cappelletti, the well known professional football player will be the featured narrator at one of the Youth Symphony Concerts this season, at Boston Symphony Hall. Under the Direction of Harry Ellis Dickson, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will conduct a program entitled: "Music For Fun", at which Gino will narrate "Freddie the Football" by Richard Hayman. This is one in a series of Concerts given each year to better acquaint children in the middle grades with the varied program of the Symphony.

Other programs in the series this year will feature a variety of music such as, Peter and the Wolf, the Berklee College of Music, folk dances of many countries, Pononaise by Chopin, etc. The Youth Symphony Program Concerts is presently in its thirteenth year in Scituate. Organized and directed by interested private citizens, tickets were made available at the close of school last year. The 3 concerts are operated in conjunction with the Scituate Public Schools. The dates of the concerts are November 18, 1972, February 3, 1973, and April 7, 1973.

A limited number of tickets are still available. For further information, please call Mrs. Joan Doyle.

PUBLIC SPIRIT
AYER, MASS.
W. 5,150
SEP 21 1972
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony youth concerts

PEPPERELL - All grade five and six students at the Peter Fitzpatrick School may still subscribe to a series of three "Youth" Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall in Boston.

The program on the 1972-1973 season is really something. "Peter and the Wolf" with slides; "The Earth's Children," Symphony Orchestra augmented by a concert-jazz ensemble depicting the moods and strength of today's youth; "Music for Fun, Toy Symphony" and other selections, orchestra supported by some surprising toys, and classical music illustrated by Folk Dances of many countries.

The Youth Concert Series costs $7 for the three concerts on Saturdays, November 18, February 3, and April 7 at 11 a.m.

Transportation from the Peter Fitzpatrick School to Boston and back will cost an additional small amount depending on the number of youngsters who go. The Pepperell PTA are the coordinators for the concerts and chaperones will accompany the youngsters.

If you are interested in having your child attend the series, contact Mrs. Winslow H. Duke, Jewett Street, Pepperell.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525
OCT 25 1972
New England Newsclip

Notes on the Musical Scene

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's annual series of youth concerts begins Nov. 11 with Harry Ellis Dickson conducting "Music in Multi-media." The concert, which will be repeated Monday, Nov. 13 and Saturday, Nov. 18, will include Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf," Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" and "The Earth's Children" by Phil Wilson, to be performed by symphony plus jazz ensemble from the Berklee College of Music.

The youth concert series include three different programs during the year, each repeated three times for different groups of children. There are two Saturday series and, for the first time this season, a Monday morning series for children who cannot attend the Saturday morning concerts. Other programs this season will include Haydn's "Toy" Symphony and a program of folk dances of many countries. All concerts are at 11 a.m. at Symphony Hall, Huntington and Massachusetts Avenues in Boston.

TIMES
WALPOLE, MASS.
W. 4,000
SEP 28 1972
New England Newsclip

Symphony Hall Youth Concerts

Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, an unusual musical event for thousands of Massachusetts students, is returning to Boston's famed Symphony Hall for the 14th season.

Under the direction of Harry Ellis Dickson, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in classical and contemporary music selected to appeal to young people in grades 5 and over, and to stimulate their interest and appreciation for fine music.

Some of the highlights of the 1971-72 season were a concert entitled, "The Organ, the Orchestra, and a Day in Music," with organ soloist Berj Zamkochian; a program of music and dance, performed by members of the Dance Companies of the National Center of Afro - American Artists, the Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts, and the Boston Ballet and directed by Billy Wilson; and a concert version of Offenbach's opera, La Perichole, directed by Michael Kaye, with local soloists in the lead roles and the townspeople played by members of the Lincoln Sudbury Regional High School chorus under the direction of Robert Wentworth.

Wednesday of this week, students in grades 5 - 9 received a letter of explanation and application re: the 1972-73 season. The concerts are given on Saturday mornings from 11 to 12 a.m. in two series of three programs each.

Walpole students will be attending Series B presented on Nov. 18, Feb. 3, and April 7. Tickets are sold for the series only. Deadline for application is Oct. 4.

Additional information is available from Mrs. Ronald Dobson at 668-6759 or Mrs. Manuel Kurland at Symphony Hall.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790
SEP 28 1972

Young people's concert Sunday on Ch. 2

Michael Tilson Thomas, the 26-year-old conductor, will conduct and narrate the New York Philharmonic Young People's Concert to be presented Sunday at 5 p.m. on Channel 2.

The youthful Thomas, currently music director of the Buffalo Symphony Orchestra and principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, takes as his subject for his television appearance with the Philharmonic the "pattern of 3s" in music — the pulse and the rhythm of three beats — and its "contribution to our musical heritage," in Thomas' own words.

TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
D. 38,127
SEP 28 1972
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony In Providence Oct. 19

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its Providence series on Oct. 19 at 8:30 p.m. at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium, Providence.

Colin Davis, a principal guest conductor of the orchestra, will conduct. He will open the program with Sibelius' Symphony No. 3 in C to be followed by Elgar's violin concerto with the Boston Symphony concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist.

The Providencd series will continue with two other concerts on Nov. 16 and Jan. 4 with Daniel Berenboim and Michael Tilson Thomas conducting.

SOUTH SHORE NEWS
ROCKLAND, MASS.
W. 43,050
OCT 4 1972
New England Newsclip

Cappelletti to narrate at symphony

BOSTON — Gino Cappelletti, the well known professional football player, will be the featured narrator at one of the Youth Symphony Concerts this season, at Boston Symphony Hall. Under the direction of Harry Ellis Dickson, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will conduct a program entitled: "Music for Fun", at which Gino will narrate "Freddie the Football' by Richard Hayman.

The dates of the concerts are November 18, 1972, February 3, 1973, and April 17, 1973. A limited number of tickets are available.

For further information please call Mrs. Joan Doyle, 545-3098.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 31,202
OCT 10 1972
New England Newsclip

Final Chance

Oct. 11 is the last date that Marblehead students will be able to purchase tickets for the current series of "Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall in Boston. Marblehead

The musical program is an annual event, and Music Director Harry Ellis Dickson and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in classical and contemporary works selected to appeal to pupils in Grades 5-12.

Marblehead students will attend Series "B" which consists of concerts to be held Nov. 18, Feb. 13 and April 7, all Saturdays at 11 a.m. Tickets are sold for the entire series only and may be ordered from local chairman Mrs. Edward B. Berman, 8 McKinley Road. Bus transportation will be arranged at additional cost.

REPORTER
MARBLEHEAD, MASS.
W. 7,400
OCT 5 1972
New England Newsclip

Tuesday is deadline for youth concert tickets

Mrs. Edward B. Berman, Town Chairman for Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, has announced the closing date for subscriptions for the 1972-73 series of concerts is Tuesday, October 10.

The concerts, with Harry Ellis Dickson conducting members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sold out each season since they began in 1959. Marblehead subscribers will attend series B - programs being presented on Saturdays at 11:00 a.m., in Symphony Hall, Boston, on November 18, February 3, and April 7.

The programs are planned to stimulate young people's interest in good music by presenting both classical and contemporary compositions played by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the traditional atmosphere of Symphony Hall.

Bus transportation will be arranged on demand.

Tickets are sold by the series only, at $7.00 for three concerts.

Please make checks payable to Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, Inc. and send to Mrs. Edward B. Berman, 8 McKinley Rd., Marblehead, Mass. 01945 - or Samuel Harris, Director of Music, Marblehead High School, Pleasant St., Marblehead, Mass. 01945. The telephone number for further information is 631-1753.

ITEM
CLINTON, MASS.
D. 4,150
OCT 10 1972
New England Newsclip

Young people in Berlin can attend concerts

Berlin youths are again encouraged to subscribe to the Youth Concerts and Symphony Hall in Boston.

This season the concerts will be held on Saturday mornings starting at 11. Bus transportation will be provided from the Berlin Memorial School for each concert. They will be on November 18, February 3, and April 7.

Harry Ellis Dickson will direct members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in classical and contemporary music geared to appeal to children in grades 5 through high school. The varied programs will stimulate their interest in music.

This will be the 14th season the Youth Concerts have been held. They are always a sell-out so that reservations must be made as soon as possible. Season tickets are available at $7.00 each for students and adults. Tickets for individual concerts are not available.

Reservations may be made through the Berlin Memorial School or Mrs. Dean Goodwin, local chairman, (562-2428). The deadline is Friday, October 13.

TOWNSMAN
WELLESLEY, MASS.
W. 8,500
SEP 28 1972
New England Newsclip

Youth Concert Deadline is Monday, October 2

Richard W. Drew, Town Chairman for Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, announced today that subscriptions for the 1972-73 season must be returned by Monday.

The Youth Concerts, with Harry Ellis Dickson conducting members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sold out for the past 13 seasons since their founding in 1959. Three concerts are presented at 11:00 a.m. Saturday mornings at Symphony Hall. The concert dates are November 11, 1972; January 27 and March 24, 1973.

The programs are specifically prepared for young people with the added benefit of hearing classical and contemporary works performed in the tradition - filled atmosphere of Symphony Hall by men of the Boston Symphony.

Application blanks have been distributed to all students in grades 5 and 6 by the Wellesley elementary music specialists. Application blanks are also available to all Junior High School students, grades 7-9.

Tickets are available for the Series only at $7.00 for the three concerts. Bus transportation for three concerts is also available at $3.00.

For further information and ticket applications, please contact R. W. Drew at the Music Office, 235-7250, ext. 46.

SOUTH SHORE MIRROR
SCITUATE, MASS.
W. 10,000
SEP 28 1972
New England Newsclip

GINO CAPPILLETTI TO NARRATE YOUTH CONCERT

Gino Cappelletti, the well known professional football player will be the featured narrator at one of the Youth Symphony Concerts this season, at Boston Symphony Hall. Under the Direction of Harry Ellis Dickson, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will conduct a program entitled: "Music For Fun", at which Gino will narrate "Freddie the Football" by Richard Hayman. This is one in a series of Concerts given each year to better acquaint children in the middle grades with the varied program of the Symphony.

Other programs in the series this year will feature a variety of music such as, Peter and the Wolf, the Berklee College of Music, folk dances of many countries, Pononaise by Chopin, etc. The Youth Symphony Program Concerts is presently in its thirteenth year in Scituate. Organized and directed by interested private citizens, tickets were made available at the close of school last year. The 3 concerts are operated in conjunction with the Scituate Public Schools. The dates of the concerts are November 18, 1972, February 3, 1973, and April 7, 1973.

A limited number of tickets are still available. For further information, please call Mrs. Joan Doyle.

PUBLIC SPIRIT
AYER, MASS.
W. 5,150
SEP 21 1972
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony youth concerts

PEPPERELL - All grade five and six students at the Peter Fitzpatrick School may still subscribe to a series of three "Youth" Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall in Boston.

The program on the 1972-1973 season is really something. "Peter and the Wolf" with slides; "The Earth's Children," Symphony Orchestra augmented by a concert-jazz ensemble depicting the moods and strength of today's youth; "Music for Fun, Toy Symphony" and other selections, orchestra supported by some surprising toys, and classical music illustrated by Folk Dances of many countries.

The Youth Concert Series costs $7 for the three concerts on Saturdays, November 18, February 3, and April 7 at 11 a.m.

Transportation from the Peter Fitzpatrick School to Boston and back will cost an additional small amount depending on the number of youngsters who go. The Pepperell PTA are the coordinators for the concerts and chaperones will accompany the youngsters.

If you are interested in having your child attend the series, contact Mrs. Winslow H. Duke, Jewett Street, Pepperell.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525
OCT 25 1972
New England Newsclip

Notes on the Musical Scene

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's annual series of youth concerts begins Nov. 11 with Harry Ellis Dickson conducting "Music in Multi-media." The concert, which will be repeated Monday, Nov. 13 and Saturday, Nov. 18, will include Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf," Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" and "The Earth's Children" by Phil Wilson, to be performed by symphony plus jazz ensemble from the Berklee College of Music.

The youth concert series include three different programs during the year, each repeated three times for different groups of children. There are two Saturday series and, for the first time this season, a Monday morning series for children who cannot attend the Saturday morning concerts. Other programs this season will include Haydn's "Toy" Symphony and a program of folk dances of many countries. All concerts are at 11 a.m. at Symphony Hall, Huntington and Massachusetts Avenues in Boston.

TIMES
WALPOLE, MASS.
W. 4,000
SEP 28 1972
New England Newsclip

Symphony Hall Youth Concerts

Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, an unusual musical event for thousands of Massachusetts students, is returning to Boston's famed Symphony Hall for the 14th season.

Under the direction of Harry Ellis Dickson, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in classical and contemporary music selected to appeal to young people in grades 5 and over, and to stimulate their interest and appreciation for fine music.

Some of the highlights of the 1971-72 season were a concert entitled, "The Organ, the Orchestra, and a Day in Music," with organ soloist Berj Zamkochian; a program of music and dance, performed by members of the Dance Companies of the National Center of Afro - American Artists, the Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts, and the Boston Bailet and directed by Billy Wilson; and a concert version of Offenbach's opera, La Perichole, directed by Michael Kaye, with local soloists in the lead roles and the townspeople played by members of the Lincoln Sudbury Regional High School chorus under the direction of Robert Wentworth.

Wednesday of this week, students in grades 5 - 9 received a letter of explanation and application re: the 1972-73 season. The concerts are given on Saturday mornings from 11 to 12 a.m. in two series of three programs each.

Walpole students will be attending Series B presented on Nov. 18, Feb. 3, and April 7. Tickets are sold for the series only. Deadline for application is Oct. 4.

Additional information is available from Mrs. Ronald Dobson at 668-6759 or Mrs. Manuel Kurland at Symphony Hall.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,700
SEP 28 1972

Young people's concert Sunday on Ch. 2

Michael Tilson Thomas, the 26-year-old conductor, will conduct and narrate the New York Philharmonic Young People's Concert to be presented Sunday at 5 p.m. on Channel 2.

The youthful Thomas, currently music director of the Buffalo Symphony Orchestra and principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, takes as his subject for his television appearance with the Philharmonic the "pattern of 3s" in music — the pulse and the rhythm of three beats — and its "contribution to our musical heritage," in Thomas' own words.

TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
D. 38,127
SEP 28 1972
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony In Providence Oct. 19

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its Providence series on Oct. 19 at 8:30 p.m. at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium, Providence.

Colin Davis, a principal guest conductor of the orchestra, will conduct. He will open the program with Sibelius' Symphony No. 3 in C to be followed by Elgar's violin concerto with the Boston Symphony concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist.

The Providencd series will continue with two other concerts on Nov. 16 and Jan. 4 with Daniel Berenboim and Michael Tilson Thomas conducting.

SOUTH SHORE NEWS
ROCKLAND, MASS.
W. 43,050
OCT 4 1972
New England Newsclip

Cappelletti to narrate at symphony

BOSTON — Gino Cappelletti, the well known professional football player, will be the featured narrator at one of the Youth Symphony Concerts this season, at Boston Symphony Hall. Under the direction of Harry Ellis Dickson, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will conduct a program entitled: "Music for Fun", at which Gino will narrate "Freddie the Football' by Richard Hayman.

The dates of the concerts are November 18, 1972, February 3, 1973, and April 17, 1973. A limited number of tickets are available.

For further information please call Mrs. Joan Doyle, 545-3098.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 51,262
OCT 10 1972
New England Newsclip

Final Chance

Oct. 11 is the last date that Marblehead students will be able to purchase tickets for the current series of "Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall in Boston. Marblehead

The musical program is an annual event, and Music Director Harry Ellis Dickson and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in classical and contemporary works selected to appeal to pupils in Grades 5-12.

Marblehead students will attend Series "B" which consists of concerts to be held Nov. 18, Feb. 13 and April 7, all Saturdays at 11 a.m. Tickets are sold for the entire series only and may be ordered from local chairman Mrs. Edward B. Berman, 8 McKinley Road. Bus transportation will be arranged at additional cost.

REPORTER
MARBLEHEAD, MASS.
W. 7,400
OCT 5 1972
New England Newsclip

Tuesday is deadline for youth concert tickets

Mrs. Edward B. Berman, Town Chairman for Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, has announced the closing date for subscriptions for the 1972-73 series of concerts is Tuesday, October 10.

The concerts, with Harry Ellis Dickson conducting members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sold out each season since they began in 1959. Marblehead subscribers will attend series B - programs being presented on Saturdays at 11:00 a.m., in Symphony Hall, Boston, on November 18, February 3, and April 7.

The programs are planned to stimulate young people's interest in good music by presenting both classical and contemporary compositions played by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the traditional atmosphere of Symphony Hall.

Bus transportation will be arranged on demand.

Tickets are sold by the series only, at $7.00 for three concerts.

Please make checks payable to Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, Inc. and send to Mrs. Edward B. Berman, 8 McKinley Rd., Marblehead, Mass. 01945 - or Samuel Harris, Director of Music, Marblehead High School, Pleasant St., Marblehead, Mass. 01945. The telephone number for further information is 631-1753.

ITEM
CLINTON, MASS.
D. 4,150
OCT 10 1972
New England Newsclip

Young people in Berlin can attend concerts

Berlin youths are again encouraged to subscribe to the Youth Concerts and Symphony Hall in Boston.

This season the concerts will be held on Saturday mornings starting at 11. Bus transportation will be provided from the Berlin Memorial School for each concert. They will be on November 18, February 3, and April 7.

Harry Ellis Dickson will direct members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in classical and contemporary music geared to appeal to children in grades 5 through high school. The varied programs will stimulate their interest in music.

This will be the 14th season the Youth Concerts have been held. They are always a sell-out so that reservations must be made as soon as possible. Season tickets are available at $7.00 each for students and adults. Tickets for individual concerts are not available.

Reservations may be made through the Berlin Memorial School or Mrs. Dean Goodwin, local chairman, (562-2428). The deadline is Friday, October 13.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 362,377
OCT 1 1972
New England Newsclip

1967-68 last season series fully subscribed

Sell-out myth ends, BSO tackles attendance gap

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

You have seen the big advertisements urging you to "join the Boston Symphony." They are the central piece of the biggest subscription campaign the orchestra has ever undertaken. As well as being an attempt to get new subscribers, they are a statement against the well-established myth — a myth that, until last year, the management was content to leave undisturbed — that it is impossible to get tickets to Boston Symphony concerts. It is not, and it has not been for some time.

Thomas Urquhart, BSO subscription manager, says that the last time a series was sold out by subscription was in the 1967-68 season, the Friday afternoons (then 24, now down to 20). He offered some further figures. Symphony Hall seats 2631. Of those, 2360 are offered for subscription, 150 being held back as rush seats, the remainder set aside for management, press, and so on. Fridays were fully subscribed as recently as five seasons ago (Saturdays had begun to drop a few years before that), but by last year the subscription list was down to 2150. For the current season it has gone up to about 2200. The short series — one of 10 concerts, three of six, one of three — have never been totally subscribed, except before the Tuesday Cambridge series moved from the very much smaller Sanders Theater to Symphony Hall some ten years ago.

One point of the Becker poll is the growing number of two-home families, a phenomenon closely coupled to the growing popularity of skiing. Quite a proportion of the BSO audience is apt to spend winter weekends away from Boston.

The Boston Symphony, trying to find answers, engaged the Becker Research Corp. last year to make a study of the audience. David Rockefeller Jr., BSO Assistant Manager for Audience and Public Affairs, describes the Becker findings as "hopeful and helpful," as something which can be used "to lead us back to full houses again in the near future." He cannot say whether any of what was learned will be made public, "and some of it," he added, "I can assure you will always be treated as confidential."

One point out of Becker mentioned by Urquhart is the growing number of two-home families (and not only among the very rich), a phenomenon closely coupled to the growing popularity of skiing. Quite a proportion, then, of the BSO audience, actual or potential, is apt to spend winter weekends away from Boston and is reluctant to commit itself to 20 Fridays or, more likely, Saturdays of Symphony-going. The BSO has met that trend by offering Saturdays not only as a package of 20, but as two split series of 10 so that you go only every other time — making official the sort of sharing that individuals and families have long engaged in on their own — and Urquhart reports that the response to that has given the Saturday series quite a lift.

The downward curve of total ticket sales has been less steep than that of subscription sales. In other words, a larger proportion of concert-goers have preferred to buy a la carte. Money has something to do with it, but it is hard to generalize on that point because the subscription price range goes from $6.50 for a second balcony seat for three Thursday "Romantic" series to $205 for 20 Friday afternoons on the orchestra floor. A subscriber buys insurance, so to speak, and convenience. He also saves a bit on the price per concert, about nine percent averaged across the house, though of course it is a saving only if you really want the whole package. At the same time he adds pleasantly to the seller's sense of security, and he helps reduce the need to advertise the concerts so heavily as they occur, which can add up to more than enough to offset the difference in receipts from subscription vs. single ticket prices.

But at this point I really want to shortcut the discussion to predict that subscriptions will go up when the quality of the product does, perhaps more precisely, when the public either has been offered persuasive reason to believe that will happen—Seiji Ozawa's taking over as Music Director next fall could well be such a reason—or when it has caught on that things really are more lively. The subscription drop moved in direct ratio to the growing dreariness of life in Symphony Hall, though with a slight lag.

It is my impression that the orchestra's morale got an immeasurable boost from the announcement eight months ago of Ozawa's appointment, not least because the players' views had been solicited and heard with respect. In no season in the eight and a half years I have heard the orchestra regularly has it played so consistently beautifully as at the Berkshire Festival this summer. Beautiful playing was the norm and the bad moments were lapses, not the other way around.

Two more steps remain to be taken. I hope a policy will be developed which will bring more interesting guest conductors and, above all, soloists to the orchestra. Then, the quality of the programs must be improved.

The programs this year are scandalous. I note gratefully the Mahler 2nd, the Bruckner 5th, the Verdi Requiem, Elgar's Violin Concerto, Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex," "Lelio" and the Te Deum of Berlioz, Piston's new Flute Concerto, and Mozart's B flat Piano Concerto, K.450, but what a mess of banalities and retreads surrounds those events. Beethoven's 6th and 7th Symphonies, the Berlioz "Romeo et Juliette," Bartok's Music for strings, percussion, and celesta, "Till Eulenspiegel," the Mahler 1st, "Firebird," "Daphnis and Chloe" No. 2, the Prokofiev 3rd Piano Concerto, the Tchaikovsky 5th — all good music, but all played at Boston Symphony concerts in the last two, three, four years, some of it as recently as last season.

The summit of irresponsibility is reached in the absence of contemporary music. The new Piston Concerto is the only work on the regular — that is, other than Spectrum — series composed within the last 15 year. This in the year of Arthur Berger's 60th birthday, this from an orchestra that has not yet played Carter's Concerto for Orchestra, no symphony by Sessions since the 3rd 15 years ago, nor George Crumb's "Of Time and the River," not Boulez's "Eclats" or "Pli selon pli," the Berio "Sinfonia," Babbitt's "Relata," Penderecki's "Threnody for the victims of Hiroshima," nor Shifrin's "Three pieces for orchestra," no work by Roberto Gerhard, not a note of Peter Maxwell Davies — to offer a very few suggestions as to where a beginning might well be made.

There is a musically sophisticated public around Boston whose members know how to pick out of the BSO list the interesting programs they want to hear, but who would not be caught dead spending an evening with the "Flying Dutchman" Overture, a Saint-Saens concerto, and the Tchaikovsky 5th, or with a sequence of "Jupiter," the Unfinished, and "Till," nice pieces, but. . . . There is an audience which the BSO could reclaim by the offer of more enlivening prospects — to say nothing of greater efficiency, which would enable the orchestra to put out a brochure in which the words "to be announced" appear rather less often — an audience that has found more interesting ways of spending the musical part of its budget. And come to think of it, I bet that when David Rockefeller assured me that there were parts of the Becker Survey no one outside the BSO family would ever see, audience comments on quality is one thing he had in mind.

The Boston Globe
(EVENING)
D. 146,302
OCT 2 1972
New England Newsclip

Silverstein conducts BSO repeat program

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

When Joseph Silverstein conducted the Boston Symphony Saturday night in the Vaughan Williams Tallis Fantasy and Mahler's Second Symphony — the program that William Steinberg had led Thursday night and Friday afternoon — it was not one of those occasions of high theater: the unknown Toscanini, Bernstein, or Thomas coming to the rescue, being propelled into instant fame, that sort of thing. No, the decision that Silverstein, the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor as well as its concert-master, should take over the third in a run of four performances "in view of William Steinberg's very taxing schedule this past week" was made a least 10 days ago and announced to the public earlier this week. Symphony Hall was sold out, and when Silverstein first came onstage, he was greeted by a demonstrative round of good-will applause.

But if the event was not one of those at which careers are spectacularly made, the situation was interesting just the same. All the rehearsal time until the first performance Thursday evening was Steinberg's, and Silverstein had only a relatively small bit Saturday just before curtain-time, first with the orchestra, then with the singers, but not with the two together, not enough for a complete run-through. I don't know if a performane rehearsed by Silverstein from the beginning would reveal an interpretation strikingly different from the one offered Saturday, but under the circumstances there were limits on how far the rescue-wagon conductor could assert ideas of his own. It was lucky, I should think, that the conductor into and out of whose preparations Silverstein had to work was one who plays Mahler as straight as Steinberg does, and not a more idiosyncratic one like Bernstein or Solti.

Certainly, what Silverstein produced was by no means a mere carbon copy of what I heard 48 hours earlier from Steinberg, the most obvious difference being that while Thursday it was not until the third movement that Steinberg had access to the required concentration, energy, and technical clarity, Silverstein was all there from the beginning (so, I was told by some musicians, was Steinberg at the Friday afternoon performance, which I did not hear). It was also my impression that Silverstein's tempi tended to be a little faster, especially in the scherzo and finale, There were occasional clear differences in detail, like Silverstein's more open dramatization of the articulations of form in the first movement, or his more impetous reading of that movement's final gesture.

Instead of the free, almost seamless flow with which Steinberg surrounded Beverly Wolff's extraordinary singing of "Primal Light," Silverstein provided a more measured accompaniment; also the pauses on either side of that song by a hair's breadth longer than Steinberg's, and the performance less effective by just that much. And at the end, Silverstein did not make the last climax unique among the others (and I remember the audience's response as more excited on Thursday), and there was an instance where the greater energies of a 40-year-old conductor, leading an exceedingly difficult work for the first time and under tough conditions, were no compensation for the accumulated experience of the 73-year-old conductor in spite of his diminished physical resources.

It did add up to an absorbing, good performance of the Mahler Second, good enough to be hard to put together with Silverstein's statement in an interview some years ago declaring himself definitely "not a Mahler man." The Vaughan Williams was enormously more coherent than it had been Thursday, though its forward motion suggested something being pushed rather than something flowing. It was, all of it, an impressive show of professionalism. The Boston Symphony played beautifully for its almost-colleague (the concertmaster occupies a difficult mezzanine position in an orchestra's social structure), but also contributed a couple of conspicuous wrong entrances in the first movement, a growl from somewhere in the lower strings and the offer on the part of a harp to begin the coda a measure early, which I am inclined to see as no-fault accidents, induced psychologically rather than technically. From F. John Adams's Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum and especially from the soloists, Beverly Wolff and Benita Valente, again flowed a level of artistry that made these performances in their verbal portions, by some considerable margin, the most beautiful I have heard of the Mahler Second.

The program is repeated tomorrow night at 7:30, with William Steinberg conducting.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500
OCT 12 1972
New England Newsclip

BSO OPENS SEASON

With a new musical director although this year they bill him as musical adviser since he will spend only a single week in Boston, a colorful, enlarged program book; and a handful of novelties, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has begun its ninety-second season. The first program under Michael Tilson Thomas the week before last included one of the novelties, Walter Piston's flute concerto, the Scythian Suite by Prokofiev and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

The first major work of the season was heard last week as William Steinberg, in his initial post-directorial appearance, programed the Second Symphony of Gustav Mahler. Because this massive symphony which carries the title "Resurrection" makes exhausting demands on those involved in its performance, Steinberg conducted the Thursday and Friday concerts in Symphony Hall and then relinquished the baton on Saturday evening to the Orchestra's concertmaster and assistant conductor Joseph Silverstein.

Whether it was the change in conductors (three within two weeks) or insufficient rehearsal time for Silverstein whose version I heard, this was not a memorable evening for Mahlerites. To many "Resurrection" Symphony is Mahler's most driving and dramatic musical essay. Yet it had none of those two forceful qualities on Saturday evening. Neither was the Orchestra in its most glowing form. In fact what saved the concertfrom complete disappointment was the extraordinarily moving contribution of the vocal forces which dominate the final two movements of the Symphony.

As in other Mahler symphonies the third, fourth and eighth the voice plays an important role in the total structure of the work. The fourth movement of the Second Symphony draws on Mahler's earlier poignant Des Knaben Wunderhorn and the finale, the symphony's fifth movement, is set to Klopstock's ode on the "Resurrection," thus giving the Symphony its title.

Beverly Wolff, the contralto, sang the plaintive "Urlicht" which forms the fourth movement with deep, dark solemnity. Her voice is ample, and she used it with great intelligence to achieve a level of performance that was at once insightful, eloquent and revelatory of the music's quiet beauty. In the finale she was joined by the soprano, Benita Valente, and the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum, formed last year by its conductor, F. John Adams. Here again the singing of all forces, both solo and ensemble, gave the evening its finest moments. And the voices of the young men and women from Cambridge had a sense of musical maturity that often belied their youth. Without them, it would have been a long evening.

Miss Valente's vocal elegance becomes more impressive with each successive visit to Boston.

And the voices of the young men and women from Cambridge had a sense of musical maturity that often belied their youth. Without them, it would have been a long evening.

One comment on the late John N. Burk's essay on the Symphony in the program notes. "Not until the entrance of the chorus with the words 'Mit Fluegeln die ich mir errungen;' he wrote, "does the music rise above pianissimo." This is not so. The male members of the chorus reach a resounding forte in the stanza before where they intone Klopstock's couplet "Was enstanden ist, das muss vergehen! Was vergangen, auferstehen!"

The evening began with Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis. Its dullness was an omen of things to come until the ladies and gentlemen who performed the vocal parts took over.

12.

The Boston Globe
(EVENING)
D. 125,032

OCT 4 1972 New England Newsclip

QUODLIBET /
Michael Steinberg

ELLIOTT CARTER
. . . Feb. 16 premiere

Who made G minor B flat?

In a recent article I mentioned some of the advantages of being a Boston Symphony subscriber rather than a buyer of single tickets. I have since learned about another.

Alterations to the Cabot-Cahners room in Symphony Hall (2nd floor, 1st violin side) and recarpeting of corridors should have been complete before the season began, but were delayed because of late arrival of materials. An insert in the BSO program explaining "the present shabby look of the corridors" concludes thus: "The Management offers apologies to subscribers and assures them that the work will be finished as soon as possible." And you see, as a casual, or transient, or however it is that the Management thinks of non-subscribers, you are eligible for neither apologies nor assurances.

There is a nice example of what might be called psycho-pathological etymology in the flyer announcing the BSO Spectrum concerts, where the profession of S. P. Diaghilev and S. Hurok is spelled "impressario," and a musically half-educated gremlin has interfered with the poster announcing the performances this weekend of the Saint-Saens Piano Concerto No. 2. The piece is in G minor, but the poster transposes it to B flat. It is too good for coincidence, B flat being the relative major of G minor and the two keys having the same signature of two flats. Knowing a little, but not enough, did someone look at the score, see the two flats, assume B flat, and "correct' what he assumed to be some obviously mistaken drivel about G?

SPECTRUM CONCERTS OPEN OCT 6 AND 7

AREA - Last year Michael Tilson Thomas and the Boston Symphony began a series called Spectrum Concerts. They opened to rave reviews. The Boston Globe said, "Michael Tilson Thomas and the Boston Symphony have started a good thing. . ." The Hartford Courant said, "Patently Mr. Thomas is a man of soaring programmatic imagination. . ." The Herald - Traveler said, "Symphony Hall has come intensely, electrically alive this year at the Boston Symphony's Spectrum Concerts."

The second season of the Spectrum Concerts opens on Friday and Saturday evenings, October 6 and 7 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall. Mr. Thomas has chosen for the opening concert the them VARIATIONS ON THE ORCHESTRA. To be included in the program are Luciano Berio's EPIFANIE, John Cage's VARIATION IV, and Webern's IM SOMMERWIND.

The concert opens with Music of the court of France, including works by Mouret. Following that the Orchestra will perform Music of Mannheim, with works by Stamitz, Richter and Filtz. Then Music of Vienna with Webern's IM SOMMERWIND. The concert closes with Music of the World, with Luciano Berio's EPIFANIE, mezzo - soprano Cathy Berberian as soloist - and John Cage's VARIATION IV.

There will be three series of Spectrum Concerts this year. On January 12 and 13, Mr. Thomas and the Orchestra will present A SALUTE TO DIAGHILEV, and on April 20 and 21 they will present a concert titled VENICE, A CELEBRATION.

Prices for subscriptions to the Spectrum Concerts range from $6 to $12. Single tickets range from $3 to $6. When you buy a subscription you get three concerts for the price of two. There are no rush seats for Spectrum Concerts.

PUBLIC SPIRIT
AYER, MASS.
W. 5,150

OCT 5 1972 New England Newsclip

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

OCT 6 1972 New England Newsclip

IN CONCERT

Spectrum Series — Symphony Hall, Oct. 6-7, at 8:30 p.m.: Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a course of music from 1675 to the present, with selections including Lucian Berio's "Epifanie," John Cage's "Variation IV," and Webern's "Im Sommerwind." Other Spectrum Concerts for this year are planned for Jan. 12-13 ("A Salute to Diaghilev") and April 20-21 ("Venice, a Celebration"). Ticket prices range from $3 to $6 for a single admission, and from $6 to $12 for the series. Those who purchase subscriptions get three concerts for the price of two.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,277

OCT 7 1972 New England Newsclip

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514

OCT 4 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO presents 'Spectrum'

BOSTON — Last year Michael Tilson Thomas and the Boston Symphony began a series called Spectrum Concerts. They opened to rave reviews. The Boston Globe said, "Michael Tilson Thomas and the Boston Symphony have started a good thing..." The Hartford Courant said, "Patently Mr. Thomas is a man of soaring programmatic imagination..." The Herald-Traveler said, "Symphony Hall has come intensely, electrically alive this year at the Boston Symphony's Spectrum Concerts."

The second season of the Spectrum Concerts opens on Friday and Saturday evenings, October 6 and 7 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall. Mr. Thomas has chosen for the opening concert the theme Variations on the Orchestra. To be included in the program are Luciano Berio's 'Epifanie,' John Cage's Variation IV, and Webern's 'Im Sommerwind.'

The concert opens with Music of the court of France, including works by Mouret. Following that the Orchestra will perform Music of Mannheim, with works by Stamitz, Richter and Filtz. Then Music of Vienna with Webern's 'Im Sommerwind.' The concert closes with Music of the World, with Luciano Berio's 'Epifanie,' mezzo-soprano Cathy Berberian as soloist - and John Cage's Variation IV.

There will be three series of Spectrum Concerts this year. On January 12 and 13 Mr. Thomas and the Orchestra will present A Salute to Diaghilev, and on April 20 and 21 they will present a concert titled Venice, a Celebration.

Prices for subscriptions to the Spectrum Concerts range from $6 to $12. Single tickets range from $3 to $6. When you buy a subscription you get three concerts for the price of two. There are no rush seats for Spectrum Concerts.

BSO opens Spectrum series

By Craig Smith
Globe Staff

The Boston Symphony opened their Spectrum series, Friday evening under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas with a program rather ambiguously titled, Variations on the Orchestra.

Comprised of music from the court of Louis the 14th, the Mannheim school, Webern circa 1900 and works by Berio and Cage, the program might better be described as Banalities on the Orchestra since, with the exception of the Webern work, nothing on the concert could be called interesting, let alone worthy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The evening opened with several trifles by Jean-Joseph Mouret, a French baroque composer. Movements from ninth-rate Mannheim pieces by Stamitz, Richter and Filtz followed. Only in Webern's very early work, Im Sommerwind, was there any reminder of what and who the Boston Symphony is. Joseph Silverstein's gorgeous solos in the Webern were some of the few moments of real pleasure in the concert.

Cathy Berberian is a singer closely identified with both Luciano Berio and John Cage whose respective works, Epifanie and Variations IV, comprised the second half of the concert. For a person of such Felliniesque appearance (accented in this concert by a lavender spotlight Miss Berberian has a strangely monochromatic voice, nicely used but lacking in the color and variety of some of the other specialists in contemporary vocal literature like Bethany Beardsley and Jan de Gaetani. The Berio work is very long, tedious and, for a piece supposedly exploring orchestral sonorities, rather unfocused and imprecise in its derivations from Messiaen, Boulez and Schoenberg, The Cage piece is a potboiler and sure-fire crowd-pleaser, a sort of 20th Century "Wellington's Victory" without music.

I found Michael Tilson Thomas' comments before the performances somewhat condescending and in the case of the Mouret movements, more misleading than informative.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

OCT 11 1972 New England Newsclip

Scheme and Practice

By David Noble
Patriot Ledger Correspondent

The concerts that opened the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second "Spectrum" series last weekend were based on an attractive idea that, on closer inspection, turned out to be awfully good. It's too bad conductor Michael Tilson Thomas let an accumulation of small things done wrong blunt his presentation.

The program as announced included works from around 1770 and 1900, bracketing the period from which the standards of the orchestral repertory come. Baroque works from well before 1770 and contemporary compositions completed the program, which Thomas titled "Variations on the Orchestra."

In the event, it turned out that the pedantic but possibly amusing "Variations" scheme really was a take-off point for a shrewd penetration of musical time-traveling. Thomas did not pick exemplary examples of the various musics he performed; instead, he picked freaky pieces designed to delight anyone who has done, say, too much FM listening.

For his baroque-period selection he unearthed a weird French mix of string ensemble with hunting horns: Symphonies de chasse by Jean-Joseph Mouret (c. 1700). Hunting horns, it became apparent, produce some notes wildly out of tune with the major and minor scales the strings stuck to. Modern valved horns can straighten these problems out but, for authenticity's sake, the horn parts were played "open." Mouret's work, produced to satisfy a royal whim, was not performed with elegant French style, but it hardly mattered.

For his selection from the 1770 period, Thomas chose four movements from symphonies by Stamitz pere, Richter and Filtz, arranged into an ad hoc suite that nearly was a symphony itself. But the performance was not merely a run-through of some early crowd-pleasers; rather, it was an occasion for Thomas to lecture on the banalities that these influential path-breakers introduced into Western music. Approached from this angle, the music of Stamitz, Richter, and Filtz takes on meaning.

The 1900-era work that represented the end of the repertory period was "Im Sommerwind," an oddly beautiful, though somewhat overblown, piece of juvenilia by Anton Webern. Predictably, the orchestra was happiest in this ripe, post-Romantic specimen. Beautiful solos were contributed, by several men; some duets played by violinists Joseph Silverstein and Jerome Rosen, and by violists Burton Fine and Reuben Green, were particularly memorable.

The post-repertory, contemporary works took up the second half of the concert. The first, Luciano Berio's "Epifanie," was really the most normal selection of the evening, sounding suitably post-Webernian. The piece aims at portraying some odd consciousness-shifts in its jumping among texts in its vocal line, but there's nothing really strange about it. Mezzo-soprano Cathy Berberian, for whom the work was composed, sang it with matchless poise and crisp style.

John Cage was a conclusion almost dictated by the dialectics of the occasion. A choral performance of his "Variations IV," sung, clapped, etc. by several hundred volunteers from the audience to the accompaniment of odd behavior by Miss Berberian and several members of the orchestra, epitomized the non-linear approach to music and its history that the concert had followed all night. My only problem about the performance was that it wasn't irritating in the way a really correct Cage interpretation is.

Thomas' biggest mistake was to leave his spoken remarks almost completely unprepared. What he came up with was sometimes condescending, sometimes inaccurate, sometimes convoluted and boring. The audience reacted well to his speeches, which serves only to demonstrate how hungry music listeners are for communication that has even a veneer of intelligence.

The limp conducting of Webern's Richard Straussian tone poem concealed many of its virtues, and his brittle reading of "Epifanie" misrepresented Berio's lyrical aims badly, but both these performances filled at least their didactic function in the evening's scheme. But the rapid, legato reading of the movements by Stamitz et al. undid the point Thomas had made in his lecture about their employment of still-familiar cliches — a slower tempo and careful separation of notes would have allowed those cliches to be heard in their context.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,825

OCT 9 1972 New England Newsclip

Unusual Effects Enliven Spectrum Opening

Audience Joins Thomas in Concert

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS

By ELLEN PFEIFER

Michael Tilson Thomas, in the first Spectrum concert of the season Friday night, offered a mini-course in the development of the orchestra. Beginning with late Baroque and pre-classical times (featuring some wildly off-pitch "natural" horns), he skipped those periods audiences know all too well (late 18th century and 19th) and concluded with the present — a present in which composers can take or leave the highly sophisticated instrument that the 19th century orchestra became.

The finale, John Cage's "Variations IV," must have, in fact, seemed pretty threatening to the BSO players who, except for about 12 of them, had nothing to do and could have gone home early. The sounds generated in the piece came from almost every other source than (conventional) instruments.

Featured soloist for the Cage happening ("Variations" dates back to the time of happenings) was mezzo-soprano Cathy Berberian, who, in white curls and false eyelashes, sang nonsense bits from the worlds of jazz, cabaret, Italian opera and the Orient; screamed; barked; and distributed toys and fruit among members of the audience.

Also featured were more than 100 volunteers from the audience (I have it on good authority that some were prearranged plants from the New England Conservatory who got in free) who clapped, stamped, whistled, flutter-tongued, and shouted from cue-cards they received at intermission.

Other elements of the sonic environment were produced by an electronic tape and some minimal guestures by the musicians, who strolled through the auditorium playing grunts on trombone or excerpts from quartets, while the lights turned on and off.

It was playful fun, music only by stretching the definition, and definitely not to be taken seriously.

Almost antithetical, as Thomas had said, to the Berio which preceded it.

Notated precisely for large orchestra and voice, "Epifanie" is, according to its composer, two cycles (one of instrumental pieces, one of songs) which are interpolated with various arrangements equally possible. The songs are multi-lingual poems by Joyce, Proust, Simon and others (most of audience will texts were provided), the texts were provicedl, the words of which are articulated in varying degrees of clarity. The music is tense, diffuse, sometimes jarring with the orchestra divided in as many ways as possible. The voice emerges out of this texture, dominates it and subsides and this "aparition" or manifestation is what gives rise to the work's title.

To my taste, the best parts of "Epifanie" are the vocal portions, not only because Miss Berberian is such a stupendous singer and magnetic personality but because of the great sensitivity of Berio's text settings.

In particular, there is the incredibly florid but delicately other-worldly Joyce poem about a young girl whose streaming hair looks so "girlishly and girlishly." Miss Berberian sings all those skips and melismas, throughout a huge range with touching innocence and transparency. She is equally at home with the passionate tragic mood of the following Italian lyric and the despairing German text at the end.

Prior to this Music of the World, circa 1972, Thomas and the orchestra (playing very well) performed works from the court of Louis XIV (where those horns added a rustic touch to music of le chasse), from the orchestra at Mannheim — where the Mannheim rocket, sigh, and crescendo originated — and finally from Webern juvenilia, "Im Sommerwind," a "death-knell work for the 19th century orchestra," according to Thomas.

Thomas, as usual, replaced program notes with impromptu remarks from the podium. He was informative and witty, but he irritated me somewhat with a rather affected and school-teacherish manner. That, I think, was my one real objection to the uniquely organized and well performed concert — it occasionally seemed like a music history lesson instead of a concert and occasionally I was made to feel just a little like one of the kiddies at a Young Person's Concert.

Ear Trumpet: Spectroscopy

By Richard Buell

I had thought that the Boston Symphony's Spectrum series had caught on with its intended audience, the post-World War Two baby crop, but Symphony Hall was only about half filled for the Saturday night concert I attended. The program broke down into two neat halves: before the intermission, music history brought to life, with jokes by conductor Michael Tilson Thomas instead of footnotes; after the intermission, Excess. The former consisted of an account of the lowly beginnings of the modern symphony orchestra, and was illustrated by selections from Mouret (some creepy tunings of the pre-valve horn here) and from the Mannheim stylebook of cliches as drawn upon by Stamitz and Filtz, the latter of whom, we learned, was arachnophagous. A fine idea (the illustration, not the arachnophagy), but it was bungled in the rather casual execution on modern non-gut strings that were agitated in our era's regulation juicy manner; and what was really virtuoso chamber orchestra material emerged, just barely, in a smudged reproduction. The players looked bored.

Anton vonWebern's "Im Sommerwind" stood for the beginning of the flight from nineteenth-century massiveness, with echoes of the masters of the big orchestra jostling with a fragmented, pinpoint style that in time would bring forth the strange, didactic setting of the Bach Ricercare and other works of Webern's maturity. As it unfurled Saturday night, "Im Sommerwind" seemed a rather straggly route from there to here, but it had a Nordic lushness that would be a joy to hear from the Vienna Philharmonic.

Luciano Berio's "Epifanie" is a descendant and mutant of the foregoing, being a voice-orchestral texture of imposing but not invariable density, some of it random. That is, the conductor would at times switch the orchestral static on, stand back, then switch it off. Some brass crescendo-diminuendos in the middle section, which was organized, and much subdivided chordally, were a kind of metallic hell plausibly in keeping with Thomas's description of the piece as a kind of tract for the times. The declamations of soloist Cathy Berberians were beautiful in timbre, and she apparently was unfazed by having to break from full-out singing into flat speech in mid-phrase. Devotees can find an excellent performance of "Epifanie," automobile coils, extra string section and all, conducted by the composer, on RCA LSC-3189.

Miss Berberian was one of a legion of participants in Jon Cage's "Variations for," which, by plan, had members of the audience up on the stage whistling, laughing, scratching and stamping; a strolling trombonist who used an orange as a mute; radios, toy pianos, etc., etc. Cage's world these days seems to be a rebellious nursery infiltrated by the wisdom of the East, and best expressed, perhaps, by a koan with jimmies. "Variations for" was real fun, and I cherish the toy Dune Runner that Cathy Berberian gave me during her amble up the aisle.

Support Spectrum, we at the Boston Phoenix say with a single editorial voice! Resist the baleful trend to paranoid conservatism in BSO programming! And fill up those seats at future concerts on January 12 and 13 and April 20 and 21! They're not expensive!

PHOENIX
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 25,000

OCT 17 1972 New England Newsclip

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

OCT 10 1972 New England Newsclip

From Mouret to Cage

Spectrum 'Variations'

By Louis Snyder

Last season, a refreshing new look at the procedures of concertgiving and concertgoing was instigated by Michael Tilson Thomas as director of a series of three Boston Symphony Spectrum concerts. Each program had a characteristic theme to bind its selections together; Mr. Thomas used his innate intelligence, wit, and charm (and a microphone) to comment informally before or between numbers, and this same informality was encouraged in dress onstage and in the audience for those who might identify Symphony Hall with rigid social ritual.

There was an increasingly enthusiastic response — by the second concert, word had gotton around. Young and old came in droves to be enlightened and delighted — and were not disappointed.

* * *

The second year of Spectrum concerts began last weekend with "Variations on the Orchestra," a once-over-lightly review of the increasing growth and refinement of the symphony orchestra as expressed in a few compositions written for it between the 1600's and 1970's.

Mr. Thomas was at his most expansive, the orchestra seemed to be enjoying itself in meeting a number of new challenges, and there was an eloquent soloist in mezzo-soprano Cathy Berberian who lived up to her reputation as an exponent of contemporary works with performances of astonishing skill and musicality. All that was missing was a sell-out group of adventurous patrons on the main floor — balconies were full — a lack which didn't dampen the general enthusiasm, however.

After a dashing, unannounced orchestral fanfare, Mr. Thomas launched into Jean-Joseph Mouret's Symphonies de Chasse (circa 1675), an early combination of the elegant strings of the Court with the (valve-less) brass that accompanied the king on hunting expeditions. BSO's strings were indeed suave, and its brass and winds, even to their headgear for this event, appropriately rowdy and unfettered.

* * *

Next, to music of Mannheim of the 1770's, where the city's free-standing orchestra (without a court or operatic affiliation) was the wonder of musical Europe as a virtuoso body. How such then-astonishing effects as the Mannheim rocket (a missile-type harmonic ascent), the "sigh," and spectacular instrumental crescendos showed off the performers' group potential was illustrated in excerpts from sinfonias by Stamitz, Richter, and Filtz — three pioneers in the development of this new concert phenomenon.

And in a long leap in time to the super-refinement of orchestral sound of 1900 in Vienna, Mr. Thomas and the BSO gave the first performance here of an early (pre-experimental) work of Anton Webern, "Im Sommerwind." Atypical as it is of the composer — "pubescent," Mr. Thomas called it — this rich, ripely sonorous work is nothing for Webern admirers to be ashamed of. Romantic, melodic, and opulently constructed, it distinguished the spot it was meant to in this context — a last stop for using the munificent orchestral sound at hand before a change in direction to more spare and particularized compositional ends. The BSO played it beautifully, and concertmaster Joseph Silverstein's solos were done with great sensitivity.

* * *

The post-intermission variations — Luciano Berio's "Epifanie" and John Cage's Variations IV — came under the programmatic heading "Music of the World, c. 1972." Miss Berberian was the knowing soloist in both, and it might be added that possible resistance to either of them was leavened by her undeniable conviction in their content, the strong projection of that knowledge, and the technical expertise of her singing and, at one point, of her speaking.

Whether either the Berio or the Cage are ultimate examples of the liberation of orchestral composition is a concession one makes to Mr. Thomas. It certainly is a good excuse to perform them in some context, and one likes to think that this is the raison d'etre of Spectrum concerts. So be it.

"Epifanie" is described as epitomizing an appearance, an outcropping, if you will, of sudden feeling — a voice bursting out of instrumental barriers. There are vocal outcries (to words of Proust, Machado, Joyce, Sanguinetti, Claude Simon, and Brecht), and the material surrounding it is of highly complex, individualistically projected performance art. (With all due respect to the BSO and this fine realization, those who want to go back to it may find it on RCA LSC-3189 with Berio, Berberian, and the BBC Symphony). Onstage this was an engrossing rendition, with percussionists kept particularly busy amid a network of virtuoso sections. Miss Berberian amazed with vocal fireworks outdoing a one-man band.

* * *

The popularity of audience participation was evidenced in the Cage piece which depends on those who will oh, ah, snap fingers, whistle, clap hands, stamp feet, moan, laugh, sigh . . . on cue. After intermission recruiting by Mr. Thomas, almost 150 members of the audience filed onstage with cue sheets — pink, yellow, green — to be part of the Cage fandango. Behind them a few orchestra members remained; in the hall, principal trombone, violins, and maybe others out of sight crooned individually or in groups while Mr. Thomas wove a mix of volunteers, tape, toy piano, gamelan-type keyboard, and the voice of Miss Berberian into Mr. Cage's musical dream. Orchestra? Who needed it?

The next Spectrum concerts — two different programs on Friday and Saturday, Jan 12 and 13 — are "Tributes to Diaghilev." It is safe to predict that nothing quite like them is in prospect before or thereafter.

14.

Herald American
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
S. 251,094

OCT 15 1972

Boston master to solo

The distinguished concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make his Syracuse Symphony bow Oct. 26 and 28 when the local orchestra presents its third set of subscription concerts of the season.

Joseph Silverstein will solo for Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. It will be his second time under the baton of Frederik Prausnitz. He soloed on Dvorak's Violin Concerto with Prausnitz directing when the SSO maestro was in Boston.

The artist has been concertmaster of the BSO since 1962 and assistant conductor since the beginning of the 1971-1972 season. He joined the Boston organization in 1955, at the age of 23, its youngest member.

Born in Detroit, Silverstein studied at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia and later with Mischa Mischakoff and Joseph Gingold. He won the Queen Elisabeth of Belgium International Competition in 1959.

A year later, he was awarded the Naumberg Foundation prize. Before going to Boston, Silverstein played with the orchestras of Houston, Denver and Philadelphia.

The same pair of concerts will mark the return to a Syracuse concert stage of soprano Helen Boatwright, who, with her husband Howard, has spent last year in Romania on a State Department program.

The Oct. 26 program will be played in Henninger High Auditorium with the Saturday concert in Corcoran.

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

ORACLE
ORLEANS, MASS.
W. 15,700

OCT 19 1972

New England Newsclip

Dining and Entertainment Guide

CAPE SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON

The Cape Cod Symphony Orchestra opens its 1972-73 season this Sunday evening, October 22nd, at 8:00 p.m. in the Mattacheese Middle School, Higgins-Crowell Road in West Yarmouth. Armando Ghitalla, principal trumpet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be soloist with the 65-member orchestra led by conductor Jerome D. Cohen.

Mr. Ghitalla will be heard in works by Franz Josef Haydn and Aaron Copland. Also on Sunday's program will be Symphony No. 1 by Johannes Brahms and, commemorating the 100th anniversary of his birth, a performance of Sir Ralph Vaughan-Williams' "English Folk Song Suite".

Assisting Mr. Ghitalla in the Aaron Copland work will be seventeen year-old Silas Blake Duncan, a senior at the Riverview School in East Sandwich. Duncan is in his second season with the Cape Cod Symphony, playing oboe and English horn.

Tickets will be on sale at the door Sunday night. Student tickets are also available. For information and reservations, call the Cape Cod Symphony at 362-3258.

ORACLE
ORLEANS, MASS.
W. 15,700

OCT 12 1972

New England Newsclip

CAPE SYMPHONY 12TH SEASON TO PRESENT TRUMPET SOLOIST

Armando Ghitalla, principal trumpet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be soloist at the opening concert of the Cape Cod Symphony's twelfth season on Sunday, October 22nd at 8 p.m. in the Mattacheese Middle School, West Yarmouth. Jerome D. Cohen, conductor of the 65-member orchestra, has chosen a program of works by Franz Josef Haydn, Johannes Brahms, Sir Ralph Vaughan-Williams and Aaron Copland.

Tickets for the Cape Cod Symphony's concert on October 22 are available in ten locations across the Cape. Lower Cape outlets are at H. H. Snow's in Orleans, Chatham Jewelers in Chatham and Edson's in Dennis Port. Mid-Cape outlets include the Yarmouth Port General Store, Erwin's Pharmacy in South Yarmouth, Great Island Pharmacy in West Yarmouth, Puritan Clothing Company on Main Street in Hyannis, the Paperback Booksmith in the Cape Cod Mall and the Osterville office of the Cape Cod Bank and Trust, as well as the Cape Cod Conservatory, Route 6A in Barnstable Village.

Student tickets at reduced rates are also available and telephone reservations may be made by calling the Cape Cod Symphony at 362-3258.

HERALD
CAMDEN, MAINE
W. 2,980

OCT 12 1972

New England Newsclip

Arthur Fielder Guest Conductor With PSO Nov. 2

The Portland Symphony Orchestra will open its third season of concerts in Augusta with Arthur Fiedler guest conducting, Thursday evening, November 2 at 8:15 in the Augusta State Armory. Fiedler will be joined by pianist Virginia Eskin.

Two other concerts in the series will take place in Cony High School. On January 24, Paul Vermel and the Portland Symphony will bring violinist Joseph Silverstein to Augusta as guest artist. Silverstein is concertmaster of the Boston Symphony and will perform the Sibelius Violin Concerto.

On Tuesday, February 27, the Inner City Repertory Dance Company of Los Angeles will perform without orchestra.

Forum-A is again sponsoring these concerts and tickets for the series may be obtained by writing Forum-A, University of Maine at Augusta, Augusta 04330. For further information telephone Forum-A at 622-7131.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

OCT 13 1972

New England Newsclip
Friday, October 13, 1972

BSO's Wolfe in recital for double bass

By Louis Snyder

Two lofty music makers were onstage at Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening — a double bass which stands nearly 6-foot-6, and its owner and player, Lawrence Wolfe, who is only a few inches shorter. If, at age 24, the bassist is not the youngest member of the Boston Symphony, he must surely be the tallest.

Mr. Wolfe has just become a faculty member at New England Conservatory of Music, of which he is a recent graduate, and it is perhaps thanks to one of his teachers there — the bass virtuoso Gary Karr — that a solo double bass recital is possible these days. Mr. Karr led the way as a soloist more than a decade ago, so that the instrument has won its place again in the sun along with its fellow strings.

* * *

As with all bassists, Mr. Wolfe was faced with the problem of the small repertory available to the instrument, a situation transcriptions in some cases help solve. After an impressive opening with the classic standard Henry Eccles Sonata in G, in cooperation with pianist Jonathan Feldman, he was heard in six Duets for Two Cellos with a BSO cellist colleague, Ronald Feldman. Although the pieces suffered from sameness, they were skillfully meshed by this duo, nothing being lost in the transferal of one cello part to the bass. In fact a contrasting mellowness of tonal texture was the special gain in this arrangement.

Two contemporary works that have been composed specifically for double bass followed — George Perle's 1962 Monody, a demanding exhibition of intricate fingering and bowing agility, and Jacob Druckman's 1969 "Valentine," which Mr. Wolfe performed as a member of "Collage" at Tanglewood last summer. This is the piece that uses all the tricks of the avant-garde trade to deliver its enigmatic message: slaps, slides, whistles, humming, whispers, the works. Everything, of course, except any sustained kind of musical means.

* * *

Mr. Wolfe performed it with spectacular brilliance, and it got the laughs it was apparently written for, but like the over-elaborate Feb. 14 funny card, one is taken aback by its prodigal expenditure of time and effort. But at least Mr. Druckman has made a novel contribution to double-bass repertory.

Time and effort had also been expended by Mr. Wolfe on J. S. Bach's Suite No. 3 for Solo Cello, played in transcription after the intermission. It demands crispness, and its inherent sprightliness, difficult enough to attain through cello sound, is that much harder on the bass. Mr. Wolfe faced it gamely, and, despite some intonation difficulties, contended like a grownup David with a giant Goliath, and got results.

Four short Russian songs, by Koussevitzky, Gliere, Shchedrin, and Plutala, with Jonathan Feldman as the accompanist, completed the program, to which was added a lusciously played Faure "Apres une Reve." A large audience responded warmly throughout the evening.

14.

Herald American
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
S. 251,094

OCT 15 1972

Boston master to solo

The distinguished concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make his Syracuse Symphony bow Oct. 26 and 28 when the local orchestra presents its third set of subscription concerts of the season.

Joseph Silverstein will solo for Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. It will be his second time under the baton of Frederik Prausnitz. He soloed on Dvorak's Violin Concerto with Prausnitz directing when the SSO maestro was in Boston.

The artist has been concertmaster of the BSO since 1962 and assistant conductor since the beginning of the 1971-1972 season. He joined the Boston organization in 1955, at the age of 23, its youngest member.

Born in Detroit, Silverstein studied at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia and later with Mischa Mischakoff and Joseph Gingold. He won the Queen Elisabeth of Belgium International Competition in 1959.

A year later, he was awarded the Naumberg Foundation prize. Before going to Boston, Silverstein played with the orchestras of Houston, Denver and Philadelphia.

The same pair of concerts will mark the return to a Syracuse concert stage of soprano Helen Boatwright, who, with her husband Howard, has spent last year in Romania on a State Department program.

The Oct. 26 program will be played in Henninger High Auditorium with the Saturday concert in Corcoran.

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

ORACLE
ORLEANS, MASS.
W. 15,700

OCT 19 1972

New England Newsclip

Dining and Entertainment Guide

CAPE SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON

The Cape Cod Symphony Orchestra opens its 1972-73 season this Sunday evening, October 22nd, at 8:00 p.m. in the Mattacheese Middle School, Higgins-Crowell Road in West Yarmouth. Armando Ghitalla, principal trumpet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be soloist with the 65-member orchestra led by conductor Jerome D. Cohen.

Mr. Ghitalla will be heard in works by Franz Josef Haydn and Aaron Copland. Also on Sunday's program will be Symphony No. 1 by Johannes Brahms and, commemorating the 100th anniversary of his birth, a performance of Sir Ralph Vaughan-Williams' "English Folk Song Suite".

Assisting Mr. Ghitalla in the Aaron Copland work will be seventeen year-old Silas Blake Duncan, a senior at the Riverview School in East Sandwich. Duncan is in his second season with the Cape Cod Symphony, playing oboe and English horn.

Tickets will be on sale at the door Sunday night. Student tickets are also available. For information and reservations, call the Cape Cod Symphony at 362-3258.

ORACLE
ORLEANS, MASS.
W. 15,700

OCT 12 1972

New England Newsclip

CAPE SYMPHONY 12TH SEASON TO PRESENT TRUMPET SOLOIST

Armando Ghitalla, principal trumpet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be soloist at the opening concert of the Cape Cod Symphony's twelfth season on Sunday, October 22nd at 8 p.m. in the Mattacheese Middle School, West Yarmouth. Jerome D. Cohen, conductor of the 65-member orchestra, has chosen a program of works by Franz Josef Haydn, Johannes Brahms, Sir Ralph Vaughan-Williams and Aaron Copland.

Tickets for the Cape Cod Symphony's concert on October 22 are available in ten locations across the Cape. Lower Cape outlets are at H. H. Snow's in Orleans, Chatham Jewelers in Chatham and Edson's in Dennis Port. Mid-Cape outlets include the Yarmouth Port General Store, Erwin's Pharmacy in South Yarmouth, Great Island Pharmacy in West Yarmouth, Puritan Clothing Company on Main Street in Hyannis, the Paperback Booksmith in the Cape Cod Mall and the Osterville office of the Cape Cod Bank and Trust, as well as the Cape Cod Conservatory, Route 6A in Barnstable Village.

Student tickets at reduced rates are also available and telephone reservations may be made by calling the Cape Cod Symphony at 362-3258.

HERALD
CAMDEN, MAINE
W. 2,980

OCT 12 1972

New England Newsclip

Arthur Fielder Guest Conductor With PSO Nov. 2

The Portland Symphony Orchestra will open its third season of concerts in Augusta with Arthur Fiedler guest conducting, Thursday evening, November 2 at 8:15 in the Augusta State Armory. Fiedler will be joined by pianist Virginia Eskin.

Two other concerts in the series will take place in Cony High School. On January 24, Paul Vermel and the Portland Symphony will bring violinist Joseph Silverstein to Augusta as guest artist. Silverstein is concertmaster of the Boston Symphony and will perform the Sibelius Violin Concerto.

On Tuesday, February 27, the Inner City Repertory Dance Company of Los Angeles will perform without orchestra.

Forum-A is again sponsoring these concerts and tickets for the series may be obtained by writing Forum-A, University of Maine at Augusta, Augusta 04330. For further information telephone Forum-A at 622-7131.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

OCT 13 1972

New England Newsclip
Friday, October 13, 1972

BSO's Wolfe in recital for double bass

By Louis Snyder

Two lofty music makers were onstage at Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening — a double bass which stands nearly 6-foot-6, and its owner and player, Lawrence Wolfe, who is only a few inches shorter. If, at age 24, the bassist is not the youngest member of the Boston Symphony, he must surely be the tallest.

Mr. Wolfe has just become a faculty member at New England Conservatory of Music, of which he is a recent graduate, and it is perhaps thanks to one of his teachers there — the bass virtuoso Gary Karr — that a solo double bass recital is possible these days. Mr. Karr led the way as a soloist more than a decade ago, so that the instrument has won its place again in the sun along with its fellow strings.

* * *

As with all bassists, Mr. Wolfe was faced with the problem of the small repertory available to the instrument, a situation transcriptions in some cases help solve. After an impressive opening with the classic standard Henry Eccles Sonata in G, in cooperation with pianist Jonathan Feldman, he was heard in six Duets for Two Cellos with a BSO cellist colleague, Ronald Feldman. Although the pieces suffered from sameness, they were skillfully meshed by this duo, nothing being lost in the transferal of one cello part to the bass. In fact a contrasting mellowness of tonal texture was the special gain in this arrangement.

Two contemporary works that have been composed specifically for double bass followed — George Perle's 1962 Monody, a demanding exhibition of intricate fingering and bowing agility, and Jacob Druckman's 1969 "Valentine," which Mr. Wolfe performed as a member of "Collage" at Tanglewood last summer. This is the piece that uses all the tricks of the avant-garde trade to deliver its enigmatic message: slaps, slides, whistles, humming, whispers, the works. Everything, of course, except any sustained kind of musical means.

* * *

Mr. Wolfe performed it with spectacular brilliance, and it got the laughs it was apparently written for, but like the overelaborate Feb. 14 funny card, one is taken aback by its prodigal expenditure of time and effort. But at least Mr. Druckman has made a novel contribution to double-bass repertory.

Time and effort had also been expended by Mr. Wolfe on J. S. Bach's Suite No. 3 for Solo Cello, played in transcription after the intermission. It demands crispness, and its inherent sprightliness, difficult enough to attain through cello sound, is that much harder on the bass. Mr. Wolfe faced it gamely, and, despite some intonation difficulties, contended like a grownup David with a giant Goliath, and got results.

Four short Russian songs, by Koussevitzky, Gliere, Shchedrin, and Plutala, with Jonathan Feldman as the accompanist, completed the program, to which was added a lusciously played Faure "Apres une Reve." A large audience responded warmly throughout the evening.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885

OCT 14 1972 New England Newsclip

Symphony Aims to Please

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

The program played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall might have been one they borrowed from the Pops—albeit whole works instead of excerpts— so familiar, so uncontroversial, so guaranteed to please were the choices.

Perhaps to balance the esoteric music of the Spectrum Concerts the week before, which surveyed styles before and after the period 1780 to 1900, this concert was solidly 19th Century.

And funny thing: Wagner, Saint-Saens and Tchaikovsky didn't prevent the ladies from making early departures any more than usual.

The Saint-Saens Piano Concerto No. 2 is one of those which every serious and semi-serious piano student tackles at one time in his life. It's show-offy, brittle yet sentimental, and altogether brainless.

There is a story about Saint-Saens' music in which a famous musician was asked to identify a work played to him anonymously. He answered "Saint-Saens" at once. When asked how he knew, he replied, "The first movement sounds like Schumann, the second like Mendelssohn, and the third like Franck. Only neither Schumann nor Franck wrote for the music hall."

• Concert Review

In the case of the G-minor concerto, the name of Bach could also be added to the roster of obvious influences music-hall-ized.

Theodore Lettvin was the soloist and, in the few years I've been in Boston he has played twice with the BSO, both times in works of what one could call a frivolous nature. It seems a shame that this artist has not had more opportunities to play things which present real challenges in taste, sensitivity and imagination.

His performance yesterday was vigorous and straight and avoided the dreadful stickiness the work almost begs for. However, it missed somewhat the abandon and sparkle that would have come with complete technical ease, and some of last movement particularly, the octave passages, in the last movement particularly, tended to muddiness.

William Steinberg conducted and although the orchestra sounded well, as it has in recent months, there were some problems of ensemble where the orchestra and soloist had trouble attacking a strong beat together. Similarly, the "Flying Dutchman" overture proved less than successful, its supcharged atmosphere strangely tensionless.

The Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony closed the program and although Steinberg added no remarkable insights to the standard view of the piece he did command the most polished playing of the afternoon.

And it was worth the trip to hear the beautiful wind playing at the beginning of the second movement, most notably the horn solos by Charles Kavaloski.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 291,042 SUN. 566,377

OCT 14 1972 New England Newsclip

Lettvin soloist in Saint-Saens concerto

Steinberg conducts Wagner, Tchaikovsky

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

I growled — once even in print — when I saw that the Boston Symphony was going to play a program consisting of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" Overture, the Saint-Saens G minor Piano Concerto, and the Tchaikovsky Fifth. I still think it too much like a program for the Esplanade, but I must also say that in the event, which was yesterday afternoon, William Steinberg conducting, I enjoyed the concert a lot.

The Saint-Saens is a funny piece. Arthur Schnabel said that the standard recital program is like a tourist's day in Paris, starting with Notre Dame and ending at the Folies Bergeres. Saint-Saens starts his piece with a sort of Bach toccata — a bit dandified, but the stylistic reference is unmistakable — but he can't bother with that for long and soon makes his way into the music hall world with some glimpses into those salons where Liszt and Thalberg used to entertain the guests of the Princesse de this and the Comtesse de something or other. And unfortunately like his Bach toccata, Saint-Saens's best music hall tune (introduced with a great flaunting of oompah accompaniment not far into the scherzo) is aborted almost as soon as it has begun — that is, he has a wonderfully catchy first phrase, and not the slightest idea of where to go with it.

Breezy, casual, written in a glittering piano style and with a tactfully efficient part for the orchestra, it is engaging music, well-mannered, and faceless. The soloist yesterday was Theodore Lettvin, playing with vigor, humor, and pianistic finesse. Steinberg was rather slow in his reactions at the beginning, but by the third movement the accompaniment was appropriately deft. Some performers are specially gifted at the silk purses and sows' ear business — Toscanini and Beecham were outstanding examples in an earlier generation of conductors, and Jeanne-Marie Darre, who played the Saints-Saens here ten years ago, is one among pianists. No such magic transformation took place yesterday, and so the question of "why bother?" didn't quite go away; nonetheless, the Lettvin-Steinberg performance was pleasant and capable.

The Tchaikovsky Fifth is not the very best Tchaikovsky, not so concentrated and original in form as the "Pathetique" nor as richly fanciful in detail as "Sleeping Beauty" and "Nutcracker," but it is surely a work extraordinarily charged with energy, expressive content, and personality. Tchaikovsky knew how to continue things as well as start them grippingly, and in a piece as masterful as the slow movement, so famous, so familiar, so taken for granted, the amazing and moving thing is not so much the beginnings of those melodies as their continued unfolding. The sense of personal utterance is felt in the scoring as well: no one ever imitated Mozart.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,[illegible]

OCT 16 1972 New England Newsclip

Recalling the 'rattle of truth'

Steinberg as a restorer of portraits, BSO style

By Louis Snyder

There are perpetual murmurs from some people about the squareness of Boston Symphony programs, so there was a certain ironical twist last weekend when William Steinberg and the orchestra came up with a real old-timers' trio — Wagner, Saint-Saens, and Tchaikovsky. Something of a novelty — not a 1910 composition in sight. All of these works could have been programmed by the BSO 75 years ago, and were.

What is, perhaps, lost sight of, is that today, the tinselly, extravagant Saint-Saens Second Piano Concerto (which had Theodore Lettvin as its sizzling soloist), and the emotionally heavy-laden Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky periodically need to be shaken out in live performance. Whatever one's preconceptions about either of them, they still have the undeniable rattle of truth when they are revived in the concert hall. And the salt spray of Wagner's "Fliegende Hollaender" Overture remains just as skin-drenching as it ever was.

* * *

Mr. Steinberg's approach to the Tchaikovsky Fifth was very much like that of a restorer of portraits, cleaning a canvas. Corners are judiciously scoured, and the outstanding features treated with discerning care. How often (and it may date further back than some may want to admit) has the Andante Cantabile been freer of treacle than on this occasion, or the Valse which follows, placed in a symphonic, and out of a pops, context? The musicians abetted Mr. Steinberg in this renewing process, and among some notable solo work there was a particularly ingratiating passage in the second Andante movement by the BSO's new first horn, Charles Kavaloski.

* * *

Placed between the drama-loaded Wagnerian Overture, and the enigmatic, personally oriented Tchaikovsky Symphony, Saint-Saens's G minor Piano Concerto becomes somehow pallid and pretentious, if only because it makes such tremendous technical demands of the performer without offering parallel rewards to the listener. With all those notes, and certainly an obvious measure of compositional craftsmanship, nothing really happens.

However, Mr. Lettvin and Mr. Steinberg approached the Concerto with all the reverence due a Mozart, and the result was a well ordered, fluid performance. The soloist did astonishing things, particularly with the pyrotechnics of the third movement — like Liszt, the composer often wrote to display his own gifts as a performer. However, at the end of the second movement, all forces conspired, with a pianistic fillip, for an audience-producing chuckle, to prove, perhaps, that the piece wasn't to be taken too seriously after all.

16.

RECORD TRANSCRIPT
MILTON, MASS.
W. 5,735

OCT 5 1972 New England Newsclip

MINI-BIOGRAPHIES

Symphony's Council Of Friends Compile Booklet

Gourmet cooks, nuclear physicists, licensed airplane pilots, wood carvers and a minister will perform at the opening concert of the 92nd season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Surprising? Not if you have perused the handsome new booklet compiled by the Council of Friends which will be on sale beginning at that time for the nominal sum of one dollar.

Months of hard work have gone in to preparing this 24-page publication which provides a "mini biography" as well as a clear photograph of each of the Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians.

The introduction of the booklet explains its purpose. We live today in a world of computers and numbers, a world in which the opportunity to know each other as human beings is fast disappearing. As this tendency to group people by numbers increases, a need is growing to relate to others on a person-to-person basis. So it is with the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the vast audience that attends the many concerts performed at Symphony Hall and at Tanglewood.

We all know these members of the B.S.O. are superb musicians, but could you call any one of them by name if you met them on the street? This booklet is designed with the hope that the musicians and their audience may get to know each other as good friends, for we share the common basis for such a friendship--a love of music and the wish to see this orchestra, of which we are all so proud, continue to command the respect it has always enjoyed from the rest of the world.

The committee responsible for the writing and compiling of the booklet consists of Mrs. Robert M.P. Kennard of Newton Center, Mrs. Giles M.S. Tod of Hingham and Mrs. Roger Voisin of Jamaica Plain.

The Council of Friends is extremely grateful to the New England Merchants National Bank for their generosity in helping to make the publication of the booklet possible.

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
W. 6,000

OCT 5 1972 New England Newsclip

Spiraling Parties for Boston Symphony

The third roupd of parties to raise a total of $80,000 for the Boston Symphony Orchestra is already in the hands of the guests of Mrs. Carl Koch and Mrs. James E. Shepherd. The following hostesses will each in turn invite five guests to continue the spiral: Mrs. Robert C. Cobb, Jr., Mrs. Frederic L. Day, Jr., Mrs. Duncan Edmands, Mrs. Hugh B. Hanson, Mrs. Edward Neal Hartley, Mrs. James B. Knight, Mrs. Gerald Lauderdale, Mrs. Martin F. Peterson, Mrs. William L. Porter, Mrs. Robert Shaw, Mrs. Chauncey W. Watt, and Mrs. Richard E. Wilson.

This unique way of raising money, similar to a chain letter, will result in over 40,000 guests in the greater Boston area contributing over $80,000.

If you would like to help in the Concord Spiral or would like more information about the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, please call Mrs. Gordon Smith at 369-6407.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000

OCT 12 1972 New England News

BSO Fund Raising

LINCOLN - An opening luncheon for the Boston Symphony Orchestra fund raising "spiral" was held last Sunday at the home of Mrs. Edwin Cole, Beaver Pond rd., Lincoln. Guests included Mr. and Mrs. Leonard Moss, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick B. Taylor, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Warner, Mr. and Mrs. Sargent Janes and Dr. and Mrs. Chester d'Autremont.

TRANSCRIPT
DEDHAM, MASS.
W. 7,209

OCT 12 1972 New England

Rose Walsh

Council of Friends 'Spirals'

In working out their numerous successful events for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—and what they have ~~accomplished~~ has been fantastic—The Council of Friends of the BSO find that music and food are a happy combination. That valiant organization began with Pre-Symphony Luncheons which featured an interesting, brief talk about the Friday concerts.

Rose Walsh

Then came the Stage Door Lectures at Symphony Hall (including beverage service and a box luncheon) with a different Symphony musician giving an informal talk and demonstration of the instrument he or she played.

The ever-increasing popularity of this series led to over-subscription. This year there will be two series of the lectures to accommodate the many disappointed ladies who were unable to get reservations.

(Continued on Page 4, Section 5)

Rose Walsh

(Continued from Page 1, Section 5)

Next came the Table Talk Suppers in stage door setting at the Hall before the evening concerts—beverage service, a well-planned buffet with friends getting together at long tables.

Husbands enjoyed the gay informality. They came right from the office to meet their wives and later to attend the concert in relaxed mood. The suppers will continue this year.

So what's new now with The Council of Friends. A series of "Symphony Spirals"—informal parties with a goal of $80,000 to reduce the increasing annual deficit of the BSO.

Mrs. Howard Hansen of Wellesley Hills and Mrs. Erick Kauders of Marblehead are co-chairmen of this innovation, assisted by Mrs. William J. Mixter, Jr. of Dedham.

The "Sprials" originated a week ago at a noontime luncheon in the Ancient Instrument Room of Symphony Hall. Mrs. Hansen and Mrs. Kauders invited eight ladies to host the kick-off party for the second turn of the Spiral. Each of the eight donated $2 to the Orchestra and brought a list of seven people they planned to invite to the second Spiral Party of 56 guests held in the Basement in Symphony Hall last Friday.

Each of those 56 guests will invite six guests each and act as hosts for the third set of parties. This makes a total of 336 guests who will act as hosts for the fourth set to take place between Oct. 6 and 13.

The Spirals continue through the seventh and final one when, between Oct. 27 and Nov. 3, 20,160 hosts will entertain two guests each for a total of 40,320 guests. Each contributes $2 to the Orchestra, realizing a total of $80,640.

The individual parties given may be in any form of entertainment—picnics, cocktail parties, teas, coffee hours, or bridge, tennis or croquet parties. The success of each Spiral is dependent on the guests contributing $2 to the Orchestra, and then becoming a host and inviting guests to her own party.

Participation in the fund-raising event can be arranged through Steven L. Solomon in the Development Office of Symphony Hall, 266-1492

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER &
SUNDAY ADVERTISER
C. 415,000

OCT 1 1972 New England Newsclip

SYMPHONY FRIENDS — Mrs. Thomas E. Jansen, Jr. (left) of Dedham, Dedham Area Chairman of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Council of Friends, was host at the second turn of the Symphony ~~Spirals at a pre-concert~~ luncheon held in Symphony Hall, Boston on Friday, September 29. Among Mrs. Jansen's guests were Mrs. Daniel Pierce (right), also of Dedham, and Mrs. James Edwards (center) of Wellesley. Mrs. Jansen's guests now become hosts for the third spiral and each invite seven people as guests to continue the spiral chain. The Spiral Parties have a goal of $80,000 to help underwrite the ever increasing annual deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Symphony Friends Raising Money

Symphony Spirals is a fund-raising project of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose chairman is Mrs. William Jason MIxter, Jr., of Dedham, to benefit the BSO and help underwrite their ever increasing deficit. It is hoped this will be a fun project for all while at the same time providing much needed support for the Orchestra.

The first spiral took place on sept. 22, before the first concert with eight ladies attending a luncheon, and contributing $2 each. The following week those eight ladies entertained seven others, each of whom also contributed $2. And the following week the spiral continued, with 56 hostesses now inviting six guests each with the usual $2 donation. The parties will continue through Nov. 3. If the spiral is not broken it will mean that 40,320 guests will have each given $2 for a grand total of $80,640, for the beneift of the Orchestra.

Mrs. Thomas E. Jansen Jr., of Channing Rd., was one f those giving the second luncheon. Her guests were Mrs. Charles Bartlett, Mrs. JohnnThayer, Mrs. Daniel Pierce, Mrs. Elizabeth Hitz, all of Dedham; and Mrs. Edward Grew, Jr., Dover; Mrs. Edwin Coe; Lincoln, and Mrs. Nicholas Edwards, Wellesley Hills.

The parties need not be luncheons and some of the other gatherings thought up by Dedham ladies are bike hikes, museum walks, coffees, birdge games, tennis, sherry parties, a "no party", and a reading party. Among the early guests and hostesses in Dedham were: Mrs. Francis Brooks, Mrs. Henry F. Colt, Miss Marion Coant, Mrs. George Darrell, Mrs. Johnn Dixon, Mrs. JohnnDwinell, Mrs. Joel C. Goldthwait, Mrs. Robert P. Greaves, Mrs. Francis A. Harding, Mrs. Johhn H. Harwood, Mrs. T. Mitchell Hastings, Mrs. Richard R. Higgins, Mrs. Elizabeth Hume HItiz, Mrs. Francis G. Jackson, Mrs. Malcolm Leach, Mrs. Richard K. Lincoln, Mrs. Alexander Macleod, Mrs. George Hill, Mrs. Nelson Hooe, Mrs. George Gofford, Mrs. Eric Johnson, Mrs. Theodore Reese, and Mrs. William Jason Mixter.

Other included were: Mrs. Richard H. Overholt, Mrs. C.V. Strekalovsky, Mrs. H. Hogarth Swann, Mrs. Courtenay Worthington, Mrs. ANdrew M. Rankin, Mrs. Robert Osborne, Mrs. Charles Woodard, Jr.l Mrs. Richard Flood, Mrs. Foster M. Trainer, Jr., Mrs. Robert D. Wrenn, Mrs. Whitney Wright, Mrs. Hardwick Mosely, Mrs. Robert Daley, Mrs. Charles Francis of Westwood, and and Mrs. Thomas B.B. Jansen of Westwood.

CLIPPER
DUXBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000

OCT 5 1972 New England Newsclip

SYMPHONY PARTIES

A series of informal parties with a goal of $80,000 to reduce the deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will get underway this week in many cities and towns.

In Duxbury Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow and Mrs. Francis Rogerson will host parties for six guests who will each donate $2 to the orchestra and next week act as hostesses for a party of five guests. By Nov. 3, when the last parties are held, Duxbury will have contributed $2880.

If you enjoy the Boston Symphony, The Boston Pops, the radio programs, or the recordings made by the orchestra, get your name on the spiral and make this plan successful by calling Mrs. Russell Eddy (934-2614) this weekend.

Ticket and program information is also available.

16.

RECORD TRANSCRIPT
MILTON, MASS.
W. 5,735

OCT 5 1972 New England Newsclip

MINI-BIOGRAPHIES

Symphony's Council Of Friends Compile Booklet

Gourmet cooks, nuclear physicists, licensed airplane pilots, wood carvers and a minister will perform at the opening concert of the 92nd season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Surprising? Not if you have perused the handsome new booklet compiled by the Council of Friends which will be on sale beginning at that time for the nominal sum of one dollar.

Months of hard work have gone in to preparing this 24-page publication which provides a "mini biography" as well as a clear photograph of each of the Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians.

The introduction of the booklet explains its purpose. We live today in a world of computers and numbers, a world in which the opportunity to know each other as human beings is fast disappearing. As this tendency to group people by numbers increases, a need is growing to relate to others on a person-to-person basis. So it is with the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the vast audience that attends the many concerts performed at Symphony Hall and at Tanglewood.

We all know these members of the B.S.O. are superb musicians, but could you call any one of them by name if you met them on the street? This booklet is designed with the hope that the musicians and their audience may get to know each other as good friends, for we share the common basis for such a friendship—a love of music and the wish to see this orchestra, of which we are all so proud, continue to command the respect it has always enjoyed from the rest of the world.

The committee responsible for the writing and compiling of the booklet consists of Mrs. Robert M.P. Kennard of Newton Center, Mrs. Giles M.S. Tod of Hingham and Mrs. Roger Voisin of Jamaica Plain.

The Council of Friends is extremely grateful to the New England Merchants National Bank for their generosity in helping to make the publication of the booklet possible.

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
W. 6,000

OCT 5 1972 New England Newsclip

'Spiraling Parties for Boston Symphony

The third round of parties to raise a total of $80,000 for the Boston Symphony Orchestra is already in the hands of the guests of Mrs. Carl Koch and Mrs. James E. Shepherd. The following hostesses will each in turn invite five guests to continue the spiral: Mrs. Robert C. Cobb, Jr., Mrs. Frederic L. Day, Jr., Mrs. Duncan Edmands, Mrs. Hugh B. Hanson, Mrs. Edward Neal Hartley, Mrs. James B. Knight, Mrs. Gerald Lauderdale, Mrs. Martin F. Peterson, Mrs. William L. Porter, Mrs. Robert Shaw, Mrs. Chauncey W. Watt, and Mrs. Richard E. Wilson.

This unique way of raising money, similar to a chain letter, will result in over 40,000 guests in the greater Boston area contributing over $80,000.

If you would like to help in the Concord Spiral or would like more information about the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, please call Mrs. Gordon Smith at 369-6407.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS
W. 3,000

OCT 12 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO Fund Raising

LINCOLN - An opening luncheon for the Boston Symphony Orchestra fund raising "spiral" was held last Sunday at the home of Mrs. Edwin Cole, Beaver Pond rd., Lincoln. Guests included Mr. and Mrs. Leonard Moss, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick B. Taylor, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Warner, Mr. and Mrs. Sargent Janes and Dr. and Mrs. Chester d'Autremont.

TRANSCRIPT
DEDHAM, MASS.
W. 7,209

OCT 12 1972 New England

Rose Walsh

Council of Friends 'Spirals'

In working out their numerous successful events for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—and what they have ~~accomplished~~ has been fantastic—The Council of Friends of the BSO find that music and food are a happy combination. That valiant organization began with Pre-Symphony Luncheons which featured an interesting, brief talk about the Friday concerts.

Rose Walsh

Then came the Stage Door Lectures at Symphony Hall (including beverage service and a box luncheon) with a different Symphony musician giving an informal talk and demonstration of the instrument he or she played.

The ever-increasing popularity of this series led to over-subscription. This year there will be two series of the lectures to accommodate the many disappointed ladies who were unable to get reservations.

(Continued on Page 4, Section 5)

Rose Walsh

(Continued from Page 1, Section 5)

Next came the Table Talk Suppers in stage door setting at the Hall before the evening concerts—beverage service, a well-planned buffet with friends getting together at long tables.

Husbands enjoyed the gay informality. They came right from the office to meet their wives and later to attend the concert in relaxed mood. The suppers will continue this year.

So what's new now with The Council of Friends. A series of "Symphony Spirals"—informal parties with a goal of $80,000 to reduce the increasing annual deficit of the BSO.

Mrs. Howard Hansen of Wellesley Hills and Mrs. Erick Kauders of Marblehead are co-chairmen of this innovation, assisted by Mrs. William J. Mixter, Jr. of Dedham.

The "Sprials" originated a week ago at a noontime luncheon in the Ancient Instrument Room of Symphony Hall. Mrs. Hansen and Mrs. Kauders invited eight ladies to host the kick-off party for the second turn of the Spiral. Each of the eight donated $2 to the Orchestra and brought a list of seven people they planned to invite to the second Spiral Party of 56 guests held in the Basement in Symphony Hall last Friday.

Each of those 56 guests will invite six guests each and act as hosts for the third set of parties. This makes a total of 336 guests who will act as hosts for the fourth set to take place between Oct. 6 and 13.

The Spirals continue through the seventh and final one when, between Oct. 27 and Nov. 3, 20,160 hosts will entertain two guests each for a total of 40,320 guests. Each contributes $2 to the Orchestra, realizing a total of $80,640.

The individual parties given may be in any form of entertainment—picnics, cocktail parties, teas, coffee hours, or bridge, tennis or croquet parties. The success of each Spiral is dependent on the guests contributing $2 to the Orchestra, and then becoming a host and inviting guests to her own party.

Participation in the fund-raising event can be arranged through Steven L. Solomon in the Development Office of Symphony Hall, 266-1492

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER &
SUNDAY ADVERTISER

OCT 1 1972 New England Newsclip

SYMPHONY FRIENDS — Mrs. Thomas E. Jansen, Jr. (left) of Dedham, Dedham Area Chairman of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Council of Friends, was host at the second turn of the Symphony Spirals ~~at a pre-concert~~ luncheon held in Symphony Hall, Boston on Friday, September 29. Among Mrs. Jansen's guests were Mrs. Daniel Pierce (right), also of Dedham, and Mrs. James Edwards (center) of Wellesley. Mrs. Jansen's guests now become hosts for the third spiral and each invite seven people as guests to continue the spiral chain. The Spiral Parties have a goal of $80,000 to help underwrite the ever increasing annual deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Symphony Friends Raising Money

Symphony Spirals is a fund-raising project of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose chairman is Mrs. William Jason MIxter, Jr., of Dedham, to benefit the BSO and help underwrite their ever increasing deficit. It is hoped this will be a fun project for all while at the same time providing much needed support for the Orchestra.

The first spiral took place on sept. 22, before the first concert with eight ladies attending a luncheon, and contributing $2 each. The following week those eight ladies entertained seven others, each of whom also contributed $2. And the following week the spiral continued, with 56 hostesses now inviting six guests each with the usual $2 donation. The parties will continue through Nov. 3. If the spiral is not broken it will mean that 40,320 guests will have each given $2 for a grand total of $80,640, for the beneift of the Orchestra.

Mrs. Thomas E. Jansen Jr., of Channing Rd., was one f those giving the second luncheon. Her guests were Mrs. Charles Bartlett, Mrs. JohnnThayer, Mrs. Daniel Pierce, Mrs. Elizabeth Hitz, all of Dedham; and Mrs. Edward Grew, Jr., Dover; Mrs. Edwin Coe; Lincoln, and Mrs. Nicholas Edwards, Wellesley Hills.

The parties need not be luncheons and some of the other gatherings thought up by Dedham ladies are bike hikes, museum walks, coffees, birdge games, tennis, sherry parties, a "no party", and a reading party. Among the early guests and hostesses in Dedham were: Mrs. Francis Brooks, Mrs. Henry F. Colt, Miss Marion Coant, Mrs. George Darrell, Mrs. Johnn Dixon, Mrs. JohnnDwinell, Mrs. Joel C. Goldthwait, Mrs. Robert P. Greaves, Mrs. Francis A. Harding, Mrs. Johhn H. Harwood, Mrs. T. Mitchell Hastings, Mrs. Richard R. Higgins, Mrs. Elizabeth Hume HItiz, Mrs. Francis G. Jackson, Mrs. Malcolm Leach, Mrs. Richard K. Lincoln, Mrs. Alexander Macleod, Mrs. George Hill, Mrs. Nelson Hooe, Mrs. George Gofford, Mrs. Eric Johnson, Mrs. Theodore Reese, and Mrs. William Jason Mixter.

Other included were: Mrs. Richard H. Overholt, Mrs. C.V. Strekalovsky, Mrs. H. Hogarth Swann, Mrs. Courtenay Worthington, Mrs. ANdrew M. Rankin, Mrs. Robert Osborne, Mrs. Charles Woodard, Jr.l Mrs. Richard Flood, Mrs. Foster M. Trainer, Jr., Mrs. Robert D. Wrenn, Mrs. Whitney Wright, Mrs. Hardwick Mosely, Mrs. Robert Daley, Mrs. Charles Francis of Westwood, and and Mrs. Thomas B.B. Jansen of Westwood.

CLIPPER
DUXBURY, MASS
W. 3,000

OCT 5 1972 New England Newsclip

SYMPHONY PARTIES

A series of informal parties with a goal of $80,000 to reduce the deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will get underway this week in many cities and towns.

In Duxbury Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow and Mrs. Francis Rogerson will host parties for six guests who will each donate $2 to the orchestra and next week act as hostesses for a party of five guests. By Nov. 3, when the last parties are held, Duxbury will have contributed $2880.

If you enjoy the Boston Symphony, The Boston Pops, the radio programs, or the recordings made by the orchestra, get your name on the spiral and make this plan successful by calling Mrs. Russell Eddy (934-2614) this weekend.

Ticket and program information is also available.

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
W. 6,000
OCT 19 1972
New England Newsclip

Concord Women Help Symphony's Goal

AREA CHAIRMAN of the Concord area of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Council of Friends, Mrs. Gordon Smith (right) was host at the second turn of the Symphony Spirals at a pre-concert luncheon held in Symphony Hall on September 29. Among Mrs. Smith's guests were Concord residents, Mrs. James Shepherd (left), Mrs. Carl Koch and from Hard, Mrs. Loring Coleman. Mrs. Smith's guests now become hosts for the third spiral and each invite seven people as guests to continue the spiral chain. The Spiral Parties have a goal of $80,000 to help underwrite the ever increasing deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TOWNSMAN
WELLESLEY, MASS.
W. 8,500
OCT 5 1972
New England

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D 70,525
OCT 2 1972
New England

Mrs. William J. Mixter, Jr. of Dedham, area chairman of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, deposits the first two dollars at the first of the Symphony Spiral parties held at Symphony Hall last Friday. With Mrs. Mixter, as they stand before a portrait of Serge Koussevitzky, are the cochairmen of the Spiral parties, Mrs. Howard Hansen (left) of Wellesley and Mrs. Erick Kauders (right) of Marblehead. The Council of Friends of the BSO hope to raise $80,000 with these parties to help underwrite the ever increasing deficit of the orchestra. (Photography Inc.)

GRAPHIC
NEWTON, MASS.
W. 10,000
OCT 5 1972
New England Newsclip

Friends Host Parties For Boston Symphony

A series of informal parties called "Symphony Spirals" have been organized by the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to help reduce the increasing annual deficit of the Boston Symphony. A number of Newton residents are attending these events with a goal of raising $80 thousand.

Mrs. Samuel A. Levine, chairman of the Newton Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is entertaining the following: Mrs. Edward Caredis, Mrs. Kenneth A. Henderson, Mrs. Melvin Miller, Mrs. William L. Bruce, all of Newton; Mrs. Murray Harvey of Wellesley, Mrs. Raymond C. Gordon of Framingham and Mrs. Samuel Markell of Boston.

Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, co-chairman of Friends of the Boston Symphony from Newton, is giving a luncheon for Mrs. Miles Clair, Mrs. Douglas D. Garfield, Mrs. L. E. Thayer, Mrs. Shepard Williams, all of Newton and Mrs. Bruce Seddon Jr. of Chuestnut Hill.

The "Symphony Spirals" originated at a noontime luncheon in the Ancient Instrument Room of Symphony Hall, Friday (September 22).

The Co-Chairmen, Mrs. Hansen and Mrs. Kauders, have invited the eight ladies who will host the kick-off party for the second turn of the Spiral. Each of the eight invited guests to the luncheon donates $2 to the Orchestra and brings a list of seven people they plan to invite to the second Spiral Party of 56 guests to be held in the Basement in Symphony Hall, Friday, September 29 at 12 o'clock noon.

Between September 29 and October 6, each of the 56 guests of the second Spiral invite six guests each and act as hosts for the third set of parties. This makes a total of 336 guests who will act as hosts for the fourth set of Spiral parties to take place between October 6 and 13.

The Spirals continue through the seventh and final Spiral when between October 27 and November 3, 20, 160 hosts entertain two guests each and each contributes $2 to the Orchestra realizing a total of $80,640.

The individual parties given by the hosts of each Spiral may be in any form of entertainment, such as picnics, cocktail parties, teas, coffee hours, or bridge, tennis or croquet parties. The success of each Spiral is dependant on each guest contributing $2. to the Orchestra, and then becoming a host and inviting guests to her party.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525
OCT 24 1972
New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

One of the most ambitious as well as the most interesting of the hundreds of Spiral Parties being held this month for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the one planned for Thursday afternoon by Mrs. Hugo A. Mujica of Squantum.

Mrs. Mujica and her husband have invited 65 guests for a champagne party from two to four next Thursday at which Boston Symphony Orchestra bass player John Salkowski will be the guest of honor. A resident of Squantum, Mr. Salkowski is an active member of "Save Our Shores," a conservation organization to promote the establishment of Boston Harbor as a national historic site and recreation area in the National Park System.

The Spiral Parties, which the Council of Friends of the BSO hope will bring in a whopping $80,000 to help with the orchestra's deficit, are built rather like a chain letter. Each person invited to a party contributes two dollars and in turn gives a party of her own to which her guests contribute two dollars and so on until the end of the chain. Planned to be completed in six weeks, the "Spirals" have involved thousands of music lovers in every area in and around Boston.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202
OCT 2 1972
New England Newsclip

Mrs. Kauders Heads Party For Symphony

A marathon of fund-raising parties to reduce the Boston Symphony Orchestra's deficit is being directed by Mrs. Erick Kauders of Marblehead. "Symphony Spirals," sponsored by the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is also being co-chaired by Mrs. Howard Hansen of Wellesley Hills.

The first event was a kickoff party arranged by Mrs. Kauders and Mrs. Hansen last week in the Ancient Instrument Room of Symphony Hall.

Guests and contributions continue to multiply as parties are being scheduled through October and November. The goal is $80,640.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER & RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312 885
OCT 27 1972
New England Newsclip

Rose Walsh

William Moyer, personnel manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who gave the recent Stage Door Lecture at Symphony Hall for the Council of Friends of the BSO, revealed the strict rules that are followed in hiring musicians for the orchestra.

A curtain separates the applicant from the board of judges and when it is a woman, she removes her shoes so the click of her heels does not indicate her identity.

Hostesses for the lecture representing Lexington, Concord, Belmont and New Hampshire included Mrs. P. Adams Colony, Mrs. Patrick Hurley, Mrs. Louis Mead, Mrs. Donald Wilson, Mrs. Robert Murray Jr., Mrs. Gordon Smith, Mrs. Charles T. Gallagher, Mrs. John H. Kenney and Mrs. William B. Moses.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514
OCT 6 1972
New England Newsclip

SYMPHONY SUPPORT — Mrs. George Blagdon (right) of Beverly was host at the second turn of the Symphony Spirals at a pre-concert luncheon held in Symphony Hall, Boston on Friday, Sept. 29. Among Mrs. Blagdon's eight guests were Manchester residents Mrs. W. Merritt Miller (left), and Mrs. Paul D. Shuwall. Mrs. Miller and Mrs. Shuwall now become hosts for the third Spiral and each invite seven people to continue the spiral chain. The Spiral Parties have a goal of $80,000 to help underwrite the ever increasing annual deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

It sounds complicated but it really isn't, this latest fund raising idea for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. If the ladies of Cleveland and San Francisco, where it has been done with great success, can master the intricacies of a build up of Spiral Parties then it is certain that their equivalents here in Boston can manage it equally well.

The second turn of the spiral went into effect at Friday noon in the Ancient Instruments Room of Symphony Hall. Eight hostesses brought seven guests each to the party, each guest contributing two dollars to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a promise that they in turn will entertain six guests of their own at a party during this week. Their guests in turn will contribute two dollars and a promise to each hold a party for five guests the following week until by the week of Oct. 29 there will be 20,160 hosts entertaining a total of 40,320. Adding all the two dollars together the total comes to a staggering $80,000 plus to help with the orchestra's deficit.

The entire complicated maneuvre got off with a bang on Friday in the upstairs room at Symphony Hall with its glass cases full of old instruments lining the walls, decorated to within an inch of its life. Mrs. Thomas Franks of Wellesley had lent her considerable talents to the spiral theme to help out her good friend, Mrs. Howard Hansen, the chairman of the Symphony Spirals. She had placed spiral cones in different colors on every table, complementing them with similar colored paper cloths and napkins. From the ceiling hung wiggly spirals in all colors, and the entire effect was something like a very sophisticated children's party.

Each of the eight hostesses had gone all out in the imaginative picnic food and accessories they had used on their tables. Mrs. Charles Hovey had cold artichokes for her seven guests, and little wicker picnic baskets lined with red checked napkins. Mrs. C. Russell Eddy of Duxbury, who is area chairman of the South Shore Council of Friends of the BSO, had found small plastic carry-alls printed in blue in which she had placed crabmeat sandwiches, cheese wedges, fresh grapes and homemade brownies on the plate of each of her guests. Among those seated around her blue covered table, all of whom will be giving parties this week, were Mrs. Francis C. Rogerson Jr. of Duxbury, Mrs. Louis F. Eaton, Jr. of Chasset, Mrs. Joseph Watkins of Hingham, Mrs. Lewis W. Kane of Milton and Mrs. Robert Ross of Duxbury.

Other hostesses presiding over the gaily decorated tables were Mrs. Lewis H. Clark of Cambridge, who had Mrs. Francis deMarneffe, Mrs. Chauncey Gay, and Mrs. David Bird, among others at her table; Mrs. Thomas E. Jansen, Jr. of Dedham, Mrs. George Draper of Boston, Mrs. Gordon Smith of Concord, Mrs. George Blagden of Beverly and Mrs. Samuel A. Levine of Newton Center.

After the luncheon a brief meeting was held during which it became clear what very novel ideas are being used to entice guests to these spiral parties. Among them are a canoeing trip on the Ipswich River, a golf tournament in Duxbury, a croquet party, tailgate parties of all kinds, and many more unusual affairs, all of which will hopefully help to raise the sum of $80,000 so urgently needed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
W. 6,000
OCT 19 1972
New England Newsclip

Concord Women Help Symphony's Goal

AREA CHAIRMAN of the Concord area of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Council of Friends, Mrs. Gordon Smith (right) was host at the second turn of the Symphony Spirals at a pre-concert luncheon held in Symphony Hall on September 29. Among Mrs. Smith's guests were Concord residents, Mrs. James Shepherd (left), Mrs. Carl Koch and from Hard, Mrs. Loring Coleman. Mrs. Smith's guests now become hosts for the third spiral and each invite seven people as guests to continue the spiral chain. The Spiral Parties have a goal of $80,000 to help underwrite the ever increasing deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TOWNSMAN
WELLESLEY, MASS.
W. 8,500
OCT 5 1972
New

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525
OCT 2 1972
New England

Mrs. William J. Mixter, Jr. of Dedham, area chairman of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, deposits the first two dollars at the first of the Symphony Spiral parties held at Symphony Hall last Friday. With Mrs. Mixter, as they stand before a portrait of Serge Koussevitzky, are the cochairmen of the Spiral parties, Mrs. Howard Hansen (left) of Wellesley and Mrs. Erick Kauders (right) of Marblehead. The Council of Friends of the BSO hope to raise $80,000 with these parties to help underwrite the ever increasing deficit of the orchestra. (Photography Inc.)

GRAPHIC
NEWTON, MASS.
W. 10,000
OCT 5 1972
New England Newsclip

Friends Host Parties For Boston Symphony

A series of informal parties called "Symphony Spirals" have been organized by the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to help reduce the increasing annual deficit of the Boston Symphony. A number of Newton residents are attending these events with a goal of raising $80 thousand.

Mrs. Samuel A. Levine, chairman of the Newton Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is entertaining the following: Mrs. Edward Caredis, Mrs. Kenneth A. Henderson, Mrs. Melvin Miller, Mrs. William L. Bruce, all of Newton; Mrs. Murray Harvey of Wellesley, Mrs. Raymond C. Gordon of Framingham and Mrs. Samuel Markell of Boston.

Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, co-chairman of Friends of the Boston Symphony from Newton, is giving a luncheon for Mrs. Miles Clair, Mrs. Douglas D. Garfield, Mrs. L. E. Thayer, Mrs. Shepard Williams, all of Newton and Mrs. Bruce Seddon Jr. of Chuestnut Hill.

The "Symphony Spirals" originated at a noontime luncheon in the Ancient Instrument Room of Symphony Hall, Friday (September 22).

The Co-Chairmen, Mrs. Hansen and Mrs. Kauders, have invited the eight ladies who will host the kick-off party for the second turn of the Spiral. Each of the eight invited guests to the luncheon donates $2 to the Orchestra and brings a list of seven people they plan to invite to the second Spiral Party of 56 guests to be held in the Basement in Symphony Hall, Friday, September 29 at 12 o'clock noon.

Between September 29 and October 6, each of the 56 guests of the second Spiral invite six guests each and act as hosts for the third set of parties. This makes a total of 336 guests who will act as hosts for the fourth set of Spiral parties to take place between October 6 and 13.

The Spirals continue through the seventh and final Spiral when between October 27 and November 3, 20, 160 hosts entertain two guests each and each contributes $2 to the Orchestra realizing a total of $80,640.

The individual parties given by the hosts of each Spiral may be in any form of entertainment, such as picnics, cocktail parties, teas, coffee hours, or bridge, tennis or croquet parties. The success of each Spiral is dependant on each guest contributing $2. to the Orchestra, and then becoming a host and inviting guests to her party.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525
OCT 24 1972
New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

One of the most ambitious as well as the most interesting of the hundreds of Spiral Parties being held this month for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the one planned for Thursday afternoon by Mrs. Hugo A. Mujica of Squantum.

Mrs. Mujica and her husband have invited 65 guests for a champagne party from two to four next Thursday at which Boston Symphony Orchestra bass player John Salkowski will be the guest of honor. A resident of Squantum, Mr. Salkowski is an active member of "Save Our Shores," a conservation organization to promote the establishment of Boston Harbor as a national historic site and recreation area in the National Park System.

The Spiral Parties, which the Council of Friends of the BSO hope will bring in a whopping $80,000 to help with the orchestra's deficit, are built rather like a chain letter. Each person invited to a party contributes two dollars and in turn gives a party of her own to which her guests contribute two dollars and so on until the end of the chain. Planned to be completed in six weeks, the "Spirals" have involved thousands of music lovers in every area in and around Boston.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202
OCT 2 1972
New England Newsclip

Mrs. Kauders Heads Party For Symphony

A marathon of fund-raising parties to reduce the Boston Symphony Orchestra's deficit is being directed by Mrs. Erick Kauders of Marblehead. "Symphony Spirals," sponsored by the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is also being co-chaired by Mrs. Howard Hansen of Wellesley Hills.

The first event was a kickoff party arranged by Mrs. Kauders and Mrs. Hansen last week in the Ancient Instrument Room of Symphony Hall.

Guests and contributions continue to multiply as parties are being scheduled through October and November. The goal is $80,640.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885
OCT 27 1972
New England Newsclip

Rose Walsh

William Moyer, personnel manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who gave the recent Stage Door Lecture at Symphony Hall for the Council of Friends of the BSO, revealed the strict rules that are followed in hiring musicians for the orchestra.

A curtain separates the applicant from the board of judges and when it is a woman, she removes her shoes so the click of her heels does not indicate her identity.

Hostesses for the lecture representing Lexington, Concord, Belmont and New Hampshire included Mrs. P. Adams Colony, Mrs. Patrick Hurley, Mrs. Louis Mead, Mrs. Donald Wilson, Mrs. Robert Murray Jr., Mrs. Gordon Smith, Mrs. Charles T. Gallagher, Mrs. John H. Kenney and Mrs. William B. Moses.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514
OCT 6 1972
New England Newsclip

SYMPHONY SUPPORT — Mrs. George Blagdon (right) of Beverly was host at the second turn of the Symphony Spirals at a pre-concert luncheon held in Symphony Hall, Boston on Friday, Sept. 29. Among Mrs. Blagdon's eight guests were Manchester residents Mrs. W. Merritt Miller (left), and Mrs. Paul D. Shuwall. Mrs. Miller and Mrs. Shuwall now become hosts for the third Spiral and each invite seven people to continue the spiral chain. The Spiral Parties have a goal of $80,000 to help underwrite the ever increasing annual deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

It sounds complicated but it really isn't, this latest fund raising idea for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. If the ladies of Cleveland and San Francisco, where it has been done with great success, can master the intricacies of a build up of Spiral Parties then it is certain that their equivalents here in Boston can manage it equally well.

The second turn of the spiral went into effect at Friday noon in the Ancient Instruments Room of Symphony Hall. Eight hostesses brought seven guests each to the party, each guest contributing two dollars to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a promise that they in turn will entertain six guests of their own at a party during this week. Their guests in turn will contribute two dollars and a promise to each hold a party for five guests the following week until by the week of Oct. 29 there will be 20,160 hosts entertaining a total of 40,320. Adding all the two dollars together the total comes to a staggering $80,000 plus to help with the orchestra's deficit.

The entire complicated maneuvre got off with a bang on Friday in the upstairs room at Symphony Hall with its glass cases full of old instruments lining the walls, decorated to within an inch of its life. Mrs. Thomas Franks of Wellesley had lent her considerable talents to the spiral theme to help out her good friend, Mrs. Howard Hansen, the chairman of the Symphony Spirals. She had placed spiral cones in different colors on every table, complementing them with similar colored paper cloths and napkins. From the ceiling hung wiggly spirals in all colors, and the entire effect was something like a very sophisticated children's party.

Each of the eight hostesses had gone all out in the imaginative picnic food and accessories they had used on their tables. Mrs. Charles Hovey had cold artichokes for her seven guests, and little wicker picnic baskets lined with red checked napkins. Mrs. C. Russell Eddy of Duxbury, who is area chairman of the South Shore Council of Friends of the BSO, had found small plastic carry-alls printed in blue in which she had placed crabmeat sandwiches, cheese wedges, fresh grapes and homemade brownies on the plate of each of her guests. Among those seated around her blue covered table, all of whom will be giving parties this week, were Mrs. Franicis C. Rogerson Jr. of Duxbury, Mrs. Louis F. Eaton, Jr. of Chassel, Mrs. Joseph Watkins of Hingham, Mrs. Lewis W. Kane of Milton and Mrs. Robert Ross of Duxbury.

Other hostesses presiding over the gaily decorated tables were Mrs. Lewis H. Clark of Cambridge, who had Mrs. Francis deMarneffe, Mrs. C. Chauncey Gay, and Mrs. David Bird, among others at her table: Mrs. Thomas E. Jansen, Jr. of Dedham, Mrs. George Draper of Boston, Mrs. Gordon Smith of Concord, Mrs. George Blagden of Beverly and Mrs. Samuel A. Levine of Newton Center.

After the luncheon a brief meeting was held during which it became clear what very novel ideas are being used to entice guests to these spiral parties. Among them are a canoeing trip on the Ipswich River, a golf tournament in Duxbury, a croquet party, tailgate parties of all kinds, and many more unusual affairs, all of which will hopefully help to raise the sum of $80,000 so urgently needed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
S. 207,211
OCT 15 1972
New England Newsclip

COLIN DAVIS, the British conductor, will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Veterans Memorial Auditorium Thursday night in an 8:30 concert.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043
OCT 18 1972
New England Newsclip

Davis to conduct Sibelius

BOSTON — Colin Davis, Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducts the Orchestra on Friday, October 20 at 2:00 p.m., on Saturday, October 21 at 8:30 p.m. and on Tuesday, October 24 at 7:30 p.m. Mr. Davis conducts works of Sibelius and Elgar.

. Mr. Davis opens the concerts with the Sibelius Symphony no. 3 in C and follows it with Elgar's Violin concerto. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra, is the soloist in the Violin concerto.

Colin Davis began his conducting career in 1949 and his early experience was with the Kalmar Chamber Orchestra, the Chelsea Opera Group, the Festival Ballet and the Ballet Russe. In 1957 he became assistant conductor of the BBC Scottish Orchestra. Two years later he was called at short notice to take the place of Otto Klemperer, who became ill, in a concert performance of Don Giovanni.

This marked a turning point in his career: he was shortly afterwards appointed Music Director of the Sadler's Wells Opera, and made his debut with the CBC Symphony in Canada, and appeared for the first time in the United States as guest conductor with the Minneapolis Symphony. He directed the Berlin Philharmonic in the German premiere of Britten's War requiem, and in the 1962-63 season led the London Symphony in a tour of Europe, Japan and Australia.

In 1967 Mr. Davis took up his appointment as chief conductor of the BBC Symphony Orchestra, which he relinquished to take up his duties at Covent Garden. He has in recent years been guest conductor with the world's leading orchestras among them the Israel Philharmonic, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Montreal Symphony, the Toronto Symphony, the Los Angeles Philharmonic and the New York Philharmonic. At the Metropolitan Opera he has conducted performances of Peter Grimes, Wozzeck and Pelleas et Melisande.

Joseph Silverstein has been concertmaster of the orchestra since 1962. Born in Detroit, he studied at the Curtis Institute and later with Joseph Gingold and Mischa Mischakoff. He was a prize winner in the 1959 Queen Elizabeth of Belgium International Competition and later won the Naumberg Foundation Award. Before coming to Boston he played in the orchestras of Houston, Denver and Philadelphia. Mr. Silverstein has established an international reputation as soloist and as first violin of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. In 1967 he led their tour to the Soviet Union, Germany and England. Mr. Silverstein is a faculty member of the New England Conservatory and Chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 67,117
OCT 20 1972
New England Newsclip

Music Last Night

Boston Symphony Heard Playing Sibelius, Elgar

By EDWIN SAFFORD

Sibelius and Elgar: two fossils found in post-romantic rock formations. Right or wrong? The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Colin Davis, set out last night in Veterans Memorial Auditorium to prove what you are liable to read in today's music appreciation bible "ain't necessarily so."

They succeeded. There were but two works on the program, Sibelius' third symphony and the Elgar violin concerto with the orchestra's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, as soloist.

For starters, that was superlative programming. The two pieces, known if at all through recordings mostly, are rarely enough given to jar appetites awake. Too, they are of a quality quite above the normal.

Davis, the British conductor whose Berlioz performances have been brilliant and who is one of the orchestra's "principal guest conductors," brought both composers alive in tremendous fashion. In this concert he emphasized pulse more than meter in his podium manner, following adrenaline as opposed to the metronome.

For either Sibelius or Elgar, given the control they received, the approach produced engrossing results. The Finnish composer's symphony represented a liberation from the 19th century symphony as a holy vocation, for example.

With that in mind, perhaps, Davis gave the work and its quasi-folk materials, reminiscent of the "Lemminkaeinen" legends, spatial properties which marked a noticeable difference between the third and second symphonies. Clarity and lyricism were everywhere evident, the only blemish evident being the first movement's winds' entrance.

Elgar's concerto dates from about the same time but harkens back more. It is thicker in texture, has greater passion and intends to create an emotional effect.

Davis and the orchestra nevertheless kept to a similar clarity in the accompaniment. There was no muddiness and those glorious risings of sonority set amidst so much reflection were beautifully molded.

Silverstein's playing began in a style more appropriate to Sarasate than the Edwardian Elgar. Whereas his performance during last Spring's Bach Festival was clean and direct, last night he resorted too often to a vibrato throb that came close to distortion.

Elgar's is a long concerto, though, demanding enormous concentration. And the reflective passages do threaten to string it out a bit. In that respect, the violinist held the piece together, grasping attentions throughout.

Furthermore, he mastered the almost unobservable (to a nonstring player) virtuosic sections, of which the concerto abounds, in no uncertain way. By the third movement, also, his throb had subsided. You could come away happier.

This was the Bostonians' first concert of their Providence season and it was a winning one. Let us hope they bring Colin Davis back.

SOUTH MIDDLESEX DAILY NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MA.
D. 24,000
OCT 20 1972
New England Newsclip

Colin Davis to conduct

BOSTON — Colin Davis, principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducts the orchestra on Friday at 2 p.m., Saturday at 8:30 p.m. and Tuesday, Oct. 24 at 7:30 p.m. Davis conducts works of Sibelius and Elgar.

Davis began his conducting career in 1949 and his early experience was with the Kalmar Chamber Orchestra, the Chelsea Opera Group, the Festival Ballet and the Ballet Russe.

In 1957 he became assistant conductor of the BBC Scottish Orchestra

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885
OCT 21 1972
New England Newsclip

Sibelius, Elgar Featured

Davis Conducts Symphony

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

Colin Davis returned yesterday to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two weeks of concerts and brought with him two rather unfamiliarand not altogether successful works by Sibelious and Elgar.

• Symphony Review

The first, Sibelius' enigmatic Third Symphony, is an unusual three-movement work with a first movement whose themes are gay but undistinctive, worked into a structure that isn't wholly conclusive or convincing. The second movement is a pleasant dance and the third marked by a repetitive pompous melodic figure.

Davis and the orchestra played it in a way, however, that capitalized on attractive features, notably textures and sonorities, minimizing some of the structural problems and making it all seem more a successful work than it really is. In particular, the second movement produced some beautifully refined playing from the winds and a finely graded balance of musical layers.

Joseph Silverstein was the soloist in the lengthy Elgar Violin Concerto, and I think it's about time that BSO principals were selected for this kind of major exposure instead of some of the second-rate youngsters often brought in.

The concerto is long, lyrical, and exceedingly romantic — almost Bathetic. It compounds the problem of too-sweetness by having first and second movements inhabiting the same perfumed and sentimental world and a third movement which cannot seem to break away entirely, even featuring a cadenza quoting themes from the previous movements.

Silverstein's playing was some of the best I have heard from him, with a lovely, if somewhat lean, tone and pitch for the most part square on. He was admirably faithful to the score and Elgar's explicit phrasing, although I personally felt he could have been slightly less zealous in observing ritards—the piece veers dangerously close to being silly and any more exaggeration can push it over the brink.

Davis and the orchestra partnered Silverstein well with the kind of ensemble one doesn't always encounter in concerto performances.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202
OCT 17 1972
New England Newsclip

* * *

Colin Davis, principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the orchestra Friday at 2 p.m., Saturday, at 8:30 p.m. and Tuesday, Oct. 24, at 7:30 p.m. Mr. Davis conducts works of Sibelius and Elgar.

Mr. Davis opens the concerts with the Sibelius Symphony No. 3 in C and follows it with Elgar's Violin concerto. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, is soloist in the Violin concerto.

Colin Davis began his conducting career in 1949 and his early experience was with the Kalmar Chamber Orchestra, the Chelsea Opera Group, the Festival Ballet and the Ballet Russe. In 1957 he became assistant conductor of the BBC Scottish Orchestra. Two years later he was called with brief notice to take the place of Otto Klemperer, who became ill, in a concert performance of Don Giovanni. This marked a turning point in his career. He was shortly afterwards appointed music director of the Sadler's Wells Opera and made his debut with the CBC Symphony in Canada.

He has in recent years been guest conductor with the world's leading orchestras among them the Israel Philharmonic, the Phildelphia Orchestra, the Montreal Symphony, the Toronto Symphony, the Los Angeles Philharmonic and the New York Philharmonic.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 281,042 SUN. 566,377
OCT 23 1972
New England Newsclip

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
OCT 26 1972
New England Newsclip

. . . and BSO 'discoveries'

Are the Third Symphony of Sibelius and the Elgar Violin Concerto in your listening repertoire? Probably not until recently if you're a Boston Symphony regular. For his second program as a principal guest conductor of the BSO, Colin Davis revived them both – the former for the first time at Symphony Hall since 1939, the second as a subscription series "first," after two isolated single performances in 1934 and 1967.

The comparative brevity of the Third Symphony and its marked economy in the use of orchestral means are in marked contrast with the general conception of Sibelius's style. However, this is still symphonic writing on a grand scale, without the weightier and more personal convolutions of a Mahler or a Bruckner, now so much in vogue. The Third – a three- rather than a four-movement work, incidentally – conveys a Nordic airiness and freedom typical of the composer, whose cool, soaring musical language, "in" or not, is quite unlike any other.

Mr. Davis approached the work with obvious affection, which was translated into a well-knit, sonorous performance by the orchestra. The BSO has a history of seeing eye to eye with Mr. Davis, a professional friendship bound to offer rewards to the listening audience.

* * *

The Elgar Concerto, conceived with the opulent violin tone and complementary technical prowess of Fritz Kreisler in mind, is a specialized and demanding work. Not only does it ask its soloist to delve into his collection of virtuoso devices, but there is an overall personal, if not specifically stated message to convey.

For Elgar, in addition to tailoring the work to Kreisler's sterling performing abilities in 1910, also envisioned the piece as the tonal personification of a friend, gender unspecified, of whom he was obviously deeply fond. Thus the intimate character that pervades the concerto has become part and parcel of its deft and challenging compositional framework.

Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein took on this formidable solo assignment, emerging, not surprisingly, with highest honors. While his may not be the ultimate tone or technique of a Kreisler, his playing was charged with the singing intensity and the sense of individual nuance that this concerto must have to fulfill its original intent. It was a solid realization, in which Mr. Davis and Mr. Silverstein's colleagues had an equal part.

Boston Symphony taps rich era

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

In the history of western music, is there another 10-year period as rich as the one immediately before the 1914 war? That was the decade in which what we still call "modern music" was invented, but beyond that, the sheer quality is staggering, as well as the variety of voices heard and the wonderful sense of doors and windows being thrown open.

For his first program this season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday afternooon in Symphony Hall, Colin Davis reached into that decade, and to two composers whose music is neither the most popular of the period (Strauss or Puccini) nor the most central and critical (Debussy, Stravinsky, Schoenberg, Webern, Berg). He gave us the third symphony of Sibelius, written in 1907 and not played by the orchestra since 1939, and the Elgar violin concerto, finished in 1910 and done here just once before, in 1934, the year of the composer's death, and then on a pension fund concert rather than in the regular series.

That I don't like the Sibelius third is of no consequence, although I think very few other people like it either: with the sixth, which Gunther Schuller revived at the New England Conservatory last year, it has always been the least played of Sibelius's symphonies, and by some margin. The third has none of the sort of scratchily individual intellectual force of the fourth and seventh syphonies, nor is it a heartily vulgar "success piece" like the second or the fifth.

It is an essay in taste and classical writing, modest both in its dimension — three movements, none very long nor of great compositional or expressive density — and in its sonority — woodwinds by twos, no tuba, kettle drums as the only percussion. There is something uncompromising to that stance which is rather appealing, and the greyness of the textures is impressive and somehow compelling. The material, however, seems dry, except in the not-quite-slow middle movement, where it looms toward the sticky, and you really have to be Beethoven to make strong music out of such drastically neutral themes.

It is obsessive music with its insistent literal or rhyming repetitions of small fragments, and a bit boring. Even so, it is the statement that could have been made by that one man only — how fascinating its obstinate antiromanticism must have seemed when this piece was new — and as we are threatened and surrounded today by musical facelessness worse and more distressing than the dumbest noodlings of the 18th Century concerto grosso factories, such assertion of individuality is a quality I come to appreciate more and more.

Elgar's was an unmistakable voice, too. He was also a great composer with much to say, but a professional through and through, with complete control on every structural level. In his ample, emotional violin concerto, there is much to admire. The surefootedness with which he marshals the progression from one event to the next, for example, or the miraculous orchestral style that is so lush and so transparent at the same time. There is also much to love in this concerto, from something as overriding as its mood, the sadness, an intense and consuming sadness, that lives so comfortably with energy and discipline, or the detail as touching as the pains he always takes to give the second violins something particularly beautiful to play. The most special feature of the concerto is the cadenza in the last movement, and surely this is the only concerto in which the cadenza is its most poetic and introspective point. The last movement, a very vivacious allegro, with piquantly oblique harmonies, makes its way gradually toward the upward progression of two semitones with which the whole work began. With that the cadenza is opened, with what Elgar himself referred to as "a sad look back at the first movement."

It is an amazing invention, that cadenza, perhaps the most vivid composition of a dream in music, something that scarcely seems to happen in real time, as fragments from earlier in the work are recalled over miraculously shadowy sonorities in the orchestra. It is a stroke that is perfectly placed, compositionally, technically and psychologically.

It was an afternoon of splendid performances. I have no reservations whatever about the performance of the Sibelius, which was cohesively conducted by Davis, and beautifully played by the orchestra. Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concert master was the soloist in the concerto (by the way, his predecessor in the 1934 performance was Jascha Heifetz). I have almost nothing but praise for Silverstein's negotiation of this extraordinarily taxing work. Obviously, it is something that he loves and understands, and he has the musical and technical mastery with which to cope with it. The one reservation I do have pertains to his sound, which I found excessively laden with vibrato.

There is a lovely theme in the last movement which Elgar specifically requests to be played with vibrato and at that point Silverstein had nothing new to give it or with which to characterize it, and I found that the insistent intensity of his vibraing was both a little monotonous and a little fatiguing. Otherwise, let me say it again, both musically and from the technical and violinistic point of view, his performance seemed to me exemplary. And its excellence was of course made possible to the huge degree by the superb framework that Davis provided with the orchestra, a framework that was infallibly sturdy from the structural point of view, that assured a continuing progression of gorgeously beautiful sounds (and this is a concerto which is particularly physical, and in which the purely sensuous aspect is singularly important), and which was ideally attentive to the leads of the soloist. In sum, it is a concert of exceptional distinction.

E. J. DIAS

A Look At the Arts

STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
S. 63,259
NOV 5 1972
New England Newsclip

I was delighted last week to see Colin Davis on the podium in Symphony Hall, where he conducted the second concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's current Tuesday "B" Series. Davis, now listed as 'principal guest conductor" of the orchestra, was, according to reliable sources, offered the directorship of the Boston Symphony when William Steinberg retired from the post. For personal reasons — namely, that he wanted to devote more time to his present work as musical director of England's Royal Opera House, Covent Garden — Davis refused the honor, which went instead to Seiji Ozawa.

Davis obviously, however, has the respect and admiration of the Boston Symphony players, who perform well under his baton. He is not a showy conductor, but his beat is firm and steady and his musicianship — in interpretation, in shading, in building to climaxes — is first-rate. Tuesday's program, which was played splendidly, was devoted to Sibelius "Symphony No. 3," a work unusually light and pastoral in tone for the Finnish composer, and to Sir Edward Elgar's "Violin Concerto in B Minor," with the orchestra's able concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, as soloist. The Elgar is richly romantic and lush in its melodies, for even though the composer lived through the first three decades of the 20th Century, he never really left the 19th Century.

Silverstein's fiddling was accurate, of good tone quality, with admirably-controlled technique, of good tone quality, ble for fire and passion of playing, but, technically, he is a master of his instrument — and the result was pleasing.

Incidentally, venerable Symphony Hall now boasts a sumptuous addition. The Picture Gallery on the second floor has been remodeled to serve as a multi-purpose room for meetings, receptions, cocktails, and occasional dining. It is open before each concert and remains open during intermission and after the concert so that music-lovers can partake of light refreshments. Called the Cabot-Cahners Room, it is named in honor of Mary Lou Cabot and Helene Cahners, founders of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony.

Colin Davis Conducts BSO

For last weekend's audiences at Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra provided a concert of pleasant, gratifying music making. It may not have been the stirring occasion that more dramatic fare sometimes offers, but it was the kind of warm, easy - going affair that left the listener with a sense of security that everything is fine with the BSO.

At these concerts, Colin Davis made his first appearance of the season as principal guest conductor and Joseph Silverstein partook of a much happier role for him as solo violinist. The program consisted of two straightforward works not often heard in the standard repertoire these days, but each quite standard in its own right. They were Symphony No. 3 in C by Sibelius and the Elgar Violin Concerto.

Both works, romantic in spirit and content, are old - fashioned in an engaging sort of way. But there the similarity stops. The symphony, completed in 1907, approximately three years berore the concerto, at least makes harmonic obeisance in the direction of modern times, whereas the Violin Concerto is a throwback to the nineteenth century.

Sibelius' Third Symphony is shorter (it has only three movements); its texture is leaner than its two predecessors; certainly it is more relaxed. Here is the directness and simplicity which the earlier works never really achieved. No longer does the heaviness and impression of things being overblown persist. And the result is that in this symphony eloquence has taken over from grandiloquence. It is music with a lilt, almost pastoral in character, and rather jocose at times.

Mr. Davis and the Orchestra played the symphony as if they really enjoyed doing it. The pacing was leisurely, the phrasing artful. In complete command, Mr. Davis shaped each turn with the skill of a master craftsman, yet did it so effortlessly that the music seemed to flow along on its own momentum. And I am hard put to recall when the Orchestra played pianissimo, especially in the cello and bass sections, with such a delightfully hushed whisper.

The Elgar concerto belongs to the same bag as the Brahms, Schumann, Bruch and Tchaikovsky concertos. It is romantic with a capital R. Nevertheless, it does have its own identity. What it lacks in innovation, it has in tender themes and lovely musical moments. In the hands of musicians who cherish them, these rise to delight an audience.

Whether the concerto is, as some maintain, Elgar's strongest contribution to the literature, it is certainly a work that deserves more frequent hearing here. In England, of course, it is almost as common as tea and scones.

Mr. Davis has a special way with his countryman's music and this devotion seems to have rubbed off well on Joseph Silverstein. Together they gave the concerto an affectionate reading which, even in the light of the small tone from the violin, came off with great charm, exactitude and beauty, much like the wonders of a small jewel. The sympathetic accompaniment scarcely made one aware of the slightness of Mr. Silverstein's tone. It was a wholly satisfying performance. Symphony Hall could well stand more like it.

H.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500
OCT 26 1972
New England Newsclip

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 366,377

OCT 29 1972

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees Mrs. James Perkins, Westwood, and Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Boston.

ALCOTT BANKS, president of the orchestra trustees, and Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager.

Symphony Hall with a new look

ALISON ARNOLD

Something new has been added to 72-year-old Symphony Hall. It's the Cabot-Cahners Room, made possible by grants given in honor of Mary Louise Cabot and Helene Cahners, founders and first co-chairmen of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Funds provided solely for this purpose have made possible the refurbishing of this room, formerly the Picture Gallery. It will be open to the public at all times.

Improved acoustics will make it a perfect place for small concerts, meetings and receptions. There are two bars and refreshments will be served a la carte before, during and after concerts. Occasional dining will take place in this room.

Modern lighting, Chinese lacquer red carpet and white walls make a glamorous background for the paintings that will continue to be shown. And by summer, air conditioning will make this room a pleasant refuge.

THE CABOT-CAHNERS ROOM, formerly the Picture Gallery, in its new dress. (Globe photos by E. T. Welsh)

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885

OCT 21 1972

New England Newsclip

Symphony Hall Goes Lavish

For symphony goers who discovered a more lavish Symphony Hall on their arrival this week, including a handsome new lounge and art gallery, resurfaced floors, red carpeting and redecorated first floor parlor, do not panic. Your subscription money and donations are not going for such lovely non-essentials as this.

The decorations were made possible through three separate grants, given solely for this purpose.

The new multi-purpose room, replacing the former Picture Gallery, was created with funds given in honor of Mary Louise Cabot and Helene R. Cahners, founders and first co-chairmen of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Small meetings, concerts, receptions, cocktails and occasional dining will take place in the room now known as the Cabot-Cahners Room. Refreshments will be served a la carte before, during and after each concert.

Other improvements in Symphony Hall were funded by the Frederick J. Kennedy Memorial Foundation, Inc. These include carpeting on all three floors, the resurfaced floors and new parlor.

PRESENT AT the opening of the Cabot-Cahners Room at Symphony Hall were Talcott M. Banks, president, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, trustee, and Mrs. James H. Perkins, trustee, of the Symphony's Board of Trustees.

The Boston Globe
(EVENING)
D. 495,932

OCT 20 1972

New England Newsclip

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

OCT 20 1972

New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

After a long tradition of 72 years almost to the day there are going to be some changes in the habits of those attending one of Boston's most sacred rituals — the Friday afternoon Symphony concerts. How the changes will be viewed by some of the older diehards who consider Friday afternoon attendance at Symphony Hall in the same light as their Sunday morning attendance at church is a question that will be answered this afternoon when they view the glories of the "new" home of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

That there has been considerable activity behind the scenes in this building that is one of Boston's prides and joys was revealed this week and spectacular is the only word to describe it. The entire upper floor art gallery has gone and in the place of the towering ceiling, the marble and the general air of dinginess so prevalent before is a modern room complete with a bar at either end, acres of red carpeting, contemporary chandeliers, small black and chrome tables and chairs and, most welcome of all, a lowered ceiling by way of baffles giving the room a reasonable decibel of noise level instead of the deafening one it had before.

This new room is to be called The Cabot-Cahners Room in honor of Mrs. Mary Louise Cabot and Mrs. Norman Cahners who were the first cochairmen of the then newly formed Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and whose families donated the $100,000 needed to renovate the room. It will be opened for light refreshments such as sandwiches and coffee, as well as cocktails, one hour before every event held at Symphony Hall; it will be open for cocktails or champagne at intermission in the civilized way of a Covent Garden or a Metropolitan Opera House and will remain open after a performance for friends to meet. As if the timing had been planned to coincide the new large garage at the corner of Westland Avenue, almost next door to Symphony Hall, will open tomorrow making a visit to Symphony for any event an easy matter of one stop parking, for both refreshments and the performance. It would seem a happy way to celebrate the 72nd anniversary of this acoustically perfect building that opened for the very first time on Oct. 15, 1900.

Sunday will see the culmination of months of hard work on the part of two organizations who have joined to produce an unusual and interesting event, the Garden Club of Hingham and the Friends of the Hingham Public Library.

It would seem to many that the wheel has come a full circle and that more than the traditional ghosts normally associated with Halloween will walk the carpeted floors of Hingham's modern spacious public library on Oct. 22, 23 and 24. The Garden Club and the Friends have cooperated in bringing to the library a standard flower show and creative arts show called "Arts in Living" in which the junior sections in particular will show fruits and vegetables grown especially by them. This is particularly appropriate for the entire show will take place on the very site on which the Agricultural Hall of old stood for close to 100 years before it was torn down to make way for the town's modern library and office complex. For years Harvest Festivals and agricultural shows were held in the huge old building at which local inhabitants proudly displayed the fruits of their labors.

On Sunday evening a preview party for the sponsors of the show will be held at the library from 6 to 9 p.m. Mr. and Mrs. Edwin A. Hills and Mr. and Mrs. Albion C. Drinkwater are cochairmen of this party. Mrs. Francis J. Thompson is ticket chairman, and sponsors' tickets, which also entitle the holder to visit the show anytime during the regular hours, are available from her or at the library, 66 Leavitt St., Hingham. Assisting the cochairmen with arrangements are Mr. and Mrs. George Curry, Mr. and Mrs. Donald F. Pitcher, Jr., Mrs. Laurence E. Crane, the Richard P. Hawkins and the Robert B. Dannies.

Hostesses for the evening are headed by Mrs. Roderick K. Macleod and Mrs. M. Tucke Curtiss. Assisting them will be Mrs. Samuel P. Newbury, Mrs. Herman Stuetzer, Mrs. William Gallagher, Mrs. Peter C. Wensberg, Mrs. Norman R. Hoezel and Mrs. Frederick Cowperthwait, Jr. Music by members of the South Shore Conservatory, the Hingham Baroque Society, and other members of musical groups in the town will entertain during the evening.

The hours of "Arts in Living" will be Oct. 23 from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. and Oct. 24 from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. In addition to the flower arrangements by 24 members of the Garden Club; paintings, sculpture, music and artisan's work, there will be films shown and crafts demonstrations held continually during the two day event.

ALISON ARNOLD

A brighter Symphony Hall

Staid Symphony Hall has had the red carpet treatment and three floors have gone wall-to-wall! Two women trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mrs. James Perkins, Westwood, and Mrs. Harris Fahnstock, Boston, explain that it's really four shades of red woven together to make it Chinese lacquer red. At any rate, it will give a glowing welcome to the Friday Symphony-goers this afternoon.

This renovation and the refurbishing of other areas of the hall were made possible by three grants designed solely for this purpose. Two of the grants, given in honor of Mary Louise Cabot and Helene Cahners, founders and first co-chairmen of the Council of Friends of the orchestra, provided funds for the redecoration of the Picture Gallery, now named the Cabot-Cahners Room.

Carpeted in the rich red, it has decorative white chandeliers, and small black tables and chairs are placed about the room. There are two bars, and cocktails, light luncheons and occasional dinners will be served there before and after the concerts and during intermission. The room will always be open to the public.

The acoustics will now make it possible to have concerts of chamber music there, as well as meetings and receptions. As Talcott Banks, president of the trustees of the orchestra, points out: "There's no reverberaion now and people can talk without shouting." Paintings will continue to be shown there.

Other interiors of Symphony Hall have been refurbished through the generosity of the Frederick J. Kennedy Memorial Foundation, Inc. The floors have been resurfaced and the first floor parlor has been redone.

Air conditioning will be installed by summer and further renovations have been provided for in public areas that have had no major improvements since the hall was built in 1900.

There are also changes in the program book. It now has a new size and includes color pages. So it's hoped there will be increased advertising revenue.

And to those conservative Bostonians who are against change, Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the orchestra, explains: "You have to spend money to make money." And that's what everyone wants to do for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

★

Fall and winter fashions will be shown at Bonwit Teller, Thursday evening, to benefit the Assn. for the Performing Arts. Spectators will sit at small marble-topped tables in the elegant Designer Salon that will be filled with flowers. At this informal showing cocktails will be served at 6 o'clock and the show will take place at 7:15 so husbands can get ideas for Christmas gifts.

There is no chairman for the committee planning this pleasant evening for, as Mrs. John J. Donahue, Winchester, explains: "We're all 'Indians' in this thing, There are no 'chiefs.' I guess we're the only group in town that does it this way, but it seems to work."

Among the loyal "Indians" are Mrs. Robert Watson, Mrs. Peter Dupuis, Mrs. John Latshaw, Mrs. John Cataldo, Mrs. Ernest Cirace, Mrs. Thomas Powers, Mrs. Ernest Grable, Mrs. Wallace Yaffe, Mrs. Robert Mullin, Mrs. Albert Pagliarulo and Mrs. William Stone.

★

The Pilgrim fathers would be shocked to hear of dancing on Sunday. But a dinner dance to preserve one of their houses will be held Sunday evening at the Winsor House, Duxbury. It's the Maj. John Bradford House in Kingston and was built in 1674 on land owned by his grandfather, Gov. William Bradford, one of the original Colonists.

The house has been owned and maintained since 1921 by the Jones River Village Club and its subcommittee, the Bradford House Council. During the past summer the house was closed to visitors so that extensive repairs could be made. It is also the site of an important "dig" conducted by archaeologists of the Plimoth Plantation, Plymouth.

A social hour will be held at the Bradford House before the dinner dance. Hosts and hostesses for the evening are members of the Bradford House Council. They include the Peter Athertons, the Samuel Babbitts, the Robert Berglunds, Dr. and Mrs. John Funkhouser, the Brian Hasletts, the Louis Lapinskis, the Herbert Macys and Mr. and Mrs. James Richards.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

OCT 21 1972

New England Newsclip

Symphony Hall's new look

By Nora E. Taylor

Symphony Hall, ancient Boston bastion of music, and home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is turning a new face to the world, inside at least. There's lots of bittersweet-red carpeting, acoustic tile, some fresh paint, new flooring, and air conditioning going in.

None of these improvements affects the BSO's operating budget. Some years ago sums of money were privately donated for the specific purpose of improving the marbled halls of the building. After long study a way has been found to use the money that will benefit public and orchestra.

The picture gallery — formerly a noisy horror — has been transformed into an elegant, carpeted, quiet room with modern chandeliers, where refreshments will be served, before, during, and after concerts.

Symphony spokesmen envisage light luncheons and dinners for concertgoers prior to Symphony Hall events. Many will welcome this innovation because of the paucity of restaurants in the neighborhood. At other times the room will be used for staff meetings and for chamber concerts.

The gallery is now named the Cabot-Cahners Room to honor Mary Louise Cabot and Helene Cahners who made it all possible. It will still function as a display area for art, with rotating exhibitions. The first one installed comes from the Museum School of the Museum of Fine Arts.

The same softly shaded carpeting is going into other areas of the formerly echoing halls, and the room below the picture gallery will be refurbished too. Other improvements in the lighting fixtures, etc., will come along.

Meanwhile, as if to celebrate a brighter look within the hall, the Boston Symphony program book has broken into color. It is now of magazine size but will still contain the program notes that have for long provided basic background information on the music to be played.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885

OCT 21 1972

New England Newsclip

Symphony Hall Goes Lavish

For symphony goers who discovered a more lavish Symphony Hall on their arrival this week, including a handsome new lounge and art gallery, resurfaced floors, red carpeting and redecorated first floor parlor, do not panic. Your subscription money and donations are not going for such lovely non-essentials as this.

The decorations were made possible through three separate grants, given solely for this purpose.

The new multi-purpose room, replacing the former Picture Gallery, was created with funds given in honor of Mary Louise Cabot and Helene R. Cahners, founders and first co-chairmen of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Small meetings, concerts, receptions, cocktails and occasional dining will take place in the room now known as the Cabot-Cahners Room. Refreshments will be served a la carte before, during and after each concert.

Other improvements in Symphony Hall were funded by the Frederick J. Kennedy Memorial Foundation, Inc. These include carpeting on all three floors, the resurfaced floors and new parlor.

PRESENT AT the opening of the Cabot-Cahners Room at Symphony Hall were Talcott M. Banks, president, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, trustee, and Mrs. James H. Perkins, trustee, of the Symphony's Board of Trustees.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

OCT 21 1972

New England Newsclip

Symphony Hall's new look

By Nora E. Taylor

Symphony Hall, ancient Boston bastion of music, and home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is turning a new face to the world, inside at least. There's lots of bittersweet-red carpeting, acoustic tile, some fresh paint, new flooring, and air conditioning going in.

None of these improvements affects the BSO's operating budget. Some years ago sums of money were privately donated for the specific purpose of improving the marbled halls of the building. After long study a way has been found to use the money that will benefit public and orchestra.

The picture gallery — formerly a noisy horror — has been transformed into an elegant, carpeted, quiet room with modern chandeliers, where refreshments will be served, before, during, and after concerts.

Symphony spokesmen envisage light luncheons and dinners for concertgoers prior to Symphony Hall events. Many will welcome this innovation because of the paucity of restaurants in the neighborhood. At other times the room will be used for staff meetings and for chamber concerts.

The gallery is now named the Cabot-Cahners Room to honor Mary Louise Cabot and Helene Cahners who made it all possible. It will still function as a display area for art, with rotating exhibitions. The first one installed comes from the Museum School of the Museum of Fine Arts.

The same softly shaded carpeting is going into other areas of the formerly echoing halls, and the room below the picture gallery will be refurbished too. Other improvements in the lighting fixtures, etc., will come along.

Meanwhile, as if to celebrate a brighter look within the hall, the Boston Symphony program book has broken into color. It is now of magazine size but will still contain the program notes that have for long provided basic background information on the music to be played.

FATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

OCT 20 1972

New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

After a long tradition of 72 years almost to the day there are going to be some changes in the habits of those attending one of Boston's most sacred rituals — the Friday afternoon Symphony concerts. How the changes will be viewed by some of the older diehards who consider Friday afternoon attendance at Symphony Hall in the same light as their Sunday morning attendance at church is a question that will be answered this afternoon when they view the glories of the "new" home of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

That there has been considerable activity behind the scenes in this building that is one of Boston's prides and joys was revealed this week and spectacular is the only word to describe it. The entire upper floor art gallery has gone and in the place of the towering ceiling, the marble and the general air of dinginess so prevalent before is a modern room complete with a bar at either end, acres of red carpeting, contemporary chandeliers, small black and chrome tables and chairs and, most welcome of all, a lowered ceiling by way of baffles giving the room a reasonable decibel of noise level instead of the deafening one it had before.

This new room is to be called The Cabot-Cahners Room in honor of Mrs. Mary Louise Cabot and Mrs. Norman Cahners who were the first cochairmen of the then newly formed Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and whose families donated the $100,000 needed to renovate the room. It will be opened for light refreshments such as sandwiches and coffee, as well as cocktails, one hour before every event held at Symphony Hall; it will be open for cocktails or champagne at intermission in the civilized way of a Covent Garden or a Metropolitan Opera House and will remain open after a performance for friends to meet. As if the timing had been planned to coincide the new large garage at the corner of Westland Avenue, almost next door to Symphony Hall, will open tomorrow making a visit to Symphony for any event an easy matter of one stop parking, for both refreshments and the performance. It would seem a happy way to celebrate the 72nd anniversary of this acoustically perfect building that opened for the very first time on Oct. 15, 1900.

Sunday will see the culmination of months of hard work on the part of two organizations who have joined to produce an unusual and interesting event, the Garden Club of Hingham and the Friends of the Hingham Public Library.

It would seem to many that the wheel has come a full circle and that more than the traditional ghosts normally associated with Halloween will walk the carpeted floors of Hingham's modern spacious public library on Oct. 22, 23 and 24. The Garden Club and the Friends have cooperated in bringing to the library a standard flower show and creative arts show called "Arts in Living" in which the junior sections in particular will show fruits and vegetables grown especially by them. This is particularly appropriate for the entire show will take place on the very site on which the Agricultural Hall of old stood for close to 100 years before it was torn down to make way for the town's modern library and office complex. For years Harvest Festivals and agricultural shows were held in the huge old building at which local inhabitants proudly displayed the fruits of their labors.

On Sunday evening a preview party for the sponsors of the show will be held at the library from 6 to 9 p.m. Mr. and Mrs. Edwin A. Hills and Mr. and Mrs. Albion C. Drinkwater are cochairmen of this party. Mrs. Francis J. Thompson is ticket chairman, and sponsors' tickets, which also entitle the holder to visit the show anytime during the regular hours, are available from her or at the library, 66 Leavitt St., Hingham. Assisting the cochairmen with arrangements are Mr. and Mrs. George Curry, Mr. and Mrs. Donald F. Pitcher, Jr., Mrs. Laurence E. Crane, the Richard P. Hawkins and the Robert B. Dannies.

Hostesses for the evening are headed by Mrs. Roderick K. Macleod and Mrs. M. Tucke Curtiss. Assisting them will be Mrs. Samuel P. Newbury, Mrs. Herman Stuetzer, Mrs. William Gallagher, Mrs. Peter C. Wensberg, Mrs. Norman R. Hoezel and Mrs. Frederick Cowperthwait, Jr. Music by members of the South Shore Conservatory, the Hingham Baroque Society, and other members of musical groups in the town will entertain during the evening.

The hours of "Arts in Living" will be Oct. 23 from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. and Oct. 24 from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. In addition to the flower arrangements by 24 members of the Garden Club; paintings, sculpture, music and artisan's work, there will be films shown and crafts demonstrations held continually during the two day event.

The Boston Globe
(EVENING)
D. 495,033

OCT 20 1972

New England Newsclip

ALISON ARNOLD

A brighter Symphony Hall

Staid Symphony Hall has had the red carpet treatment and three floors have gone wall-to-wall! Two women trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mrs. James Perkins, Westwood, and Mrs. Harris Fahnstock, Boston, explain that it's really four shades of red woven together to make it Chinese lacquer red. At any rate, it will give a glowing welcome to the Friday Symphony-goers this afternoon.

This renovation and the refurbishing of other areas of the hall were made possible by three grants designed solely for this purpose. Two of the grants, given in honor of Mary Louise Cabot and Helene Cahners, founders and first co-chairmen of the Council of Friends of the orchestra, provided funds for the redecoration of the Picture Gallery, now named the Cabot-Cahners Room.

Carpeted in the rich red, it has decorative white chandeliers, and small black tables and chairs are placed about the room. There are two bars, and cocktails, light luncheons and occasional dinners will be served there before and after the concerts and during intermission. The room will always be open to the public.

The acoustics will now make it possible to have concerts of chamber music there, as well as meetings and receptions. As Talcott Banks, president of the trustees of the orchestra, points out: "There's no reverberaion now and people can talk without shouting." Paintings will continue to be shown there.

Other interiors of Symphony Hall have been refurbished through the generosity of the Frederick J. Kennedy Memorial Foundation, Inc. The floors have been resurfaced and the first floor parlor has been redone.

Air conditioning will be installed by summer and further renovations have been provided for in public areas that have had no major improvements since the hall was built in 1900.

There are also changes in the program book. It now has a new size and includes color pages. So it's hoped there will be increased advertising revenue.

And to those conservative Bostonians who are against change, Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the orchestra, explains: "You have to spend money to make money." And that's what everyone wants to do for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

★

Fall and winter fashions will be shown at Bonwit Teller, Thursday evening, to benefit the Assn. for the Performing Arts. Spectators will sit at small marble-topped tables in the elegant Designer Salon that will be filled with flowers. At this informal showing cocktails will be served at 6 o'clock and the show will take place at 7:15 so husbands can get ideas for Christmas gifts.

There is no chairman for the committee planning this pleasant evening for, as Mrs. John J. Donahue, Winchester, explains: "We're all 'Indians' in this thing, There are no 'chiefs.' I guess we're the only group in town that does it this way, but it seems to work."

Among the loyal "Indians" are Mrs. Robert Watson, Mrs. Peter Dupuis, Mrs. John Latshaw, Mrs. John Cataldo, Mrs. Ernest Cirace, Mrs. Thomas Powers, Mrs. Ernest Grable, Mrs. Wallace Yaffe, Mrs. Robert Mullin, Mrs. Albert Pagliarulo and Mrs. William Stone.

★

The Pilgrim fathers would be shocked to hear of dancing on Sunday. But a dinner dance to preserve one of their houses will be held Sunday evening at the Winsor House, Duxbury. It's the Maj. John Bradford House in Kingston and was built in 1674 on land owned by his grandfather, Gov. William Bradford, one of the original Colonists.

The house has been owned and maintained since 1921 by the Jones River Village Club and its subcommittee, the Bradford House Council. During the past summer the house was closed to visitors so that extensive repairs could be made. It is also the site of an important "dig" conducted by archaeologists of the Plimoth Plantation, Plymouth.

A social hour will be held at the Bradford House before the dinner dance. Hosts and hostesses for the evening are members of the Bradford House Council. They include the Peter Athertons, the Samuel Babbitts, the Robert Berglunds, Dr. and Mrs. John Funkhouser, the Brian Hasletts, the Louis Lapinskis, the Herbert Macys and Mr. and Mrs. James Richards.

22

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

OCT 25 1972

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony will present Berlioz, Beethoven

BOSTON — On Friday afternoon, October 27 and Saturday evening, October 28, Colin Davis conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in works of Berlioz and Beethoven. Janet Baker, mezzo-soprano, is soloist.

Mr. Davis opens the concert with Berlioz' Overture to "Les francs-juges" and follows that with Berlioz' "Nuits d'ete". Janet Baker is soloist for that work. The concert closes with Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in C.

Colin Davis began his conducting career in 1949 and his early experience was with the Kalmar Chamber Orchestra, the Chelsea Opera Group, the Festival Ballet and the Ballet Russe. In 1957 he became assistant conductor of the BBC Scottish Orchestra. Two years later he was called at short notice to take the place of Otto Klemperer, who became ill, in a concert performance of Don Giovanni. This marked a turning point in his career: he was shortly afterwards appointed Music Director of the Sadler's Wells Opera, and made his debut with the CBC Symphony in Canada, and appeared for the first time in the United States as guest conductor with the Minneapolis Symphony. He directed the Berlin Philharmonic in the German premiere of Britten's War requiem, and in the 1962-63 season led the London Symphony in a tour of Europe, Japan and Australia. In 1967 Mr. Davis took up his appointment as Chief Conductor of the BBC Symphony Orchestra, which he relinquished to take up his duties at Covent Garden. He has in recent years been guest conductor with the world's leading orchestras among them the Israel Philharmonic, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Montreal Symphony, the Toronto Symphony, the Los Angeles Philharmonic and the New York Philharmonic. At the Metropolitan Opera he has conducted performances of Peter Grimes, Wozzeck, and Pelleas et Melisande.

Janet Baker, one of Britain's most distinguished singers, makes her debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these concerts. She came to international prominence a little more than a decade ago when she made her first tour of France, Sweden and the USSR with Benjamin Britten's English Opera Group. She sang in the United States for the first time in 1966, and has been a regular visitor to this country in the years since, in recital and orchestral appearances. Last season she sang a recital of duets with Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, accompanied by Daniel Barenboim at Carnegie Hall, New York. Janet Baker has received an honorary doctorate of music from the University of Birmingham, and was designated a Commander of the Order of the British Empire by Elizabeth II in 1970. Her repertoire ranges from the baroque to the contemporary, and her many recordings are on Angel, Argo, L'Oiseau-Lyre and Everest labels.

SUBURBAN PRESS
AND RECORDER
NATICK, MASS.
W. 5,300

OCT 26 1972

New England Newsclip

Music lovers

BOSTON SYMPHONY – This weekend guest conductor Colin Davis will conduct the works of Berlioz and Beethoven, Friday, Oct. 27 at 2 p.m. and Saturday Oct. 28 at 8:30 p.m.; Berlioz "Nuits d'ete" and Beethoven Symphony No. 2 in C.

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 10,200

OCT 26 1972

New England Newsclip

Davis guests with symphony

On Friday at 2 p.m. Oct. 27 and 8:30 p.m. Saturday evening, Oct. 28 at Symphony Hall, Colin Davis conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in works of Berlioz and Beethoven. Janet Baker, mezzo-soprano, is soloist.

Mr. Davis opens the concert with Berlioz' Overture to "Les francs-juges" and folows that with Berlioz' "Nuits d'ete". Janet Baker is soloist for that work. The concert closes with Beethoven's Symphony no. 2 in C.

ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
CITIZEN ITEM
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 8,900

OCT 26 1972

New England Newsclip

Davis guests with symphony

On Friday at 2 p.m. Oct. 27 and 8:30 p.m. Saturday evening, Oct. 28 at Symphony Hall, Colin Davis conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in works of Berlioz and Beethoven. Janet Baker, mezzo-soprano, is soloist.

Mr. Davis opens the concert with Berlioz' Overture to "Les francs-juges" and folows that with Berlioz' "Nuits d'ete". Janet Baker is soloist for that work. The concert closes with Beethoven's Symphony no. 2 in C.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,484

OCT 30 1972

New England Newsclip

BSO: words and music by Davis, Miss Baker

By Louis Snyder

Not within recent memory has a voice from the podium of Symphony Hall politely but firmly reproved a Boston Symphony subscription audience for its lack of manners.

This happened, however, not a moment too soon, last Friday afternoon when Colin Davis, now a principal guest conductor of the BSO, faced a surprised traditional assemblage in the middle of a superb realization of Berlioz's "Nuit d'Ete" and entreated it, one and all, "please, please" to stop rustling programs, to stifle coughs, to control dropping handbags, and otherwise make it possible for orchestra, soloist Janet Baker, and himself to proceed.

* * *

Fortuitously, since his first acclaimed appearances with the orchestra in Boston in 1967, Mr. Davis has become not only a favorite son locally but Covent Garden's musical director and an outstanding international figure. Perhaps this is why his measured reproof brought forth a spate of approving applause, and noticeable compliance throughout the rest of the afternoon. Nevertheless, it is sad to realize that one of the most beautiful and penetrating performances of this or several seasons had to contend with built-in thoughtlessness and inattention, imposed by a few on performers and fellow-listeners alike.

The program opened with the Berlioz Overture to "Les Francs-Juges," an astonishing orchestral tour de force intended to preface an opera which finally never saw the light of day. Written in the composer's youth, it is a showy catalog of dramatically daring things to come, brilliantly crafted and aurally overpowering. If programs were rustled or handbags dropped, they couldn't have been heard over this rich surge of sound.

"Nuits d'Ete," the song cycle which followed, presented Miss Baker as mezzo-soprano soloist in her BSO debut. A solo recital in Cambridge, under Peabody-Mason auspices last year, will be remembered fondly as her previous local appearance. Then as now, Miss Baker revealed herself as one of the major vocal interpreters now before the public.

* * *

Wonderously on Friday, the admonition for silence after two numbers of the six which make up "Nuits d'Ete" didn't ultimately destroy the continuity which binds these intimate, delicately wrought songs. The Gautier poems, progressively more impassioned, are matched by musical settings of impelling emotional impact in which the voice soars as a solo instrument on even terms with the orchestra. Miss Baker's lovely mellow sound was matched by her deep-felt projection of word and mood; Mr. Davis and the orchestra provided accompaniments to enchant the ear and melt the heart.

There was a sense of happily disciplined agreement between conductor and orchestra, if not large emotional dividends for the listener, in the Beethoven Second Symphony which followed the break. This is, of course, a compositional product of what we must believe was one of the most devastating periods of Beethoven's life — the struggle against his impending deafness. Thus its free-flying melody and unmistakable serenity present an eternal paradox.

Mr. Davis's way with the Second was crisp and sure, and the BSO played admirably for him. However, the great experience of the program had been their collaboration with Miss Baker in the Berlioz song cycle, and for once Beethoven came in second (no pun intended).

The Boston Globe 23
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
OCT 28 1972
New England Newsclip

Berlioz's 'Nuits d'ete' a rare treat at Symphony Hall concert

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Good for Colin Davis! At yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert, he turned around and actually told the audience something it ought long ago to have been told—from the stage— about its manners.

Berlioz's exquisite Gauthier cycle, "Nuits d'ete" was on the program, with Janet Baker to sing it. After the last couple of minutes of "le spectre de la rose" had been drowned in coughing and program-rattling, Davis, after a quick consultation with Joseph Silverstein, the concertmaster, told the audience to "read the poetry when you get home and listen to the music while you are here." The nonstop rustling, he said, made it extremely difficult for the orchestra to play, and, he added "you don't know when you will be able to hear these again."

The last time Boston Sumphony subscribers had a chance at "Nuits d'ete" was in April 1955 (which is when the beautiful record with Victoria de los Angeles and Charles Munch was made). That was also the first, which is even more astonishing than the nearly 54-year interval since the last performance of Berlioz's "Frances-juges" overture, which began yesterday's program.

It was marvelous to have both works back, and in such beautiful performances. "Nuits d'ete" is more a sequence of six lovely songs than a unified cycle in the "Dichterliebe" sense, but they wonderfully represent what Berlioz could do at the delicate end of his expressive spectrum. The range of "Nuits d'ete" is great, from "L'ile inconnue," all light and air, to the darkness and gravity of "Sur les lagunes." That range, though, all happens within astonishingly narrow physical confines. There are no excursions into declamatory style, there is nothing loud, and even special orchestral effects like those eerie violin harmonics in "Au cimetiere" occur with extreme rarity.

But with what fantasy and virtuosity Berlioz handles his "plain" materials, and how individual his voice always is. So when the rose says to the dreaming girl, "I come from Paradise," Berlioz can turn you inside out just by adding the harp's simple A major cascade to his four woodwinds, two horns and strings. A man who could find his way to the center even of giants like Shakespeare and Virgil, he responds fully to the images of Gauthier, and there is in "Nuits d'ete" that conjunction of poetic sensibility and compositional power that makes great songs. "Nuits d'ete" is one of the loveliest moments of the Romantic movement.

The Overture to Berlioz's early, unperformed, then lost opera, "Les franc-juges," which deals with the creepy, underground Vehmic tribunals in medieval Germany, is engaging and surprising. A grand and powerful introduction leads to what starts out to be a harmless, then ravishingly pretty allegro.

The Italian lightness is a surprise, within which is contained the further surprise of how well Berlioz could write a symmetrical tune (this one he lifted from a flute quintet he had written 13 years earlier when he was all of 11). Then the next layer of surprise is revealed when from this material he takes you into directions as unexpected as the extremely slow-motion woodwind music over a highly jittery string accimpaniment, or the scoring which seems to get almost demonstratively more colorful.

The Boston Symphony played "Francs-juges" with great brilliance for Davis, and their playing was transparent and beautifully shaded in the songs. Janet Baker is one of those people who make singing sound terribly easy, and who even make it seem quite natural to be intelligent, musical and to pronounce French perfectly.

Davis completed the concert with a knowingly shaped, witty, vivacious performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 2. But, talk about surprises: How about that introduction and those "genie-out-of-the-bottle" codas to the first and last movements?

Symphony Features Berlioz and Beethoven

By Ellen Pfeifer
Music Critic

• Symphony Review

Berlioz' "Les Nuits d'ete," which the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed yesterday with Janet Baker — Colin Davis conducting — is a cycle of extraordinary sensual poems by Theophile Gautier, poems of a fantastic, supremely romantic nature (the kind which would appeal greatly to Berlioz). The subjects are ordinary enough in the song medium — a lovers walk in the woods, a bereaved lover's lament etc. — but the language conveys some rather unusual images of a delicious, f occasionally precious nature. Written originally for the piano, the composer's settings The composer's setings written originally for the piano, are straightforward, simple, economial, especially for Berlioz, and they are quite moving. Sometimes, the accompaniments are the simplest kinds of repeated rhythmic figures and the textures absolutely transparent.

Te be performed well, the songs require a great deal of subtlety of nuance as well as a rather wide range and vocal flexibility. Ms. Baker, do not get me wrong, has a beautiful voice and sings intelligently, but I felt she was not quite into the songs, that she hadn't grasped completely the variety of moods, however fine the distinctions. Her tone sounded pretty much the same throughout the cycle and the light-hearted song about the walk in the woods seemed no different in mood than the eerie one about a visit to the cemetery.

Her understanding of the individual word meanings was not obious at all times either and the "Reviens, Reviens" of "L' Absence," for example, lacked the pleading quality it ought to have.

The musical framework provided by Davis was exquisite, clear, beautifully-shaped and well paced. He preceded the songs with about as different a kind of Berlioz as is possible to find—the Overture of "Les Frances-juges"—in which he displayed the same kind of knowingness about how things should go, where they should be ominous, gay and exiciting.

He concluded with Beethoven's infrequently heard Symphony No. 2, which he gave a straight, finely-detailed if unsurprising performance.

About ten minutes into the Berlioz songs, Davis found it necessary to admonish the particularly noisy audience flipping the pages of the program book in order to read the the texes.

Since he brought up the subject, I'd like to add that audiences during the past two concerts I've attended were atrocious. It's the same old kind of disturbance too, jangling charm bracelets, whispers and crackling cellophane candy wrappers, The last are the worst of all, especially when offenders try to stifle the noise by unwrapping slowly. It's just as noisy and even more lengthy and irritating a process. It always seems to happen during slow movements and no amount of nasty looks will shame offenders into silence. Audiences ought to be forced to surrender all potential noise makers at the door.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885
OCT 28 1972
New England Newsclip

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
D. 480,233 SAT. 450,227
OCT 31 1972

The Boston Symphony

Magnificence for Ozawa

By Robert Commanday
Chronicle Music Critic

Boston

Saturday night, I was wishing that the San Francisco Symphony audience could share in hearing the Boston Symphony, and not only because it was an exceptional program exceptionally well performed.

It was illuminating and provocative to hear the thoroughly beautiful instrument which will next year become Seiji Ozawa's other major responsibility.

(In the interim he serves as musical adviser, with Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas as principal guest conductors.)

In view of San Francisco's long-range plan to build some sort of auditorium for its orchestra, it was also instructive again to hear the BSO in its classic single-purpose Symphony Hall. The orchestra's tone blooms in the hall in direct and personal ways that cannot happen in an opera theater.

INNATE

In contrast to the BSO sound under Erich Leinsdorf and William Steinberg, the music flowed smooth and natural with Colin Davis on the podium. Davis never imposes a highly personal conducting manner, never impresses himself on the details otherwise. In consequence, the players are encouraged to follow their innate musicianship, which is first class, deep into the BSO ranks.

CONDUCTOR COLIN DAVIS
The music flowed smooth, natural

Freed from pressure or restraints, the strings play with a soft, unified luster and perfection of ensemble.

There is also a sheen to the tone, and possible intensity which was not, however, much called for by Davis. The cellos have a particularly round, warm tone, as if from a single baritone voice of rich quality. The balance with the winds and their performance was elegant.

Only the brasses tend to be a little too bright and, apart from this tonal picture, following an old BSO style set by the trumpeter Roger Voisin.

The program featured Berlioz' "Nuits d'Ete," with the incomparable mezzo soprano, Janet Baker, as interpreter extraordinaire. San Francisco knows her distinctive way with this song cycle and will experience it again during the coming season. This time, she was, if anything, more inspired.

INTENSITY

She reached into the delicate, elusive poesy, illuminating a thousand shades of intensity. The delicacy of feeling, whether in moods of ecstasy, longing, sweet mourning or wistful love-dreaming, were inescapably penetrating, because Miss Baker defined them with such exquisite involvement.

Her voice was radiant and Davis' treatment of the fine Berlioz palette was subtlety itself. He is one of the major Berlioz interpreters, and proved it here once again.

Berlioz' early "Les Francs—Juges" overture, is not deep, but prophetic in its brilliant theatricality, and Davis brought out this character incisively.

With Beethoven's second symphony, the BSO demonstrated as Davis developed it — Beethoven was light, transparent and joyous, with a particular singing grace and intimate charm in the larghetto. It was chamber music perfection extended to the symphonic scale.

There is no question but that the Boston Symphony can be as great as its conductor and that Ozawa has succeeded to the podium of an orchestra which is still magnificent.

24.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885

OCT 27 1972

New England Newsclip

Chamber Players Wow Colombia

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players recently returned from a week's concert tour of Colombia, South America where, as part of the Partnership of the Americas program, they encountered some incredible audiences.

"Five thousand people jammed into the Cathedral at Medellin," recalled Joseph Silverstein, BSO concert master, "and over half of them stood throughout the concert. At the end, they set a new precedent by applauding in the cathedral. We were taken very much by surprise by that.

We also had some nice contacts with students in informal master classes in Bogota where the entire orchestra turned out to see us."

Under the Partnership, the Antioquia state and Massachusetts are sister states and the former has a very impressive cultural program including a large music festival. Apparently the people's love of music and musicians is great enough to overcome the anti-Americanism often displayed in South American countries.

"There was not a trace of hostility," Silverstein said. "Even at the master classes which were held at American cultural centers, no one showed any reluctance to come to the centers and our reception was very warm and pleasant."

Ironically, the Chamber Players often do not encounter the same kind of warm reception in Boston, at least not by all critics all the time. And reviews have occasionally suggested that the players, composed of principals from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are under-rehearsed and sight-read their way through the chamber concerts.

"That's a lot of nonsense," Silverstein said, "and you know it. We're very serious, professional musicians and outside of Boston we're considered the best group of our kind. When we go other places we're very sought after even though we are orchestra musicians.

"We've never taken a performance on stage where we felt we were desperately short of rehearsal time.

"We were berated when we performed the Webern String Trio for playing from the score. If the critic had been really careful he would have known that the music is only printed that way. For that little 10 minutes piece we put in maybe 30 to 40 hours of rehearsal. For the Messiaen Quartet for the End of Time, we rehearsed 25 hours.

"We don't take our responsibility lightly. Then the critics will review students we coach and say how fantastic their performance is. We just get a little resentful when people say we take a cavalier attitude," Silverstein continued.

"Let me tell you about another incident," he said and told of Jerry Berlin, the Civil Liberties Union lawyer and amateur clarinetist, who performed with the Chamber Players in a CLUM benefit several years ago. "He was expecting two run-throughs with the group." Instead he had a lot of rehearsals "and some of the players would stay afterwards with him to give individual help."

The willingness to rehearse shown by the Chamber Players is characteristic of the BSO as a whole, according to Silverstein. "Most guest conductors are surprised to find after every rehearsal three or four hands will go up with the request, 'Maestro, can we do this section over.' We have a reputation for wanting to rehearse and play well. Our attitude is known as being warm and eager to please.

"For a long time the orchestra has been trying to get Eugene Ormandy to conduct and finally he came last summer. For years, it was too difficult for him to come, now he's dying to come back."

BSO rehearsals, private teaching, and solo performances make rehearsing with the Chamber Players quite difficult and leaves the performers with very little leisure time. "Take, for example, tomorrow. It's supposed to be a free day," said Silverstein referring to a Wednesday. "At 10:30 a.m. we'll begin on the Boykan," a world premiere by Brandeis composer Martin Boykan which Players perform at their opening concert of the season, Nov. 12. "We'll start on the Brahms (Quintet in B-minor for Clarinet and Strings at noon.

"We should be finished by three and then I have to fly to Syracuse where I'm playing the Mendelssohn Concerto that night."

The Chamber Players is not just "a boondoggle, a chance to pick up some extra bread," Silverstein commented. "In fact, the money is just not commensurate with all the effort. There has to be some reward beyond just the business of playing a concert. All the people in the group have had extensive chamber music experience and that's a part of their musical life they don't want to lose."

As for repertory, Silverstein feels the Chamber Players have nothing to be ashamed about either. Going by his figures, in fact, the group has an admirable record for performing 20th century music and especially works by composers in the area.

"To learn a piece like the Boykan is quite an expenditure of effort in mid-season. It's tough to sandwich in the commitment to the piece and to the composers of the area.

"To say we are ill-prepared is unfair in our case," Silverstein said. "But, face it, anything that emanates from Symphony Hall is fair game. We're the establishment and, therefore, sitting ducks. But we resent that our integrity is impugned.

"To say we are ill-prepared is a bum rap. It's so absurd a charge that it doesn't deserve a rebuttal."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
LAW JOURNAL
D. 3,000

OCT 31 1972

Brooklyn Bar Sponsors Centennial Concert

PAGE ONE

The Brooklyn Bar Association, as part of the fall program of its centennial-year celebration, has arranged a centennial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music at 8:30 P.M. Thursday.

The symphony orchestra will be conducted by Colin Davis in a program of Wagner, Beethoven and Brahms. Tickets are $6.95 each.

Information is available from Bernadette Dolan, chairman of the centennial concert committee, 624-0675.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

OCT 25 1972

Boston Symphony in B'klyn

The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences will sponsor a series of three Thursday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Nov. 2, Feb. 8 and March 29 at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Colin Davis, James Levine and Lorin Maazel will be the conductors, respectively. For ticket information, call 638-5159.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

OCT 14 1972

* * *

The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences will sponsor a series of three Thursday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concerts will take place on Nov. 2, Feb. 8 and March 29.

For ticket information, call the Brooklyn Institute, 638-5159.

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 3,221,549

OCT 22 1972

Boston Orch To Play Here

A series of three evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be staged in Brooklyn during the fall and winter months under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

All concerts will be held on Thursday nights with discount subscriptions for senior citizens and students.

The first concert, on Nov. 2, will feature selections from Wagner, Beethoven and Brahms with Colin Davis conducting. James Levine will wield the baton Feb. 8th, with selections by Mozart and Mahler. The concluding concert on March 29 features numbers by Barber, Prokofiev and Sibelius with Lorin Maazel conducting.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797
NOV 2 1972

Words & Music

HARRIETT JOHNSON

Davis Leads Baker in Berlioz

Colin Davis is a conductor who is more concerned with big effects than less apparent subtleties. He opened the Boston Symphony's five-event Philharmonic Hall series last night with Berlioz's Overture to "Les francs-juges," and opera whose "cast of thousands" was dramatized by the ear-splitting volume that he caused to storm through the hall.

Davis, music director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, and together with Michael Tilson Thomas, a principal guest conductor for the Bostonians, conducts with healthy vigor and the results he gets are healthily athletic and not without nuance, but missing in imagination and instrumental color.

His British colleague, mezzo-soprano soloist, Janet Baker, was the soloist in the Berlioz cycle, "Nuits d'ete, Op. 7," six songs to poems by Theophile Gautier, which followed the composer's overture.

Personal Music

As a man who was obsessed by love, Berlioz created some of his most personal and haunting music in these songs done with insight and exquisite taste by Miss Baker. Each of the six, the best known of which is "L'Absence," is with one exception involved with tragic love.

Since I last heard Miss Baker in French songs, she has moved much closer to the core of French style and coloring. Her enunciation is sharper, and her voice, which has always in my experience been beautiful and untrammeled, has more of the pungent, lyrical, slightly nasal timbre which the French language, if properly enunciated, inspires.

Throughout the cycle she was absorbingly expressive. In "Le Spectre de la Rose," her voice became a sliver at the end of the phrase, "Des pleurs d'argent de l'arrosoir." One somehow caught immediately the feeling of the rose sprinkled by pearled, silvery tears. Her passionate outbursts on the other hand in each repetition of "Ah'," during "Sur les Lagunes," a lament for a beloved, lost friend, were the quintessence of vocal exuberance.

While he couldn't be faulted in the letter of his collaboration, Davis and orchestra missed much in projecting the moods of these songs. Essentially he is not a tone-colorist. A robust man, his interpretations are robust too, honest and straightforward. So it was with the Symphony No. 2 by Beethoven, which closed the program.

The next program in the Bostonians' series will be Nov. 29 when William Steinberg will lead Mahler's Symphony No. 2 in C Minor, the "Resurrection," with soprano Benita Valente and contralto Beverly Wolff as

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 66,825 SUN. 65,718
NOV 6 1972

Conductor, composer both share plaudits

By BYRON BELT

Colin Davis, the gifted British conductor who is assuming the jumpy podium mannerisms of a Bernstein, over-conducted Saturday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall. The players smiled a great deal at the foolish antics, but they played a glowing Brahms Third symphony, a melodramic Beethoven "Coriolan" overture, and accompanied pianist Jerome Lowenthal in the same composer's delightful Second Piano Concerto.

Davis is too gifted to dilute his talents with a pretty blatant attempt to become a super-star maestro, but the audience which jammed the hall ate it up and cheered conductor and the magnificent orchestra to the skies.

There were cheers too, for Jerome Lowenthal's rather prosaic, hardtoned and sentimentally phrased performance of the keyboard concerto. Only in the first movement cadenza was there real style in conception and execution.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549
NOV 6 1972

Ostrovsky and Moerschel Shine in Joint Recital

Fred Ostrovsky and Joel Moerschel, members of the Boston Symphony violin and cello sections respectively, took advantage of the orchestra's current New York visit to give a joint recital in Carnegie Recital Hall Saturday afternoon.

Since there is precious little music written for this particular combination of instruments, Messrs. Ostrovsky and Moerschel gave just about the only program they could: the duos by Kodály and Martinu and Ravel's Sonata. Thanks to the stylistic dissimiliarities of these three craftily executed pieces, there was never a suggestion of the aural fatigue that one might expect from so limited a medium.

The excellent performances also deserved rapt attention. Both men played with all the committed involvement of orchestral musicians delighted to be on their own, balanced by the kind of precision teamwork that comes from years of symphonic experience. The interpretations were uniformly cultured and characterful with the Kodaly full of vigor and brio, the Martinu coolly limned and the Ravel a model of suave sophistication.

PETER G. DAVIS.

Middle-European Fare By the Boston Symphony

Solid, dependable middle-European fare was the order of the evening for the Boston Symphony's Carnegie Hall concert Saturday night: Beethven's Second Piano Concerto and "Coriolanus" Overture and the Brahms Third Symphony—hardly the thing for anyone in search of adventurous programing.

In Colin Davis's hands these well-tried classics received trim neatly organized and wholly civilized performances offering few revelations. At its best this was fine, honest music-making, although one might have hoped for a slightly less formal approach and an occasional point of view—even an outrageous one would be better than none at all

For the Concerto Mr. Davis properly reduced the ochestra to Mozartean proportions and together with soloist, Jerome Lowenthal, gave the piece a very precise, courtly reading. Mr. Lowenthal's poised pianism was beyond reproach, and he injected a welcome note of virile bravado into this happy work.

PETER G. DAVIS.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,129,901 SUN. 2,948,786
NOV 6 1972

Bostonians In Good Form

The Boston Symphony, which virtually took up residence here last week with three concerts in four days, proved once again Saturday night at Carnegie Hall what a fine addition it is to the musical scene in New York.

Colin Davis, who along with Michael Tilson Thomas is a principal guest conductor of the orchestra, led the group in forceful and spirited readings of Beethoven's Coriolanus Overture and Brahm's Third Symphony.

Jerome Lowenthal joined the orchestra as soloist in Beethoven's Second Piano Concerto to complete the program, which was the first in a series of four at Carnegie.

Beethoven, Brahms

Both the overture and the symphony were played with the proper robustness and richness. The Brahms work particularly was performed with great expressiveness; the third is a far more delicate piece than Brahms' earlier symphonies, and Davis conducted it with admirable sensitivity and restraint.

Lowenthal's performance of the Beethoven concerto was precise and poised but lacked warmth and feeling.

—Steven Matthews

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,129,901 SUN. 2,948,786
NOV 3 1972

Baker in a Fine Debut

By STEVEN MATTHEWS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and mezzo-soprano Janet Baker warmed a damp and chilly evening Wednesday with a lovely performance of Berlioz's "Nuits d'ete" at Philharmonic Hall.

It was Miss Baker's debut with the orchestra as well as the opening of the group's New York season and it was an auspicious event for all. The audience was obviously pleased and the musicians responded enthusiastically to Miss Baker's singing.

"Nuits d'ete" is an arrangement of six love poems by Theophile Gautier. It is more a piece for voice than orchestra, and Miss Baker was easily equal to its elegance; the orchestra provided a fine accompaniment.

The other works on the program, Berlioz's Overture to "Les francs-juges" and Beethoven's Second Symphony, provided a far greater chance for the musicians.

Out of the Trunk

The overture, written for a never-completed opera about a medieval German court, is as classic in theme as it is romantic. The orchestra handled its darting, singing melody with great feeling and exactness.

In the Beethoven, neither a slightly slow first movement nor a bobbled trumpet entrance in the scherzo, detracted greatly from the over-all performance. The Second represents the first blossoming of Beethoven's symphonic genius, and the orchestra articulated it superbly.

Colin Davis, one of the Boston Symphony's two principal guest conductors, led the group with precision. He is not the most passionate of conductors, but he was both powerful and delicate when needed, and the orchestra responded in kind.

The program will be repeated tonight.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549
NOV 8 1972
New England Newsclip

Music: A British Star

Janet Baker Impressive in Her Singing of Berlioz With the Bostonians

By DONAL HENAHAN

The difference between impressive vocalism and impressive singing, so often overlooked in times that put more emphasis on brawn than brain, was demonstrated fully at Philharmonic Hall Wednesday night. Janet Baker, Britain's most valuable feminine contribution to the lower voice categories since Kathleen Ferrier, took up Berlioz's song cycle, "Nuits d'été," with the complete sympathy and support of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Colin Davis.

Miss Baker, a mezzo-soprano of rare cultivation, vocalized the Berlioz extremely well, but beyond that she sang it with intelligence and affecting artistry, passing up every opportunity to display her own gifts at the expense of Berlioz's score.

Others certainly have discovered more obvious kinds of drama in "Nuits d'été." In fact, there were times when one felt that a more abandoned interpretation would not have been out of place. The opening "Villanelle" itself, for instance, seemed somewhat too matter-of-fact, and "L'Absence" lacked the ecstatic outpouring that other singers have given it, as well as the emotional extravagance that seems so much a part of any Berlioz. But Miss Baker made up for that by bringing out a strangely pathetic and moving aspect to these songs.

Mr. Davis, conducting the Bostonians with such sensitivity that one heard the singer's every note, matched her perfectly in restraint and care for musical detail. Miss Baker's intonation even in those difficult places where the orchestra follows the singer instead of leading her could not have been more dead on-center, and at times her ability to color a tone like a great instrumentalist allowed her to achieve blendings that would have charmed the ear of Berlioz, that master of orchestration.

Beethoven's Symphony No. 2, in a poised and carefully articulated reading, and a robust performance of Berlioz's "Les francs-juges" Overture filled out the program.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500
NOV. 9 1972
New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BERLIOZ'S "NUITS D'ETE"

Meditating far back over the years, Theophile Gautier in his "Histoire du romantisme" adjudged Hector Berlioz as filled with "...depth of passion, amorous or melancholy dreaminess, longings and questionings of the soul, infinite and mysterious sentiments not to be rendered in words and that something more than a we which escapes language but may be divined in music."

A fair enough judgment, and there exists no better epitomization of it than "Nuits de'ete," a cycle of six songs that the composer set to poems of Gautier himself. Berlioz commenced upon the composition in 1834 and did not complete the orchestration of the full cycle until 1856 — a period that embodied the greater part of his creative output. The "Nuits" represents, though, all that is best in Berlioz, unshackled from grandiosity, artificiality and stammering. If you think of the best passages, say, in "La Damnation de Faust," "Romeo et Juliette," "L'Enfance de Christ" and the "Requiem," you get some idea of the economy of means, the transparence and the poignancy that runs through every bar.

The cycle is archtypical of that consummate form of musical expression, the French art song. And like many towering prototypes it has never been surpassed if equalled by its successors. But unlike such prototypes, a performance of the "Nuits" is a rarity. Thus the advent of the eminent British artists, the mezzo - soprano Janet Baker and the conductor Colin Davis, who joined the orchestra here last weekend, was only the second occasion of its rendering at the subscription concerts in BSO history.

The occasion will not soon be forgotten by the lucky ones who heard it. Miss Baker, making her initial appearance with the Symphony, showed herself in every way worthy of the formidable reputation that has preceded her. Her voice covers a wide range with astonishing expressive power and richness of timbre. The moods of the songs runs from the melancholy to the haunting and to the jocose, and the requisite stage presence and dramatic statement stood always in easy abundance.

As for Colin Davis, his way with Berlioz is by now one of the legends of contemporary music making, and he collaborated in inspiring the players to spin a wonderful orchestral filigree out of the richly inflected score. After the second song, he stopped the proceedings, turned to the audience and chided them for their rustling of the programs. Admonishing them to listen and return home before reading the texts of the poems, he added either, "It might be a long time before you have the opportunity to hear such beautiful music again," or, "It might be a long time before you hear this music so beautifully done." Which ever way it was put, he was dead right.

The program opened with one of Berlioz's earlier works, "Les francs-juges" overture, a museum piece that deserves a fate better than it has enjoyed. Audiences in this country for some reason have never cottoned to Berlioz's overtures, and so much the worse for the audiences. As this reading demonstrated, the "Francs-juges" has ever so much zing and zest amid the pompier. Some Friday afternoon trombone trouble to the contrary, the traversal was passing fine.

Mr. Davis concludeds the concert with a performance of Beethoven's Second Symphony which was notable for its buoyancy and vivacity — a proper ending to a characteristically pleasing guest fortnight's visit here. He will be back in February for two additional weeks.

This weekend the orchestra is on tour. It returns next weekend when the guest conductor will be Daniel Barenboim, who will do a program consisting of Haydn's Symphony No. 86 in D and Bruckner's Symphony No. 9 in D minor.

26.

Barenboim to conduct Symphony

BOSTON — Daniel Barenboim conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday November 9 at 8:30 p.m., Friday November 10 at 2:00 pm, Saturday November 11 at 8:30 pm and Tuesday November 14 at 8:30 pm in works of Haydn and Bruckner. Mr. Barenboim opens these concerts with Haydn's Symphony no. 86 in D and follows it with Bruckner's Ninth Symphony.

Daniel Barenboim conducted the Boston Symphony for the first time at the 1969 Berkshire Festival. Born in Bueonos Aires in 1942, he began piano studies at the age of five with his father and mother, both of whom were accomplished pianists, and gave his first recital at seven.

His mentors were, first Adolf Busch in Buenos Aires, then, when his family moved to Israel, Igor Markevitch, with whom he studied conducting.

Later he took lessons at Salzburg from Edwin Fischer and Enrico Mainardi Daniel Barenboim made his debut in London as a pianist in 1956, playing a Mozart concerto with the Royal Philharmonic and Josef Krips, and giving a solo recital. The following year he played for the first time in the United States with the Symphony of the Air directed by Leopold Stokowski. Since that time he has become one of the world's most widely traveled musicians.

He has played throughout the five continents, and since 1966 has also worked extensively as a conductor with many orchestras, among them the English Chamber Orchestra, the Israel Philharmonic, the New Philharmonia, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Los Angeles Philharmonic and the New York Philharmonic.

This season Daniel Barenboim appears as soloist with leading American orchestras, and gives recitals in San Francisco, Atlanta, Miami, Boston and in other major cities.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514
NOV 8 1972
New England Newsclip

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043
NOV 8 1972
New England Newsclip

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,[illegible]
NOV 14 1972
New England Newsclip

Barenboim as 'compleat musician'

He conducts BSO, and plays solo Chopin recital

By Louis Snyder

The persuasively talented hands of Daniel Barenboim are making a lot of music in and around Boston these days. Last week, beginning Thursday evening, he conducted the first of two programs with the Boston Symphony — four concerts (there remains one tonight at Symphony Hall, one in Providence on Thursday) — and on Sunday afternoon he appeared as a solo pianist in an all-Chopin recital at Symphony Hall. Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, he'll complete the second half of his Boston debut with the BSO, after a first conducting stint with the orchestra at Tanglewood in 1969.

Boston is not unacquainted with the rise of Mr. Barenboim in the musical firmament. At the age of 15 (to the alarm of some critics and the amazement of the public), he pinch-hit for a well known pianist at Jordan Hall with a taxing Beethoven sonata program. In the intervening 12 years his progress has inevitably been followed with considerable interest.

A visitor from Outer Appreciasia to either his performance as a conductor or a solo pianist wouldn't need much prompting to realize that here is a "compleat" musician. Like the Angler, he faces a score with an admixture of admiration and a will to conquer. That a musicianly intelligence directs his hands has been evident in these recent manifestations.

The BSO program was divided in two — Haydn's Symphony No. 86 in D, and Bruckner's Symphony No. 9 in D minor. The same Haydn, given a strangely limp performance earlier in the week in Cambridge by the Cappella Coloniensis under Gunther Wich's direction, became forthright and alive under Mr. Barenboim's baton. For one thing he made use of forces Haydn would have envied — no textbook daintification of "composer's intentions" — with the result that this delectable Paris symphony sang out crisp, classic, and clear.

Bruckner Ninth is the product of a man at once simple and complex, and for all but deep

Daniel Barenboim

Brucknerites, it shows it. The symphony, as history reinforced by program notes tells us, is the final supreme effort of a humble composer, almost equally imbued in religion and musical notation. Its extended, rather unlaced, solemn passages are weighted down with the most portentous speculation, its jaunty Scherzo perhaps less easily explained. In any case, there is a lot of it, with themes and good intentions going this way and that, not always with direction specified or ends achieved, but somehow cathedral-like in its abstract grandeur. You can either take it very seriously or just take it.

Is there a right and only way to do this Ninth? It would seem not, but certainly it is the conductor's task to hold it together and present it in an organized, palpable form, with all the springs of heavenly aspiration tucked neatly and reverently in place. Mr. Barenboim, with a minimum of gesticulation and an almost complete absence of sentimental drool, managed it admirably, with the help of a corps of responsive, sonorous musicians.

Alone on Symphony Hall's stage on Sunday afternoon with a piano and Chopin, Mr. Barenboim was still a non-violent David facing an illusory Goliath. To say that, from the first notes of the F minor Fantasie, his playing was solid doesn't sound like much of a compliment unless one confirms it by recalling that the recital ended with an equally sure-fingered A-flat major Polonaise. Nowhere in between was there a hint of pressure, misconception, or uncomprehension of the pieces at hand. The playing was clean, the tempos logical, the interpretations tender, but decided.

Most of the selections were familiar and well tried: the B-flat minor Sonata ("Funeral March"), the melting Berceuse (Op. 57), a lilting Barcarolle (F-sharp major, Op. 60), and of course the A-flat major Polonaise to which Mr. Barenboim brought the flinty spark of youth. To begin the second half, he played the Polonaise-Fantaisie in A-flat major (Op. 61), not so well known to some but fascinating in its continuous wash of moods and rhythms.

At the end, three encores — all Chopin — were asked and graciously given. And the audience departed — not electrified, it wasn't that kind of concert — but deeply satisfied by exposure to a masterly technique and unobtrusive musical penetration coming to glorious grips with the giant among pianistic composers.

ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
CITIZEN ITEM
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 8,900
NOV 9 1972
New England Newsclip

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 10,200
NOV 9 1972
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Programs Listed

BOSTON — Daniel Barenboim conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday Nov. 9 at 8:30 p.m. Friday Nov. 10 at 2 p.m. Saturday Nov. 11 at 8:30 p.m. and Tuesday Nov. 14 at 8:30 p.m. in works of Haydn and Bruckmer. Mr. Barenboim opens these concerts with Haydn's Symphony no. 86 in D and follows it with Bruckmer's Ninth Symphony.

Daniel Barenboim conducted the Boston Symphony for the first time at the 1969 Berkshire Festival.

Born in Buenos Aires in 1942, he began piano studies at the age of five with his father and mother, both of whom were accomplisehd pianists, and gave his first recital at seven.

His mentors were, first Adolf Busch in Buenos Aires, then, when his family moved to Israel, Igor Markevitch, with whom he studied conducting.

NEWS
MALDEN, MASS.
D. 12,420
NOV 2 1972
New England Newsclip

MERCURY
MEDFORD, MASS.
D. 045
NOV 2 1972
New England Newsclip

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 251,012 SUN. 662,277
NOV 10 1972
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Orchestra — Symphony Hall, Nov. 10 at 2 p.m., Nov. 11 at 8:30; Daniel Barenboim conducting Haydn's Symphony No. 86 in D, and Bruckner's Symphony No. 9 in D-Minor.

SOUTH MIDDLESEX DAILY NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MA.
D. 24,000
NOV 3 1972
New England Newsclip

To conduct BSO

BOSTON — Daniel Barenboim will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thursday, Nov 9 at 8 30 p m , Friday, Nov. 10 at 2 p m , Saturday, Nov. 11 at 8 30 p m., Tuesday Nov. 14 at 8 30 p m. in works of Haydn and Bruckner.

Barenboim opens these concerts with Haydn's Symphony No. 86 in D and follows it with Bruckner's Ninth Symphony.

Symphony to play tonight

Daniel Barenboim conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday Nov. 9 at 8:30 p.m., Friday Nov. 10 at 2 p.m., Saturday Nov. 11 at 8:30 p.m. and Tuesday Nov. 14 at 8:30 p. m. in works of Haydn and Bruckner. Mr. Barenboim opens these concerts with Haydn's Symphony no. 86 in D and follows it with Bruckner's Ninth Symphony.

Daniel Barenboim conducted the Boston Symphony for the first time at the 1969 Berkshire Festival. He has played throughout five continents, and since 1966 has also worked extensively as a conductor with many orchestras, among them the English Chamber Orchestra, the Israel Philharmonic, the New Philharmonia, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Los Angeles Philharmonic and the New York Philharmonic.

This season Daniel Barenboim appears as soloist with leading American orchestras, and gives recitals in San Francisco, Atlanta, Miami, Boston and in other major cities. Mr. Barenboim's recordings are on the Angel, CBS and Deutsche Grammophon labels.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885

NOV 18 1972 New England Newsclip

At BSO Concert

Conducting Problems

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

Watching Daniel Barenboim conduct these last two weeks with the Boston Sympony Orchestra has confirmed an impression I've had of him for several years — he is really uneasy with any music that isnt' concerned with obvious emotional content and large scale gesture.

Of the composers he has conducted here (or in Tanglewood) he has been far more successful with Tchaikovosky, Bruckner, Elgar and early Stravinsky than with Haydn, for example, or middle Stravinsky.

Yesterday's concert was a fairly telling illustration. The program included Elgar's Funeral March from "Grania and Diarmid" and his wonderful "Falstaff" symphonic study; Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra and the "Firebird" Suite.

"Falstaff," although rarely played, is a wonderful work, highly programmatic and closely based on the Shakespearean episodes in "Henry the Fourth," Parts I and II, which deal with the corpulent, luxurious knight.

Scored for large orchestra, it has a rich variety of themes, associated with Sir John and Prince Hal (the former has a particularly appropriate motif which in its bumpy rise and fall of intervals perfectly describes Hal's boon companion); tremendous wit and a good deal of sympathy (so that the Falstaff does not give way to caricature); some lovely depictions of the English country side; and an independent architectural strength that holds the work together regardless of programmatic explanations.

The Funeral March, taken from Elgar's incidental music to W. B. Yeats and George Moore's play, "Grania and Diarmid," proved also to be an attractive piece of solemn and noble mood although probably not obvious enough melodically to make it a staple for state occasions as Elgar predicted.

Both these works and the "Firebird" which closed the concert proved basically congenial to Barenboim's temperament and thus received rather good performances. There were some problems about the "Falstaff" which proceeded from the too-fast tempi which Barenboim selected initially—things like rhythmic details that were not cleanly articulated. Also, the dynamic scale seemed too limited and I wished several times that Barenboim would let go a little more.

However, things went well for the most part and the orchestra played beautifully — especially the solos of Joseph Silverstein and Harold Wright (Silverstein recently told me that on hearing Wright play the first time, he thought, "He's invented an entirely new instrument." And certainly the sound he produces is beautiful in a way few other instrumentalists achieve.)

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885

NOV 11 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO Performs Haydn, Bruckner

Performance Below Standard

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

Maybe it was because they were performing for the second time that day and the third time in 24 hours, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra players just don't seem up to their recent standard of performance at yesterday afternoon's concert in Symphony Hall.

It perhaps had something to do, too, with conductor Daniel Barenboim who is rather over-extended, himself, with a solo recital Sunday afternoon in addition to a two-week conducting stint with the orchestra. He seemed, at any rate, to have very little understanding about the Haydn Symphony No. 86 and not much more passion in his response to Bruckner's Symphony No. 9.

The Haydn sounded very much different in this performance than in the one by the Cappella Coloniensis last Monday night. The sound was larger and, in its use of modern instruments (the

• Concert Review

Cologne group uses stringed instruments with gut strings and older forms of winds and brass) more conventional although not nearly so interesting and delicate.

But more basic to the problem, the BSO's performance under Barenboim lacked graciousness and vivacity. The allegros were over-accented on the strong beats producing a choppiness that untimately resulted in monotony. And the slow sections, particularly the Capriccio, were mannered and curiously disjointed, never achieving a flowing quality.

In the Bruckner (that tragic uncompleted work for which the aging composer prayed to have death postponed and on which he worked the day he died, the performance never really captured the longing, the solemnity, and the haunting quality really written into that score. Nor were those on-the-brink hamonies really explicated.

And, then, the orchestra was just not playing with what has become their usual polish — the strings sounded a little raw and not always square on pitch, the brass, too, were having some problems playing in tune, even the winds sounded not as refined as usual.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,012 SUN. 566,377

NOV 10 1972 New England Newsclip

Barenboim let Haydn pull surprises

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

What has happened with the Boston Symphony in the last several months is that playing beautifully has again become its habit. That was so most of the summer at Tanglewood, and this fall for Thomas, Steinberg, Silverstein and Davis the orchestra has sounded stunning week after week.

Therefore, first sensation at the concert conducted by Daniel Barenboim in Symphony Hall last night was shock at the coarse and ragged playing of Haydn's Symphony No. 86, which opened the program. The strings sounded edgy, although the most persistent problem was that things were simply not clean and together.

I have heard performances ably conducted by Barenboim, live with the English Chamber Orchestra, and various things on records. Last night, however, with conducting that seemed to go more for choreography descriptive of the music than for gestures calculated to help the orchestra play confidently, he was getting generally dismal results. To indulge, under the circumstances, in the grand-seigneural gesture of letting the orchestra tremble its way unconducted through a couple of pages of Haydn suggested that Barenboim was enormously more involved with the show he was offering than with the music played.

Not that he had much to say to Haydn anyway: the quick movements were straight but uninflected, the slow ones wandered vaguely from beat to beat. It has been said that the essence of Haydn's style was dramatic surprise at the moment, but surely it is not the performers who ought to be surprised.

Bruckner's 9th Symphony presumably had more rehearsal per minute of playing time than the Haydn. Ensemble, at least, was precarious only occasionally. On the other hand, in Bruckner's bigger scoring, which this orchestra can project so sumptuously, the playing went from merely coarse to out-and-out raucous.

From point of view of interpretation, Barenboim provided a choice between inattentive and fussy.

The program is repeated this afternoon at 2, and tomorrow nd Tuesday evening at 8:30.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514

NOV 15 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO schedules works by Elgar

BOSTON — Daniel Barenboim conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday November 17 at 2:00 p.m. and Saturday November 18 at 8:30 p.m. in works by Elgar and Stravinsky. Barenboim opens the concert with Elgar's funeral march from "Grania and Diarmid" and follows it with Elgar's "Falstaff" symphonic study. Barenboim will then conduct Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra and closes the concert with the Firebird Suite by Stravinsky.

Daniel Barenboim conducted the Boston Symphony for the first time at the 1969 Berkshire Festival. Born in Buenos Aires in 1942, he began piano studies at the age of five with his father and mother, both of whom were accomplished pianists, and gave his first recital at seven. His mentors were, first Adolf Busch in Buenos Aires, then, when his family moved to Israel, Igor Markevitch, with whom he studied conducting. Later he took lessons at Salzburg from Edwin Fischer and Enrico Mainardi.

Barenboim made his debut in London as a pianist in 1956, playing a Mozart concerto with the Royal Philharmonic and Josef Krips, and giving a solo recital. The following year he played for the first time in the United States with the Symphony of the Air directed by Leopold Stokowski. Since that time he has become one of the world's most widely traveled musicians. He has played throughout the five continents, and since 1966 has also worked extensively as a conductor with many orchestras.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

NOV 16 1972 New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BARENBOIM'S BRUCKNER . . .

Conventional wisdom has it that orchestras that are conducted by a series of guests in lieu of a full-time director soon go to seed. The players, so the argument runs, need an authority figure; the ensemble needs the imprint of its own uniqueness, and so on. By these lights the Boston Symphony's present season would be a candidate for disaster unremitting. Thomas, Steinberg, Silverstein, Davis and Barenboim before mid-November, and Bernstein, Jochum, Mazzel, Haitink and Ozawa yet to come.

As it stands, nevertheless, I cannot recall a time when the orchestra has been performing so consistently well as it has been doing these days. The great leap forward of the strings a few years back is now being matched in the woodwinds and brass and the consequent orchestral sound and esprit are unmistakeable.

When Daniel Barenboim arrived here last week for his first visit as a conductor, then, he had rather a lot going for him. Mr. Barenboim lost little time in displaying a talent well calculated to make the most of his opportunity. His vehicles—Haydn's Symphony No. 86 in D and Bruckner's Ninth – were more consistent with the wares of an old-time maestro from Central Europe than with a 31-year-old native of Argentina reared in Israel and artistically come of age in England.

But did that matter? No way. He dealt with the material as if he were twice his age and to the Viennese manner born. And what material. For a listener truly prepared to give himself over to the piece, a proper performance of Bruckner's D Minor Symphony can be an awesome experience. Never mind that the composer never lived to write its last movement. The unfinished Ninth is magnificently organized music whose organic growth from its materials unfolds into a nobly proportioned whole. The adagio, so achingly Bruckner's final statement, leads with an intensity of expressiveness onto planes of spirituality of a height and scope reserved for such summings up as, say, the last quartets of Beethoven or Schubert's "Winterreise" cycle.

There are many ways to interpret Bruckner and one needn't agree with the conductor's every tempo or his mediation among the innumerable climaxes. Indeed, I for one found myself at odds at a good many points in this performance, be it the clip at which the scherzo commenced, or the frequently ragged entrances of the heavy brass, or some sonoritiers that brayed more than they compelled. Yet the overall conception jelled; one felt that Mr. Barenboim (conducting, incidentally, without a score) knew exactly what he wanted and get it.

The Haydn symphony went quite swimmingly too. The striking themes, harmonic adventuresomeness, the swift changes in rhythm and texture coupled with sudden silences are all resolved into a beautifully unified whole. This is the quintessence of art-to-conceal-art classical writing, and heavens knows why the 86th seldom gets an airing. Mr. Barenboim showed a firm but easy hand, and the irrepressible score sparkled with an incisive lyricism.

For his second and last appearance this week he leads the orchestra in Elgar's Funeral March from "Grania and Diarmid" and "Falstaff" symphony, together with Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra and "Firebird Suite."

BSO CHAMBER PLAYERS

The Chamber Players played to a full house in the first of the Sunday afternoon series of three concerts last weekend at Sanders Theatre.

Now in their fourth season under the joint auspices of the Harvard Music Department and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the time, place and ambiance of these concerts make them reminiscent of that fine old New York City institution of bygone years, The New Friends of Music, with its programs in Town Hall. The opening program consisted of Beethoven's quintet for piano and strings, the first performance anywhere of Martin Boykan's Concerto for Thirteen Players and Brahms' clarinet quintet.

The Beethoven quintet in ordinary hands is pleasantly rough and ready, a cut above music for the troops. these first-desk players, though, for transcend ordinary hands, and the early Beethoven came out suave, perfect of pitch and remarkably precise in ensemble, in conjunction with Gilbert Kalish's strong yet refined piano work. Deutsche Grammophon could have taped the performance and sold it off on records without more ado.

Boykan's intricate new piece came off on one hearing as a skillfully derivative exercise in pointillism as handed down by Webern. The composer could have done well to ponder the Master's penchant for brevity though — the material here seemed to me to be insufficiently compelling in terms of sonorities, rhythmic innovations or structure to justify its fairly porlonged running time. The work must have posed performing difficulties, for Joseph Silverstein was there to conduct and had plenty of work on the podium.

The big work of the program was the Brahms' quintet, with Harold Wright, clarinetist. Surely the Clarinet Quintet, with its understated pathos and moments of biting passion, comes pretty close itself to being a final statement. As interpreted by the ensemble, the work came through as predominately elegiac, its emotional intensity subdued and with great emphasis on the tonal coloration. The intensity that lies very close beneath the surface was permitted to emerge only occasionally, as in the rhapsodic second section o fht slow movement and in the coda of the last movement, when the opening theme dramatically returns—one of the more poignant moments in chamber music literature.

Harold Wright is a consummate instrumentalist with stupefying control. Though he can do just about anything with a clarinet, he never flaunts his matchless gifts but always subordinates them the the greater food of the ensemble. The performance of all five players was effectively brought off and much deserving of the stomping applause that greeted the conclusion.

The second program is scheduled for Sunday, Fabruary, 4. Now is a good time to order a ticket while some are still available.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885

NOV 18 1972 New England Newsclip

At BSO Concert

Conducting Problems

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

Watching Daniel Barenboim conduct these last two weeks with the Boston Sympony Orchestra has confirmed an impression I've had of him for several years — he is really uneasy with any music that isnt' concerned with obvious emotional content and large scale gesture.

Of the composers he has conducted here (or in Tanglewood) he has been far more successful with Tchaikovosky, Bruckner, Elgar and early Stravinsky than with Haydn, for example, or middle Stravinsky.

Yesterday's concert was a fairly telling illustration. The program included Elgar's Funeral March from "Grania and Diarmid" and his wonderful "Falstaff" symphonic study; Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra and the "Firebird" Suite.

"Falstaff," although rarely played, is a wonderful work, highly programmatic and closely based on the Shakespearean episodes in "Henry the Fourth," Parts I and II, which deal with the corpulent, luxurious knight.

Scored for large orchestra, it has a rich variety of themes, associated with Sir John and Prince Hal (the former has a particularly appropriate motif which in its bumpy rise and fall of intervals perfectly describes Hal's boon companion); tremendous wit and a good deal of sympathy (so that the Falstaff does not give way to caricature); some lovely depictions of the English country side; and an independent architectural strength that holds the work together regardless of programmatic explanations.

The Funeral March, taken from Elgar's incidental music to W. B. Yeats and George Moore's play, "Grania and Diarmid," proved also to be an attractive piece of solemn and noble mood although probably not obvious enough melodically to make it a staple for state occasions as Elgar predicted.

Both these works and the "Firebird" which closed the concert proved basically congenial to Barenboim's temperament and thus received rather good performances. There were some problems about the "Falstaff" which proceeded from the too-fast tempi which Barenboim selected initially—things like rhythmic details that were not cleanly articulated. Also, the dynamic scale seemed too limited and I wished several times that Barenboim would let go a little more.

However, things went well for the most part and the orchestra played beautifully — especially the solos of Joseph Silverstein and Harold Wright (Silverstein recently told me that on hearing Wright play the first time, he thought, "He's invented an entirely new instrument." And certainly the sound he produces is beautiful in a way few other instrumentalists achieve.)

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885

NOV 11 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO Performs Haydn, Bruckner

Performance Below Standard

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

Maybe it was because they were performing for the second time that day and the third time in 24 hours, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra players just don't seem up to their recent standard of performance at yesterday afternoon's concert in Symphony Hall.

It perhaps had something to do, too, with conductor Daniel Barenboim who is rather over-extended, himself, with a solo recital Sunday afternoon in addition to a two-week conducting stint with the orchestra. He seemed, at any rate, to have very little understanding about the Haydn Symphony No. 86 and not much more passion in his response to Bruckner's Symphony No. 9.

The Haydn sounded very much different in this performance than in the one by the Cappella Coloniensis last Monday night. The sound was larger and, in its use of modern instruments (the

• Concert Review

Cologne group uses stringed instruments with gut strings and older forms of winds and brass) more conventional although not nearly so interesting and delicate.

But more basic to the problem, the BSO's performance under Barenboim lacked graciousness and vivacity. The allegros were over-accented on the strong beats producing a choppiness that untimately resulted in monotony. And the slow sections, particularly the Capriccio, were mannered and curiously disjointed, never achieving a flowing quality.

In the Bruckner (that tragic uncompleted work for which the aging composer prayed to have death postponed and on which he worked the day he died, the performance never really captured the longing, the solemnity, and the haunting quality really written into that score. Nor were those on-the-brink hamonies really explicated.

And, then, the orchestra was just not playing with what has become their usual polish — the strings sounded a little raw and not always square on pitch, the brass, too, were having some problems playing in tune, even the winds sounded not as refined as usual.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 281,672 SUN. 565,377

NOV 10 1972 New England Newsclip

Barenboim let Haydn pull surprises

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

What has happened with the Boston Symphony in the last several months is that playing beautifully has again become its habit. That was so most of the summer at Tanglewood, and this fall for Thomas, Steinberg, Silverstein and Davis the orchestra has sounded stunning week after week.

Therefore, first sensation at the concert conducted by Daniel Barenboim in Symphony Hall last night was shock at the coarse and ragged playing of Haydn's Symphony No. 86, which opened the program. The strings sounded edgy, although the most persistent problem was that things were simply not clean and together.

I have heard performances ably conducted by Barenboim, live with the English Chamber Orchestra, and various things on records. Last night, however, with conducting that seemed to go more for choreography descriptive of the music than for gestures calculated to help the orchestra play confidently, he was getting generally dismal results. To indulge, under the circumstances, in the grand-seigneural gesture of letting the orchestra tremble its way unconducted through a couple of pages of Haydn suggested that Barenboim was enormously more involved with the show he was offering than with the music played.

Not that he had much to say to Haydn anyway: the quick movements were straight but uninflected, the slow ones wandered vaguely from beat to beat. It has been said that the essence of Haydn's style was dramatic surprise at the moment, but surely it is not the performers who ought to be surprised.

Bruckner's 9th Symphony presumably had more rehearsal per minute of playing time than the Haydn. Ensemble, at least, was precarious only occasionally. On the other hand, in Bruckner's bigger scoring, which this orchestra can project so sumptuously, the playing went from merely coarse to out-and-out raucous.

From point of view of interpretation, Barenboim provided a choice between inattentive and fussy.

The program is repeated this afternoon at 2, and tomorrow nd Tuesday evening at 8:30.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514

NOV 15 1972 New England

BSO schedules works by Elgar

BOSTON — Daniel Barenboim conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday November 17 at 2:00 p.m. and Saturday November 18 at 8:30 p.m. in works by Elgar and Stravinsky. Barenboim opens the concert with Elgar's funeral march from "Grania and Diarmid" and follows it with Elgar's "Falstaff" symphonic study. Barenboim will then conduct Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra and closes the concert with the Firebird Suite by Stravinsky.

Daniel Barenboim conducted the Boston Symphony for the first time at the 1969 Berkshire Festival. Born in Buenos Aires in 1942, he began piano studies at the age of five with his father and mother, both of whom were accomplished pianists, and gave his first recital at seven. His mentors were, first Adolf Busch in Buenos Aires, then, when his family moved to Israel, Igor Markevitch, with whom he studied conducting. Later he took lessons at Salzburg from Edwin Fischer and Enrico Mainardi.

Barenboim made his debut in London as a pianist in 1956, playing a Mozart concerto with the Royal Philharmonic and Josef Krips, and giving a solo recital. The following year he played for the first time in the United States with the Symphony of the Air directed by Leopold Stokowski. Since that time he has become one of the world's most widely traveled musicians. He has played throughout the five continents, and since 1966 has also worked extensively as a conductor with many orchestras.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

NOV 16 1972 New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BARENBOIM'S BRUCKNER . . .

Conventional wisdom has it that orchestras that are conducted by a series of guests in lieu of a full-time director soon go to seed. The players, so the argument runs, need an authority figure; the ensemble needs the imprint of its own uniqueness, and so on. By these lights the Boston Symphony's present season would be a candidate for disaster unremitting. Thomas, Steinberg, Silverstein, Davis and Barenboim before mid-November, and Bernstein, Jochum, Mazzel, Haitink and Ozawa yet to come.

As it stands, nevertheless, I cannot recall a time when the orchestra has been performing so consistently well as it has been doing these days. The great leap forward of the strings a few years back is now being matched in the woodwinds and brass and the consequent orchestral sound and esprit are unmistakeable.

When Daniel Barenboim arrived here last week for his first visit as a conductor, then, he had rather a lot going for him. Mr. Barenboim lost little time in displaving a talent well calculated to make the most of his opportunity. His vehicles—Haydn's Symphony No. 86 in D and Bruckner's Ninth – were more consistent with the wares of an old-time maestro from Central Europe than with a 31-year-old native of Argentina reared in Israel and artistically come of age in England.

But did that matter? No way. He dealt with the material as if he were twice his age and to the Viennese manner born. And what material. For a listener truly prepared to give himself over to the piece, a proper performance of Bruckner's D Minor Symphony can be an awesome experience. Never mind that the composer never lived to write its last movement. The unfinished Ninth is magnificently organized music whose organic growth from its materials unfolds into a nobly proportioned whole. The adagio, so achingly Bruckner's final statement, leads with an intensity of expressiveness onto planes of spirituality of a height and scope reserved for such summings up as, say, the last quartets of Beethoven or Schubert's "Winterreise" cycle.

There are many ways to interpret Bruckner and one needn't agree with the conductor's every tempo or his mediation among the innumerable climaxes. Indeed, I for one found myself at odds at a good many points in this performance, be it the clip at which the scherzo commenced, or the frequently ragged entrances of the heavy brass, or some sonoritiers that brayed more than they compelled. Yet the overall conception jelled; one felt that Mr. Barenboim (conducting, incidentally, without a score) knew exactly what he wanted and get it.

The Haydn symphony went quite swimmingly too. The striking themes, harmonic adventuresomeness, the swift changes in rhythm and texture coupled with sudden silences are all resolved into a beautifully unified whole. This is the quintessence of art-to-conceal-art classical writing, and heavens knows why the 86th seldom gets an airing. Mr. Barenboim showed a firm but easy hand, and the irrepressible score sparkled with an incisive lyricism.

For his second and last appearance this week he leads the orchestra in Elgar's Funeral March from "Grania and Diarmid" and "Falstaff" symphony, together with Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra and "Firebird Suite."

BSO CHAMBER PLAYERS

The Chamber Players played to a full house in the first of the Sunday afternoon series of three concerts last weekend at Sanders Theatre.

Now in their fourth season under the joint auspices of the Harvard Music Department and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the time, place and ambiance of these concerts make them reminiscent of that fine old New York City institution of bygone years, The New Friends of Music, with its programs in Town Hall. The opening program consisted of Beethoven's quintet for piano and strings, the first performance anywhere of Martin Boykan's Concerto for Thirteen Players and Brahms' clarinet quintet.

The Beethoven quintet in ordinary hands is pleasantly rough and ready, a cut above music for the troops. these first-desk players, though, for transcend ordinary hands, and the early Beethoven came out suave, perfect of pitch and remarkably precise in ensemble, in conjunction with Gilbert Kalish's strong yet refined piano work. Deutsche Grammophon could have taped the performance and sold it off on records without more ado.

Boykan's intricate new piece came off on one hearing as a skillfully derivative exercise in pointillism as handed down by Webern. The composer could have done well to ponder the Master's penchant for brevity though — the material here seemed to me to be insufficiently compelling in terms of sonorities, rhythmic innovations or structure to justify its fairly porlonged running time. The work must have posed performing difficulties, for Joseph Silverstein was there to conduct and had plenty of work on the podium.

The big work of the program was the Brahms' quintet, with Harold Wright, clarinetist. Surely the Clarinet Quintet, with its understated pathos and moments of biting passion, comes pretty close itself to being a final statement. As interpreted by the ensemble, the work came through as predominately elegiac, its emotional intensity subdued and with great emphasis on the tonal coloration. The intensity that lies very close beneath the surface was permitted to emerge only occasionally, as in the rhapsodic second section o fht slow movement and in the coda of the last movement, when the opening theme dramatically returns—one of the more poignant moments in chamber music literature.

Harold Wright is a consummate instrumentalist with stupefying control. Though he can do just about anything with a clarinet, he never flaunts his matchless gifts but always subordinates them the the greater food of the ensemble. The performance of all five players was effectively brought off and much deserving of the stomping applause that greeted the conclusion.

The second program is scheduled for Sunday, Fabruary, 4. Now is a good time to order a ticket while some are still available.

28

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 10,200

NOV 16 1972 New England Newsclip

Barenboim to conduct Symphony

Daniel Barenboim will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday, Nov. 17 at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Nov. 18 at 8:30 p.m. in works by Elgar and Stravinsky.

Barenboim will open the concert with Elgar's "Falstaff" symphonic study. He will then conduct Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra and close the concert with the Firebird Suite by Stravinsky.

Barenboim conducted the Boston Symphony for the first time at the 1969 Berkshire Festival. Born in Buenos Aires in 1942, he began piano studies at the age of five with his father and mother, both of whom were accomplished pianists. He gave his first recital at seven.

Barenboim made his debut in London as a pianist in 1956, playing a Mozart concerto with the Royal Philharmonic and Josef Krips, and giving a solo recital. The following year he played for the first time in the United States with the Symphony of the Air directed by Leopold Stokowski. Since that time he has become one of the world's most widely traveled musicians. He has played throughout the five continents, and since 1966 has also worked extensively as a conductor with many orchestras, among them the English Chamber Orchestra, the Israel Philharmonic, the Philadelphia, the Los Angeles Philharmonic and the New York Philharmonic.

Thisseason Barenboim appears as soloist with leading American orchestras, and gives recitals in San Francisco, Atlanta, Miami, Providence, Boston, and other major cities. Barenboim's recordings are on the Angel, CBS and Deutsche Grammophon labels.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 67,117

NOV 17 1972 New England Newsclip

Music Last Night

Boston Symphony Brings More Elgar Works to R.I.

By EDWIN SAFFORD

More good programming and more Elgar. The Boston Symphony Orchestra brought with it last night to Veterans Memorial Auditorium Daniel Barenboim as conductor and he brought two works by the British composer, these following Elgar's violin concerto last month.

In company with Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra and the 1911 suite from "The Firebird," the Elgar pieces were the funeral march for "Grania and Diarmid" and the symphonic study, "Falstaff."

The Elgar revival thus continues apace. It is much welcomed. "Falstaff" is a marvelous piece, an abstraction from parts of Shakespeare's "King Henry IV" plays and from the rotund, loveable, frustrating, ill - mannered knight, Sir John Falstaff himself.

You hear him at the outset in his fat, spraddle-legged, jovial steps. Elgar, as in other scores, dwells fragmentarily on his musical themes but it is possible to conjure up fairly explicit scenes and characters — Doll Tearsheet, Pistol and Bardolff at the Boar's Head, for example.

The whole thing is vigorously human, truthful to its source in a way Verdi was, and ultimately moving. Those final measures really clutch the heart.

Barenboim led a performance containing plenty of snap. Perhaps he took the composer too much at his word by not allowing the surging fragments to have more spread. In total, however, his was a quite satisfactorily realized reading since it had a grasp both of the music and of the rich material on which it was based.

The funeral march, totally unfamiliar to one listener, was part of a set of incidental music to a play by W.B. Yeats and George Moore. An expected somber mood prevailed, unsurprisingly, with a typically Elgarian full orchestra. It was but a tantalizing sample of what the other two pieces in the set might be like.

In Stravinsky, Barenboim, who was not exactly stiff yet also not balletic in his conducting, seemed just as much at home. Furthermore, he got a pleasing warmth from the Boston strings.

There were a couple more in the Concerto than demanded. That did not spoil matters terribly, except perhaps for those who prefer their Stravinsky neo-classicism drier. And it certainly abetted "The Firebird".

Hearing the score played by such an orchestra spoils you for most experiences in the ballet theater where the pit sound is much thinner. Few ballet bands can achieve the big moment of Kaschei's infernal dance which Barenboim let blast right on top of the round of the princesses as Stokowski used to do.

The conductor, you must know, is a considerable pianist. He is developing a following as a podium man, too, and last night gave evidence why. He has room for development, but it will be based on firm technical ground.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

NOV 20 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO, Barenboim in 'dead march,' 'infernal dance'

By David Sterritt

Under the baton of young, brightly talented Daniel Barenboim, the Boston Symphony held to the 20th century in its latest program.

It was a successful outing: Elegance and exoticism were both movingly on hand, from the thunderous bass pizzicati of an Elgar "dead march" to the crashing climax of a Stravinsky "infernal dance."

The concert's Elgarian first half began with the Funeral March for "Grania and Diarmid," Op. 42, in its first performance by the BSO. Composed as incidental music for a play by W. B. Yeats and George Moore, this is a sweeping, almost epical work. Yeats praised its "heroic melancholy," a quality which pervades its calm, gentle conclusion as thoroughly as its comprehensive gamut of sad moods.

* * *

Mr. Barenboim plunged into the conducting of it, reaching for nuances and careful details with an energy that remained consistent throughout the Friday afternoon. Yet there was a feeling of some small disjointedness among the orchestral forces during the march. For all his obvious sympathy with the piece, Mr. Barenboim did not seem to feel quite the rapport here that was in evidence for the rest of the program.

Elgar's "Falstaff" symphonic study, Op. 68, fared very well, however, right from its slippery low-register opening theme. Many of Sir John's most humanly mysterious aspects are explored in this sophisticated portrait. Yet the composer often stresses a folksy humor, which remains lightly skittish even as it glimpses the ponderous inner sadness of its subject.

Sundry moodmaking elements mingle and succeed one another, from the delightful sardonicism of the solo bassoon, to the lyricism of the solo violin (handled with delicate sentimentality by concertmaster Joseph Silverstein). Mr. Barenboim allowed each atmospheric shade a world of play, with a special understanding of Elgar's occasional faint exoticisms, leading to the neat final touch of the sudden whispered ending.

* * *

The Stravinskian second half opened with the 1946 Concerto in D for string orchestra. Though this is not an immediately gripping work, the orchestra moved briskly into the jaunty Vivace, then retreated to an airy melodiousness in the central Arioso. And there was an effective urgency to the jabs that gain paramount importance during the stirring but sprightly Rondo conclusion.

The concert ended with the second-most-familiar Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu," that of 1911. Mr. Barenboim showed a firm command of each section's prevailing feel: the delicate spiciness of the Introduction's enchanted garden and dance. The self-conscious exoticism of "The firebird's entreaties." The playful, only faintly heavy "game of the princesses." The lyrical beauty of the "Round of the princesses," featuring marvelous woodwind work.

In a sure-fire audience-pleasing gambit, the orchestra held the round's final soft note with extraordinary control. And then launched into the final "Infernal dance" with a crashing vigor and dynamic pungency that nearly knocked its listeners out of their chairs. One could scarcely do better than to end a program with seminal Stravinsky at his most brashly energetic best. It was a happily exciting conclusion.

28

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 10,200

NOV 16 1972

New England Newsclip

Barenboim to conduct Symphony

Daniel Barenboim will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday, Nov. 17 at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Nov. 18 at 8:30 p.m. in works by Elgar and Stravinsky.

Barenboim will open the concert with Elgar's "Falstaff" symphonic study. He will then conduct Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra and close the concert with the Firebird Suite by Stravinsky.

Barenboim conducted the Boston Symphony for the first time at the 1969 Berkshire Festival. Born in Buenos Aires in 1942, he began piano studies at the age of five with his father and mother, both of whom were accomplished pianists. He gave his first recital at seven.

Barenboim made his debut in London as a pianist in 1956, playing a Mozart concerto with the Royal Philharmonic and Josef Krips, and giving a solo recital. The following year he played for the first time in the United States with the Symphony of the Air directed by Leopold Stokowski. Since that time he has become one of the world's most widely traveled musicians. He has played throughout the five continents, and since 1966 has also worked extensively as a conductor with many orchestras, among them the English Chamber Orchestra, the Israel Philharmonic, the Philadelphia, the Los Angeles Philharmonic and the New York Philharmonic.

Thisseason Barenboim appears as soloist with leading American orchestras, and gives recitals in San Francisco, Atlanta, Miami, Providence, Boston, and other major cities. Barenboim's recordings are on the Angel, CBS and Deutsche Grammophon labels.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 67,117

NOV 17 1972

New England Newsclip

Music Last Night

Boston Symphony Brings More Elgar Works to R.I.

By EDWIN SAFFORD

More good programming and more Elgar. The Boston Symphony Orchestra brought with it last night to Veterans Memorial Auditorium Daniel Barenboim as conductor and he brought two works by the British composer, these following Elgar's violin concerto last month.

In company with Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra and the 1911 suite from "The Firebird," the Elgar pieces were the funeral march for "Grania and Diarmid" and the symphonic study, "Falstaff."

The Elgar revival thus continues apace. It is much welcomed. "Falstaff" is a marvelous piece, an abstraction from parts of Shakespeare's "King Henry IV" plays and from the rotund, loveable, frustrating, ill - mannered knight, Sir John Falstaff himself.

You hear him at the outset in his fat, spraddle-legged, jovial steps. Elgar, as in other scores, dwells fragmentarily on his musical themes but it is possible to conjure up fairly explicit scenes and characters — Doll Tearsheet, Pistol and Bardolff at the Boar's Head, for example.

The whole thing is vigorously human, truthful to its source in a way Verdi was, and ultimately moving. Those final measures really clutch the heart.

Barenboim led a performance containing plenty of snap. Perhaps he took the composer too much at his word by not allowing the surging fragments to have more spread. In total, however, his was a quite satisfactorily realized reading since it had a grasp both of the music and of the rich material on which it was based.

The funeral march, totally unfamiliar to one listener, was part of a set of incidental music to a play by W.B. Yeats and George Moore. An expected somber mood prevailed, unsurprisingly, with a typically Elgarian full orchestra. It was but a tantalizing sample of what the other two pieces in the set might be like.

In Stravinsky, Barenboim, who was not exactly stiff yet also not balletic in his conducting, seemed just as much at home. Furthermore, he got a pleasing warmth from the Boston strings.

There were a couple more in the Concerto than demanded. That did not spoil matters terribly, except perhaps for those who prefer their Stravinsky neo-classicism drier. And it certainly abetted "The Firebird".

Hearing the score played by such an orchestra spoils you for most experiences in the ballet theater where the pit sound is much thinner. Few ballet bands can achieve the big moment of Kaschei's infernal dance which Barenboim let blast right on top of the round of the princesses as Stokowski used to do.

The conductor, you must know, is a considerable pianist. He is developing a following as a podium man, too, and last night gave evidence why. He has room for development, but it will be based on firm technical ground.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

NOV 20 1972

New England Newsclip

BSO, Barenboim in 'dead march,' 'infernal dance'

By David Sterritt

Under the baton of young, brightly talented Daniel Barenboim, the Boston Symphony held to the 20th century in its latest program.

It was a successful outing: Elegance and exoticism were both movingly on hand, from the thunderous bass pizzicati of an Elgar "dead march" to the crashing climax of a Stravinsky "infernal dance."

The concert's Elgarian first half began with the Funeral March for "Grania and Diarmid," Op. 42, in its first performance by the BSO. Composed as incidental music for a play by W. B. Yeats and George Moore, this is a sweeping, almost epical work. Yeats praised its "heroic melancholy," a quality which pervades its calm, gentle conclusion as thoroughly as its comprehensive gamut of sad moods.

* * *

Mr. Barenboim plunged into the conducting of it, reaching for nuances and careful details with an energy that remained consistent throughout the Friday afternoon. Yet there was a feeling of some small disjointedness among the orchestral forces during the march. For all his obvious sympathy with the piece, Mr. Barenboim did not seem to feel quite the rapport here that was in evidence for the rest of the program.

Elgar's "Falstaff" symphonic study, Op. 68, fared very well, however, right from its slippery low-register opening theme. Many of Sir John's most humanly mysterious aspects are explored in this sophisticated portrait. Yet the composer often stresses a folksy humor, which remains lightly skittish even as it glimpses the ponderous inner sadness of its subject.

Sundry moodmaking elements mingle and succeed one another, from the delightful sardonicism of the solo bassoon, to the lyricism of the solo violin (handled with delicate sentimentality by concertmaster Joseph Silverstein). Mr. Barenboim allowed each atmospheric shade a world of play, with a special understanding of Elgar's occasional faint exoticisms, leading to the neat final touch of the sudden whispered ending.

* * *

The Stravinskian second half opened with the 1946 Concerto in D for string orchestra. Though this is not an immediately gripping work, the orchestra moved briskly into the jaunty Vivace, then retreated to an airy melodiousness in the central Arioso. And there was an effective urgency to the jabs that gain paramount importance during the stirring but sprightly Rondo conclusion.

The concert ended with the second-most-familiar Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu," that of 1911. Mr. Barenboim showed a firm command of each section's prevailing feel: the delicate spiciness of the Introduction's enchanted garden and dance. The self-conscious exoticism of "The firebird's entreaties." The playful, only faintly heavy "game of the princesses." The lyrical beauty of the "Round of the princesses," featuring marvelous woodwind work.

In a sure-fire audience-pleasing gambit, the orchestra held the round's final soft note with extraordinary control. And then launched into the final "Infernal dance" with a crashing vigor and dynamic pungency that nearly knocked its listeners out of their chairs. One could scarcely do better than to end a program with seminal Stravinsky at his most brashly energetic best. It was a happily exciting conclusion.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 251,042 SUN. 365,877
NOV 15 1972
New England Newsclip

New work by Brandeis composer

Chamber Players in Boykan concerto

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players have just lent their attention, prestige, and drawing power to a new and difficult work by a non-brand-name composer. This was Martin Boykan's Concerto for Thirteen Players. Joseph Silverstein conducting, the Chamber Players gave the premiere at the first concert in their regular series Sunday afternoon in Sanders Theater, and repeated it Monday evening at the annual Irving Fine Memorial Concert in Slosberg Recital Hall, where Boykan teaches.

Boykan, in his late thirties, writes little, slowly, and carefully. The Concerto, finished last year, is a big piece, three movements, about 23 minutes (I was surprised when I timed it at the second hearing — I had thought shorter). The instrumentation: flute doubling piccolo, clarinet, bass clarinet, bassoon horn, trumpet, trombone, one each of bowed strings, harp, piano. No oboe, and the sonority in general tends toward the round, the compact, rather than toward the sharp-edged.

The second movement is the one you would instantly identify as from the world of concertos: it has a violin solo throughout (very well played by Max Hobart). The two movements on either side, the first quite slow, the last more scherzando in character, are in the Brandenburg-to-Webern chamber concerto tradition. Solo, concertino, and tutti roles shift all the time, but the central argument of the work is one of play of contrasting weights, textures, densities.

That comes out most clearly in the opposition of legato and staccato. There is a thread of sustained melody, passed from instrument to instrument and through all registers, and behind and around it a nervous fretwork of accompaniments, punctuations, and airspaces. It is clean, transparent, and, for all its nonstop and intense dissonance, it remains somehow very surveyable. In character it is soft-spoken and serious. Its rather muted wit grows out of Boykan's effective writing for the instruments (I am thinking of a detail like the surprising smoke spiral from the cello just before the end).

An estimable piece, and I wish it a better performance, bolder, freer to move. But I found the Chamber Players' other performances at these concerts equally unpersuasive. "My, wasn't that lovely?" said one Cambridge lady to another after the Brahms Clarinet Quintet? Well, in so far as the performance had made many sweet sounds and no others, yes. There were, of course, well-realized details, but what a lot of dropped stitches and missed opportunities, with so many mountains and hills made low, the crooked straight, and the rough places plain. But gentlemen, you were supposed to be playing a Brahms quintet not bucking for the Nobel Peace Prize!

At Brandeis, Irving Fine's amiable Partita for Wind Quintet got a lick and a promise. The other works on the two programs were the Brahms C minor Piano Quartet (Brandeis) and Beethoven's Quintet for piano and winds (Sanders).

UNION LEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
D. 21,008
NOV 16 1972
New England Newsclip

ARMANDO GHITALLA

Philharmonic Pops Concert Set for Sunday

This Sunday evening, Rolland Tapley of the Boston Symphony conducts the New Hampshire Philharmonic Orchestra in its first pre-season honest-to-goodness Pops Concert at the Sheraton-Wayfarer Convention Center in Bedford.

With a limited number of seats left, this "fun and fund raising" affair promises to be a SRO concert.

Featured guest artist is Armando Ghitalla, first trumpet of the Boston Symphony, as an added attraction, several members of the national company of "Godspell," currently playing at the Wilbur Theater in Boston, will present selections from that hit musical.

Jeffrey (who plays the "Christ" part) and his wife, Evelyn Weller, as well as Falko A. Schilling of Manchester, are the taltented young players from the cast who will make a guest appearance.

The NHPO Concert, a "Thanksgiving Pops Concert," promises to become an annual affair. At this time no complete tables are still available, although reservations for cancellations are being accepted.

Chairman of the Concert Committee is Falko M. Schilling.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549
NOV 8 1972

Music: A Young Violinist

Marylou Speaker, a young Boston Symphony violinist who appeared Monday night at Carnegie Recital Hall, made it clear in the course of her program that she is the kind of musician any orchestra would be lucky to have in its ranks. Miss Speaker, an Oregonian by birth, joined the B.S.O. two years ago, and has been a soloist with the Boston Pops. She plays in tune, with great facility and in unimpeachable taste.

•

Her major offering was the Prokofiev Concerto No. 1 in D, with Elizabeth Wright's piano accompanying in place of orchestra (a practice that used to be quite common in violin recitals but recently has been out of favor). Miss Speaker took a literal, fairly unimaginative approach to the music that led one to wonder whether she is by temperament the soloist type. But her technique and her musicianship were fully adequate to the job, which is saying a good deal.

Early in her program, Miss Speaker made minor errors, possibly attributable to nervousness, so that some effect was lost in both Wieniawski's Prelude (Op. 10, No. 6) and Paganini's Caprice No. 21 in A. But the staccato section in the Paganini was dazzlingly executed, and there was nice spray of impressionism thrown around Szymanowski's "La Fontaine d'Arethuse" by the violinist and her excellent pianist.

•

In Mozart's Adagio in E (K. 261), another orchestral piece, Miss Speaker played without much character, though accurately and intelligently. Schoenberg's "Phantasy" (Op. 47), a prickly problem from every angle, was similarly successful, though Miss Speaker discovered no more fantasy in the score than other violinists have.

DONAL HENAHAN.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 310,835
NOV 15 1972
New England Newsclip

Chamber Performance Proves 'Correct'

By DAVID SATZ

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, performing at Sanders Theatre this past Sunday, gave an instructive showing of what the upper echelons of professional music-making is about.

The concert began with the Beethoven quintet for piano and winds, Op. 16. This is one of the many works which the young composer created as a vehicle for his talents as a pianist. However, the piano part sounded recessive in this performance.

• Concert Review

ASIDE FROM this problem and a few minor scrapes over intonation, this was an Officially Correct performance, obviously well within the technical means of the players and moderate to the point of squareness.

A noteworthy event followed: the successful first performance of a new work by Martin Boykan, whose orderly but highly imaginative musical language creates a delightful sense of spontaneity while at the same time making ingenious use of near-repetition and subtle variation.

THIS WORK, Concerto for Thirteen Players, showed an astounding finesse in the handling of instrumental combinations. Hopefully this concerto will become a regular part of the Chamber Players' repertoire.

Such projects in contemporary music should be a major focus of almost every performing organization, but especially when there is so much potential both in terms of performers and in terms of the tremendous compositional activity today, little of which ever reaches the public even through inadequate performances.

The Brahms Quintet, the last work on the program, is one of the few undeniably first-rate chamber pieces featuring the clarinet.

THE PART demands sensitivity, flexibility, and control. Harold Wright, who had performed in both previous pieces, untiringly fulfilled every requirement of this difficult score with a directness and clarity that contrasted with the artificially fervent style of the string quartet.

In a pleasing reversal of the usual situation between winds and strings, it was the quartet who had to work hard to keep pace with the variety of expressive shadings and rubato of the clarinet.

THE JERSEY JOURNAL
JERSEY CITY, N. J.
D. 34,227 SUN. 7,000
NOV 17 1972

COLLEGE RECITALIST — Assistant conductor and concertmaster for Boston Symphony Orchestra, Joseph Silverstein will perform the Violin Concerto of Tschaikovsky at the 25th season opening of Fairleigh Dickinson University's Concert Series, Nov. 30 at the Hackensack campus.

The Record
HACKENSACK, N. J.
D. & SUN. 147,389
NOV 17 1972

FDU soloist

Joseph Silverstein, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be soloist in the Symphony's special concert at Orrie de Nooyer Auditorium, Hackensack, Nov. 30 at 8:30 p.m. The program, conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, will present works by Beethoven, Tchaikovsky, and Brahms. Ticket information is available from FDU Concerts, Fairleigh Dickinson University, Teaneck.

30.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514
NOV 1 1972
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Orchestra gets three new trustees

BOSTON — It was recently announced that Archie C. Epps, III, of Cambridge, Mrs. George Lee Sargent of Dover and John Hoyt Stookey of New York, all Overseers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been elected to the Board of Trustees.

Archie C. Epps, III, Dean of Students at Harvard College, is a native of Lake Charles, Louisiana. After receiving his A.B. degree from Talledega College in Alabama, he went to Harvard for graduate studies and was awarded a graduate degree in religion in 1961. Dean Epps has been a Teaching Fellow in Middle Eastern Studies, and is now tutor in Leverett House. From 1964 to 1967 Dean Epps was Assistant Conductor of the Harvard Glee Club, and is now adviser to the Leverett Opera Society. He was Assistant Dean of Harvard College from 1964 until his appointment in 1970 as Dean of Students in Harvard College. He edited The Speeches of Malcolm X at Harvard, which was published in 1968 with a long essay on Malcolm X's thoughts and rhetoric. Several of his other articles, appearing in national journals, have dealt with the subject of Afro-American history.

Mrs. George Lee Sargent was born in Grosse Point, Michigan. She was educated at the Ethel Walker School and Kingswood School, Cranbrook, and lived until her marriage to George Lee Sargent in Bermuda and Colorado. She is now a Trustee of Tufts University and of the Ethel Walker School; a member of the Board of Governors of the New England Medical Center Hospitals Inc.; a Director of the New England Patriots Football Club; and a member of the Advisory Committee of development to the Executive Council of the Episcopal Church. Mrs. Sargent has been Chairman of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1971. She is the mother of four children.

John Hoyt Stookey was educated at Hotchkiss School, Amherst College and the Columbia University Engineering School, and was a member of the Industrial Engineering Honors Society. His musical interests are varied: he is President of the Berkshire Boy Choir, which has appeared on several occasions with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood; Vice President of the Oratorio Society of New York; and a former President and singing member for fifteen years of the Canterbury Choral Society of New York. He is also Chairman of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York. Mr. Stookey is President of Wallace Clark, Inc., and a Director of the National Distillers and Chemical Corporation, and of Reigel Textile Corporation. He is Trustee of the Stowe School and Treasurer and Trustee of the College for Human Services. Mr. Stookey is the father of four children.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885
NOV 7 1972
New England Newsclip

Rose Walsh

Spiral Parties Whirl On...

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Council of Friends, latest fund-raising venture, the Spiral Parties, is whirling on in fantastic fashion. The idea is unique and when carried out correctly can amount to a handsome financial total. The individual party-giver agrees to host and solicit $2 from up to six people who then will continue the Spiral. These six people in turn act as hosts and invite and solicit five people. Each of the five people invite four of their friends to some diversion and on and on it goes.

Parties have been held throughout New England and as far west as Ann Arbor, Mich., where the orchestra has frequently played. They have taken the form of bike hikes, tennis and croquet games, field trips to various museums and special shows. A Lexington family has a collection of old home movies taken of friends when they all were growing up. The movies were shown as a surprise to their guests.

Students, housewives, members of various women's and church organizations, as well as many of the members of the orchestra (the fund benefits the BSO) have done their interesting party bit. Bass player John Salkowski has been invited to a champagne reception in his home town, Squantum, where he will be guest of honor.

Steven Solomon in the Development Office in Symphony Hall will answer any questions from interested Spiral hosts or hostesses.

SUNDAY POST
LYNN, MASS.
S. 15,000
NOV 26 1972
New England Newsclip

Berklee College of Music President Lawrence Berk, Mrs. Lawrence Berk, president of the Berklee Faculty Wives association and director of the Department of Public Information; Vice-President Lee Eliot Berk, and Mrs. Manuel Kurland, executive director of the Boston Symphony Youth Concerts, in discussion following the Premiere of Berklee Faculty member Phil Wilson's "The Earth's Children", which was especially composed for the Berklee Thursday Night Dues Band and the Boston Symphony Orchestra and dedicated to the Youth Concerts. Over 13,000 young people attended these Youth Concerts, which were founded by conductor Harry Ellis Dickson.

DOVER-SHERBORN
SUBURBAN PRESS
NATICK, MASS.
W. 1,500
NOV 2 1972
New England Newsclip

Mrs. Sargent orchestra director

Mrs. George Lee Sargent of Dover, an overseer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been elected to the orchestra's Board of trustees.

She was born in Grosse Point, Mich. She was educated at the Ethel Walker School and Kingswood School, Cranbrook and lived until her marriage to Mr. Sargent in Bermuda and Colorado.

She is now a trustee of Tufts University and of the Ethel Walker School; a member of the Board of Governors of the New England Medical Center Hospitals Inc.; a director of the New England Patriots Football Club; and a member of the advisory committee of development to the Executive Council of the Episcopal Church.

Mrs. Sargent has been chairman of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1971. She is the mother of four children.

CHRONICLE
REVERE, MASS.
W. 6,500
NOV 2 1972
New England Newsclip

Mrs. George Lee Sargent On BSO Board

Mrs. George Lee Sargent of Dover is one of three new members elected to the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Chosen with her are Archie Epps, III , dean of students at Harvard, and John H. Stookey of New York, oresident of Wallace Clark, Inc. and director of the National Distillers and CMHEICAL Corp., and of Reigel Textile Corp.

Mrs. Sargent was born in Grosse Point, Mich. She was educated at the Ethel Walker School and Kingswood School, Cranbrook, and lived until her marriage to George Lee Sargent in Bermuda and Colorado. She is now a Trustee of Tufts university of New England Medical Center Hospitals Inc.; Director of the New England Patriots Football Club; and a member of the Advisory COMMITTEE OF DEVELOPMENT TO THE Executive Council of the Episcopal Church.

MESSENGER
NORWOOD, MASS.
W. 7,500
NOV 10 1972
New England Newsclip

Youth Concerts Begin Tomorrow

The Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall will begin on Saturday, November 11, at 11 a.m., according to the Norwood Creative Arts Committee. Sixty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Harry Ellis Dickson will be performing.

Fifty students in Grades 5 through 8 have bought series tickets for the 1972-'73 season and will be going to Boston on Jan. 27 and March 24, as well as tomorrow.

The bus will leave Junior High North parking lot at 9:30 a.m. and return there at 1 p.m.

Saturday morning's program promises to be exciting since its theme is "Music in Multi—Media":

Peter and the Wolf, Prokofieff, narrated by Daniel Wyndham with slides.

From "Pictures at an Exhibition," Moussorgsky, "Ballet of the Unhatched Chicks," "Baba—Yaga," "The Great Gate of Kiev."

"The Earth's Children," Paul Wilson, with the "Thursday Night Dues Band," Berklee College of Music. (For Symphony Orchestra augmented by a concert-jazz ensemble, depicting the moods and strength of today's youth

DOWN BEAT
CHICAGO, ILL.
E. O. WEEK 67,000

NOV 9 1972

Phil Wilson's The Earth's Children, a piece written for symphony orchestra and large jazz ensemble, will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berklee College of Music Thursday Night Dues Band as part of the symphony's Youth Concert series Nov. 10, 11, 13, 17&18. The two principal soloists, both Berklee students, will be Jan Konopasek, baritone sax, of Czechoslavakia (he was on Oliver Nelson's Berlin Dialogue LP) and Tony Klatka, fluegelhorn (featured on Woody Herman's last two albums and a former arranger for Wayne Cochran). Wilson will conduct the five performances of the symphony/jazz work.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

NOV 21 1972

New England Newsclip

Berklee, Conservatory students offer jazz with different strokes

By Ray Murphy, Globe Staff

One of the compensations for living in Boston is provided by the city's colleges which keep us in touch with our cultural traditions and verities.

Two of them, Berklee College of Music, the nation's only jazz college, and the New England Conservatory of Music's jazz department, performed such roles last week in separate events.

The Berklee contribution was by far the more ambitious. Phil Wilson, head of the Berklee trombone department, presented his symphonic tone poem, "The Earth's Children," in Symphony Hall with a complement of young jazz musicians and Boston Symphony players. It was a bold work brought off in great style despite obstacles inherent in such a blending of jazz and more traditional forms.

The few attempts made to mix the symphonic players in with jazz musicians have usually resulted with the jazz section sounding as if it were tacked on. Wilson overcame that nicely by exploiting elements common to both idioms. The cultural shock then was considerably lessened and the older Symphony musicians and the younger jazz players, 19 members of the college's Thursday Night Dues Band, swung happily together at this latest in a series of youth concerts.

Wilson, a native of Belmont, is a musical veteran. He played for the Woody Herman band and has arranged for Buddy Rich.

He conducted the full orchestra for the tone poem which he divided into six parts. The piece had to do with being born and growing up. It started off with some bells and a spacy oboe business and then swung into a Latin theme which sounded a little like Ellington's "Caravan."

The fourth section was a rock theme. Here, the Symphony players and the Dues Band hit their stride. They were working within a similar structure. Both rock and baroque music use the 4-4 signature.

The poem wound up in an upbeat hard-driving swing finale and then an abrupt end.

The piece combined a variety of jazz figures, Latin rhythms, some Chinese and Indian touches, a resourceful use of the symphony sounds and nice solo work, especially by fluegelhorn player Tony Klatka, whose extended bop solo was a standout.

Wilson wrote and scored the work this summer and has been working it out with the Dues Band at school. The Dues Band is a solid group which keeps active playing campus dates. It has also done some television work. It is the first time they have been tied in with symphonic players though, and they carried it off like professionals. The piece was well received by the young audience in Symphony Hall and might well make a brisk-selling recording.

The Conservatory concert in Jordan Hall presented the standard big band in a series of arrangements taken from the jazz literature of the 1940s and '50s, as exemplified by Count Basie, Fletcher Henderson and Boyd Raeburn.

Some of the pieces were written and scored by students and demonstrated a good grasp of the form.

The program started off with a Basie standard which captured the brilliant brass of the Basie band. The trumpet section was exceptional. Two numbers were by a student flutist and saxophonist, Tom Lee. They were rather moody pieces, well thought out and effective. There was a nice duet between the tenor sax and trombone on one number and a showcase solo for soprano sax on another with Lee featured on the sax.

Three of the pieces were by Stanley Sagov, a graduate assistant at the school. Sagov got in a variety of effects, including a bop piece, a 12-tone number which featured a strong tenor sax solo. His best piece, and the most effective in the program, was called "Alternative Mode," a jazz-rock number with a Latin rhythm with good solo work on piano, tenor and flute.

The jazz band is one of two at the school. It is taught by Jaki Byard, the veteran pianist and part-time alto saxophonists and composer from Worcester who has played with a number of top jazzmen. Byard talked and played his way through a long solo in a piece called "I Had a Ball".

The band generally has a nice big sound and is well schooled. Its reed sectio ncould use some work, however. It is one of two full-sized swing bands at the school. The other one will also have a chance to be heard at a future concert.

NEWS
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
D. 7,358

NOV 4 1972

New England Newsclip

Bill Plante's North Shore

Boston Symphony joining Berklee band for Youth Concert premiere

What would happen, say, if the Boston Symphony Orchestra sat down to play with the Berklee College of Music Thursday Night Dues Band?

And what do you suppose would happen if they played for 13,000 young people at Symphony Hall?

I would expect shock waves to reverberate throughout the music world for months to come.

That's what's in store November 10,11, 13, 17 and 18 when five concerts will feature the world premiere of Phil Wilson's "The Earth's Children," composed especially for symphony orchestra and the Berklee 18-piece jazz ensemble.

Phil Wilson is as personable a young man as one could hope to meet. Probably as popular as any teacher at Berklee, he looks as much the part of student (which he is) and teacher (which he is) as he does composer, performer, director (which he is).

No stranger to the symphonic-jazz idiom, he recently conducted the Westchester (N.Y.) Symphony Orchestra in the world premiere of his composition "The Left and the Right."

I met Phil Wilson during a late after-concert session at Ann and Bob Bosteels' house, too many years back, when he had brought his trombone and I had fetched a rhythm guitar. I dropped out as soon as I found I was playing all wrong chords, sat back and revelled in Phil's fluid horn. Phil comes to jazz out of New Hampshire, and to the concert stage from a variety of experiences which has included roles as trombonist-arranger for the Dorsey Brothers, Woody Herman, and the Buddy Rich orchestras.

At Berklee, he organized the Thursday Night Dues Band, an international gathering that is probably the major gem in the galaxy of eight free concerts produced by Berklee in its annual concert series.

The TNDB appears on educational television, in sacred concerts, and was filmed by the United States Information Service for a world-wide televised documentary.

Some of us have held for some time that classical modernists and the avante garde jazz composers have been heading for common ground from different starting points. It will be interesting to see how far down that road Phil Wilson has taken us with this new work, which he describes as "a six part tone poem, depicting the moods and conflicts of today's youth in his struggle for maturity."

Now I have a hard time picturing Phil Wilson saying things like that. And so would the boys in Herman's Herd. But knowing Phil, they'd expect him to grin that boyish grin of his and say, "Yuh, hey, far out, Baby."

Past Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, which were founded by violinist-conductor Harry Ellis Dickson in 1959 to "educate, entertain, and stimulate young people, have featured Berklee faculty members Herb Pomeroy and Andy McGhee in the past, so the walls won't come tumbling down this time.

But the TNDB, Phil Wilson, AND the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

Those lucky kids.

Berklee College of Music Thursday Night Dues Band

Ear Trumpet: Kiddies and Ancients

By Richard Buell

Since children affect me much as they did the late W. C. Fields, the Boston Symphony's Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall are not the sort of thing I would normally take in. But I got invited and I went, if only to gauge my tolerance of tiny jumpers and screamers, and to see if the B.S.O., when confronted with several hundred Boston public school children, would panic and call in the Tactical Police Force.

Actually, the occasion (this was the morning of Friday, November 10) reminded me of field trips and excursions I underwent as a child, during the consulship of Dobbin, Caligula's beloved nag: the sense of deviation from school routine; a journey to a big, strange place; adults who seemed important without one's knowing why, exactly; and wondering where the bathroom was.

To beguile the ears of the little ones, conductor Harry Ellis Dickson had assembled a program of brightly colored dazzlers — "The Earth's Children", for jazz ensemble and symphony orchestra, by Phil Wilson; excerpts from Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition"; Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" — and it was for a slide show accompaniment to the latter that kids from seven elementary schools did some dynamite illustrations. The cultural transplantation in these was interesting: Peter and his friends were up a tree (Ulmus americanus) in Boston Common, and the hunters who saved the day were a hearteningly interracial crew. I am indebted to John Kyriakidis, one of the artists, for a lucid account of the genesis of the project; his thoroughness and tact should make him an ornament to the diplomatic corps after the Venusian takeover.

Unfortunately, I couldn't stay for the concert, but no O.D.s were reported from the premises, and Symphony Hall was still standing when I returned later that day to hear Daniel Barenboim conduct the full B.S.O. in Haydn and Bruckner.

Bless them all, I say.

Safety in programming and star conductors characterize the Boston Symphony's 1972-73 season. I heard Colin Davis conduct Berlioz (Les Franc Juges Overture; Nuits d'Ete) and Beethoven (Second Symphony), and Barenboim conduct Haydn (Symphony No. 86) and Bruckner (Ninth Symphony). Davis is both tasteful and enthusiastic and he elicited a finely gauged orchestral accompaniment for the wonderful Janet Baker in Nuits d'Ete. But elsewhere a certain heaviness in him that has made for earthbound readings of Mahler and Mozart brought about, with an orchestra that is never light on its feet, a lot of, well, heaviness, no matter what the tempo. Barenboim's Haydn was edgy and charmless, his Bruckner big and eloquent, and vigorously set forth by the orchestra.

BOSTON, MASS.
BOSTON PHOENIX
W. 43,630

NOV 28 1972

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719

FEB 1973

The Berklee College of Music Thursday Night Dues Band and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at recent BS Youth Concerts premiered Phil Wilson's The Earth's Children, commissioned by and dedicated to the Youth Concerts and composed for symphony and jazz orchestra, and performed with the composer conducting. Wilson, Chairman of the Berklee Trombone Department and Board Member of the International Trombone Assoc., was formerly soloist with the Woody Herman and Dorsey Brother's Orchestras and is currently arranger for the Buddy Rich Orchestra. More than 13,000 young people attended the 5 concerts.

NEWS
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
D. 7,358

NOV 4 1972

New England Newsclip

Bill Plante's North Shore

Boston Symphony joining Berklee band for Youth Concert premiere

What would happen, say, if the Boston Symphony Orchestra sat down to play with the Berklee College of Music Thursday Night Dues Band?

And what do you suppose would happen if they played for 13,000 young people at Symphony Hall?

I would expect shock waves to reverberate throughout the music world for months to come.

That's what's in store November 10,11, 13, 17 and 18 when five concerts will feature the world premiere of Phil Wilson's "The Earth's Children," composed especially for symphony orchestra and the Berklee 18-piece jazz ensemble.

Phil Wilson is as personable a young man as one could hope to meet. Probably as popular as any teacher at Berklee, he looks as much the part of student (which he is) and teacher (which he is) as he does composer, performer, director (which he is).

No stranger to the symphonic-jazz idiom, he recently conducted the Westchester (N.Y.) Symphony Orchestra in the world premiere of his composition "The Left and the Right."

I met Phil Wilson during a late after-concert session at Ann and Bob Bosteels' house, too many years back, when he had brought his trombone and I had fetched a rhythm guitar. I dropped out as soon as I found I was playing all wrong chords, sat back and revelled in Phil's fluid horn. Phil comes to jazz out of New Hampshire, and to the concert stage from a variety of experiences which has included roles as trombonist-arranger for the Dorsey Brothers, Woody Herman, and the Buddy Rich orchestras.

At Berklee, he organized the Thursday Night Dues Band, an international gathering that is probably the major gem in the galaxy of eight free concerts produced by Berklee in its annual concert series.

The TNDB appears on educational television, in sacred concerts, and was filmed by the United States Information Service for a world-wide televised documentary.

Some of us have held for some time that classical modernists and the avante garde jazz composers have been heading for common ground from different starting points. It will be interesting to see how far down that road Phil Wilson has taken us with this new work, which he describes as "a six part tone poem, depicting the moods and conflicts of today's youth in his struggle for maturity."

Now I have a hard time picturing Phil Wilson saying things like that. And so would the boys in Herman's Herd. But knowing Phil, they'd expect him to grin that boyish grin of his and say, "Yuh, hey, far out, Baby."

Past Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, which were founded by violinist-conductor Harry Ellis Dickson in 1959 to "educate, entertain, and stimulate young people, have featured Berklee faculty members Herb Pomeroy and Andy McGhee in the past, so the walls won't come tumbling down this time.

But the TNDB, Phil Wilson, AND the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

Those lucky kids.

Berklee College of Music Thursday Night Dues Band

DOWN BEAT
CHICAGO, ILL.
E. O. WEEK 67,000

NOV 9 1972

Phil Wilson's The Earth's Children, a piece written for symphony orchestra and large jazz ensemble, will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berklee College of Music Thursday Night Dues Band as part of the symphony's Youth Concert series Nov. 10, 11, 13, 17&18. The two principal soloists, both Berklee students, will be Jan Konopasek, baritone sax, of Czechoslavakia (he was on Oliver Nelson's Berlin Dialogue LP) and Tony Klatka, fluegelhorn (featured on Woody Herman's last two albums and a former arranger for Wayne Cochran). Wilson will conduct the five performances of the symphony/jazz work.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

NOV 31 1972

New England Newsclip

Berklee, Conservatory students offer jazz with different strokes

By Ray Murphy, Globe Staff

One of the compensations for living in Boston is provided by the city's colleges which keep us in touch with our cultural traditions and verities.

Two of them, Berklee College of Music, the nation's only jazz college, and the New England Conservatory of Music's jazz department, performed such roles last week in separate events.

The Berklee contribution was by far the more ambitious. Phil Wilson, head of the Berklee trombone department, presented his symphonic tone poem, "The Earth's Children," in Symphony Hall with a complement of young jazz musicians and Boston Symphony players. It was a bold work brought off in great style despite obstacles inherent in such a blending of jazz and more traditional forms.

The few attempts made to mix the symphonic players in with jazz musicians have usually resulted with the jazz section sounding as if it were tacked on. Wilson overcame that nicely by exploiting elements common to both idioms. The cultural shock then was considerably lessened and the older Symphony musicians and the younger jazz players, 19 members of the college's Thursday Night Dues Band, swung happily together at this latest in a series of youth concerts.

Wilson, a native of Belmont, is a musical veteran. He played for the Woody Herman band and has arranged for Buddy Rich.

He conducted the full orchestra for the tone poem which he divided into six parts. The piece had to do with being born and growing up. It started off with some bells and a spacy oboe business and then swung into a Latin theme which sounded a little like Ellington's "Caravan."

The fourth section was a rock theme. Here, the Symphony players and the Dues Band hit their stride. They were working within a similar structure. Both rock and baroque music use the 4-4 signature.

The poem wound up in an upbeat hard-driving swing finale and then an abrupt end.

The piece combined a variety of jazz figures, Latin rhythms, some Chinese and Indian touches, a resourceful use of the symphony sounds and nice solo work, especially by fluegelhorn player Tony Klatka, whose extended bop solo was a standout.

Wilson wrote and scored the work this summer and has been working it out with the Dues Band at school. The Dues Band is a solid group which keeps active playing campus dates. It has also done some television work. It is the first time they have been tied in with symphonic players though, and they carried it off like professionals. The piece was well received by the young audience in Symphony Hall and might well make a brisk-selling recording.

The Conservatory concert in Jordan Hall presented the standard big band in a series of arrangements taken from the jazz literature of the 1940s and '50s, as exemplified by Count Basie, Fletcher Henderson and Boyd Raeburn.

Some of the pieces were written and scored by students and demonstrated a good grasp of the form.

The program started off with a Basie standard which captured the brilliant brass of the Basie band. The trumpet section was exceptional. Two numbers were by a student flutist and saxophonist, Tom Lee. They were rather moody pieces, well thought out and effective. There was a nice duet between the tenor sax and trombone on one number and a showcase solo for soprano sax on another with Lee featured on the sax.

Three of the pieces were by Stanley Sagov, a graduate assistant at the school. Sagov got in a variety of effects, including a bop piece, a 12-tone number which featured a strong tenor sax solo. His best piece, and the most effective in the program, was called "Alternative Mode," a jazz-rock number with a Latin rhythm with good solo work on piano, tenor and flute.

The jazz band is one of two at the school. It is taught by Jaki Byard, the veteran pianist and part-time alto saxophonists and composer from Worcester who has played with a number of top jazzmen. Byard talked and played his way through a long solo in a piece called "I Had a Ball".

The band generally has a nice big sound and is well schooled. Its reed sectio ncould use some work, however. It is one of two full-sized swing bands at the school. The other one will also have a chance to be heard at a future concert.

Ear Trumpet: Kiddies and Ancients

By Richard Buell

Since children affect me much as they did the late W. C. Fields, the Boston Symphony's Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall are not the sort of thing I would normally take in. But I got invited and I went, if only to gauge my tolerance of tiny jumpers and screamers, and to see if the B.S.O., when confronted with several hundred Boston public school children, would panic and call in the Tactical Police Force.

Actually, the occasion (this was the morning of Friday, November 10) reminded me of field trips and excursions I underwent as a child, during the consulship of Dobbin, Caligula's beloved nag: the sense of deviation from school routine; a journey to a big, strange place; adults who seemed important without one's knowing why, exactly; and wondering where the bathroom was.

To beguile the ears of the little ones, conductor Harry Ellis Dickson had assembled a program of brightly colored dazzlers — "The Earth's Children", for jazz ensemble and symphony orchestra, by Phil Wilson; excerpts from Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition"; Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" — and it was for a slide show accompaniment to the latter that kids from seven elementary schools did some dynamite illustrations. The cultural transplantation in these was interesting: Peter and his friends were up a tree (Ulmus americanus) in Boston Common, and the hunters who saved the day were a hearteningly interracial crew. I am indebted to John Kyriakidis, one of the artists, for a lucid account of the genesis of the project; his thoroughness and tact should make him an ornament to the diplomatic corps after the Venusian takeover.

Unfortunately, I couldn't stay for the concert, but no O.D.s were reported from the premises, and Symphony Hall was still standing when I returned later that day to hear Daniel Barenboim conduct the full B.S.O. in Haydn and Bruckner.

Bless them all, I say.

Safety in programming and star conductors characterize the Boston Symphony's 1972-73 season. I heard Colin Davis conduct Berlioz (Les Franc Juges Overture: Nuits d'Ete) and Beethoven (Second Symphony), and Barenboim conduct Haydn (Symphony No. 86) and Bruckner (Ninth Symphony). Davis is both tasteful and enthusiastic and he elicited a finely gauged orchestral accompaniment for the wonderful Janet Baker in Nuits d'Ete. But elsewhere a certain heaviness in him that has made for earthbound readings of Mahler and Mozart brought about, with an orchestra that is never light on its feet, a lot of, well, heaviness, no matter what the tempo. Barenboim's Haydn was edgy and charmless, his Bruckner big and eloquent, and vigorously set forth by the orchestra.

BOSTON, MASS.
BOSTON PHOENIX
W. 43,630

NOV 28 1972

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719

FEB 1973

The Berklee College of Music Thursday Night Dues Band and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at recent BS Youth Concerts premiered Phil Wilson's The Earth's Children, commissioned by and dedicated to the Youth Concerts and composed for symphony and jazz orchestra, and performed with the composer conducting. Wilson, Chairman of the Berklee Trombone Department and Board Member of the International Trombone Assoc., was formerly soloist with the Woody Herman and Dorsey Brother's Orchestras and is currently arranger for the Buddy Rich Orchestra. More than 13,000 young people attended the 5 concerts.

PASTE OVER

32.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
NOV 13 1972
New England Newsclip

Music Center gets grant from National Arts

The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood received a grant of $200,000 and the Boston Symphony Orchestra $100,000, according To an announcement by the National Endowment for the Arts in Washington Thursday. The 1972 grants totaling $5.2 million, are distributed among 97 orchestras and other musical organizations throughout the country. Four million dollars the grants comes from federal funds and the rest from other sources. Each recipient must match the federal grant with an equal sum raised from other sources. Some of the funds must be used to support public programs for young people's audiences, others to set standards and [illegible]. The federal [illegible] made since 1965 and the Symphony has received [illegible] matching grants in the past.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398
NOV 10 1972
New England Newsclip

$10,000 Grant To Springfield

The springfield Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood are among 97 orchestras and other musical organizations to receive grants totaling $5.2 million from the National Endowment for the Arts, the federal agency announced Thursday.

The Springfield Symphony will receive a grant of $10,000 for programs for young people and the Berkshire Music Center will receive $200,000 for special programs. The center's allocation is from private funds.

Agency chairman Nancy Hanks said the money $1.1 million of it from private sources, support projects ranging from professional orchestras to college groups and from inner - city school concerts to performances by gifted young artists.

"Not only do these grants benefit the public, but they also help the more than 8,000 musicians in these orch[illegible] who have devoted [illegible] to the field of [illegible] Hanks said.

The following [illegible] made in New [illegible]

Programs [illegible] People: Bos[illegible] Society [illegible] Symphony [illegible] 000; Sym[illegible] Greater [illegible]

WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,977
NOV 10 1972
New England Newsclip

Orchestras To Receive U.S. Funds

WASHINGTON (UPI) — [illegible] total of 97 orchestras and o[illegible] musical organizations will [illegible]ceive $5.2 million in grants [illegible] year from the National E[illegible]ment for the Arts, the f[illegible] agency announced yester[illegible] Chairman Nancy Han[illegible] the money — $1.1 milli[illegible] from private sources - [illegible] go to recipients in 39 st[illegible] District of Columbia a[illegible] Rico to support proje[illegible] ing from professional [illegible] to college groups, f[illegible] city school concerts [illegible] ances by gifted you[illegible]

"Not only do t[illegible] benefit the public, [illegible] "but they also he[illegible] than 8,000 musici[illegible] orchestras who [illegible] their lives to [illegible] music."

The following [illegible] made in New E[illegible] Boston Philha[illegible] $7,000; Boston [illegible] chestra, $100,[illegible] Society of G[illegible] $20,000; New [illegible] Orchestra, $2[illegible] land Philhar[illegible] Providence, [illegible] Symphony [illegible] Vermont Symphony [illegible] Association, Middlebury, $10,000; Portland Symphony Orchestra, Maine, $20,000. Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass., $200,000, (one-half private funds).

TRIBUNE
SANFORD, MAINE
W. 8,040
NOV 16 1972
Bos Sym. Oct.
New England Newsclip

Music Grants

WASHINGTON UPI - A total of 97 orchestras and other musical organizations will receive $5.2 million in grants this year from the National Endowment for the Arts, the federal agency announced Thursday.

Chairman Nancy Hanks said the money - $1.1 million of it from private sources - would go to recipients in 39 states, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico to support projects ranging from professional orchestras to college groups, from inner city school concerts to performances by gifted young artists.

"Not only do these grants benefit the public," she said, "but they also help the more than 8,000 musicians in these orchestras who have devoted their lives to the field of music."

The following awards were made in New England:

Programs For Young People: Boston Philharmonic Society, $7,000; Boston Symphony Orchestra, $100,000; Symphony Society of Greater Hartford, $20,000; New Haven Symphony Orchestra, $23,500; Rhode Island Philharmnic Orchestra, Providence, $25,000; Springfield Symphony Orchestra, $10,000; Vermont Symphony Orchestra Association, Middlebury, $10,000.

Professional Services: Portland Symphony Orchestra, Maine, $20,000.

Special: Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass., $200,000, one half private funds.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500
NOV 21 1972
New England Newsclip

MAESTROS MEET—Seiji Ozawa, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, greets famed composer-conductor Leonard Bernstein and his mother, Mrs. Samuel Bernstein, at recent dinner of Boston Chapter, American Friends of the Hebrew University, at which Maestro Bernstein received the Scopus Award.

NEWS
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
D. 7,354
NOV 16 1972
New England Newsclip

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 165,925
NOV 17 1972
New England Newsclip

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000
NOV 17 1972
New England Newsclip

SOUTH MIDDLESEX DAILY NEW
FRAMINGHAM, MA.
D. 24,0
NOV 9 1972

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 117,499
NOV 19 1972
New England Newsclip

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993
NOV 16 1972
New England Newsclip

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200
NOV 16 1972
New England Newsclip

NEWS
MELROSE, MASS.
D. 2,800
NOV 16 1972
New England Newsclip

NEWS ADVERTISER
WESTFIELD, MASS.
D. 5,000
NOV 16 1972
New England Newsclip

NEWS
MILFORD, MASS.
D. 11,172
NOV 16 1972
New England Newsclip

TENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000
NOV 16 1972
New England Newsclip

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350
NOV 16 1972
New England Newsclip

Kruman
BRATTLEBORO, VT.
D. 8,000
NOV 18 1972
New England Newsclip

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
D. 22,000
NOV 16 1972
New England Newsclip

ITEM
CLINTON, MASS.
D. 4,150
NOV 17 1972

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
D. 42,250
NOV 16 1972
New England Newsclip

ENTERPRISE
BROCKTON, MASS.
D. 60,687
NOV 16 1972
New England Newsclip

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
W. 8,234
NOV 16 1972
New England Newsclip

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
W. 6,000
NOV 16 1972
New England Newsclip

Bernstein Opens Symphony Series

Leonard Bernstein opens the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Romantic Series Thursday, Nov. 22 at 8:30 p.m. in works by Mozart, Wagner and Berlioz. Bernstein begins the concert with Mozart's Symphony No. 40 in G minor, follows it with Wagner's Prelude and Liebestod from 'Tristan and Isolde,' and closes the concert with Three Orchestral excerpts from 'Romeo et Juliette' by Berlioz.

The Romantic Series consists of three concerts -- November 22, January 25 and March 1. Eugen Jochum conducts in January with works by Handel, Mozart and Strauss, and Colin Davis closes the series in March with works by Sibelius and Elgar. Subscription tickets for the Thursday B ('Romantic') Series range from $10.00 to $16.50 and there are still subscriptions available.

CHRONICLE
IPSWICH, MASS.
W. 3,520
NOV 16 1972
New England Newsclip

TRI TOWN TRANSCRIPT
TOPSFIELD, MASS.
W. 4,500
NOV 16 1972
New England Newsclip

Bernstein Conducts Boston Series Opener

BOSTON — Leonard Bernstein opens the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Romantic Series Wednesday, November 22 at 8.30 p. m. in works by Mozart, Wagner and Berlioz. Mr. Bernstein begins the concert with Mozart's Symphony No. 40 in G minor, follows it with Wagner's Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde", and closes the concert with Three Orchestral excerpts from "Romeo et Juliette" by Berlioz.

The Romantic Series consists of three concerts — 44 season. His unique career Wednesday, January 25 and was firmly launched during March 1. Eugen Jochum that winter when he conducts in January with stituted for a suddenly ailing works by Handel, Mozart and Bruno Walter. In 1945 he Strauss, and Colin Davis began his three years as closes the series in March Director of the New York with works by Sibelius and Symphony. He has served as Elgar. Subscription tickets head of the orchestra and for the Thursday B conducting department of the ("Romantic") Series range Berkshire Music Festival and from $10.00 to $16.50 has been professor of music there are still subscriptions at Brandeis University available.

Leonard Bernstein's association with Boston and its symphony is an important part of his life. Born in Lawrence, he was graduated from Harvard in 1939 and continued his studies at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia with Fritz Reiner and Randall Thompson and at Tanglewood for several summers as a Koussevitzky student and assistant. Arthur Rodzinsky engaged him as Assistant Conductor of the New York Philharmonic for the 1943 -

NEWS
MELROSE, MASS.
D. 2,800
NOV 15 1972
New England Newsclip

MERCURY
MEDFORD, MASS.
D. 845
NOV 15 1972
New England Newsclip

NEWS
LYNN, MASS.
D. 12,120
NOV 15 1972
New England Newsclip

GRAPHIC
NEWTON, MASS.
W. 10,000
NOV 16 1972
New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
NOV 21 1972
New England Newsclip

CHRONICLE
NEEDHAM, MASS.
W. 6,500
NOV 16 1972
New England Newsclip

NEWS
AMESBURY, MASS.
W. 4,400
NOV 16 1972
New England Newsclip

ENTERPRISE
BROCKTON, MASS.
D. 61,687
NOV 11 1972
New England Newsclip

HERALD
DANVERS, MASS.
W. 4,400
NOV 16 1972
New England Newsclip

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528
NOV 20 1972
New England Newsclip

Bernstein Will Lead BSO Series

BOSTON — Leonard Bernstein opens the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Romantic Series Wednesday, Nov 22 at 8:30 p.m. in works by Mozart, Wagner and Berlioz.

Mr. Bernstein begins the concert with Mozart's Symphony No. 40 in G minor, follows it with Wagner's Prelude and Liebestod from 'Tristan und Isolde' and closes the concert with Three Orchestral excerpts from 'Romeo et Juliette' by Berlioz.

The Romantic Series consists of three concerts — Nov. 22, Jan. 25 and March 1. Eugen Jochum conducts in January with works by Handel, Mozart and Strauss, and Colin Davis closes the series in March with works by Sibelius and Elgar.

Leonard Bernstein's association with Boston and its symphony is an important part of his life. Born in Lawrence, he was graduated from Harvard in 1939 and continued his studies at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia with Fritz Reiner and Randall Thompson and at Tanglewood for several summers as a Koussevitzky student and assistant.

Arthur Rodzinsky engaged him as assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic for the 1943-44 season. His unique career was firmly launched during that winter when he substituted for a suddenly ailing Bruno Walter.

In 1945 he began his three years as director of the New York Symphony. He has served as head of the orchestra and conducting department of the Berkshire Music Festival and has been professor of music at Brandeis University.

Bernstein to open BSO series

BOSTON [illegible] onard Bernstein will cond[illegible] e opening concert of the Bo[illegible] ymphony Orchestra's Rom[illegible] Series tomorrow night at 8:30 in Symphony Hall.

The program will feature Mozart's Symphony No. 40 in G Minor, Wagner's Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde" and three orchestral excerpts from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet."

Tanglewood adviser

Bernstein is an artistic director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. The conductor-composer has a long association with the BSO, having performed with it more than 1,000 times.

The musician is currently Charles Eliot Norton, Professor of Poetry at Harvard University, Cambridge. He is in residence at the same house where he spent his undergraduate days.

The program that Bernstein will conduct is one in a series of three concerts. Eugen Jochum will conduct the second Jan. 25, featuring a program of Handel, Mozart and Strauss. Colin Davis will conduct the final concert March 1. The program will be works by Sibelius and Elgar.

Subscription tickets for the Romantic series of programs are still available at the Boston box office.

TOWN CRIER
WAYLAND, MASS.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Leonard Bernstein, conductor. Music of Mozart, Wagner and Berlioz. Wed., Nov. 22 at 8:30 p.m. Symphony Hall. Info: 266-1492.

BERNSTEIN OPENS SERIES

BOSTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced that Leonard Bernstein will open the orchestra's Romantic Series with a concert Nov. 22.

Bernstein to open Nov. Boston concert series

Leonard Bernstein opens the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Romantic Series Wednesday, November 22 at 8:30 p.m. in works by Mozart, Wagner and Berlioz. Mr. Bernstein begins the concert with Mozart's Symphony No. 40 in G minor, follows it with Wagner's Prelude and Liebstod from 'Tristan and Isolde' and closes the concert with Three Orchestral excerpts from 'Romeo et Juliette' by Berlioz.

The Romantic Series consists of three concerts—November 22, January 25 and March 1. Eugen Jochum conducts in January with works by Handel, Mozart and Strauss, and Colin Davis closes the series in March with works by Sibelius and Elgar. Subscription tickets for the Thursday B ('Romantic') Series range from $10.00 to $16.50 and there are still subscriptions available.

Leonard Bernstein's association with Boston and its symphony is an important part of his life. Born in Lawrence, he was graduated from Harvard in 1939 and continued his studies at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia with Fritz Reiner and Randall Thompson and at Tanglewood for several summers as a Koussevitzky student and assistant. Arthur Rodzinsky engaged him as Assistant Conductor of the New York Philharmonic for the 1943-44 season. His unique career was firmly launched during that winter when he substituted for suddenly ailing Bruno Walter. In 1945 he began his three years as Director of the New York Symphony. He has served as head of the orchestra and conducting department of the Berkshire Music Festival and has been professor of music at Brandeis University.

As Laureate Conductor of the New York Philharmonic, Mr. Bernstein continues his close association with that orchestra. When he was appointed its Music Director, he became the first American-born and trained conductor to hold the position under the longest contract signed by the orchestra since the beginning of the century. He still holds the record for having conducted the largest number of performances at home and on tour and his 1000th concert with the orchestra was celebrated on December 15, 1971.

In addition to his position as Adviser to Tanglewood, Leonard Bernstein returns to his home state this year as both teacher and conductor, having been appointed Charles Eliot Norton Professor of Poetry at Harvard. He is now in residence at the same house where he spent his undergraduate days. His eldest child, daughter Jaime, is also in residence, but as a Radcliffe Junior, resident in another house.

Bernstein to Open Hub Romantic Series

BOSTON — Leonard Bernstein will open the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Romantic Series November 22 at 8.30 p. m. in works by Mozart, Wagner and Berlioz.

Bernstein will begin the concert with Mozart's Symphony No. 40 in G minor, follow it with Wagner's Prelude and Liebestod from 'Tristan and Isolde" and close the concert with Three Orchestral excerpts from "Romeo et Juliette" by Berlioz.

Bernstein to Conduct Boston Symphony's Opening Concert in Romantic Series

Leonard Bernstein opens the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Romantic Series on Nov. 22 at 8:30 p.m. in works by Mozart, Wagner and Berlioz. Mr. Bernstein begins the concert with Mzoart's Symphony No. 40 in G minor, follows it with Wagner's Prelude and Liebestod from 'Tristan unde Isolde', and closes the concert with Three Orchestral excerpts from Romeo et Juliette by Berlioz.

The Romantic Series consists of three concerts — Nov. 22, Jan. 25 and March 1. Eugen Jochum conducts in January with Works by Handel. Mozart and Strauss, and Colin David closes the series in March with works by Sibelius and Elgar. Subscription tickets are still available.

Leonard Bernstein's association with Boston and its symphony is an important part of his life. Born in Lawrence, he was graduated from Harvard in 1939 and continued his studies at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia with Fritz Reiner and Randall Thompson and at Tanglewood for several summers as a Kouseevitzky student and assistant. Arthur Rodzinsky engaged him as Assistant Conductor of the New York Philharmonic for the 1943-44 season. His unique career was firmly launched during that winter when he substituted for a suddenly ailing Bruno Walter. In 1945 he began his three years as Director of the New York Symphony. He has served as head of the orchestra and conducting department of the Berkshire Music Festival and has been professor of music at Brandeis University.

As laureate conductor of the New York Philharmonic, Mr. Bernstein continues his close association with that orchestra. When he was appointed its Music Director, he became the first American-born and trained conductor to hold the position under the longest contract signed by the orchestra since the beginning of the century. He still holds the record for having conducted the largest number of performances at home and on tour and his 100th concert with the orchestra was celebrated on Dec. 15, 1971.

In addition to his position as adviser to Tanglewood, Leonard Bernstein returns to his home state this year as both teacher and conductor, having been appointed Charles Eliot Norton Poofessor of Poetry at Harvard. He is now in residence at the same house where he spent his undergraduate days. His eldest child, daughter Jaime, is also in residence, but as a Radcliffe Junior, resident in another house.

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
M. 11,500

NOV 1972

New England Newsclip

(MUSIC) BY JOAN HIGGINS

AN SOS TO THE BSO

New music is needed to save the Symphony from extinction.

Dear Mr. Ozawa:

Since your appointment as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was announced last February, Boston has eagerly soaked up all scraps of information about you.

The enthusiasm of the musical community was catching, and now, with a full year left to wait until you assume your duties as Music Director, the Boston music lover feels like a child set before the Christmas tree who is told he can't open his gifts just yet. While keeping a firm hand on those gifts, the child feels compelled to confess to some sins. Honesty demands that certain unpleasant facts of life be told you. Mindful of what Rudolf Bing said of his successor at the Met ("The poor dear doesn't know what he's in for"), we must set your illusions straight.

In a recently published interview in the late Boston Review of the Arts, you stated a belief that "the Boston audience is one of the most educated, or most sophisticated audiences in many ways." You do us too much honor. We like to think we are.

But now we seem too removed from the mainstreams of musical thought, out of touch with the vital ideas that hammer and shape artistic trends, hopelessly unaware of the ferment and excitement that mark a truly creative musical center.

When you were asked if you had any plans to educate the Boston audience, you replied, "I don't think so." Yet we would hope that you would see to our education, for there are great gaps in our learning.

Confused by the hubbub and not knowing whom to believe, we have put our faith in the leading musical figures and hope that they will lead us out of the maze and unto musical enlightenment. But growing awareness brings us to this curious truth: They don't know whom to believe either. Or if these towering intellects know, they're not telling us. (Leonard Bernstein once uttered the classic put-down of new music on national television. The story goes that after playing a passage by the most influential composer of the 20th century, Arnold Schoenberg, he suggested, "Now, let's open the windows and let some air in.") As you can see, we're badly in need of education. We need the guidance of a great conductor and a great orchestra to state and interpret and cajole us into understanding new musical truths.

For a long while, Boston had such an orchestra and such a conductor. During Serge Koussevitzky's reign, the BSO had the reputation of being the finest orchestra in the world with a vital, innovative repertoire.

Even now, after a transitional period that has stretched into some 20 years, our first-chair players are among the greatest virtuosos in the world, our string section conceded to be the most ravishingly beautiful of any orchestra's, the individual musicianship of our orchestra members considered to be among the best in the nation.

What are the problems then? The problems are monumental ones that could well be the orchestra's undoing.

Boston, which spawned the august Boston Symphony Orchestra, is reluctant to admit that its offspring has any faults. But some citizens are beginning to wonder whether the kid isn't getting out of hand. Some disturbing symptoms, at first dismissed, are beginning to defy treatment: an inability to capture the interest of the young, a seemingly insatiable appetite for money, and—most significant of all—a tendency to withdraw from the musical realities of the 20th century back into the safe havens of 19th-century repertoire.

These withdrawal symptoms may be the deadliest and most insidious of all. For while money will solve many of the orchestra's problems, it may not ever reach the heart of the matter. For some time now, concerned observers have pointed to the BSO's retreat from any consistent encounters with contemporary music. Yet from its earliest beginnings in 1881 (when one out of five works was by a contemporary composer) and throughout the Koussevitzky era (when an estimated 38% of the repertoire was devoted to then contemporary works), the orchestra has had a long and brilliant history of introducing new works to an unwilling public. (Wagner was introduced at founder Henry Higginson's insistence, though he personally found his music distasteful. Brahms' Third Symphony was introduced to an audience that got up and left the hall by the hundreds.)

What has happened recently? Well, last year, one work by Boston composer Leon Kirchner was performed and another by Ned Rorem. That was about it for contemporary American composers in 1970-71.

This year's programming may send American contemporary composers marching en masse to the sea. This year, we find ourselves knee-deep in Beethoven—with the prospect of four symphonies, one piano concerto and one overture by the 19th century's most overpowering master. Further, we discover ourselves up to our ears in Wagner and Berlioz. Saddest of all, we detect only one new work to be premiered during the course of the entire season—a Flute Concerto composed by Walter Piston, a first-generation (now 79) American modernist. (That premiere, which opened the new season, marked at least the 21st time that the BSO has introduced a

Joan Higgins, a practicing musician with a Master of Music degree from the New England Conservatory of Music, was music/drama critic for the Townsman in Wellesley, and does free-lance musical criticism for the Boston Globe.

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 463,503 SUN. 867,810

NOV 12 1972

East, West Meet As Ozawa Opens New Boston Era

By DANIEL WEBSTER
Of The Inquirer Staff

Seiji Ozawa looks forward to the easy time ahead when he will be music director of only two orchestras and one summer festival season.

The conductor will reach that golden shore next fall, when he officially adds the music directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to his other title — music director of the San Francisco Symphony.

"It will be much easier for me — for us," he says after rehearsal with the Philadelphia Orchestra at the Academy. "Now, we are two weeks here, two weeks in Roma, a week there, until we don't know where we are."

We, now, is his wife and their 10-month-old daughter. On a half day's holiday here before his concerts, Ozawa says the family went shopping. "Baby shopping. Food, you know."

While that settling down will slow his travel pace, he is aware that the music world is watching his moves in Boston more than ever before. When he was chief in Toronto and then San Francisco, the Eastern music establishment looked for clues. Now, it looks for a renaissance, a new direction and vitality in an orchestra weakened by a long transition.

That transition ended last year when Ozawa was in Philadelphia. He left midway during his concerts here to be presented in Boston as the successor to William Steinberg.

"I never dreamed I would be music director there," he says. "When I was at Tanglewood as a student, I never thought it possible. Even when I was appointed the head of Tanglewood, it had not seemed possible to me. They have the tradition of the older, great maestro. But, once I was at Tanglewood, we worked very much together. The Symphony got to know me and I got to know it.

"I studied the situation a long time before I took the job. I wanted to see if it is really possible to be music director of both orchestras. I think it is possible.

"In Boston, I am fortunate to have Colin Davis as chief guest conductor, and Michael Thomas as associate. I will do six weeks, then go away while Colin is there for five weeks and Michael does some weeks. Then I will come back. Six weeks is for me about the right time. More than that, and the players are tired of you, need a change. If you do less, they see a new face on the podium every week or so and it is upsetting to them.

"I think this is the major change I will be bringing to Boston, the system of music director with chief guest conductor. It worked very well with Solti and Giulini in Chicago and I think it will be good in Boston. I think this is the only way American orchestras will go. I think it will come to Philadelphia, too.

"In a sense it will be easier, moving back and forth between San Francisco and Boston. But the responsibility will be much heavier. It's one thing to be a guest conductor and be concerned only with musical things, quite another to be responsible for everything that happens. There aren't many who are great administrators and great conductors. Eugene Ormandy is, and George Szell was, but how many others? It seems you are either one or the other.

"My work in Boston is much easier because Maestro Steinberg made several important personnel changes. We have an excellent clarinet (Harold Wright) and a new first horn, a man from Denver I had wanted for my San Francisco orchestra. I feel that the Symphony is coming up."

Coming up, or waiting to be brought up, as the BSO trustees suggested in appointing him?

"No, no, it's coming up. There is a spirit there. They played very well last summer at Tanglewood," he smiles.

In Boston, Ozawa stamped his approval on Thomas' plan to hold concerts of new music in special settings. "I used to think the ideal way to present new music was by

Continued on Page 5, Col. 1

SEIJI OZAWA, guest conductor this week of the Philadelphia Orchestra: "It's one thing to be a guest conductor and be concerned only with musical things, quite another to be responsible for everything that happens."

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
M. 11,500

NOV 1972

New England Newsclip

(MUSIC) BY JOAN HIGGINS

AN SOS TO THE BSO

New music is needed to save the Symphony from extinction.

Dear Mr. Ozawa:

Since your appointment as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was announced last February, Boston has eagerly soaked up all scraps of information about you.

The enthusiasm of the musical community was catching, and now, with a full year left to wait until you assume your duties as Music Director, the Boston music lover feels like a child set before the Christmas tree who is told he can't open his gifts just yet. While keeping a firm hand on those gifts, the child feels compelled to confess to some sins. Honesty demands that certain unpleasant facts of life be told you. Mindful of what Rudolf Bing said of his successor at the Met ("The poor dear doesn't know what he's in for"), we must set your illusions straight.

In a recently published interview in the late Boston Review of the Arts, you stated a belief that "the Boston audience is one of the most educated, or most sophisticated audiences in many ways." You do us too much honor. We like to think we are.

But now we seem too removed from the mainstreams of musical thought, out of touch with the vital ideas that hammer and shape artistic trends, hopelessly unaware of the ferment and excitement that mark a truly creative musical center.

When you were asked if you had any plans to educate the Boston audience, you replied, "I don't think so." Yet we would hope that you would see to our education, for there are great gaps in our learning.

Confused by the hubbub and not knowing whom to believe, we have put our faith in the leading musical figures and hope that they will lead us out of the maze and unto musical enlightenment. But growing awareness brings us to this curious truth: They don't know whom to believe either. Or if these towering intellects know, they're not telling us. (Leonard Bernstein once uttered the classic put-down of new music on national television. The story goes that after playing a passage by the most influential composer of the 20th century, Arnold Schoenberg, he suggested, "Now, let's open the windows and let some air in.") As you can see, we're badly in need of education. We need the guidance of a great conductor and a great orchestra to state and interpret and cajole us into understanding new musical truths.

For a long while, Boston had such an orchestra and such a conductor. During Serge Koussevitzky's reign, the BSO had the reputation of being the finest orchestra in the world with a vital, innovative repertoire.

Even now, after a transitional period that has stretched into some 20 years, our first-chair players are among the greatest virtuosos in the world, our string section conceded to be the most ravishingly beautiful of any orchestra's, the individual musicianship of our orchestra members considered to be among the best in the nation.

What are the problems then? The problems are monumental ones that could well be the orchestra's undoing.

Boston, which spawned the august Boston Symphony Orchestra, is reluctant to admit that its offspring has any faults. But some citizens are beginning to wonder whether the kid isn't getting out of hand. Some disturbing symptoms, at first dismissed, are beginning to defy treatment: an inability to capture the interest of the young, a seemingly insatiable appetite for money, and—most significant of all—a tendency to withdraw from the musical realities of the 20th century back into the safe havens of 19th-century repertoire.

These withdrawal symptoms may be the deadliest and most insidious of all. For while money will solve many of the orchestra's problems, it may not ever reach the heart of the matter. For some time now, concerned observers have pointed to the BSO's retreat from any consistent encounters with contemporary music. Yet from its earliest beginnings in 1881 (when one out of five works was by a contemporary composer) and throughout the Koussevitzky era (when an estimated 38% of the repertoire was devoted to then contemporary works), the orchestra has had a long and brilliant history of introducing new works to an unwilling public. (Wagner was introduced at founder Henry Higginson's insistence, though he personally found his music distasteful. Brahms' Third Symphony was introduced to an audience that got up and left the hall by the hundreds.)

What has happened recently? Well, last year, one work by Boston composer Leon Kirchner was performed and another by Ned Rorem. That was about it for contemporary American composers in 1970-71.

This year's programming may send American contemporary composers marching en masse to the sea. This year, we find ourselves knee-deep in Beethoven—with the prospect of four symphonies, one piano concerto and one overture by the 19th century's most overpowering master. Further, we discover ourselves up to our ears in Wagner and Berlioz. Saddest of all, we detect only one new work to be premiered during the course of the entire season—a Flute Concerto composed by Walter Piston, a first-generation (now 79) American modernist. (That premiere, which opened the new season, marked at least the 21st time that the BSO has introduced a

Joan Higgins, a practicing musician with a Master of Music degree from the New England Conservatory of Music, was music/drama critic for the Townsman in Wellesley, and does free-lance musical criticism for the Boston Globe.

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 463,503 SUN. 867,810

NOV 12 1972

East, West Meet As Ozawa Opens New Boston Era

By DANIEL WEBSTER
Of The Inquirer Staff

Seiji Ozawa looks forward to the easy time ahead when he will be music director of only two orchestras and one summer festival season.

The conductor will reach that golden shore next fall, when he officially adds the music directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to his other title — music director of the San Francisco Symphony.

"It will be much easier for me — for us," he says after rehearsal with the Philadelphia Orchestra at the Academy. "Now, we are two weeks here, two weeks in Roma, a week there, until we don't know where we are."

We, now, is his wife and their 10-month-old daughter. On a half day's holiday here before his concerts, Ozawa says the family went shopping. "Baby shopping. Food, you know."

While that settling down will slow his travel pace, he is aware that the music world is watching his moves in Boston more than ever before. When he was chief in Toronto and then San Francisco, the Eastern music establishment looked for clues. Now, it looks for a renaissance, a new direction and vitality in an orchestra weakened by a long transition.

That transition ended last year when Ozawa was in Philadelphia. He left midway during his concerts here to be presented in Boston as the successor to William Steinberg.

"I never dreamed I would be music director there," he says. "When I was at Tanglewood as a student, I never thought it possible. Even when I was appointed the head of Tanglewood, it had not seemed possible to me. They have the tradition of the older, great maestro. But, once I was at Tanglewood, we worked very much together. The Symphony got to know me and I got to know it.

"I studied the situation a long time before I took the job. I wanted to see if it is really possible to be music director of both orchestras. I think it is possible.

"In Boston, I am fortunate to have Colin Davis as chief guest conductor, and Michael Thomas as associate. I will do six weeks, then go away while Colin is there for five weeks and Michael does some weeks. Then I will come back. Six weeks is for me about the right time. More than that, and the players are tired of you, need a change. If you do less, they see a new face on the podium every week or so and it is upsetting to them.

"I think this is the major change I will be bringing to Boston, the system of music director with chief guest conductor. It worked very well with Solti and Giulini in Chicago and I think it will be good in Boston. I think this is the only way American orchestras will go. I think it will come to Philadelphia, too.

"In a sense it will be easier, moving back and forth between San Francisco and Boston. But the responsibility will be much heavier. It's one thing to be a guest conductor and be concerned only with musical things, quite another to be responsible for everything that happens. There aren't many who are great administrators and great conductors. Eugene Ormandy is, and George Szell was, but how many others? It seems you are either one or the other.

"My work in Boston is much easier because Maestro Steinberg made several important personnel changes. We have an excellent clarinet (Harold Wright) and a new first horn, a man from Denver I had wanted for my San Francisco orchestra. I feel that the Symphony is coming up."

Coming up, or waiting to be brought up, as the BSO trustees suggested in appointing him?

"No, no, it's coming up. There is a spirit there. They played very well last summer at Tanglewood," he smiles.

In Boston, Ozawa stamped his approval on Thomas' plan to hold concerts of new music in special settings. "I used to think the ideal way to present new music was by

Continued on Page 5, Col. 1

SEIJI OZAWA, guest conductor this week of the Philadelphia Orchestra: "It's one thing to be a guest conductor and be concerned only with musical things, quite another to be responsible for everything that happens."

STON
STON, MASS.
11,500
1972
New England Newsclip

IN THE BIG BOYS

King and Company.

Steele becomes the biggest seller of oil packages to corporations and ...ons in the world—and by swinger ... the new Piston composition. Meanwhile, works of other American composers of perhaps greater stature—and certainly ones closer to the contemporary scene—go unplayed.)

We further learn, to our chagrin, that the liveliest programming of the season is more likely to be found in the 15 Youth Concerts sponsored by the orchestra. Here at least, some 20th century names crop up, as does the unlikely, but stimulating, presence of a rock group.

Ah ha, you say, but in its present leaderless state and with a battery of nine guest conductors, the orchestra cannot possibly attempt new works. Perhaps. But that is only a partial explanation, for the roots of the problem go far deeper. The coming season cannot so easily be explained away as yet another year of transition.

The underlying difficulty would seem to be in the lack of communication between the creators of music, the composers and the purveyors of music, the orchestra. This growing rift first came to the public's attention last summer at Tanglewood during a performance of a contemporary work by the BSO. To the delight of reporters and the consternation of the composer, staid BSO musicians were caught in the act of booing a work they were rehearsing.

Following this rehearsal, the orchestra gave the work—Charles Wuorinen's Concerto for Amplified Violin—what was from all accounts a rather rotten performance. The composer, a 1970 Pulitzer Prize-winner, did not retaliate by booing the orchestra. Rather he cast these far more damaging verbal barbs from the music pages of the New York Times: "What composers do determines everything about the world of music. . . . If today's orchestras manifest enough hostility to today's composers, if little enough new orchestral music is played, and if what does get played is distorted beyond all reason, then practical pressures will force composition decisions that will render the orchestra as obsolete as the sackbut."

First flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer, who witnessed the incident at Tanglewood, offers a logical explanation: Loudspeakers on stage were turned up so high that the players were in actual physical discomfort. "The musicians' ears were assaulted," she states. "Their hearing was threatened and I think they had every right to object in any way."

Composer Charles Wuorinen sees it differently: "The issue was that the orchestra did not want to spend the to any conscious effort to avoid the orchestral medium ("I would very much like to explore its possibilities"). Yet his highly acclaimed Exercises Enroute totally bypasses the orchestra and addresses itself to a small chamber group.

Our orchestra, often criticized for its obsession with the past, also runs the risk of staleness by its constant recycling. Leon Kirchner, Harvard's Pulitzer Prize-winning composer, points to the danger: "Without the constant stimuli of well-prepared contemporary scores," writes Dr. Kirchner, "the past will lose its quality as well [for] it depends vitally on renewed frames of reference."

And, Wuorinen's prediction to the contrary, present indications are that composers, disheartened by bleak performance prospects and even bleaker claims to financial security, will not outlast the orchestras. Rather, the composers will be consigned to musical oblivion through the neglect of orchestras and audiences.

Composer Robert Selig of the New England Conservatory insists that many gifted composers are abandoning serious composition, convinced the struggle is not worthwhile. Is that the orchestra's fault? To a large degree, believes Selig. "Everybody wants that big piece—with that big orchestra."

These highly creative men would seem to have something to say, Mr. Ozawa. The public may be ready to hear them. How shall we know unless the BSO performs its proper function as catalyst between the creator and the listener?

That, we hope, is where you come in. From your many appearances in Boston, we know what fire and life and sense of involvement you bring to a masterwork. We are less certain of your feelings toward music of our own time. Reports filtering back from San Francisco indicate that your symphony programs are, like the BSO's, heavily weighted toward the 19th century. An inaccurate assessment? We hope so.

In Koussevitzky's day (that recurring refrain), Boston audiences were introduced to such conspicuous American talents as Aaron Copland, William Schumann, Roy Harris, Lukas Foss. All right, and such minor ones as Paul Creston, George Foote, George Chadwick (how long since you've heard a Chadwick symphony?). But the point is, we heard much contemporary music, and were able to learn to discriminate between the good and the mediocre. We believe that you should give us that opportunity once again. There are some strong indications that the orchestra may be growing increasingly ready for such encounters.

Point. The Boston Chamber Players, the group composed of first-chair members of the orchestra, will present three new works by three Boston composers this season. Further, their repertoire of contemporary works is constantly growing, and their sympathy toward new music may eventually influence other orchestra members.

Point. Several young members of the orchestra have organized a splinter group entitled Collage which devotes itself exclusively to the performance of contemporary chamber music. Its programs shun the far-out avant-garde and touch base only with the finest examples of current contemporary repertoire.

Point. The three Spectrum concerts, born of economic necessity, have thus far displayed some imaginative programming on the part of principal guest conductor Michael Tilson Thomas. Choices of program are not directed particularly to contemporary repertoire, but lurch drunkenly from 16th-century court compositions to electronic shock treatments à la John Cage. Interesting.

Point. The Fromm Contemporary Music Festival Week, sponsored annually at Tanglewood by the BSO and philanthropist Paul Fromm, is growing steadily in popularity and repute. Last year, two young composers, Robert Selig and Fred Lehrdahl, received joint commissions from the BSO and the Fromm Foundation. These joint commissions represent virtually all the commissioning activities sponsored by the orchestra.

Point. One unpublicized boon for contemporary music that emerges yearly from Tanglewood's Berkshire Music Center is that young performers schooled there in the techniques of new music then go out and infiltrate symphony orchestras. In the last analysis, performers trained in the new demands of contemporary music may make all the difference. (Collage, for example, was formed by Berkshire Music Center graduates now with the BSO.)

The most dismal fact to surface among these hopeful developments is that out of a total 1970-71 symphony budget of more than $6 million, only about $20,000 was earmarked for contemporary music. In other words, the amount set aside for music to perpetuate itself amounted to approximately 1/30 of the total budget. Frightening?

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 463,503 SUN. 867,810

NOV 12 1972 Beckelle

East, West Meet As Ozawa Opens New Boston Era

By DANIEL WEBSTER
Of The Inquirer Staff

Seiji Ozawa looks forward to the easy time ahead when he will be music director of only two orchestras and one summer festival season.

The conductor will reach that golden shore next fall, when he officially adds the music directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to his other title — music director of the San Francisco Symphony.

"It will be much easier for me — for us," he says after rehearsal with the Philadelphia Orchestra at the Academy. "Now, we are two weeks here, two weeks in Roma, a week there, until we don't know where we are."

We, now, is his wife and their 10-month-old daughter. On a half day's holiday here before his concerts, Ozawa says the family went shopping. "Baby shopping. Food, you know."

While that settling down will slow his travel pace, he is aware that the music world is watching his moves in Boston more than ever before. When he was chief in Toronto and then San Francisco, the Eastern music establishment looked for clues. Now, it looks for a renaissance, a new direction and vitality in an orchestra weakened by a long transition.

That transition ended last year when Ozawa was in Philadelphia. He left midway during his concerts here to be presented in Boston as the successor to William Steinberg.

"I never dreamed I would be music director there," he says. "When I was at Tanglewood as a student, I never thought it possible. Even when I was appointed the head of Tanglewood, it had not seemed possible to me. They have the tradition of the older, great maestro. But, once I was at Tanglewood, we worked very much together. The Symphony got to know me and I got to know it.

"I studied the situation a long time before I took the job. I wanted to see if it is really possible to be music director of both orchestras. I think it is possible.

"In Boston, I am fortunate to have Colin Davis as chief guest conductor, and Michael Thomas as associate. I will do six weeks, then go away while Colin is there for five weeks and Michael does some weeks. Then I will come back. Six weeks is for me about the right time. More than that, and the players are tired of you, need a change. If you do less, they see a new face on the podium every week or so and it is upsetting to them.

"I think this is the major change I will be bringing to Boston, the system of music director with chief guest conductor. It worked very well with Solti and Giulini in Chicago and I think it will be good in Boston. I think this is the only way American orchestras will go. I think it will come to Philadelphia, too.

"In a sense it will be easier, moving back and forth between San Francisco and Boston. But the responsibility will be much heavier. It's one thing to be a guest conductor and be concerned only with musical things, quite another to be responsible for everything that happens. There aren't many who are great administrators and great conductors. Eugene Ormandy is, and George Szell was, but how many others? It seems you are either one or the other.

"My work in Boston is much easier because Maestro Steinberg made several important personnel changes. We have an excellent clarinet (Harold Wright) and a new first horn, a man from Denver I had wanted for my San Francisco orchestra. I feel that the Symphony is coming up."

Coming up, or waiting to be brought up, as the BSO trustees suggested in appointing him?

"No, no, it's coming up. There is a spirit there. They played very well last summer at Tanglewood," he smiles.

In Boston, Ozawa stamped his approval on Thomas' plan to hold concerts of new music in special settings. "I used to think the ideal way to present new music was by

Continued on Page 5, Col. 1

SEIJI OZAWA, guest conductor this week of the Philadelphia Orchestra: "It's one thing to be a guest conductor and be concerned only with musical things, quite another to be responsible for everything that happens."

N
N, MASS.
500
72
New England
Newsclip

time dealing with [the music]."

Though this particular incident may have been unduly magnified, it nevertheless tells us something of the virulence of opposition to new music from some—but by no means all—members of the orchestra. Further, it raises many lines of speculation regarding the present incompatibility of composer and performer. Has their traditional partnership reached the stand-off stage of a Western movie with each side intent on picking off the other? What of deeper significance does this minor skirmish tell us about the contemporary music scene?

Plenty.

The recent bloodletting points to a major problem experienced by contemporary composers: the problem of somehow extracting from an orchestra an adequate performance of a contemporary work. There are others.

In Boston, one of the primary problems is persuading the orchestra to deal with contemporary music at all. Even when it does tackle a contemporary score, rarely does it schedule reperformances in successive seasons though contemporary works, with their complex, intricate structures, demand repeated hearings for understanding and acceptance.

Boston composers are well aware of the depth and urgency of the problem. Composer Donald Martino, head of the New England Conservatory's composition department, believes that while it is unfair to lay the blame of tired repertoire exclusively on the BSO ("It is all part of an enormous cultural problem"), nevertheless the BSO does far less than other orchestras in performing and commissioning new works—far less, certainly, than the Chicago Symphony, for example.

The neglect of one of Boston's most outstanding composers, Seymour Shifrin, is rapidly becoming an embarrassment to the city. This year, Shifrin's Three Pieces for Orchestra won the Koussevitzky International Recording Award. Some years back, he received the Boston Symphony Horblit Award for "influential contributions to symphonic music." The BSO has yet to perform a single composition by Seymour Shifrin.

More and more, established composers are turning away from the orchestra, or else they write only on specific commission or when a performance is virtually assured. The BSO's one concrete effort to reverse this trend—its pilot project for a composer-in-residence—fizzled after two years.

Harvard's Earl Kim does not admit to any conscious effort to avoid the orchestral medium ("I would very much like to explore its possibilities"). Yet his highly acclaimed Exercises Enroute totally bypasses the orchestra and addresses itself to a small chamber group.

Our orchestra, often criticized for its obsession with the past, also runs the risk of staleness by its constant recycling. Leon Kirchner, Harvard's Pulitzer Prize-winning composer, points to the danger: "Without the constant stimuli of well-prepared contemporary scores," writes Dr. Kirchner, "the past will lose its quality as well [for] it depends vitally on renewed frames of reference."

And, Wuorinen's prediction to the contrary, present indications are that composers, disheartened by bleak performance prospects and even bleaker claims to financial security, will not outlast the orchestras. Rather, the composers will be consigned to musical oblivion through the neglect of orchestras and audiences.

Composer Robert Selig of the New England Conservatory insists that many gifted composers are abandoning serious composition, convinced the struggle is not worthwhile. Is that the orchestra's fault? To a large degree, believes Selig. "Everybody wants that big piece—with that big orchestra."

These highly creative men would seem to have something to say, Mr. Ozawa. The public may be ready to hear them. How shall we know unless the BSO performs its proper function as catalyst between the creator and the listener?

That, we hope, is where you come in. From your many appearances in Boston, we know what fire and life and sense of involvement you bring to a masterwork. We are less certain of your feelings toward music of our own time. Reports filtering back from San Francisco indicate that your symphony programs are, like the BSO's, heavily weighted toward the 19th century. An inaccurate assessment? We hope so.

In Koussevitzky's day (that recurring refrain), Boston audiences were introduced to such conspicuous American talents as Aaron Copland, William Schumann, Roy Harris, Lukas Foss. All right, and such minor ones as Paul Creston, George Foote, George Chadwick (how long since you've heard a Chadwick symphony?). But the point is, we heard much contemporary music, and were able to learn to discriminate between the good and the mediocre. We believe that you should give us that opportunity once again. There are some strong indications that the orchestra may be growing increasingly ready for such encounters.

Point. The Boston Chamber Players, the group composed of first-chair members of the orchestra, will present three new works by three Boston composers this season. Further, their repertoire of contemporary works is constantly growing, and their sympathy toward new music may eventually influence other orchestra members.

Point. Several young members of the orchestra have organized a splinter group entitled Collage which devotes itself exclusively to the performance of contemporary chamber music. Its programs shun the far-out avant-garde and touch base only with the finest examples of current contemporary repertoire.

Point. The three Spectrum concerts, born of economic necessity, have thus far displayed some imaginative programming on the part of principal guest conductor Michael Tilson Thomas. Choices of program are not directed particularly to contemporary repertoire, but lurch drunkenly from 16th-century court compositions to electronic shock treatments à la John Cage. Interesting.

Point. The Fromm Contemporary Music Festival Week, sponsored annually at Tanglewood by the BSO and philanthropist Paul Fromm, is growing steadily in popularity and repute. Last year, two young composers, Robert Selig and Fred Lehrdahl, received joint commissions from the BSO and the Fromm Foundation. These joint commissions represent virtually all the commissioning activities sponsored by the orchestra.

Point. One unpublicized boon for contemporary music that emerges yearly from Tanglewood's Berkshire Music Center is that young performers schooled there in the techniques of new music then go out and infiltrate symphony orchestras. In the last analysis, performers trained in the new demands of contemporary music may make all the difference. (Collage, for example, was formed by Berkshire Music Center graduates now with the BSO.)

The most dismal fact to surface among these hopeful developments is that out of a total 1970-71 symphony budget of more than $6 million, only about $20,000 was earmarked for contemporary music. In other words, the amount set aside for music to perpetuate itself amounted to approximately 1/30 of the total budget. Frightening?

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 463,503 SUN. 867,810

NOV 12 1972 Bulletin

East, West Meet As Ozawa Opens New Boston Era

By DANIEL WEBSTER
Of The Inquirer Staff

Seiji Ozawa looks forward to the easy time ahead when he will be music director of only two orchestras and one summer festival season.

The conductor will reach that golden shore next fall, when he officially adds the music directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to his other title — music director of the San Francisco Symphony.

"It will be much easier for me — for us," he says after rehearsal with the Philadelphia Orchestra at the Academy. "Now, we are two weeks here, two weeks in Roma, a week there, until we don't know where we are."

We, now, is his wife and their 10-month-old daughter. On a half day's holiday here before his concerts, Ozawa says the family went shopping. "Baby shopping. Food, you know."

While that settling down will slow his travel pace, he is aware that the music world is watching his moves in Boston more than ever before. When he was chief in Toronto and then San Francisco, the Eastern music establishment looked for clues. Now, it looks for a renaissance, a new direction and vitality in an orchestra weakened by a long transition.

That transition ended last year when Ozawa was in Philadelphia. He left midway during his concerts here to be presented in Boston as the successor to William Steinberg.

"I never dreamed I would be music director there," he says. "When I was at Tanglewood as a student, I never thought it possible. Even when I was appointed the head of Tanglewood, it had not seemed possible to me. They have the tradition of the older, great maestro. But, once I was at Tanglewood, we worked very much together. The Symphony got to know me and I got to know it.

"I studied the situation a long time before I took the job. I wanted to see if it is really possible to be music director of both orchestras. I think it is possible.

"In Boston, I am fortunate to have Colin Davis as chief guest conductor, and Michael Thomas as associate. I will do six weeks, then go away while Colin is there for five weeks and Michael does some weeks. Then I will come back. Six weeks is for me about the right time. More than that, and the players are tired of you, need a change. If you do less, they see a new face on the podium every week or so and it is upsetting to them.

"I think this is the major change I will be bringing to Boston, the system of music director with chief guest conductor. It worked very well with Solti and Giulini in Chicago and I think it will be good in Boston. I think this is the only way American orchestras will go. I think it will come to Philadelphia, too.

"In a sense it will be easier, moving back and forth between San Francisco and Boston. But the responsibility will be much heavier. It's one thing to be a guest conductor and be concerned only with musical things, quite another to be responsible for everything that happens. There aren't many who are great administrators and great conductors. Eugene Ormandy is, and George Szell was, but how many others? It seems you are either one or the other.

"My work in Boston is much easier because Maestro Steinberg made several important personnel changes. We have an excellent clarinet (Harold Wright) and a new first horn, a man from Denver I had wanted for my San Francisco orchestra. I feel that the Symphony is coming up."

Coming up, or waiting to be brought up, as the BSO trustees suggested in appointing him?

"No, no, it's coming up. There is a spirit there. They played very well last summer at Tanglewood," he smiles.

In Boston, Ozawa stamped his approval on Thomas' plan to hold concerts of new music in special settings. "I used to think the ideal way to present new music was by

Continued on Page 5, Col. 1

SEIJI OZAWA, guest conductor this week of the Philadelphia Orchestra: "It's one thing to be a guest conductor and be concerned only with musical things, quite another to be responsible for everything that happens."

time dealing with [the music]."

Though this particular incident may have been unduly magnified, it nevertheless tells us something of the virulence of opposition to new music from some—but by no means all—members of the orchestra. Further, it raises many lines of speculation regarding the present incompatibility of composer and performer. Has their traditional partnership reached the stand-off stage of a Western movie with each side intent on picking off the other? What of deeper significance does this minor skirmish tell us about the contemporary music scene?

Plenty.

The recent bloodletting points to a major problem experienced by contemporary composers: the problem of somehow extracting from an orchestra an adequate performance of a contemporary work. There are others.

In Boston, one of the primary problems is persuading the orchestra to deal with contemporary music at all. Even when it does tackle a contemporary score, rarely does it schedule reperformances in successive seasons though contemporary works, with their complex, intricate structures, demand repeated hearings for understanding and acceptance.

Boston composers are well aware of the depth and urgency of the problem. Composer Donald Martino, head of the New England Conservatory's composition department, believes that while it is unfair to lay the blame of tired repertoire exclusively on the BSO ("It is all part of an enormous cultural problem"), nevertheless the BSO does far less than other orchestras in performing and commissioning new works—far less, certainly, than the Chicago Symphony, for example.

The neglect of one of Boston's most outstanding composers, Seymour Shifrin, is rapidly becoming an embarrassment to the city. This year, Shifrin's Three Pieces for Orchestra won the Koussevitzky International Recording Award. Some years back, he received the Boston Symphony Horblit Award for "influential contributions to symphonic music." The BSO has yet to perform a single composition by Seymour Shifrin.

More and more, established composers are turning away from the orchestra, or else they write only on specific commission or when a performance is virtually assured. The BSO's one concrete effort to reverse this trend—its pilot project for a composer-in-residence—fizzled after two years.

Harvard's Earl Kim does not admit to any conscious effort to avoid the orchestral medium ("I would very much like to explore its possibilities"). Yet his highly acclaimed Exercises Enroute totally bypasses the orchestra and addresses itself to a small chamber group.

Our orchestra, often criticized for its obsession with the past, also runs the risk of staleness by its constant recycling. Leon Kirchner, Harvard's Pulitzer Prize-winning composer, points to the danger: "Without the constant stimuli of well-prepared contemporary scores," writes Dr. Kirchner, "the past will lose its quality as well [for] it depends vitally on renewed frames of reference."

And, Wuorinen's prediction to the contrary, present indications are that composers, disheartened by bleak performance prospects and even bleaker claims to financial security, will not outlast the orchestras. Rather, the composers will be consigned to musical oblivion through the neglect of orchestras and audiences.

Composer Robert Selig of the New England Conservatory insists that many gifted composers are abandoning serious composition, convinced the struggle is not worthwhile. Is that the orchestra's fault? To a large degree, believes Selig. "Everybody wants that big piece—with that big orchestra."

These highly creative men would seem to have something to say, Mr. Ozawa. The public may be ready to hear them. How shall we know unless the BSO performs its proper function as catalyst between the creator and the listener?

That, we hope, is where you come in. From your many appearances in Boston, we know what fire and life and sense of involvement you bring to a masterwork. We are less certain of your feelings toward music of our own time. Reports filtering back from San Francisco indicate that your symphony programs are, like the BSO's, heavily weighted toward the 19th century. An inaccurate assessment? We hope so.

In Koussevitzky's day (that recurring refrain), Boston audiences were introduced to such conspicuous American talents as Aaron Copland, William Schumann, Roy Harris, Lukas Foss. All right, and such minor ones as Paul Creston, George Foote, George Chadwick (how long since you've heard a Chadwick symphony?). But the point is, we heard much contemporary music, and were able to learn to discriminate between the good and the mediocre. We believe that you should give us that opportunity once again. There are some strong indications that the orch... may be growing increasingly ready for such encounters.

Point. The Boston Chamber Players, the group composed of first-chair members of the orchestra, will present three new works by three Boston composers this season. Further, their repertoire of contemporary works is constantly growing, and their sympathy toward new music may eventually influence other orchestra members.

Point. Several young members of the orchestra have organized a splinter group entitled Collage which devotes itself exclusively to the performance of contemporary chamber music. Its programs shun the far-out avant-garde and touch base only with the finest examples of current contemporary repertoire.

Point. The three Spectrum concerts, born of economic necessity, have thus far displayed some imaginative programming on the part of principal guest conductor Michael Tilson Thomas. Choices of program are not directed particularly to contemporary repertoire, but lurch drunkenly from 16th-century court compositions to electronic shock treatments à la John Cage. Interesting.

Point. The Fromm Contemporary Music Festival Week, sponsored annually at Tanglewood by the BSO and philanthropist Paul Fromm, is growing steadily in popularity and repute. Last year, two young composers, Robert Selig and Fred Lehrdahl, received joint commissions from the BSO and the Fromm Foundation. These joint commissions represent virtually all the commissioning activities sponsored by the orchestra.

Point. One unpublicized boon for contemporary music that emerges yearly from Tanglewood's Berkshire Music Center is that young performers schooled there in the techniques of new music then go out and infiltrate symphony orchestras. In the last analysis, performers trained in the new demands of contemporary music may make all the difference. (Collage, for example, was formed by Berkshire Music Center graduates now with the BSO.)

The most dismal fact to surface among these hopeful developments is that out of a total 1970-71 symphony budget of more than $6 million, only about $20,000 was earmarked for contemporary music. In other words, the amount set aside for music to perpetuate itself amounted to approximately 1/30 of the total budget. Frightening?

Ozawa, East Meets West As a New Era Begins in Boston

Continued from First Page

choosing ten pieces and then putting one in this program and other in that one so that the audiences could hear them but still hear the traditional music. Now, composers write for small groups, seven instruments, solos, chamber orchestra, and I think this music should be played by small groups. Why put them in the orchestra program?

"Leon Fleisher is doing this kind of thing for us now in San Francisco. Half the orchestra plays in the fall opera season, while the others play in this new series. They have always played school concerts or pops concerts before and have been tired at the start of the season.

"I think they will be fresh and ready for our season to begin this year. I think, though, that this is a very expensive series, but I am happy Leon has done it for us."

Ozawa's appointment in San Francisco has had important effects. The orchestra has returned to recording for the first time since Pierre Monteux conducted, and it has been chosen for a seven-week tour of Europe and Russia next year. "I am very proud," he says. "We are the first to go under the resumed cultural exchange program with Russia.

"I am getting worried. I want to take young American conductors with me, but everybody wants me to conduct. It is getting very difficult."

As Boston's pre-eminent musician, Ozawa will set the tone of the Tanglewood season as well. "I want to bring the Symphony and the school closer together. It is nice to conduct a concert in the shed and know that just across the way, the students are getting something very exciting ready.

"When you think only a few years ago, Koussevitzky conducted, ran the school, taught. I'd like to get back to that, but I am not a teacher. It is good for the Symphony to be close to the students, and I think that will be true. Gunther (Schuller, co-director of Tanglewood) and I speak the same language and understand each other well. Now Lenny (Bernstein) is very interested in the school, but he doesn't have time to teach all summer, and the conductors I ask to work with the Symphony are working with the students. I think that is good.

"All this will work if I can find time to rest in between concerts. I must find time."

Ozawa says now that he has begun to understand the differences between East Coast American and West Coast America. "It is almost like different countries," he says. "I like both, but I think neither understands the other.

"I had to move from the Barclay to the Bellevue because I had to wear a tie and jacket at the Barclay. That is something that wouldn't be a problem in San Francisco. The differences are interesting. My wife likes Boston because of the young people who are involved in everything."

Ozawa took a western idea back to Japan last year when the Japan Philharmonic — his third orchestra — was faced with financial disaster because of the cutoff of funds from television broadcasting. He took the audacious step of speaking to the Emperor at an audience. It made headlines, but did not affect his orchestra, which has since gone to court and carried on a sit-in at the TV central.

The result?

"I'm out of a job," says Ozawa.

The Boston Globe
(EVENING)
D. 195,032
NOV 22 1972
New England Newsclip

Bernstein conducts the BSO---no lack of energy

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Leonard Bernstein came to the Boston Symphony last night for the first in a series of concerts, and instantly there was that sense of occasion and festivity which his presence uniquely calls up. The program: Mozart's or, Symphony No. 40 in G minor, the Prelude and Love-Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" and the three big orchestral movements from the Berlioz "Romeo et Juliette" Symphony.

Bernstein played the Mozart as an expansive, big piece. Tempi were broad, more so maybe than what Mozart had in mind, for example, specifying "allegro molto" in cut time for the first movement, but Bernstein made a strong case for what he was about. The largeness of the phrases was impressive, and at the same time there was room for projecting lots of detail.

There was no lack of energy in forward motion.

Where a more consciously stylish performance would put the center of gravity into the first movement, Bernstein read the symphony in a more Beethovenian way as a work in which everything builds up to a climactic finale.

Up to a point the G minor supports such an interpretation — the last movement certainly has the most adventurous harmonies and rhythms, and, both by careful scene-setting as well as an extraordinary sense of the moment, Bernstein made the fierce unison passage at the beginning of the development sound shocking again. He also gave the work rather special proportions by making the conventional repeat of the first movement exposition, going through the Andante with no repeat, and then repeating both halves of the finale.

There was bigness to the sonority, too, which threatened to be a bit string-heavy at first as well as sometimes tense in violin tone, but which soon settled into something rich and handsome. A reading at once individual, questionable and convincing.

To the Wagner, Bernstein brought all the intensity you would expect, but an extraordinary measure of patience and control as well. This daringly slow performance shared with the Mozart symphony an amazing and exciting sense of newness.

One aspect of the "Tristan" music that reached me particularly this time was the delicacy and economy of Wagner's scoring: it is so rich, which is what you remember, but so clean and so much without an unnecessary note, and that you rarely get to hear. It was a performance that proceeded from a complete identification with "Tristan," and it was at the same time a very great orchestral achievement.

The Berlioz performances offered a more mixed package. The sequence leading from Romeo alone, his sadness, to the ball at the Capulets, went wonderfully, with beautiful restraint in the quiet, proto-Tristan scene at the beginning, and tremendous verve for the dance music.

When the Queen Mab scherzo gets into its stranger fantasies toward the end, there was humor and sharp characterization, but much of it was badly wanting in delicacy and sometimes even precision. The Love Scene I found least convincing, too open, too heavily leaned into, never piaissimo enough, the requests for slight retards read as grinding halts, all that producing ten minutes of sensuously gorgeous music and missing almost every element that makes this so special in its mixture of painful ardor, tenderness, and delicacy. Incidentally Bernstein, for the sake presumably of having a brilliant ending to the concert, did not play the excerpts in the order in which they occur in the symphony, and I must say I found it a touch disorienting to have a love scene before the lovers have as much as seen each other.

The program is repeated tonight at 8:30. It is given also on Friday at 2, Saturday at 8:30, and Tuesday, Dec. 5, at 7:30 with Debussy's "Faun" and Ravel's "Rapsodie espagnole" replacing the Mozart.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
NOV 24 1972
New England Newsclip

Bernstein-BSO's happy Symphony Hall reunion

By Louis Snyder

Leonard Bernstein and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have maintained a long-standing friendship, which in their infrequent meetings over the past few years has produced some rare performances.

Now that Mr. Bernstein has become Professor Bernstein for 1972-73 in the Charles Eliot Norton Chair at Harvard across the Charles, he and BSO musicians are becoming reacquainted at leisure. On Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, at Symphony Hall, he conducted the first program in a series of five (to be repeated substantially this afternoon, tomorrow evening, and on Dec. 5), leaving no doubt of the mutual renewal of musical rapport on the concert platform, or with sold-out houses, for that matter.

* * *

It is perhaps redundant to remark that Mr. Bernstein is a musician's musician, a listener's mentor, an artist for all seasons. If his innate spontaneity sometimes takes the outward form of a spectacular podium performance, which some of the untutored come to observe, it soon becomes apparent that Mr. Bernstein is serving the music at hand, first and foremost, let visual extravagances fall where they may.

On Tuesday, Mr. Bernstein and the orchestra were beginning a reunion which must, by now, be progressing at full speed. There was something of the cautious, if confident, approach to Mozart's G minor Symphony (No. 40, K. 550). This is a familiar one, very often whisked through as an example, in all its perfection, as Exhibit A in late 18th-century compositional style. Mr. Bernstein's interpretation, however, examined it more closely. There was a real attempt to extract from each of the four movements its individual musical pertinence, and a complementary assist through well chosen tempos. This was not Mozart the charmer, but the composer suddenly revealed to have a vital, serious side.

In the Prelude and Liebstod from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," there was a closer bond between conductor and musicians. The music surged and soared with much greater facility than in the Mozart, and Mr. Bernstein's expressed ideas about Wagner's music drama offered a delectable idea of what his potential as a conductor of Wagnerian opera will be.

After intermission, three orchestral excerpts from Berlioz's "Romeo et Juliette" revealed Mr. Bernstein as he is best known with the BSO — for his uncanny ability to fashion the large-scale musical concept — like Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony, the Beethoven Ninth and Missa Solemnis — which have been among his latest performances with the orchestra.

While the orchestral excerpts represent only a fraction of the Berlioz Shakespearean realization, Mr. Bernstein played them as part of a boundless whole — rich-voiced, romantic, and theatrically oriented. With the orchestra and its soloists rising to each occasion, he matched the Berlioz inspiration with velvet sound in the love scene and Capulet's deserted garden, with an electric and technically amazing Queen Mab scherzo, and finally in a masterfully built transition from Romeo's reverie to the breathless exuberance of the ball at the Capulets.

Perhaps for the first time in the program, the means used to weave the spell were lost in the sheer splendor of sound, and the Bernstein image became one with the music itself. Friendship can ask no more than the response of the orchestra to their guest conductor in this dazzling Berlioz score.

In the remaining concerts today and tomorrow, and on Dec. 5, the Berlioz and Wagner selections will be played, with Debussy's Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun, and Ravel's Rapsodie Espagnol replacing the Mozart Symphony.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
NOV 25 1972
New England Newsclip

Bernstein graces 'Faun' prelude

By Michael Steinberg, Globe Staff

Leonard Bernstein again conducted the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon, keeping the "Tristan" Prelude and Love-Death and orchestral excerpts from Berlioz's "Romeo et Juliette" from Tuesday's and Wednesday's program, but substituting Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" and the Ravel "Rapsodie Espagnole" for the Mozart G minor.

The "Faun" was beautiful, with the freshness of a premiere, but of course with the assurance of something long settled in the muscles of face and hands. Bernstein found the dance in the piece and gave it a delicious, lilting grace. He also provided the sonorous analog to his special sense of the work's gait: less lush than usual, this "Faun," in the transparence of its polyphony of textures, seemed to look far forward to the Debussy of "Jeux" and of the great piano Study in Contrasted Sonorities. A "Faun," in sum, whose compelling sensuality was in the suppleness, the iridescence of its rhythms and textures — beautifully played by the orchestra, and with Mrs. Dwyer's flute solo especially lovely.

Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole," which presents a most beguiling surface but then not a lot else, wants a virtuoso orchestra—specifically one that can play with nearly uncanny delicacy — and a conductor who is good at dance music. Yesterday it had both, and my only reservation about an extremely successful performance about the Habanera, which I thought fussy, Spanish to self-conscious excess.

The "Tristan" Prelude, conducted and played with passion and control, was as beautiful as it had been Tuesday; the "Liebestod," however, Bernstein chopped at strangely instead of letting, or making, it go according to its own natural tides, and it failed to convince. The playing was a bit on the rough side, too, with the very end really spoiled by the uncertain attack and the out-of-tuneness with each other of the two oboes in that D sharp so miraculously suspended between the last two B major chords (one of the players involved later making a big intonational blot at the end of Berlioz's "Tristesse"). As for the Berlioz in general, there was again the puzzling discrepancy between the sensibility of Bernstein's handling of the "Romeo seul—Tristesses" sequence and the heavily emphatic playing of much of the Love Music, but with "Queen Mab" done this time with sufficient lightness and brilliance all the way through.

A footnote: Bernstein's programs have been made up with a view to assembling material for his Norton lectures at Harvard, rather than with regard for their own internal balances. At least it seems to me that Bernstein, who has good program sense, would not normally put "Tristan" and the Berlioz on the same program, nor dampen the effect of "Queen Mab's antique cymbals by anticipating that rare and special sound (in Debussy's "Faun").

And another: I thought it sad to see outside the hall a long line of people who would have given a lot to get in, then on the inside to see three or four dozen empty seats belonging to subscribers away for the weekend and lacking whatever faculty would have prompted them to phone and release those seats (to say nothing of the women trooping out all through the Berlioz).

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885
NOV 26 1972
New England Newsclip

BSO Concert Video-Taped

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

As part of the Charles Eliot Norton lecture series which he will deliver in the spring, Leonard Bernstein will offer a number of video-taped musical examples recorded during two Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts which he is conducting this week and next at Symphony Hall.

The first concerts Tuesday, Wednesday and yesterday were given over to what you might call the textbook classics—works of great historical significance which every music student encounters at some point in his training.

Yesterday they included Wagner's Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde"; Debussy's "Prelude a l'apres-midi d'un faune"; Ravel's "Rapsodie espagnole"; and Berlioz' Three Excerpts from "Romeo et Juliette."

For any other reason than Bernstein's didactic one, such a program would be impossible. The works, certainly established masterpieces, are all too alike in the way they exploit the orchestra's brilliant palette. There is too much grand statement and overt drama. Each would fit comfortably on a program balanced by selections from the 18th Century repertory or somesuch as is customary.

Nevertheless, one isn't supposed to take this programming seriously because of the practical purpose — the video-taping — the concert is to serve.

As for the performances, I'm not sure how much Bernstein's pedagogical spirit had to do with it, but there were no real examples of the eccentricity which a Bernstein interpretation can have. The readings were straightforward and clearly articulated with some brilliant playing by the musicians. What eccentricity there was was pretty much limited to Bernstein's conducting technique which is characterized by stamping feet, a few steps of hip-swinging Spanish dance (in the Ravel), and a guaranteed leap in the air for just about every movement.

• Concert Review

His way with the "Tristan" Prelude is to take things very slowly, increasing the tension already written into the harmony and to gradually move to a dynamic climax that seems even more immense than usual. The Liebestod is somewhat disappointing in that it never becomes as ecstatic as it might — which may be due to the sonic gap created when instruments are substituted for the soprano's part.

The Debussy was beautifully played, with fine woodwind solos, particularly by Doriot Anthony Dwyer. However, the antique spell of the piece was never really achieved because of the rather casual observance of dynamics, most especially on the piano side of the scale.

The remaining works by Ravel and Berlioz were quite spectacular.

36.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790

NOV 26 1972

Boston Symphony on LI

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Steinberg to conduct at C. W. Post Center

Sunday Press
MUSIC

By CHARLOTTE AMES

The Boston Symphony comes to Long Island Saturday night in a stirring program under the baton of William Steinberg, its music director.

He'll conduct this great orchestra in Wagner's Overture to the Flying Dutchman, Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5, and Vaughn-Williams Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis.

This is another in the fine varied offerings of Island Concert Hall. It starts at 8:40 p.m. at C.W. Post Center in Brookville. Reserved seats are $8 (students and senior citizens, $5).

Charlotte Ames

WILLIAM STEINBERG
Conductor, Boston Symphony

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
D. 84,000

NOV 29 1972 New England Newsclip

Michael Tilson Thomas Shows His Conductorial Virtuosity

Michael Tilson Thomas, who is reckoned among the foremost conductorial prodigies (one might even say the Bernstein of the 70s), conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra concert last evening in Woolsey hall, thus affording many area music afficionados their first exposure to his methods, present capacity, and potential.

During an evening of works by Beethoven, Piston and Strauss, the slight young conductor whose responsibilities include the music directorship of the Buffalo Philharmonic and principal guest conductor of the Boston ensemble, largely lived up to his much heralded promise — provided of course, that the eyes were tight shut against his excessive podium mannerisms and motions.

Crisp, Muscular Playing

Generally Mr. Thomas drew a full, bright and somewhat athletic sound from "the Aristocrat of Orchestras"; on second thought, perhaps this sort of playing might better be described as crystal clear, crisp and taut. In any event, the band from the "home of the bean and the cod" responded with the calibre of tone and precision which is expected of an orchestra of the first rank.

Mr. Thomas is usually considerate of individual composer's styles and the architecture of whatever score with which he is dealing. However he does seem to favor dramatics and strenuous tempi, which occassionally resulted in a sense of strain, particularly during Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 where some sectional inbalances also came to light. Perhaps needless to say, even when one did not entirely agree with his methods, dullness is not a factor in Mr. Thomas' interpretations. I particularly liked his assured rhythmic sense and the fashion in which he maintained the cementing presence of the melodic line, obvious or underlying.

Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture was given a grimly dramatic reading, with tension continuously mounting and an inherent sense of motion; the lyrical episodes were not lingered over, but then, the conductor's modus operandi did not lead one to expect any other approach.

Daemonic Strauss

Much the same state of affairs prevailed in Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," wherein the scamp of folk lore more often than not acquired a daemonic rather than merely mischievous character.

The Beethoven symphony, which is often thought to be the apotheosis of the dance is no less, perhaps even more so, the epitome of rhythm, and Mr. Thomas's rhythms were nothing less than emphatic and brimming with forward thrust and relentless energy. In addition to the occasional sectional imbalances mentioned apriori, the conductor sometimes demanded tempi so exacting that ensemble tone became harsh and the sense of iron control tended to crush the rhythmic element. While the melodic bubbling of the third movement was well enough served, the finale ascended to such heights of climatic utterance that the whole momentarily assumed the character of a raging storm at sea.

In sharp contrast to the sound theatrics, Walter Piston's Concerto for Flute and Orchestra, composed last year, proved to be an agreeable demonstration of the flute's capacity as a solo instrument. Solo instrument and orchestra are intended to function in partnership, with the flutist required to exhibit a variety of scale runs, trills, et al. Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flutist for the orchestra, was equal to the occasion, demonstrating complete mastery over the material entrusted her. Nonetheless, there can be little question that the concerto is not one of Piston's most significant works; for all that, its goal was more than adequately established, and the orchestra was not remiss in dischsrging its responsibility.

Whatever his present overindulgences, Mr. Thomas is clearly a conductor who will rank high in the annals of music; indeed, he is clearly well on the road, and it is to be hoped that maturity will be attained without interference stemming from his predisposition to the theatrical.

—RICHARD DAY

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
D. 114,000

NOV 30 1972 New England Newsclip

At The Concert

Rehearsal Vs. Performance

During performances as opposed to rehearsals, a conductor's work is different, in many respects, and the debate goes on as to which efforts ultimately more important. Though I tned towards the corner that places greater emphasis on what transpires before the audience even enters the scene, the element of performance night chemistry cannot be minimized in terms of orchestral playing that moves beyond the authentic and transcends what is merely competent and professional.

While it was obvious last night at Woosley Hall that young conductor Michael Tilson Thomas had done his homework with both the music at hand and the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his podium manner embodied an amalgum of wind-up toy gyrating and athletic elan that was at times only mildly disconcerting while at others — as during the final movement of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony — much like a parody. I have no doubts concerning Mr. Thomas's immersion in the re-creative act nor do I question has artistic integrity or ability. But I frequently found that his flamboyance got between me and the music. And, more importantly, I had the distinct feeling that, for the most part, the performances would have gone as well without so much of it. Perhaps better.

Beethovan's Egmont overture opened the program, and it was an accord that appropriately streesed drama — clearly one of Mr. Thomas's major aesthetic considerations throughout the evening. Contrasts were deeply etched and if the opening chords centering around F. minor were too softly contoured, the motor driven material that forms the bulk of the work-particularly the closing Allegro con brio — was spun out with compelling demonic force.

Walter Piston's recent Concert for Flute and Orchestra (1971) received its first New Haven performance and featured the orchestra's excellent principal flutist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer. Though Mrs. Dwyer made as much as she could of the several solo cadenzas and recitative — like spans, there is precious little about the musci that is either arresting or memorable. Sketchy use is made of the orchestral forces, and, indeed, this listener was left with the feeling that — even in the presence of such solid craft — the music itself seemed more like a sketch than a finished composition.

If one does not tatally share Mr. Thomas's feelings about Beethoven's Seventh Symphony — and this listener must be counted among those who do not — his feelings about it are at least his own. And bless him for that. This was no routine reading of the music that reportedly led Weber to express the opinion tha Beethoven was ripe for the madhouse (telling more about Weber's lack of perception than the music), and even when one sensed that tempo sagged or that too much nicety was intruding itself — as during much of the first movement vivace — one was also aware that the conductor holds a distrinctive and thoughtfully conceived point of view concerning what makes it tick.

Particularly admirable was the consistency with which he attempted, and with great success, to illuminate certain structural characteristics that prevade the entire work and provide another level of meaning. Due to his sharply chiseled realization of the trip motif in the third movement, for example, its frequently obscured relationship to the dotted rhythm that is germinal to the opening movement was made to stand out in relief. And his balancing of countermelody and main theme in the second movement was as sensitively wrought as the coloration and nuance provided by the responsive players.

The musicians performed Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" with notable panache and while ensemble wasn't always as meticulous as one has come to expect from the Boston players there was plenty of evidence — here as elsewhere — to substantiate the high esteem in which they are held through-

JOURNAL-COURIER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
D. 34,000

NOV 30 1972 New England Newsclip

Audience Spellbound At Woolsey

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with its guest conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, held an audience that filled Woolsey Hall to the last seat spellbound Tuesday night for the second concert in the Woolsey series.

Thomas had [illegible] program filled with old [illegible] favorites with the exception of a brand new composition by Walter Piston, a concerto for flute and orchestra [illegible] Boston's lead flutist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer. The program also included Beethoven's [illegible] at Seventh Son, [illegible] Wagner and his overture to [illegible] and the [illegible] Eulenspiegel by Strauss.

Thomas brought the Boston to an exciting performance no matter what was played and his superb mastery of the tempo and dynamic power made each work one of brilliance, the concert opened with the Egmont, the incidental music to Goethe's play and the musical drama unfolded the conflict and climaxes of the tragedy's dramatization by Goethe.

Wagner Is Revived

From the nobility of the overture the orchestra turned to Piston's [illegible] which, according to program notes, was inspired by Mrs. Dwyer's virtuoso performance on the flute. Dissonant with a sharp and bright accent for the flute, one was reminded of Mercurian Pan playing his flute to the sounds of the winds and sea. Engaging and infectious as it was, the Piston work was in sharp contrast to the Beethoven overture. Mrs. Dwyer's performance, however was skillful and artistic.

Strauss' great tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel" was given a colorful reading by the young conductor and one's imagination could clearly picture the jokester Till as he played and pranked after another only to end on the scaffold which he mounted [illegible] whistling. The delightful [illegible] melody is filled with gaiety and charm with Till's motif played by the horn, piercing the [illegible] background.

Beethoven's rhapsodic Seventh all but hypnotized the audience listening to the glorious rhythms as well as [illegible] by Thomas' [illegible] the vigorous vivace of the [illegible] movement, to the second movement's lovely two themes used contrapuntally. The [illegible] work progressed in overwhelming force and with a great build-up of power. The joyous rapid movement with its dance between woods and strings, [illegible] the wild dance in the [illegible] served to further generate a gigantic flow of music filled with powerful rhythms. The audience accorded both director and orchestra a tumultuous ovation and Thomas returned several times to acknowledge the applause.

FLORENCE JOHNSON

36.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790

NOV 26 1972

Boston Symphony on LI

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Steinberg to conduct at C. W. Post Center

Sunday Press
MUSIC

By CHARLOTTE AMES

The Boston Symphony comes to Long Island Saturday night in a stirring program under the baton of William Steinberg, its music director.

He'll conduct this great orchestra in Wagner's Overture to the Flying Dutchman, Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5, and Vaughn-Williams Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis.

This is another in the fine varied offerings of Island Concert Hall. It starts at 8:40 p.m. at C.W. Post Center in Brookville. Reserved seats are $8 (students and senior citizens, $5).

Charlotte Ames

WILLIAM STEINBERG
Conductor, Boston Symphony

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
D. 84,000

NOV 29 1972 New England Newsclip

Michael Tilson Thomas Shows His Conductorial Virtuosity

Michael Tilson Thomas, who is reckoned among the foremost conductorial prodigies (one might even say the Bernstein of the 70s), conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra concert last evening in Woolsey hall, thus affording many area music afficionados their first exposure to his methods, present capacity, and potential.

During an evening of works by Beethoven, Piston and Strauss, the slight young conductor whose responsibilities include the music directorship of the Buffalo Philharmonic and principal guest conductor of the Boston ensemble, largely lived up to his much heralded promise — provided of course, that the eyes were tight shut against his excessive podium mannerisms and motions.

Crisp, Muscular Playing

Generally Mr. Thomas drew a full, bright and somewhat athletic sound from "the Aristocrat of Orchestras"; on second thought, perhaps this sort of playing might better be described as crystal clear, crisp and taut. In any event, the band from the "home of the bean and the cod" responded with the calibre of tone and precision which is expected of an orchestra of the first rank.

Mr. Thomas is usually considerate of individual composer's styles and the architecture of whatever score with which he is dealing. However he does seem to favor dramatics and strenuous tempi, which occassionally resulted in a sense of strain, particularly during Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 where some sectional inbalances also came to light. Perhaps needless to say, even when one did not entirely agree with his methods, dullness is not a factor in Mr. Thomas' interpretations. I particularly liked his assured rhythmic sense and the fashion in which he maintained the cementing presence of the melodic line, obvious or underlying.

Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture was given a grimly dramatic reading, with tension continuously mounting and an inherent sense of motion; the lyrical episodes were not lingered over, but then, the conductor's modus operandi did not lead one to expect any other approach.

Daemonic Strauss

Much the same state of affairs prevailed in Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," wherein the scamp of folk lore more often than not acquired a daemonic rather than merely mischievous character.

The Beethoven symphony, which is often thought to be the apotheosis of the dance is no less, perhaps even more so, the epitome of rhythm, and Mr. Thomas's rhythms were nothing less than emphatic and brimming with forward thrust and relentless energy. In addition to the occasional sectional imbalances mentioned apriori, the conductor sometimes demanded tempi so exacting that ensemble tone became harsh and the sense of iron control tended to crush the rhythmic element. While the melodic bubbling of the third movement was well enough served, the finale ascended to such heights of climatic utterance that the whole momentarily assumed the character of a raging storm at sea.

In sharp contrast to the sound theatrics, Walter Piston's Concerto for Flute and Orchestra, composed last year, proved to be an agreeable demonstration of the flute's capacity as a solo instrument. Solo instrument and orchestra are intended to function in partnership, with the flutist required to exhibit a variety of scale runs, trills, et al. Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flutist for the orchestra, was equal to the occasion, demonstrating complete mastery over the material entrusted her. Nonetheless, there can be little question that the concerto is not one of Piston's most significant works; for all that, its goal was more than adequately established, and the orchestra was not remiss in dischsrging its responsibility.

Whatever his present overindulgences, Mr. Thomas is clearly a conductor who will rank high in the annals of music; indeed, he is clearly well on the road, and it is to be hoped that maturity will be attained without interference stemming from his predisposition to the theatrical.

—RICHARD DAY

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
D. 114,000

NOV 30 1972 New England Newsclip

At The Concert

Rehearsal Vs. Performance

During performances as opposed to rehearsals, a conductor's work is different, in many respects, and the debate goes on as to which efforts ultimately more important. Though I tned towards the corner that places greater emphasis on what transpires before the audience even enters the scene, the element of performance night chemistry cannot be minimized in terms of orchestral playing that moves beyond the authentic and transcends what is merely competent and professional.

While it was obvious last night at Woosley Hall that young conductor Michael Tilson Thomas had done his homework with both the music at hand and the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his podium manner embodied an amalgum of wind-up toy gyrating and athletic elan that was at times only mildly disconcerting while at others — as during the final movement of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony — much like a parody. I have no doubts concerning Mr. Thomas's immersion in the re-creative act nor do I question has artistic integrity or ability. But I frequently found that his flamboyance got between me and the music. And, more importantly, I had the distinct feeling that, for the most part, the performances would have gone as well without so much of it. Perhaps better.

Beethovan's Egmont overture opened the program, and it was an accord that appropriately streesed drama — clearly one of Mr. Thomas's major aesthetic considerations throughout the evening. Contrasts were deeply etched and if the opening chords centering around F. minor were too softly contoured, the motor driven material that forms the bulk of the work-particularly the closing Allegro con brio — was spun out with compelling demonic force.

Walter Piston's recent Concert for Flute and Orchestra (1971) received its first New Haven performance and featured the orchestra's excellent principal flutist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer. Though Mrs. Dwyer made as much as she could of the several solo cadenzas and recitative — like spans, there is precious little about the musci that is either arresting or memorable. Sketchy use is made of the orchestral forces, and, indeed, this listener was left with the feeling that — even in the presence of such solid craft — the music itself seemed more like a sketch than a finished composition.

If one does not tatally share Mr. Thomas's feelings about Beethoven's Seventh Symphony — and this listener must be counted among those who do not — his feelings about it are at least his own. And bless him for that. This was no routine reading of the music that reportedly led Weber to express the opinion tha Beethoven was ripe for the madhouse (telling more about Weber's lack of perception than the music), and even when one sensed that tempo sagged or that too much nicety was intruding itself — as during much of the first movement vivace — one was also aware that the conductor holds a distrinctive and thoughtfully conceived point of view concerning what makes it tick.

Particularly admirable was the consistency with which he attempted, and with great success, to illuminate certain structural characteristics that prevade the entire work and provide another level of meaning. Due to his sharply chiseled realization of the trip motif in the third movement, for example, its frequently obscured relationship to the dotted rhythm that is germinal to the opening movement was made to stand out in relief. And his balancing of countermelody and main theme in the second movement was as sensitively wrought as the coloration and nuance provided by the responsive players.

The musicians performed Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" with notable panache and while ensemble wasn't always as meticulous as one has come to expect from the Boston players there was plenty of evidence — here as elsewhere — to substantiate the high esteem in which they are held through-

JOURNAL-COURIER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
D. 34,000

NOV 30 1972 New England Newsclip

Audience Spellbound At Work

[illegible]

FLORENCE JOHNSON

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790

DEC 4 1972

Music on LI

Boston Symphony pure liquid gold

By GABRIEL FONTRIER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under William Steinberg treated an Island Concert Hall audience of 3,000 to resplendent beauties of sound last Saturday night at the C. W. Post Center Auditorium in Brookville. And it was certainly not simply "sound for sound's sake" that we all heard. Steinberg, his Spartan baton and left hand moving with the imponderable precisions of the human heart, gave us performances of the Vaughan-Williams Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis and Tchaikowsky's Fifth Symphony that were musical glories to hear.

To begin with the strings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra play with a sense of ensemble one only finds in a fine string quartet. Their sound is pure liquid gold. They effect attacks and releases (and tutti pizzacatos) and nuances of dynamics that seem effortless, that are letter-perfect. The Fantasia, scored for strings, filled the hall with a magical aura of sounds that Vaughan-Williams had conjured up in this lovely work and left the audience quite breathless. No forte was forced; no pianissimo was the least ibt unbalanced.

After the first performance of his Fifth Symphony in 1888, Tchaikowsky could only report to his famous "unseen" patron, Mme. von Meck, that he was totally unsatisfied with the work . . . "Am I really played out, as they say?" Later, after a Hamburge performance, he told his nephew, Davidov, "I like it better now." All audiences have since always loved it. It is filled with the passion and fires of the late 19th Century. And Tchaikowsky's melodic genius in this work is apparent at every moment.

All these expressive magics are also projected with a wizardry of orchestration that few composers have equalled . . . and if a conductor does not make certain that orchestral colors in crystal clear "transparencies" come through to the audience a performance can fail. But Stainberg had every inch of the score in the palm of his hand. He has incredible ears that hear everything. His is a formidable brain that must operate at intervals of thousandths of a second. And he directed a virtuoso performance of this symphony I shall never forget.

The delicate, built-into-the-music nuances of tempo that he managed in the beautiful third movement — a waltz of exquisite loveliness — simply glorified a melody of elegance, charm and bitter-sweet sophistication. He prepared the entry of the horn for that famous horn solo of the second movement with a poet's touch. All the strong, expansive lines were led to convincing climaxes. And the audience roared with applause.

The only unusual . . . I do not say unsatisfactory . . . performance of the evening came at the beginning of the concert. Steinberg must have decided not to give Wagner's Flying Dutchman overture the usual flamboyant treatment. I do not believe Wagner would have been happy with this sort of thing . . . restrained explosions and orchestral boilings of sound. And it may also be that so superlative an ensemble as the Boston Symphony cannot feel comfortable sitting on an improvised stage where musicians can't immediately hear each other clearly in a circular hall that provides good sound only near the perimeter.

Whatever the reason, it was of little account considering the masterful performance of the Fantasia and Tchaikowsky that followed. May we soon have a magnificent concert hall for such concerts . . . for the ICH regular audience of at least 3,000 . . . for thousands of others who will take great delight in attending concerts here in Nassau, in a proper place that honors the art of music.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,126,001 SUN. 2,948,786

DEC 2 1972

Mahler in the Hands Of Another Master

By STEVEN MATTHEWS

The Boston Symphony, under the direction of William Steinberg, its recently retired music director, gave a precise, well-articulated reading of Gustav Mahler's Second Symphony (Resurrection) at Philharmonic Hall Wednesday night.

It is an audacious work. It is long (about an hour and 50 minutes) and complex, with thunderous crescendos, delicate pianissimos, tumultuous dissonance and soaring melody.

The orchestra was equal to the pyrotechnics, but Steinberg's conducting was very restrained and understated. The result was a slow, almost dispassionate beginning that lacked much of the fervor necessary for Mahler.

By the time they reached the third movement, a lyrical scherzo punctuated with discordant interruptions, the musicians had warmed to their task considerably, however, and were fully prepared for the gamut of emotions in the final two movements.

The Bostonians always boasted a superb string section; Wednesday night they displayed fine, well-disciplined brasses, too.

Soprano Joy Clements and contralto Beverly Wolff were the soloists in the piece, and the Westminster Choir sang the brief choral part in the fifth movement.

Miss Clements sang her small role well. Miss Wolff's voice, although pleasing, lacked some of the power range and clarity that could have been in her first solo. The choir is a lovely collection of voices and performed excellently.

The orchestra also played Ralph Vaughan Williams' "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis," scored for strings only. They produced a suitably mellow and sonorous tone and were properly exultant for most of the piece.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

DEC 1 1972

New England Newsclip

Music

'Resurrection' Led by Steinberg Here

By DONAL HENAHAN

Mahler's Symphony No. 2, the stupendous five-movement "Resurrection," can lift a listener out of the here and now in any responsible performance. Played to the hilt, of course, feverishly at times and with the aching longing for lost Romantic innocence that Mahler poured into his greatest works, the "Resurrection" reaches planes inhabited only by a few inspired scores in our musical history.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's performance of the Second Symphony at Philharmonic Hall on Wednesday night never did reach ultimate levels—perhaps did not reach for them. William Steinberg conducted Mahler as he conducts so much else: with sobriety, restraint, care for detail and a determined avoidance of posturing. It was a "Resurrection" rich in anti-Romantic values, and as such often threw the score into strange, but fascinating, perspective.

●

Mr. Steinberg plainly knows this score intimately, and his pacing and phrasing often proved that it is in his bones as well as his brain. The flowing wit of the third movement, the "Saint Anthony Preaches to the Fishes" part, came through beautifully, for instance, though the tone of febrile menace that underlies the calm could not be detected.

Mr. Steinberg drew polished, balanced playing from the orchestra, and at the score's grand climaxes, which should be pulverizing emotionally but never shattering in tone, the conductor's concern for control paid off. The fortissimo outbreak marked "maestoso" in the final movement, coming after the music has fallen to a tired whisper, was managed superbly. In general, however, Mr. Steinberg's greatest successes were in the more contemplative pages rather than those in which Mahler gallops off on his wild hunts and celestial battles. Some of the finest moments of the night came when the offstage brass sounded their faraway retreats and ghostly tuckets.

The Westminster Choir delivered magnificently in the finale, and Beverly Wolff sang the contralto solos with proper intensity, though missing the exalted radiance of "Urlicht." The soprano soloist, Joy Clements, made a tentative beginning and seemed intimidated by her assignment.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

DEC 5 1972

New England Newsclip

Close-up

Heading East to Ozawa's Golden Shore

By Dan Webster
Patriot Ledger Correspondent

Seiji Ozawa looks forward to the easy time ahead when he will be music director of only two orchestras and one summer festival season.

The conductor will reach that golden shore next fall, when he officially adds the music directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to his other title — music director of the San Francisco Symphony.

"It will be much easier for me — for us," he said after rehearsal at the Philadelphia Academy of music. "Now, we are two weeks here, two weeks in Rome, a week there, until we don't know where we are.

We, now, is his wife and their 10-month-old daughter. On a half day's holiday in Philadelphia before his concerts, Ozawa says the family went shopping. "Baby shopping. Food, you know."

Slowing Down

While that settling down will slow his travel pace, he is aware that the music world is watching his moves in Boston more than ever before. When he was chief in Toronto and then San Francisco, the Eastern music establishment looked for clues. Now, it looks for a renaissance, a new direction and vitality in an orchestra weakened by a long transition.

That transition ended last year when Ozawa was in Philadelphia. He left midway during his concerts in that city to be presented in Boston as the successor to William Steinberg.

"I never dreamed I would be music director there," he says. "When I was at Tanglewood as a student, I never thought it possible. Even when I was appointed the head of Tanglewood, it had not seemed possible to me. They have the tradition of the older, great maestro. But, once I was at Tanglewood, we worked very much together. The Symphony got to know me and I got to know it.

Possible

"I studied the situation a long time before I took the job. I wanted to see if it is really possible to be music director of both orchestras. I think it is possible.

"In Boston, I am fortunate to have Colin Davis as chief guest conductor, and Michael Thomas as associate. I will do six weeks, then go away while Colin is there for five weeks and Michael does some weeks. Then I will come back. Six weeks is for me about the right time. More than that, and the players are tired of you, need a change. If you do less they see a new face on the podium every week or so, and it is upsetting to them.

"I think this is the major change I will be bringing to Boston, the system of music director with chief guest conductor. It worked very well with Solti and Giulini in Chicago and I think it will be good in Boston. I think this is the only way American orchestras will go. I think it will come to Philadelphia, too.

Heavy

"In a sense it will be easier, moving back and forth between San Francisco and Boston. But the responsibility will be much heavier. It's one thing to be a guest conductor and be concerned only with musical things, quite another to be responsible for everything that happens. There aren't many who are great administrators and great conductors. Eugene Ormandy is, and George Szell was, but how many others? It seems you are either one or the other.

"My work in Boston is much easier because Maestro Steinberg made several important personnel changes. We have an excellent clarinet (Harold Wright) and a new first horn, a man from Denver I had wanted for my San Francisco Symphony. I feel that the Symphony is coming up."

On the Rise

Coming up, or waiting to be brought up, as the BSO trustees suggested in appointing him?

"No, no, it's coming up. There is a spirit there. They played very well last summer at Tanglewood," he smiles.

In Boston, Ozawa stamped his approval on Thomas' plan to hold concerts of new music in special settings. "I used to think the ideal way to present new music was by choosing 10 pieces and then putting one in this program and another in that one so that the audiences could hear them but still hear the traditional music. Now, composers write for small groups, seven instruments, solos, chamber orchestra, and I think this music should be played by small groups. Why put them in the Orchestra program?

Seiji Ozawa

"Leon Fleisher is doing this kind of thing for us now in San Francisco. Half the orchestra plays in the fall opera season, while the others play in this new series. They have always played school concerts or pops concerts before and have been tired at the start of the season.

Getting Ready

"I think they will be fresh and ready for our season to begin this year. I think, though, that this is a very expensive series, but I am happy Leon has done it for us."

Ozawa's appointment in San Francisco has had important effects. The orchestra has returned to recording for the first time since Pierre Monteux conducted, and it has been chosen for a seven-week tour of Europe and Russia next year. "I am very proud," he says. "We are the first to go under the resumed cultural exchange program with Russia.

"I am getting worried. I want to take young American conductors with me, but everybody wants me to conduct. It is getting very difficult."

As Boston's pre-eminent musician, Ozawa will set the tone of the Tanglewood season, as well. "I want to bring the Symphony and the school close together. It is nice to conduct a concert in the shed and know that just across the way, the students are getting something very exciting ready.

Getting Closer

"When you think only a few years ago, Koussevitzky conducted, ran the school, taught. I'd like to get back to that, but I am not a teacher. It is good for the Symphony to be close to the students, and I think that will be true. Gunther (Schuller) co-director of Tanglewood) and I speak the same language and understand each other well. Now Lenny (Bernstein) is very interested in the school, but he doesn't have time to teach all summer, and the conductors I ask to work with the Symphony are working with the students. I think that is good.

"All this will work if I can find time to rest in between concerts. I must find time."

Ozawa says now that he has begun to understand the differences between East Coast America and West Coast America. "It is almost like different countries," he says. "I like both, but I think neither understands the other.

A Casual Note

"I had to move from the Barclay in Philadelphia to the Bellevue because I had to wear a tie and jacket at the Barclay. That is something that wouldn't be a problem in San Francisco. The differences are interesting. My wife likes Boston because of the young people who are involved in everything."

Ozawa took a Western idea back to Japan last year when the Japan Philharmonic — his third orchestra — was faced with financial disaster because of the cutoff of funds from television broadcasting. He took the audacious step of speaking to the Emperor at an audience. It made headlines, but did not affect his orchestra, which has since gone to court and carried on a sit-in at the TV central.

The result?

"I'm out of a job," says Ozawa.

MILWAUKEE SENTINEL
MILWAUKEE, WISC.
D. 165,653

DEC 27 1972

Korean Musicians' Careers Have Habit of Intersecting

By LAWRENCE B. JOHNSON

WHEN THEY were schoolboys, Taik-ki Kim and Bo Youp Hwang stuck together. You'd hardly ever find them separated by more than, say, an octave.

But with the passing of those close, formative years of chamber music in Seoul, South Korea, the older Kim packed his violin and followed his brother to the University of Wisconsin—Milwaukee.

Meanwhile, Hwang kept fiddling while he, too, burned for a chance to continue his training in the United States. And within a year, the improbable happened: the two lads were playing duets again, both studying at UWM.

The muses are fickle, though. A few brief years together and Kim was off to Cincinnati to play in the symphony under Thomas Schippers. And Hwang? He found work with the Milwaukee Symphony Orchestra.

NOW, FRIENDSHIP is a magnetic thing. After a season with Cincinnati, Kim was induced to come "home," meaning a spot with the Milwaukee orchestra and reunion with Hwang.

Isn't that a storybook ending? High school buddies traveling half way around the world to become college classmates and finally settling into a career together.

Well, to make a short story longer, Hwang is heading a little farther down the road. Next June, he will join the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Commradeship is dear, but "getting to play with the Boston Symphony is like a dream," Hwang admitted. "When I listen to their recordings, it's like a different world. They are one of the finest orchestras."

For a violinist of 25, Hwang's move is distinction added to distinction. In his fourth year with the Milwaukee Symphony, he is the orchestra's assistant concertmaster.

KIM'S CAREER also has developed swiftly. Back in Milwaukee for a vacation last summer, he was practically conscripted to serve Maestro Kenneth Schermerhorn as assistant principal of the second violins.

"Compared with the Milwaukee Symphony," he said, "the Cincinnati musicians are rather old, about 40 years old on the average. Musically, that didn't make too much difference to me, but socially it was difficult. Here, I can go out with my young friends in the orchestra and have a drink. It's very nice."

Kim, 26, said he found Cincinnati audiences more enthusiastic about their orchestra than Milwaukeeans, whether the repertoire was Mozart or modern. Under Schippers, a former opera conductor, programing included frequent evenings with vocal soloists.

"I thought Schippers was pretty demanding," he commented, "but other members of the orchestra said that compared with Max Rudolf (Schippers' predecessor), he wasn't too bad."

BOTH VIOLINISTS come from business families and both learned early that the Korean child who shows an interest in music works at it.

"That's a difference between this country and the Orient," said Kim, who now has pupils himself. "Here, if a child seems to lose interest before he has acquired the technique to begin progressing, the parents just let him quit."

"My father knows nothing about music," Hwang added, "but he pushed me to practice. Many times I didn't want to, but I had no choice."

The Suzuki method of teaching violin to very small children has made it the Korean national instrument, Kim said. He described competition as fierce, and said that parents are typically quite sensitive to their child's advancement in comparison with their neighbor's.

KOREANS HAVE embraced Western classical music as their own. "People go around listening to classical music all day on little transistor radios," Hwang said, "and sometimes audiences just won't let a musician quit — six encores. I remember one recital that was ended by curfew."

Kim came to UWM because his brother, Bock-ki, had studied mathematics there. In his first year, his teacher, Leonard Sorkin, and the rest of the school's Fine Arts Quartet went to South Korean during a tour.

At Kim's urging, Hwang, still a senior in high school, introduced himself to the quartet and played for them.

"They listened to me and became very excited," Hwang recalled. "They tried to show me some technical points, but I didn't understand English."

dent in the Boston Symphony. He'll be moving in at the same time as the orchestra's new music director, Seiji Ozawa, for whom Hwang auditioned.

"OZAWA TRIES to bridge Oriental music and Western," the violinist said. "He is very sensitive. He is established in classical, romantic and contemporary literature, of course, so he seems likely to begin exploring in new directions."

Hwang is intent on further study. He knows what he faces in keeping stride with a first rate orchestra under Ozawa's scrutiny.

"It's a wonderful orchestra, but when I met several of the musicians at the audition, I found out they are just people. Very nice people," he said. "I'll do my best."

TAIK-KI KIM (ABOVE) AND BO YOUP HWANG

Fiendship is a magnetic thing

MILWAUKEE JOURNAL
MILWAUKEE, WISC.
D. 346,967 SUN. 530,805

DEC 1 1972

Symphony Leader Takes Boston Post

Bo Youp Hwang, assistant concertmaster of the Milwaukee Symphony Orchestra, has accepted a job as a violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was learned Friday.

Hwang confirmed his decision in an interview Friday morning, saying he would leave Milwaukee at the end of the orchestra's winter season in May and begin work in Boston in early June.

"I thought there was a very slight chance of getting the job," Hwang said. "The Boston Symphony has openings once every five years or so. When they offered, I couldn't believe it."

Hwang was selected from among about 50 violinists auditioning for the single chair last month.

"It's a splendid thing," Milwaukee Symphony Conductor Kenneth Schermerhorn said. "It's a fine job. It shows the kind of caliber we have in the orchestra."

Hwang, 25, is from Seoul, Korea, where he was educated at the National University. In 1966, he won the Chang Young music competition that allowed him to study abroad. As a result of hearing the University of Wisconsin — Milwaukee Fine Arts Quartet, he chose to come to Milwaukee.

Hwang studied violin with Abraham Loft at UWM, where he received his music degree. He joined the orchestra in 1969, becoming assistant concertmaster a year later.

In discussing his future with symphony management recently, Hwang said: "I would like to go as far in music as I can here before returning to Korea."

"I was always looking for something better," Hwang said Friday. "I had been in Milwaukee five years and I thought that was long enough."

Hwang does not regret giving up a top position with the Milwaukee Symphony for a seat farther back at Boston.

"I will see more things," he said. "It will be interesting. But I have learned a lot in Milwaukee."

In addition to the prestige of the Boston orchestra, Hwang also cited the larger financial package the eastern orchestra offered.

Bo Youp Hwang

After a lifetime of driving, he becomes nervous at the wheel. He swears that nobody can drive anymore. Nuts, that's what they are. He backs into a concrete weater and puts into a silent butler.

When he plays, he curses anyway. Sometimes he takes her out to dine. He wants good food but he doesn't want to be robbed. He complains about tips to the waiter and to the kid who parked the car.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885

DEC 4 1972 New England Newsclip

Rose Walsh

Friends of the BSO Plan a Backstage Tour

We never have to ask "What's new?" from the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, because the members are always a step ahead of the question. They just never run out of new ideas to make the internationally famous orchestra better known.

Now they have worked out plans for a backstage tour of Symphony Hall — interesting half hour sessions which takes participants behind the scenes of the world's first concert hall to be designed for perfect acoustics.

While the tour is going on, a guide will give a brief history of Symphony Hall and show the fascinating Ancient Instruments Room, radio and broadcast control rooms, offices and maintenance areas, musical library, TV and projection booths, recording facilities and other intriguing areas seldom open to the public.

Mrs. Edwin T. Green and Mrs. Walter Watson II have planned the tours which are open to groups or individuals by appointment. A regular one is scheduled for Monday, Dec. 11. Information is available by calling Mrs. Whitty (266-1348).

Area chairmen who are planning their mid-winter Council of Friends meetings in conjunction with these tours include Mrs. George Draper (Boston), Mrs. Charles F. Hovey (Brookline-Chestnut Hill) and Mrs. Howard Hansen (Wellesley).

This week the Hall is getting all decked out for the Yuletide season. Five 10-foot Norwegian spruce trees on the marquee outside and two 14-foot white spruce trees inside have been donated by Mrs. William Shelley from the tree farm started by her late husband.

Mrs. Robert Kistner and Mrs. Robert Mustard of Wellesley are decorating them with tiny white lights and red and white bows and all will be in readiness of Tuesday evening's concert.

Mrs. Donald Dwight, wife of the Lt. Governor will be the guest of Mrs. George Lee Sargent, chairman of the Council of Friends, and recently elected trustee of the BSO, at the pre-Symphony Table Talk Supper before the lighting takes place.

★

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

DEC 4 1972 New England Newsclip

ALISON ARNOLD

★

Christmas spirit will invade Symphony Hall this week. Five 10-foot Norwegian spruce trees on the marquee outside and two 14-foot white spruce trees on the marquee inside, donated by Mrs. William Shelley from the tree farm started by her late husband, will be set up in time for tomorrow evening's concert. Mrs. Robert Kistner and Mrs. Robert Mustard will decorate the trees with tiny white lights and red and white bows.

Mrs. Donald Dwight, wife of the lieutenant governor, will be the guest of Mrs. George Lee Sargent, chairman of the Council of Friends and recently elected trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Pre-Symphony Table Talk Supper before lighting the decorated trees.

★

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

DEC 6 1972 New England Newsclip

BARITONE DAVID EVITTS, who sings the role of the Messenger in Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" with Leonard Bernstein and the Boston Symphony this week, will be heard at the opening concert of a new Monday evening series which begins in January at Emmanuel Church on Newbury street in Boston's Back Bay.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885

DEC 16 1972 New England Newsclip

Rose Walsh

★

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra horn player, David Ohanian, who will repeat his last Friday's Stage Door Lecture on Jan. 5, sponsored by the Council of Friends of the BSO, had the pleasure of introducing his parents, Mr. and Mrs. John Ohanian of Westport, Conn., both musicians, at last Friday's talk. He revealed that they had tried to dissuade him from a musical career, but his love of all kinds of music led him to the horn and eventually to the BSO which he joined in 1970.

But the very young musician has avocations like Chinese cooking, Hi Fi and Stereo and he built his own color TV a year ago.

Mrs. Donald B. Sinclair and Mrs. Anatole A. Haemmerle of Concord are chairmen of Series I of the Lectures which take place before the Friday concerts at Symphon Hall. Smart Christmas shoppers crossed off several names on their list when they discovered they could buy the recently-published red-covered and Christmas wrapped booklet ($1), "Know Your Orchestra."

★

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER &
SUNDAY ADVERTISER
S. 415,000

DEC 31 1972 New England Newsclip

Rose Walsh

★

Friday at noon, the Stage Door Lecture by David Ohanian, Boston Symphony Orchestra horn player, takes place at Symphony Hall. Sponsored by the Council of Friends of the BSO, Mrs. Donald B. Sinclair and Mrs. Anatole A. Haemmerle of Concord are chairmen of this series.

who's news

ARCHIE C. EPPS III, has been elected a member of the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Epps, Dean of Students in Harvard College, and a native of Lake Charles, Louisiana, is the first black to be elected to this position.

From 1964 to 1967 Dean Epps was Assistant Conductor of the Harvard Glee Club, and is now adviser to the Leverett Opera Society. He was Assistant Dean of Harvard College from 1964 until his appointment in 1970 as Dean of Students in Harvard College.

Epps

BAY STATE BANNER
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 17,000

DEC 21 1972 New England Newsclip

MERCURY
MEDFORD, MASS.
D. 045

DEC 5 1972 New England Newsclip

Bernstein Lead Boston Sym

BOSTON — L stein will cond Symphony Orc at 2 p.m. and p.m. in works Stravinsky.

Mr. Bern concert Symphon and fol Oedip Oedi Jac E Hoffmeister Michael W and the Ha der the direc as Chorus.

NEWS
MELROSE, MASS.
D. 2,800

DEC 5 1972 New England Newsclip

Bernstein Lead Boston Sympt

BOSTON — Leona stein will conduct th Symphony Orchestra o at 2 p.m. and Saturda p.m. in works by Beet Stravinsky.

Mr. Bernstein wi concert with B Symphony no. 6 in and follow it wit Oedipus rex with Oedipus, Tatian Jacasta, Tom F Ezio Flagello a Evitts as M Hoffmeister Michael Wa and the Ha as Chorus.

NEWS
MALDEN, MASS.
D. 12,420

DEC 5 1972 New England Newsclip

Bernstein Leads Boston Symphony

BOSTON — Leonard Bernstein will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. in works by Beethoven and Stravinsky.

Mr. Bernstein will open the concert with Beethoven's Symphony no. 6 in F 'Pastoral' and follow it with Stravinsky's Oedipus rex with Rene Kollo as Oedipus, Tatiana Troyanos as Jacasta, Tom Krause as Creon, Ezio Flagello as Tiresias, David Evitts as Messenger, Frank Hoffmeister as Shepherd, Michael Wager as Speaker, and the Harvard Glee Club under the direction of John Adams as Chorus.

40.

Bernstein to conduct BSO in Stravinsky, Beethoven

BOSTON — Leonard Bernstein conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday December 8 at 2 p.m. and Saturday December 9 at 8:30 p.m. in works by Beethoven and Stravinsky. Mr. Bernstein opens the concert with Beethoven's Symphony No. 6 in F 'Pastoral' and follows it with Stravinsky's Oedipus rex with Rene Kollo as Oedipus, Tatiana Troyanos as Jocasta, Tom Krause as Creon, Ezio Flagello as Tiresias, David Evitts as Messener, Frank Hoffmeister as Shepherd, Michael Wager as Speaker, and the Harvard Glee Club under the direction of John Adams as Chorus.

Leonard Bernstein's association with Boston and its symphony is an important part of his life. Born in Lawrence, he was graduated from Harvard in 1939 and continued his studies at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia with Fritz Reiner and Randall Thompson and at Tanglewood for several summers as a Koussevitsky student and assistant. Arthur Rodzinsky engaged him as Assistant Conductor of the New York Philharmonic for the 1943-44 season. His unique career was firmly launched during that winter when he substituted for a suddenly ailing Bruno Walter. In 1945 he began his three years as Director of the New York Symphony. He has served as head of the orchestra and conducting department of the Berkshire Music Festival and has been professor of music at Brandeis University.

As laureate conductor of the New York Philharmonic, Mr. Bernstein continues his close association with that orchestra. When he was appointed its music director, he became the first American-born and trained conductor to hold the position under the longest contract signed by the orchestra since the beginning of the century. He still holds the record for having conducted the largest number of performances at home and on tour and his 1,000th concert with the orchestra was celebrated on December 15, 1971.

In addition to his position as adviser to Tanglewood, Leonard Bernstein returns to his home state this year as both teacher and conductor, having been appointed Charles Eliot Norton Professor of Poetry at Harvard. He is now in residence at the same house where he spent his undergraduate days. His eldest child, daughter Jaime, is also in residence, but as a Radcliffe Junior, resident in another house.

Rene Kollo appears for the first time with the Boston Symphony. He began his operatic career at the Staatstheater in Brunswick and later was engaged to sing at the Deutsche Oper am Rhein where he performed major roles in operas by Mozart, Bizet, Puccini, Janacek, Weber and Verdi. In 1969 Rene Kollo was invited to Bayreuth to sing the part of the Steerman in The Flying Dutchman, and returned a year later to sing Erik in the same opera. Last year he appeared at Bayreuth in the title role of Lohengrin. In 1970 he sang Parsifal in Venice, and a year later made his debut at the Vienna State Opera in the same role. Rene Kollo has appeared with the companies of La Scala, Milan, Bologna and Munich in operas by Richard Strauss and other composers.

Tatiana Troyanos has appeared with the Boston Symphony in recent years in performances of Schumann's Scenes from Faust and Verdi's Requiem, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. A native of New York, she is now equally well known on both sides of the Atlantic. She has been a regular member of the Hamburg State Opera for several years, and has appeared in many other parts of Europe. She has taken leading roles in Oedipus rex in Rome, in Carmen at the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, in Ariadne auf Naxos at Munich, in Rosenkavalier at Salzburg, and in Le nozze di Figaro in Amsterdam. In this country she has sung with the New York City Opera, and many of the major symphony orchestras. Recent engagements include appearances in Berlin, Munich, Cologne, Hamburg, Vienna, Chicago, Cleveland and Cincinnati.

Tom Krause began his present visit to the United States with appearances as Escamillo in the new production of Carmen at the Metropolitan Opera, conducted by Leonard Bernstein. More recently he has sung the role of Guglielmo in a new production of Cosi fan tutte with the Lyric Opera of Chicago. Tom Krause has sung leading roles with the Hamburg State Opera, the Salzburg Festival, La Scala, Milan, the Teatro Colon in Buenos Aires, the Bayreuth Festival and the Metropolitan Opera. His large repertoire ranges from Handel's Giulio Cesare, Mozart's Don Giovanni and Donezetti's Don Pasquale, to Stravinsky's The rake's progress. He has appeared as soloist with almost every major orchestra in America

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514
DEC 6 1972
New England Newsclip

Bernstein conducts Boston Symphony

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

The Boston Symphony concert Leonard Bernstein conducted yesterday afternoon was full of marvellous things, yet its impact was less than promised. The program was Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony and Stravinsky's opera-oratorio, "Oedipus Rex," and the trouble began there.

The two works have nothing to say to one another, and they make too long a program, at least for that audience, to which a punctual four o'clock departure is more important than any musical statement.

Pastoral-Oedipus is not a bill a conductor would normally think of concocting, but Bernstein concocted it anyway, being more concerned with assembling material to be videotaped for his Norton lectures at Harvard than with sensible program-building. At any rate, Stravinsky's grim drama really had little chance to assert itself through the stream of departing ladies.

"A great big lump of wonderful music, some of which never did come off right and still doesn't," is what Virgil Thomson once called "Oedipus Rex." It is the work as a whole that doesn't come off rather than any of the music (or perhaps I misread Thomson's ambiguous "which") and Stravinsky himself late in life was critical of the dramaturgy, particularly the spoken narration in the vernacular to link the tableaux whose text has been translated back into Latin for the sake of the concision and above all the incantatory possibilities of that language.

The distribution of dramatic stresses is strange (as odd, in fact, as some of Stravinsky's syllabic stresses), and you could not always immediately infer, from musical weight, which are dramatically the "important" scenes. That works when "Oedipus" is staged, and it works on records, when the listener is cued to use his imagination with extra sharpness. In concert, which is middle ground between the hotness of the one and the coolness of the other, it seems not so clear and not so convincing.

Add to that one technical problem: When a work written for the theater, and assuming the orchestra is in the pit, is given in concert, with singers and players on stage together, the singers are apt to be in trouble. Sometimes yesterday words disappeared in the orchestral tempest, which blurs the story-telling, but also irritates an audience, evaporating its concentration and sympathy.
sympathy.

Bernstein conducts "Oedipus Rex" superbly, with remarkable concentration, rhythmic bite, sense of dramatic timing and character. He lives in it with extraordinary intensity, and its monumental classicism makes it not something he can love to death. He had impressive collaborators through whom to realize his interpretation. The Boston Symphony played magnificently, and F. John Adams's Harvard Glee Club was admirable in the incisiveness of its singing, the clarity of text and pitch.

The eloquent choral music could hardly be better done, and the same imposing level was reached in the Jocasta of Tatiana Troyanos, who supplied exciting thrust of voice and articulation, finding also just the right combination of intensity and distance.

On the other hand, Rene Kollo as Oedipus left the whole performance somehow hollow: His tenor is agreeable, his phrasing is musical, but he has no tragic stature. He is neither arrogant, nor angry, nor afraid, and, though he says "lux facta est," it is hard to believe he has seen anything. Singing, he remains too much the amiable, nice-looking young man who between arias sits there with his legs casually crossed.

Impressive competence in every way was provided by Tom Krause (Creon), David Evitts (Messenger), and Frank Hoffmeister (Shepherd), while Michael Wager was notably good, which means both simple and commanding, at dealing with the narration. The usually excellent Ezio Flagello (Tiresias) was disappointingly woolly in rhythm and diction.

The performance of the Beethoven Pastoral was serene, intelligent, imaginative, light and transparent wonderfully played.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 565,377
DEC 9 1972
New England Newsclip

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
DEC 11 1972
New England Newsclip

New music and old at Symphony Hall

Leonard Bernstein conducts Boston Symphony; Handel and Haydn's annual 'Messiah'

By Louis Snyder

It was a weekend at Symphony Hall very much in the time-honored Boston experience — music acceptably "new," and music indigenously old: Leonard Bernstein-Boston Symphony-Stravinsky in the first instance; the Handel and Haydn Society's 158th annual "Messiah" in the second. There were two performances of each, received with predictable enthusiasm.

Although Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" hasn't been done by the BSO for 20 years, both Boston and the orchestra assume a certain proprietary interest in it. The work was given its first American performances, both in Boston and New York, by Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra in 1928, less than a year after the world premiere in Paris. And the composer himself conducted performances with the BSO in 1940.

* * *

Whether these possessive pluses win for "Oedipus" a local listener-tolerance such a work by another composer would not, it seems possible. In any case, there was warm acceptance on Friday of this opera-oratorio, which, in form, is awkwardly in between, and for Stravinsky's setting of Jean Cocteau's version of the Sophocles tragedy, sung by soloists and chorus in a text "translated backwards" into Ciceronian Latin. Incidents to come in this progressive horror story are detailed, without musical accompaniment, by a Speaker whose words are from an E. E. Cummings English translation.

* * *

"Oedipus Rex" hardly classifies as a lovable piece. Its musical idiom comes across as patently "invented," and expression of the grisly story of the Theban king's fate is theatrically static. But through a vigorous male chorus, intensity of utterance by six soloists, and sharp intrumental commentary, "Oedipus" achieves a cumulative power not to be denied.

Mr. Bernstein infused the occasion with as strong a dramatic statement as the score permits. And the singers, whose assignments range from grudgingly grateful to downright inconsiderate, were uniformly skillful: Tatiana Troyanos, a rich-voiced Jocasta; tenor Rene Kollo in the title part; Tom Krause as Creon, and Ezio Flagello as Tiresias. Two young Boston singers distinguished themselves in vital roles — David Evitts as the Messenger, and Frank Hoffmeister as the Shepherd. Michael Wager was a sonorous Speaker, and the Harvard Glee Club intoned the choral passages impressively.

* * *

Stravinsky was prefaced by a glowing performance of Beethoven's Sixth Symphony ("Pastoral"), lovingly interpreted by Mr. Bernstein. Except for a faltering string and horn passage on Friday, the orchestra was in the vein, too, and there were delectable solo contributions by Doriot Dwyer (flute), Harold Wright (clarinet), Ralph Gomberg (oboe), and Sherman Walt (bassoon). The Beethoven was a memorial tribute to the late Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, a trustee and friend of the BSO since 1949.

Bernsteinto conduct BSO in Stravinsky, Beethoven

BOSTON — Leonard Bernstein conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday December 8 at 2 p.m. and Saturday December 9 at 8:30 p.m. in works by Beethoven and Stravinsky. Mr. Bernstein opens the concert with Beethoven's Symphony No. 6 in F 'Pastoral' and follows it with Stravinsky's Oedipus rex with Rene Kollo as Oedipus, Tatiana Troyanos as Jocasta, Tom Krause as Creon, Ezio Flagello as Tiresias, David Evitts as Messener, Frank Hoffmeister as Shepherd, Michael Wager as Speaker, and the Harvard Glee Club under the direction of John Adams as Chorus.

Leonard Bernstein's association with Boston and its symphony is an important part of his life. Born in Lawrence, he was graduated from Harvard in 1939 and continued his studies at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia with Fritz Reiner and Randall Thompson and at Tanglewood for several summers as a Koussevitsky student and assistant. Arthur Rodzinsky engaged him as Assistant Conductor of the New York Philharmonic for the 1943-44 season. His unique career was firmly launched during that winter when he substituted for a suddenly ailing Bruno Walter. In 1945 he began his three years as Director of the New York Symphony. He has served as head of the orchestra and conducting department of the Berkshire Music Festival and has been professor of music at Brandeis University.

As laureate conductor of the New York Philharmonic, Mr. Bernstein continues his close association with that orchestra. When he was appointed its music director, he became the first American-born and trained conductor to hold the position under the longest contract signed by the orchestra since the beginning of the century. He still holds the record for having conducted the largest number of performances at home and on tour and his 1,000th concert with the orchestra was celebrated on December 15, 1971.

In addition to his position as adviser to Tanglewood, Leonard Bernstein returns to his home state this year as both teacher and conductor, having been appointed Charles Eliot Norton Professor of Poetry at Harvard. He is now in residence at the same house where he spent his undergraduate days. His eldest child, daughter Jaime, is also in residence, but as a Radcliffe Junior, resident in another house.

Rene Kollo appears for the first time with the Boston Symphony. He began his operatic career at the Staatstheater in Brunswick and later was engaged to sing at the Deutsche Oper am Rhein where he performed major roles in operas by Mozart, Bizet, Puccini, Janacek, Weber and Verdi. In 1969 Rene Kollo was invited to Bayreuth to sing the part of the Steerman in The Flying Dutchman, and returned a year later to sing Erik in the same opera. Last year he appeared at Bayreuth in the title role of Lohengrin. In 1970 he sang Parsifal in Venice, and a year later made his debut at the Vienna State Opera in the same role. Rene Kollo has appeared with the companies of La Scala, Milan, Bologna and Munich in operas by Richard Strauss and other composers.

Tatiana Troyanos has appeared with the Boston Symphony in recent years in performances of Schumann's Scenes from Faust and Verdi's Requiem, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. A native of New York, she is now equally well known on both sides of the Atlantic. She has been a regular member of the Hamburg State Opera for several years, and has appeared in many other parts of Europe. She has taken leading roles in Oedipus rex in Rome, in Carmen at the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, in Ariadne auf Naxos at Munich, in Rosenkavalier at Salzburg, and in Le nozze di Figaro in Amsterdam. In this country she has sung with the New York City Opera, and many of the major symphony orchestras. Recent engagements include appearances in Berlin, Munich, Cologne, Hamburg, Vienna, Chicago, Cleveland and Cincinnati.

Tom Krause began his present visit to the United States with appearances as Escamillo in the new production of Carmen at the Metropolitan Opera, conducted by Leonard Bernstein. More recently he has sung the role of Guglielmo in a new production of Cosi fan tutte with the Lyric Opera of Chicago. Tom Krause has sung leading roles with the Hamburg State Opera, the Salzburg Festival, La Scala, Milan, the Teatro Colon in Buenos Aires, the Bayreuth Festival and the Metropolitan Opera. His large repertoire ranges from Handel's Giulio Cesare, Mozart's Don Giovanni and Donezetti's Don Pasquale, to Stravinsky's The rake's progress. He has appeared as soloist with almost every major orchestra in America

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514
DEC 6 1972
New England Newsclip

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,284
DEC 11 1972
New England Newsclip

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 565,377
DEC 9 1972
New England Newsclip

Bernstein conducts Boston Symphony

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

The Boston Symphony concert Leonard Bernstein conducted yesterday afternoon was full of marvellous things, yet its impact was less than promised. The program was Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony and Stravinsky's opera-oratorio, "Oedipus Rex," and the trouble began there.

The two works have nothing to say to one another, and they make too long a program, at least for that audience, to which a punctual four o'clock departure is more important than any musical statement.

Pastoral-Oedipus is not a bill a conductor would normally think of concocting, but Bernstein concocted it anyway, being more concerned with assembling material to be videotaped for his Norton lectures at Harvard than with sensible program-building. At any rate, Stravinsky's grim drama really had little chance to assert itself through the stream of departing ladies.

"A great big lump of wonderful music, some of which never did come off right and still doesn't," is what Virgil Thomson once called "Oedipus Rex." It is the work as a whole that doesn't come off rather than any of the music (or perhaps I misread Thomson's ambiguous "which") and Stravinsky himself late in life was critical of the dramaturgy, particularly the spoken narration in the vernacular to link the tableaux whose text has been translated back into Latin for the sake of the concision and above all the incantatory possibilities of that language.

The distribution of dramatic stresses is strange (as odd, in fact, as some of Stravinsky's syllabic stresses), and you could not always immediately infer, from musical weight, which are dramatically the "important" scenes. That works when "Oedipus" is staged, and it works on records, when the listener is cued to use his imagination with extra sharpness. In concert, which is middle ground between the hotness of the one and the coolness of the other, it seems not so clear and not so convincing.

Add to that one technical problem: When a work written for the theater, and assuming the orchestra is in the pit, is given in concert, with singers and players on stage together, the singers are apt to be in trouble. Sometimes yesterday words disappeared in the orchestral tempest, which blurs the story-telling, but also irritates an audience, evaporating its concentration and sympathy.
sympathy.

Bernstein conducts "Oedipus Rex" superbly, with remarkable concentration, rhythmic bite, sense of dramatic timing and character. He lives in it with extraordinary intensity, and its monumental classicism makes it not something he can love to death. He had impressive collaborators through whom to realize his interpretation. The Boston Symphony played magnificently, and F. John Adams's Harvard Glee Club was admirable in the incisiveness of its singing, the clarity of text and pitch.

The eloquent choral music could hardly be better done, and the same imposing level was reached in the Jocasta of Tatiana Troyanos, who supplied exciting thrust of voice and articulation, finding also just the right combination of intensity and distance.

On the other hand, Rene Kollo as Oedipus left the whole performance somehow hollow: His tenor is agreeable, his phrasing is musical, but he has no tragic stature. He is neither arrogant, nor angry, nor afraid, and, though he says "lux facta est," it is hard to believe he has seen anything. Singing, he remains too much the amiable, nice-looking young man who between arias sits there with his legs casually crossed.

Impressive competence in every way was provided by Tom Krause (Creon), David Evitts (Messenger), and Frank Hoffmeister (Shepherd), while Michael Wager was notably good, which means both simple and commanding, at dealing with the narration. The usually excellent Ezio Flagello (Tiresias) was disappointingly woolly in rhythm and diction.

The performance of the Beethoven Pastoral was serene, intelligent, imaginative, light and transparent wonderfully played.

New music and old at Symphony Hall

Leonard Bernstein conducts Boston Symphony; Handel and Haydn's annual 'Messiah'

By Louis Snyder

It was a weekend at Symphony Hall very much in the time-honored Boston experience — music acceptably "new," and music indigenously old: Leonard Bernstein-Boston Symphony-Stravinsky in the first instance; the Handel and Haydn Society's 158th annual "Messiah" in the second. There were two performances of each, received with predictable enthusiasm.

Although Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" hasn't been done by the BSO for 20 years, both Boston and the orchestra assume a certain proprietary interest in it. The work was given its first American performances, both in Boston and New York, by Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra in 1928, less than a year after the world premiere in Paris. And the composer himself conducted performances with the BSO in 1940.

* * *

Whether these possessive pluses win for "Oedipus" a local listener-tolerance such a work by another composer would not, it seems possible. In any case, there was warm acceptance on Friday of this opera-oratorio, which, in form, is awkwardly in between, and for Stravinsky's setting of Jean Cocteau's version of the Sophocles tragedy, sung by soloists and chorus in a text "translated backwards" into Ciceronian Latin. Incidents to come in this progressive horror story are detailed, without musical accompaniment, by a Speaker whose words are from an E. E. Cummings English translation.

* * *

"Oedipus Rex" hardly classifies as a lovable piece. Its musical idiom comes across as patently "invented," and expression of the grisly story of the Theban king's fate is theatrically static. But through a vigorous male chorus, intensity of utterance by six soloists, and sharp intrumental commentary, "Oedipus" achieves a cumulative power not to be denied.

Mr. Bernstein infused the occasion with as strong a dramatic statement as the score permits. And the singers, whose assignments range from grudgingly grateful to downright inconsiderate, were uniformly skillful: Tatiana Troyanos, a rich-voiced Jocasta; tenor Rene Kollo in the title part; Tom Krause as Creon, and Ezio Flagello as Tiresias. Two young Boston singers distinguished themselves in vital roles — David Evitts as the Messenger, and Frank Hoffmeister as the Shepherd. Michael Wager was a sonorous Speaker, and the Harvard Glee Club intoned the choral passages impressively.

* * *

Stravinsky was prefaced by a glowing performance of Beethoven's Sixth Symphony ("Pastoral"), lovingly interpreted by Mr. Bernstein. Except for a faltering string and horn passage on Friday, the orchestra was in the vein, too, and there were delectable solo contributions by Doriot Dwyer (flute), Harold Wright (clarinet), Ralph Gomberg (oboe), and Sherman Walt (bassoon). The Beethoven was a memorial tribute to the late Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, a trustee and friend of the BSO since 1949.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Beethoven celebration set

BOSTON — Former Music Director William Steinberg returns to Boston Friday and Saturday, Dec. 15 and 16 to conduct the Orchestra in a weekend celebration of Beethoven's birthday.

Friday evening, Dec. 15 at 8:30 p.m. the Orchestra performs Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture no. 3, the Symphony no. 8 and the Fifth Symphony. Saturday evening the Orchestra performs Beethoven's First and Ninth Symphonies. Soloists for the Ninth Symphony are: Johanna Meier, soprano; Joanna Simon, contralto; Dean Wilder, tenor; Norman Treigle, bass; and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus under the direction of John Oliver.

William Steinberg, former Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, retired from his post in Boston at the end of last season and is now Music Director of the Pittsburgh Symphony. Under his leadership, the Boston Symphony has continued its steady progress as one of the foremost musical organizations in the world. He led concerts not only in Boston, in New York and in many other American cities, but also in the music centers of England, Germany, Austria, Italy, Spain and France. Mr. Steinberg's is a celebrated name in music all over the world and he has the distinction of being a founder of the Israel Philharmonic.

Johanna Meier makes her debut with the Boston Symphony in this performance of the Ninth Symphony. Born and trained in the United States, she appeared with the New York City Opera for the first time three seasons ago in Capriccio, and since that time has sung many roles with the Company. Last summer she made her debut with the Metropolitan Opera as Donna Anna in a part performance of Don Giovanni. Johanna Meier has appeared with many other companies, including the Opera Guild of Greater-Miami, the Washington Civic Opera and the Chautauqua Opera. During the 1972 Blossom Festival she sang in the Cleveland Orchestra's performance of Mahler's Eighth Symphony.

Johanna Simon, who has appeared with the Orchestra in recent seasons here in Boston, made her debut with the New York City Opera as Cherubino in Mozart's The Marriage of Figaro. Since that time she has appeared regularly with the New York City Opera and has been a guest with the Bordeaux Opera in the title role of Carmen, a performance she repeated with the Israel Philharmonic. During 1972 Joanna Simon has appeared at the Teatro Colon, Buenos Aires, in Bomarzo, at Tanglewood, at the Salzburg Festival, as well as with many orchestras and opera companies in the United States.

Dean Wilder, who is Head of the voice department at the Westminster Choir School, made advanced opera and lieder study at the Deutsche Opera, Berlin, at the Goldovsky Opera Theatre, at the Denver Lyric Opera and at the NBC Opera. In recent seasons he has appeared with many orchestras and choruses, among them the National Symphony, the Rhode Island Symphony, the Portland (Oregon) Symphony and the Cambridge Festival and Bach Society Orchestras. Until recently he taught at the New England Conservatory and Boston University. Dean Wilder sang with the Boston Symphony earlier this year in Symphony Hall and at Tanglewood.

Norman Treigle, leading bass of the New York City Opera, began his career with the New Orleans Opera Company. In 1953 he was accepted as a member of the New York City Opera and has remained there ever since. Mr. Treigle has also sung in other leading opera houses of the United States, Canada and Latin America, and with major symphony orchestras, including the New York Philharmonic, the Philadelphia, the Minnesota.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514
DEC 6 1972 New England Newsclip

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043
DEC 6 1972 New England Newsclip

DOVER-SHERBORN
SUBURBAN PRESS
NATICK, MASS.
W. 1,500
DEC 14 1972 New England Newsclip

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IS CELEBRATING BEETHOVEN'S BIRTHDAY THIS WEEK WITH A PERFORMANCE OF THE NINTH SYMPHONY. THE PERFORMANCE, UNFORTUNATELY, IS SOLD OUT. Tune in next week.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
DEC 8 1972 New England Newsclip

Bernstein subs for Steinberg

Leonard Bernstein will replace William Steinberg as conductor of the two special Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, Dec. 15 and 16.

The program for the two Beethoven evenings has been changed to the Ninth Symphony each night, with the same orchestra, choruses and soloists as previously scheduled. Steinberg's illness caused the changes in conductor and material.

FENCE VI
SUDBURY
W. 3,000
MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MAS
W. 8,234
MINUTE M
BEDFORD
W. 2,993
TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200
JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
W. 6,000
DEC 7 1971
DEC 7
DEC 7 1972
DEC 7
DEC 7 1972 New England Newsclip

Former Music Director William Steinberg returns to Boston Friday and Saturday, Dec. 15 and 16 to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a weekend celebration of Beethoven's birthday.

On Friday evening, Dec. 15 at 8:30 p.m., the orchestra performs Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture no. 3, the Symphony no. 8 and the Fifth Symphony. Saturday evening the orchestra performs Beethoven's First and Ninth Symphonies. Soloists for the Ninth Symphony are: Johanna Meier, soprano; Joanna Simon, contralto; Dean Wilder, tenor; Norman Treigle, bass, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus under the direction of John Oliver.

THE LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 8,500
DEC 8 1972 New England Newsclip

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202
DEC 8 1972 New England Newsclip

Northeastern News
Boston Mass
DEC 1 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO celebrates Ludwig

The 172nd anniversary of Beethoven's birthday will be celebrated on Dec. 16th. To commemorate this event, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform two programs of Beethoven's music on Friday, Dec. 15th and on Saturday, Dec. 16th.

Former Music Director, William Steinberg, will return to Boston's podium to conduct the BSO. The program on Friday night at 8:30, will include the "Leonora Overture No. 3," and the Symphonies Nos. 5 and 8. Saturday's program, also beginning at 8:30, will include the First and Ninth Symphonies.

The soloists for the Ninth Symphony will be Johanna Meier, soprano; Joanna Simon, contralto; Dean Wilder, tenor; Norman Treigle, Bass; and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus under the direction of John Oliver.

Johanna Meier will make her debut with the BSO in these performances. Joanna Simon, who has appeared with the orchestra in recent seasons, has also appeared at Tanglewood, and at the Saltzburg Festival in Austria. Dean Wilder is head of the voice department at the Westminster Choir School, and has appeared with many orchestras and choruses. Until recently he taught at the New England Conservatory and Boston University. Norman Treigle, leading bass of the New York City Opera, has appeared previously with the BSO in performances of Bach's "Johannespassion."

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus, formed in 1970, is sponsored jointly by the BSO and by Boston University. John Oliver, who also directs the Framingham Choral Society, has directed the Tanglewood Chorus since its beginning. Members of the Chorus come from the Greater Boston Area.

Tickets for these Beethoven Celebration Performances may be purchased at the Symphony Hall Box Office, on Mass. Ave. Inquiries may be directed to the Box Office: telephone 266-1492.

Steinberg to conduct symphony

Former Music Director William Steinberg returns to Boston Friday and Saturday, Dec. 15 and 16, to conduct the Orchestra in a weekend celebration of Beethoven's birthday.

Friday evening, Dec. 15 at 8:30 p.m., the Orchestra performs Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture no. 3, the Symphony no. 8 and the Fifth Symphony. Saturday evening the Orchestra performs Beethoven's First and Ninth Symphonies. Soloists for the Ninth Symphony are: Johanna Meier, soprano; Joanna Simon, contralto; Dean Wilder, tenor; Norman Treigle, bass; and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus under the direction of John Oliver.

Steinberg, former Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, retired from his post in Boston at the end of last season and is now Music Director of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525
DEC 14 1972 New England Newsclip

A Holiday Sampler

There has been a change in conductors for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's programs tomorrow and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Leonard Bernstein replaces William Steinberg (who is hospitalized) in conducting the Beethoven birthday celebration concerts. In both concerts Mr. Bernstein will conduct a program consisting solely of Beethoven's Symphony No. 9. As originally announced, the program for Friday included the "Leonore" Overture No. 3, the Symphony No. 8 and the Fifth Symphony. Saturday's program was to have included the First Symphony as well as the Ninth. There will be no intermission. Tickets for the Saturday performance are sold out, but there are some still available for Friday's concert.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398
DEC 14 1972 New England Newsclip

Steinberg to Conduct Tribute to Beethoven

BOSTON — Former Music Director William Steinberg will return to Boston Friday and Saturday to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a weekend celebration of Beethoven's birthday.

Friday evening at 8.30, the orchestra will perform Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture no. 3, the Symphony no. 8 and the Fifth Symphony. Saturday evening, the orchestra will perform Beethoven's First and Ninth Symphonies. Soloists for the Ninth Symphony will be Johanna Meier, soprano; Joanna Simon, contralto; Dean Wilder, tenor; Norman Treigle, bass; and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus under the direction of John Oliver.

THE PERFORMING ARTS

By MARY-ALICE KING

Many Beethoven devotees will celebrate the master's birthday with the Boston Symphony. Two special all-Beethoven concerts featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus will take place Friday, Dec. 15, and Saturday, Dec. 16, under the baton of William Steinberg, former music director.

Friday's fare features the Fifth Symphony; Leonore Overture No. 3 and Symphony No. 8. Saturday the orchestra performs the First and Ninth symphonies.

Soloists for the Ninth are Johanna Meier, soprano; Joanna Simon, contralto; Dean Wilder, tenor; Norman Treigle, bass, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus under the direction of John Oliver.

Conductor Steinberg, who has retired as music director of the BSO, is music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Performance time both evenings is 8:30 p.m.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Beethoven celebration set

BOSTON — Former Music Director William Steinberg returns to Boston Friday and Saturday, Dec. 15 and 16 to conduct the Orchestra in a weekend celebration of Beethoven's birthday.

Friday evening, Dec. 15 at 8:30 p.m. the Orchestra performs Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture no. 3, the Symphony no. 8 and the Fifth Symphony. Saturday evening the Orchestra performs Beethoven's First and Ninth Symphonies. Soloists for the Ninth Symphony are: Johanna Meier, soprano; Joanna Simon, contralto; Dean Wilder, tenor; Norman Treigle, bass; and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus under the direction of John Oliver.

William Steinberg, former Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, retired from his post in Boston at the end of last season and is now Music Director of the Pittsburgh Symphony. Under his leadership, the Boston Symphony has continued its steady progress as one of the foremost musical organizations in the world. He led concerts not only in Boston, in New York and in many other American cities, but also in the music centers of England, Germany, Austria, Italy, Spain and France. Mr. Steinberg's is a celebrated name in music all over the world and he has the distinction of being a founder of the Israel Philharmonic.

Johanna Meier makes her debut with the Boston Symphony in this performance of the Ninth Symphony. Born and trained in the United States, she appeared with the New York City Opera for the first time three seasons ago in Capriccio, and since that time has sung many roles with the Company. Last summer she made her debut with the Metropolitan Opera as Donna Anna in a part performance of Don Giovanni. Johanna Meier has appeared with many other companies, including the Opera Guild of Greater-Miami, the Washington Civic Opera and the Chautauqua Opera. During the 1972 Blossom Festival she sang in the Cleveland Orchestra's performance of Mahler's Eighth Symphony.

Johanna Simon, who has appeared with the Orchestra in recent seasons here in Boston, made her debut with the New York City Opera as Cherubino in Mozart's The Marriage of Figaro. Since that time she has appeared regularly with the New York City Opera and has been a guest with the Bordeaux Opera in the title role of Carmen, a performance she repeated with the Israel Philharmonic. During 1972 Joanna Simon has appeared at the Teatro Colon, Buenos Aires, in Bomarzo, at Tanglewood, at the Salzburg Festival, as well as with many orchestras and opera companies in the United States.

Dean Wilder, who is Head of the voice department at the Westminster Choir School, made advanced opera and lieder study at the Deutsche Opera, Berlin, at the Goldovsky Opera Theatre, at the Denver Lyric Opera and at the NBC Opera. In recent seasons he has appeared with many orchestras and choruses, among them the National Symphony, the Rhode Island Symphony, the Portland (Oregon) Symphony and the Cambridge Festival and Bach Society Orchestras. Until recently he taught at the New England Conservatory and Boston University. Dean Wilder sang with the Boston Symphony earlier this year in Symphony Hall and at Tanglewood.

Norman Treigle, leading bass of the New York City Opera, began his career with the New Orleans Opera Company. In 1953 he was accepted as a member of the New York City Opera and has remained there ever since. Mr. Treigle has also sung in other leading opera houses of the United States, Canada and Latin America, and with major symphony orchestras, including the New York Philharmonic, the Philadelphia, the Minnesota.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514
DEC 6 1972 New England Newsclip

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043
DEC 6 1972 New England Newsclip

DOVER-SHERBORN
SUBURBAN PRESS
NATICK, MASS.
W. 1,500
DEC 14 1972 New England Newsclip

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IS CELEBRATING BEETHOVEN'S BIRTHDAY THIS WEEK WITH A PERFORMANCE OF THE NINTH SYMPHONY. THE PERFORMANCE, UNFORTUNATELY, IS SOLD OUT. Tune in next week.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
DEC 8 1972 New England Newsclip

Bernstein subs for Steinberg

Leonard Bernstein will replace William Steinberg as conductor of the two special Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, Dec. 15 and 16.

The program for the two Beethoven evenings has been changed to the Ninth Symphony each night, with the same orchestra, choruses and soloists as previously scheduled. Steinberg's illness caused the changes in conductor and material.

FENCE VI
SUDBURY
W. 3,000

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MAS
W. 8,234

MINUTE M
BEDFORD
W. 2,993

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200
DEC 7 1972 New England Newsclip

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
W. 6,000
DEC 7 1972

DEC 7 DEC 7 1972 DEC 7

Boston Symphony Orch.

Former Music Director William Steinberg returns to Boston Friday and Saturday, Dec. 15 and 16 to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a weekend celebration of Beethoven's birthday. On Friday evening, Dec. 15 at 8:30 p.m., the orchestra performs Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture no. 3, the Symphony no. 8 and the Fifth Symphony. Saturday evening, the orchestra performs Beethoven's First and Ninth Symphonies. Soloists for the Ninth Symphony are: Johanna Meier, soprano; Joanna Simon, contralto; Dean Wilder, tenor; Norman Treigle, bass; and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus under the direction of John Oliver.

THE LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 9,500
DEC 8 1972 New England Newsclip

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202
DEC 8 1972 New England Newsclip

Northeastern News
Boston Mass

DEC 1 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO celebrates Ludwig

The 172nd anniversary of Beethoven's birthday will be celebrated on Dec. 16th. To commemorate this event, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform two programs of Beethoven's music on Friday, Dec. 15th and on Saturday, Dec. 16th.

Former Music Director, William Steinberg, will return to Boston's podium to conduct the BSO. The program on Friday night at 8:30, will include the "Leonora Overture No. 3," and the Symphonies Nos. 5 and 8. Saturday's program, also beginning at 8:30, will include the First and Ninth Symphonies.

The soloists for the Ninth Symphony will be Johanna Meier, soprano; Joanna Simon, contralto; Dean Wilder, tenor; Norman Treigle, Bass; and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus under the direction of John Oliver.

Johanna Meier will make her debut with the BSO in these performances. Joanna Simon, who has appeared with the orchestra in recent seasons, has also appeared at Tanglewood, and at the Saltzburg Festival in Austria. Dean Wilder is head of the voice department at the Westminster Choir School, and has appeared with many orchestras and choruses. Until recently he taught at the New England Conservatory and Boston University. Norman Treigle, leading bass of the New York City Opera, has appeared previously with the BSO in performances of Bach's "Johannespassion."

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus, formed in 1970, is sponsored jointly by the BSO and by Boston University. John Oliver, who also directs the Framingham Choral Society, has directed the Tanglewood Chorus since its beginning. Members of the Chorus come from the Greater Boston Area.

Tickets for these Beethoven Celebration Performances may be purchased at the Symphony Hall Box Office, on Mass. Ave. Inquiries may be directed to the Box Office: telephone 266-1492.

Steinberg to conduct symphony

Former Music Director William Steinberg returns to Boston Friday and Saturday, Dec. 15 and 16, to conduct the Orchestra in a weekend celebration of Beethoven's birthday.

Friday evening, Dec. 15 at 8:30 p.m., the Orchestra performs Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture no. 3, the Symphony no. 8 and the Fifth Symphony. Saturday evening the Orchestra performs Beethoven's First and Ninth Symphonies. Soloists for the Ninth Symphony are: Johanna Meier, soprano; Joanna Simon, contralto; Dean Wilder, tenor; Norman Treigle, bass; and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus under the direction of John Oliver.

Steinberg, former Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, retired from his post in Boston at the end of last season and is now Music Director of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525
DEC 14 1972 New England Newsclip

A Holiday Sampler

There has been a change in conductors for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's programs tomorrow and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Leonard Bernstein replaces William Steinberg (who is hospitalized) in conducting the Beethoven birthday celebration concerts. In both concerts Mr. Bernstein will conduct a program consisting solely of Beethoven's Symphony No. 9. As originally announced, the program for Friday included the "Leonore" Overture No. 3, the Symphony No. 8 and the Fifth Symphony. Saturday's program was to have included the First Symphony as well as the Ninth. There will be no intermission. Tickets for the Saturday performance are sold out, but there are some still available for Friday's concert.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398
DEC 14 1972 New England Newsclip

Steinberg to Conduct Tribute to Beethoven

BOSTON — Former Music Director William Steinberg will return to Boston Friday and Saturday to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a weekend celebration of Beethoven's birthday.

Friday evening at 8.30, the orchestra will perform Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture no. 3, the Symphony no. 8 and the Fifth Symphony. Saturday evening, the orchestra will perform Beethoven's First and Ninth Symphonies. Soloists for the Ninth Symphony will be Johanna Meier, soprano; Joanna Simon, contralto; Dean Wilder, tenor; Norman Treigle, bass; and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus under the direction of John Oliver.

THE PERFORMING ARTS

By MARY-ALICE KING

Many Beethoven devotees will celebrate the master's birthday with the Boston Symphony. Two special all-Beethoven concerts featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus will take place Friday, Dec. 15, and Saturday, Dec. 16, under the baton of William Steinberg, former music director.

Friday's fare features the Fifth Symphony; Leonore Overture No. 3 and Symphony No. 8. Saturday the orchestra performs the First and Ninth symphonies.

Soloists for the Ninth are Johanna Meier, soprano; Joanna Simon, contralto; Dean Wilder, tenor; Norman Treigle, bass, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus under the direction of John Oliver.

Conductor Steinberg, who has retired as music director of the BSO, is music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Performance time both evenings is 8:30 p.m.

Earl J. Dias review

42.

Bernstein leads BSO with skillful, dramatic flair

Leonard Bernstein, whose associations with the Boston Symphony Orchestra go back to his student days at Harvard and at Tanglewood, was guest conductor for the third program in the orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series.

Bernstein who has made his mark as director, composer, commentator, lecturer and writer, chose to present a program varied in both style and content — Mozart's "Symphony No. 40 in G Minor," Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole," and three orchestral excerpts from Berlioz's dramatic symphony, "Romeo et Juliette, Opus 17."

That Bernstein boasts a special kind of charisma in the musical world is obvious. Still silm, agile and assured, Bernstein, who has made his program with the dramatic flair, the agility and the attention to detail that have become his trademark.

The Mozart, for example, which some scholars have seen as a cry from the composer's heart, as his pathetic symphony full of unhappy agitation was given a remarkably lucid and beautifully phrased reading by Bernstein.

Whether this symphony is as sorrowful and restlessly passionate as some critics believe, I do not know. What I do know is that it has grace, delicacy, melodic charm, and finesse of workmanship, and it was these qualities that were underlined by Bernstein.

The Boston Symphony musicians gave him the kind of playing that they sometimes bestow on favored conductors — wonderfully precise, skillfully shaded, deeply felt, a model of controlled and expert orchestra performance.

As for the Ravel, with its instrumental coloring, its contagiously appealing Iberian rhythms, this, too, was a joy to the ear. And Bernstein really whipped the orchestra to a grand display of tonal power in the concluding "Habanera" and "Feria."

As for the Berlioz, he was a master of orchestration. The three excerpts from his "Romeo et Juliette" — a calm and beautiful night in the heroine's garden, a musical setting for Mercutio's charming and imaginative Queen Mab speech, and the concert and ball at the Capulet's home — are striking examples of program music. Inasmuch as both Bernstein and the orchestra were in top-notch form, this work won well-deserved plaudits to conclude a concert that must rank among the best of this Tuesday "B" Series.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
DEC 15 1972
New England Newsclip

TIME
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 3,473,000
DEC 25 1972

STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
S. 63,259
DEC 17 1972
New England Newsclip

E. J. DIAS

A Look At the Arts

Bernstein on podium in Symphony Hall

There are signs of tattle-tale gray in Leonard Bernstein's shock of unruly hair, but this glamorous composer-conductor-writer-commentator is still mentally and physically agile, and, in the third concert of the Boston Symphony's Tuesday "B" Series, in which Bernstein ~~was guest con~~ductor, he displayed the charisma, the ability to excite an audience that have for so long been his trademark.

Bernstein's associations with the Boston Symphony go back many years, of course, to his student days at Harvard and Tanglewood. The musicians of the orchestra know and understand him well and are unusually responsive to his baton. As a result, the Bernstein concert was one of the best-played that I have heard in Symphony Hall in several years—a concert that included a precise and lovely reading of Mozart's "Symphony No. 40 in G. Minor," Ravel's wonderfully rhythmical and many-mooded "Rapsodie Espagnole," and three excerpts from Berlioz's dramatic symphony, "Romeo and Juliette."

Whether the scores called for delicate pianissimo effects or roaring fortissimos, Bernstein and his musicians were equal to the occasion. Flawless in both execution and interpretation, the program was one of those rarities—one in which the temperament of the conductor and the expertise of the players were in harmonious accord.

EDUCATION

Professor Lenny

The seminar called Music 180 was 30 minutes into its dissection of Stravinsky's Sonata for Two Pianos when the door flew open and a 5-ft. 8½-in. whirlwind spun into the room, flung a fur coat onto a chair, affectionately pinched the cheek of Professor Leon Kirchner and subsided into a sitting position on the floor. It was "retired" Superconductor Leonard Bernstein, now 54, making his rounds at Harvard as the new Charles Eliot Norton Professor of Poetry.*

In characteristic Bernstein style, Lenny relaxed for only a few moments as a pair of suddenly awe-struck students resumed playing the sonata. Then he jumped to his feet. "No, no," he said. "You play it without feeling. Too much staccato. Please, please, play this more smoothly." Bumping a student as he lunged toward the piano, Bernstein apologized: "I've been to twelve hours of classes today. That can make you a little dizzy."

Then, fingers poised over the keys, came a cry: "My God, I can't play the piano any more." That remark was pure melodrama. After listening to Bernstein's brief run-through, the students tried again, and now they brought the piece to life. Satisfied, the visiting professor dropped back to his seat on the floor, extracted a cigarette from a leather case, and listened to a student wind quintet attack Irving Fine's Partita. Halfway through the first movement, Bernstein leaped to his feet again. "Tune up!" he cried. "My God, tune up!" While the musicians trembled, he went on: "This piece is whimsical. It's full of surprises. It should be played with energy and bounce." When the quintet failed to pick up, Bernstein raised his arms and led the undergraduates as energetically as if he were still conducting the New York Philharmonic. When the seminar ended, the students were exhausted. Lenny was as fresh as ever.

For Bernstein (class of '39), being a professor has provided pleasant surprises. "When I was at Harvard," he says, "no one was making music. I'm so happy to hear music at Harvard now." He has been hearing music elsewhere in Boston as well. During his six-week visit this fall, he worked with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his rehearsals and concerts were videotaped for the lectures he will deliver during another six-week residence next spring.

For all his professed attempts at maintaining a low profile, he has been perhaps the single most visible personage around the Yard—attending classes, helping music professors and spending evenings in long talk sessions with students in his suite at Eliot House. "Warmth isn't the word for what I feel in coming back," he says. "I have a penchant for sentimentality, especially where Harvard is concerned."

*The Norton professorship, a one-year post established in 1925, conceives poetry broadly to include all the arts.

THE MANY FACES OF BERNSTEIN TEACHING THE POETRY OF MUSIC AT HARVARD

DOUG BRUCE—CAMERA 5

QUODLIBET / By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Saturday's 'Oedipus Rex' an event of another order

Sometimes, when there is music on the program I especially love and which is not often heard, I go back Saturday night for a Boston Symphony program I have already reviewed Friday afternoon. Last Saturday I went back mainly for Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex," and, I believe for the first time, I want to write a second review.

Friday, the impact was somehow scattered, and in a review I never managed to write to my satisfaction, I tried to tell why. The central reason, I thought, was that Rene Kollo, taking the title role, was emotionally casual in a way that left the whole performance hollow at the center. Saturday's "Oedipus Rex" was an event of another order, one of the great musical experiences of my life, and I am sure that the critical difference was in Kollo.

Oedipus is a very, very difficult role. At the beginning, full of hubris, he sings in florid, sinuous lines—a strange union of Bach and Veri, made by this century's greatest inventor of melodies. His fears and his discoveries he articulates in barely inflected parlando. You need a tenor of penetrating intelligence and exemplary diction, one who is forceful and elegant at the same time, with command of florid style, and able to invest the quietest music with the utmost intensity. He must convince you that the journey from the showy, proud sufficiency of his opening "Liberi, vos liberabo" (Children, I will free you) to the starkness of "Lux facta est!" (All now is made plain) is a journey on which a soul is stripped.

That the 35-year-old Kollo is a tenor of unusual gifts is evident from his recordings of "Tannhaeuser" (with Solti on London) and "Meistersinger" (with Karajan on Angel), and I was not prepared for the musical and personal blandness of what he offered Friday. Everything was tasteful and pleasant-sounding, but you just cannot tell that story about a hero who remains so untouched.

Saturday he was a changed man. That he stood through the whole performance except for Jocasta's address rather than sitting with an air of total non-involvement when not singing was the most obvious external token of change. The crucial impact of his changed attitude was on his singing. He projected the embellishments of his arias with arrogant elan, the voice itself now ringing, full of color and life. But the crises in "Oedipus Rex" are pianissimo, and this time Kollo put so much energy into the articulation of syllables and into the rhythm that, in all their quiet, their force was tremendous. The end of the journey, when Oedipus sees his triple shame of birth, marriage, and parricide — "Lux facta est!" — was overwhelming.

I don't know whether because of the difference in having so compelling a figure at the center of the story, or just coincidentally, but Saturday evening everyone seemed to have something special to give. Leonard Bernstein's conducting was highly charged and completely controlled, and the response of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Harvard Glee Club, prepared by F. John Adams, was splendid Tatiana Troyanos was an electrifying Jocasta; Tom Krause and Ezio Flagello filled the less stunningly grateful roles of Creon and Tiresias excellently. And it was a particular pleasure to observe how well the two young Bostonians in this distinguished international cast acquitted themselves, Frank Hoffmeister (Shepherd) and especially David Evitts (Messenger).

Some of the troublesome balances between voices and instruments which you always get when a work designed for pit orchestra is done in concert with everyone on stage together stayed sticky, though it was better than on Friday. Michael Wager's narration, still admirable, moved between Friday and Saturday very slightly in the direction of hamminess (gulp). I again felt that Beethoven's Pastoral is not the ideal preface to "Oedipus Rex," and I was again very much moved by a performance both so simple and so discovering (and Saturday, by one dangerous percent, more self-indulgent in the last climax and coda).

Earl J. Dias review

42.

Bernstein leads BSO with skillful, dramatic flair

Leonard Bernstein, whose associations with the Boston Symphony Orchestra go back to his student days at Harvard and at Tanglewood, was guest conductor for the third program in the orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series.

Bernstein who has made his mark as director, composer, commentator, lecturer and writer, chose to present a program varied in both style and content — Mozart's "Symphony No. 40 in G Minor," Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole," and three orchestral excerpts from Berlioz's dramatic symphony, "Romeo et Juliette, Opus 17."

That Bernstein boasts a special kind of charisma in the musical world is obvious. Still silm, agile and assured, Bernstein, who has made his program with the dramatic flair, the agility and the attention to detail that have become his trademark.

The Mozart, for example, which some scholars have seen as a cry from the composer's heart, as his pathetic symphony full of unhappy agitation was given a remarkably lucid and beautifully phrased reading by Bernstein.

Whether this symphony is as sorrowful and restlessly passionate as some critics believe, I do not know. What I do know is that it has grace, delicacy, melodic charm, and finesse of workmanship, and it was these qualities that were underlined by Bernstein.

The Boston Symphony musicians gave him the kind of playing that they sometimes bestow on favored conductors — wonderfully precise, skillfully shaded, deeply felt, a model of controlled and expert orchestra performance.

As for the Ravel, with its instrumental coloring, its contagiously appealing Iberian rhythms, this, too, was a joy to the ear. And Bernstein really whipped the orchestra to a grand display of tonal power in the concluding "Habanera" and "Feria."

As for the Berlioz, he was a master of orchestration. The three excerpts from his "Romeo et Juliette" — a calm and beautiful night in the heroine's garden, a musical setting for Mercutio's charming and imaginative Queen Mab speech, and the concert and ball at the Capulet's home — are striking examples of program music. Inasmuch as both Bernstein and the orchestra were in top-notch form, this work won well-deserved plaudits to conclude a concert that must rank among the best of this Tuesday "B" Series.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
C. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
DEC 15 1972
New England Newsclip

TIME
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 3,473,000
DEC 25 1972

STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
S. 63,259
DEC 17 1972
New England Newsclip

E. J. DIAS

A Look At the Arts

Bernstein on podium in Symphony Hall

There are signs of tattle-tale gray in Leonard Bernstein's shock of unruly hair, but this glamorous composer-conductor-writer-commentator is still mentally and physically agile, and, in the third concert of the Boston Symphony's Tuesday "B" Series, in which Bernstein ~~was guest~~ conductor, he displayed the charisma, the ability to excite an audience that have for so long been his trademark.

Bernstein's associations with the Boston Symphony go back many years, of course, to his student days at Harvard and Tanglewood. The musicians of the orchestra know and understand him well and are unusually responsive to his baton. As a result, the Bernstein concert was one of the best-played that I have heard in Symphony Hall in several years—a concert that included a precise and lovely reading of Mozart's "Symphony No. 40 in G. Minor," Ravel's wonderfully rhythmical and many-mooded "Rapsodie Espagnole," and three excerpts from Berlioz's dramatic symphony, "Romeo and Juliette."

Whether the scores called for delicate pianissimo effects or roaring fortissimos, Bernstein and his musicians were equal to the occasion. Flawless in both execution and interpretation, the program was one of those rarities—one in which the temperament of the conductor and the expertise of the players were in harmonious accord.

EDUCATION

Professor Lenny

The seminar called Music 180 was 30 minutes into its dissection of Stravinsky's Sonata for Two Pianos when the door flew open and a 5-ft. 8½-in. whirlwind spun into the room, flung a fur coat onto a chair, affectionately pinched the cheek of Professor Leon Kirchner and subsided into a sitting position on the floor. It was "retired" Superconductor Leonard Bernstein, now 54, making his rounds at Harvard as the new Charles Eliot Norton Professor of Poetry.*

In characteristic Bernstein style, Lenny relaxed for only a few moments as a pair of suddenly awe-struck students resumed playing the sonata. Then he jumped to his feet. "No, no," he said. "You play it without feeling. Too much staccato. Please, please, play this more smoothly." Bumping a student as he lunged toward the piano, Bernstein apologized: "I've been to twelve hours of classes today. That can make you a little dizzy."

Then, fingers poised over the keys, came a cry: "My God, I can't play the piano any more." That remark was pure melodrama. After listening to Bernstein's brief run-through, the students tried again, and now they brought the piece to life. Satisfied, the visiting professor dropped back to his seat on the floor, extracted a cigarette from a leather case, and listened to a student wind quintet attack Irving Fine's Partita. Halfway through the first movement, Bernstein leaped to his feet again. "Tune up!" he cried. "My God, tune up!" While the musicians trembled, he went on: "This piece is whimsical. It's full of surprises. It should be played with energy and bounce." When the quintet failed to pick up, Bernstein raised his arms and led the undergraduates as energetically as if he were still conducting the New York Philharmonic. When the seminar ended, the students were exhausted. Lenny was as fresh as ever.

For Bernstein (class of '39), being a professor has provided pleasant surprises. "When I was at Harvard," he says, "no one was making music. I'm so happy to hear music at Harvard now." He has been hearing music elsewhere in Boston as well. During his six-week visit this fall, he worked with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his rehearsals and concerts were videotaped for the lectures he will deliver during another six-week residence next spring.

For all his professed attempts at maintaining a low profile, he has been perhaps the single most visible personage around the Yard—attending classes, helping music professors and spending evenings in long talk sessions with students in his suite at Eliot House. "Warmth isn't the word for what I feel in coming back," he says. "I have a penchant for sentimentality, especially where Harvard is concerned."

*The Norton professorship, a one-year post established in 1925, conceives poetry broadly to include all the arts.

THE MANY FACES OF BERNSTEIN TEACHING THE POETRY OF MUSIC AT HARVARD

DOUG BRUCE—CAMERA 5

QUODLIBET / By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Saturday's 'Oedipus Rex' an event of another order

Sometimes, when there is music on the program I especially love and which is not often heard, I go back Saturday night for a Boston Symphony program I have already reviewed Friday afternoon. Last Saturday I went back mainly for Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex," and, I believe for the first time, I want to write a second review.

Friday, the impact was somehow scattered, and in a review I never managed to write to my satisfaction, I tried to tell why. The central reason, I thought, was that Rene Kollo, taking the title role, was emotionally casual in a way that left the whole performance hollow at the center. Saturday's "Oedipus Rex" was an event of another order, one of the great musical experiences of my life, and I am sure that the critical difference was in Kollo.

Oedipus is a very, very difficult role. At the beginning, full of hubris, he sings in florid, sinuous lines—a strange union of Bach and Veri, made by this century's greatest inventor of melodies. His fears and his discoveries he articulates in barely inflected parlando. You need a tenor of penetrating intelligence and exemplary diction, one who is forceful and elegant at the same time, with command of florid style, and able to invest the quietest music with the utmost intensity. He must convince you that the journey from the showy, proud sufficiency of his opening "Liberi, vos liberabo" (Children, I will free you) to the starkness of "Lux facta est!" (All now is made plain) is a journey on which a soul is stripped.

That the 35-year-old Kollo is a tenor of unusual gifts is evident from his recordings of "Tannhaeuser" (with Solti on London) and "Meistersinger" (with Karajan on Angel), and I was not prepared for the musical and personal blandness of what he offered Friday. Everything was tasteful and pleasant-sounding, but you just cannot tell that story about a hero who remains so untouched.

Saturday he was a changed man. That he stood through the whole performance except for Jocasta's address rather than sitting with an air of total non-involvement when not singing was the most obvious external token of change. The crucial impact of his changed attitude was on his singing. He projected the embellishments of his arias with arrogant elan, the voice itself now ringing, full of color and life. But the crises in "Oedipus Rex" are pianissimo, and this time Kollo put so much energy into the articulation of syllables and into the rhythm that, in all their quiet, their force was tremendous. The end of the journey, when Oedipus sees his triple shame of birth, marriage, and parricide — "Lux facta est!" — was overwhelming.

I don't know whether because of the difference in having so compelling a figure at the center of the story, or just coincidentally, but Saturday evening everyone seemed to have something special to give. Leonard Bernstein's conducting was highly charged and completely controlled, and the response of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Harvard Glee Club, prepared by F. John Adams, was splendid Tatiana Troyanos was an electrifying Jocasta; Tom Krause and Ezio Flagello filled the less stunningly grateful roles of Creon and Tiresias excellently. And it was a particular pleasure to observe how well the two young Bostonians in this distinguished international cast acquitted themselves, Frank Hoffmeister (Shepherd) and especially David Evitts (Messenger).

Some of the troublesome balances between voices and instruments which you always get when a work designed for pit orchestra is done in concert with everyone on stage together stayed sticky, though it was better than on Friday. Michael Wager's narration, still admirable, moved between Friday and Saturday very slightly in the direction of hamminess (gulp). I again felt that Beethoven's Pastoral is not the ideal preface to "Oedipus Rex," and I was again very much moved by a performance both so simple and so discovering (and Saturday, by one dangerous percent, more self-indulgent in the last climax and coda).

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885

DEC 18 1972 New England Newsclip

Beethoven Played as Beethoven

By DAVID NOBLE

When Leonard Bernstein is n sympathy with a piece of nusic he is conducting, the erformance he gives is apt) be impressive. The Beethoven Ninth he presented this weekend with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Tanglewood chorus was impressive.

It was impressive at first because it was not overly shaped. That may sound like odd praise, but the reason Beethoven often is a bore is that most conductors labor to make him sound great, although his true greatness shows when his music is treated like other people's and allowed to flow.

This Bernstein-BSO Ninth flowed, especially in the first two movements, not without expressive shaping and pointing but not with too much. Most impressive, most suggestive of the gigantic depths of this symphony, was the reprise of the first movement. The incredibily evocative changes in detail between the first statement of the themes (in the opening exposition) and their recapitulation here were made plain with hair-raising fluidity and modesty.

Before the third movement, Bernstein paused to let the solo singers used in the finale take the stage. This was a good place to pause: it marked a change in Beethoven's score from classical sonata-form movements to theme-and-variation sets, and it marked a watershed in Bernstein's performance. Up to that point the Ninth had been all Beethoven's; afterward it was still his, but in a Bernstein edition that stepped away from terse sublimity toward dramatic projection on a more human level.

The mark of this "Bernstein edition," as the slow movement unfolded, was a general rise in loudness to one or two levels above Beethoven's markings, as if someone had turned up a volume knob.

Also, there was more fussing with expressive details, though generally in a lyrical direction — it worked, though not on the eerily suggestive plane achieved earlier. The musician who played this movement's florid horn solo made a valuable contribution.

The last movement went through some exaggerated ups and downs in Bernstein's interpretation, but that version had its strong points, effectiveness often among them. The solo singers were not devastating as individual performers, but as a quartet they secured some difficult music remarkably well. The chorus was more reliable than inspired, but also had its moments. The sense of accomplishment the audience had at the end was not an illusion.

Post script: At midnight, just after the first performance of the BSO's Beethoven gala,a different sort of holiday concert was played by the Harvard-Radcliffe Orchestra in Sanders Theater. It included Harvard President Derek Bok narrating Prokofiev's children's fable, "Peter and the Wolf."

In that, and in Kodaly's "Hary Janos" suite, the student performers were most impressive, despite serious rough spots. They give a tantalizing glimpse of what a professional orchestra could do if it were taught postimpressionist style as well as conductor James Yannatos had done with these intelligent young people.

Beethoven, Bernstein, and the BSO celebrate

By Louis Snyder

Leonard Bernstein

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

DEC 18 1972 New England Newsclip

The three B's — Beethoven, Bernstein, and the BSO — gave two bulging Symphony Hallsful a festive anniversary weekend. Since the birthdate in 1770 wavers between Dec. 15 and 16, the Beethoven celebration, in the form of his Ninth Symphony, was celebrated both evenings to wild acclaim.

Two seasons ago, Mr. Bernstein climaxed the orchestra's bicentennial Beethoven festival with a stirring performance of the same work, and it was on that occasion that the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, then recently formed under John Oliver's direction, made its official debut. This sterling group was on hand again in exuberant voice for the choral finale of the Ninth as was a quartet of strong-voiced soloists: soprano Johanna Meier, in her BSO debut; contralto Joanna Simon; tenor Dean Wilder, and basso Ara Berberian.

Mr. Bernstein was again in top form on Saturday evening, and as has been the case with his Symphony Hall appearances over the past few weeks, the orchestra, individually and ensemble, gave him the kind of support any conductor must dream of.

* * *

When such a personage as Ralph Vaughan Williams declared (with a few reservations) that "this Symphony is an unapproachable masterpiece," he wasn't just talking about the fourth movement — the choral setting with soloists of Schiller's "Ode to Joy." While this is the big moment many listeners (and some conductors) are there for, not so Mr. Bernstein. To each of the three preceding movements he gave the full complement of feeling and impact. The second movement — Molto Vivace — has almost never come off with such overwhelming rhythmic effect.

The "Ode to Joy," in the hands of Mr. Bernstein and the orchestra and the throats of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and soloists, achieved its rafter-shaking destination. After a somewhat tentative start on Saturday by Mr. Berberian, he and the singers plunged headlong into that extraordinary vocal and instrumental mix which Vaughan Williams, again, described as one of two examples of great music "which is at the same time serious, profound, and cheerful"

The soloists contended admirably with the treacherous writing Beethoven allotted to them — Miss Meier's strong, soaring voice emerged particularly clearly. At the end there was a great shout from the audience which recognized the titan-sized contributions of everyone, including the titan himself whose name looks down from Symphony Hall's procenium.

Beethoven birthday series

Bernstein conducts BSO in 'Ninth'

By Craig Smith
Globe Correspondent

Friday's performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with the Boston Symphony conducted by Leonard Bernstein in a special series of Beethoven Birthday concerts was most remarkable.

Bernstein is of course a known quantity, America's most famous classical musician and a special flamboyant personality who's talents range over the whole spectrum of music making. The flamboyance no doubt played some part in the effectiveness of the performance, and the well-known Bernstein charisma, obviously, was partially responsible for the stunning playing that he got from the orchestra.

At the same time it was amazing what a tough, unbeautiful and uncompromising performance he chose. There was no gloss in the knotty wind writing in the development of the first movement. It was all clarity and structure. The tempo shifts in the Adagio were not particularly suave but they were absolutely clear in intention and incidently the tempo ratios always the same, a quality one was also grateful for in his performance of Stravinsky's Oedipus Rex last week.

All in all it seems that Bernstein is in a more self-effacing "music for music's sake" stage of his career than he once was. It is a welcome development, and one which is producing some excellent performances.

It was good that the Ninth was the only piece in the program. One wants to be fresh for the piece and obviously nothing can follow it on the program. The orchestral playing was of the finest quality although it strikes me that the ratio of buzz to pitch in the bassoon is dangerously high, noticeable in the last movement dialogue with the lower strings, and that the oboe is not always in tune with the other winds.

The soloists were all adequate but only tenor Dean Wilder seemed really comfortable in the high tessitura of the writing. The chorus was well-trained but rather young sounding, a quality no doubt inevitable in America, where choruses tend to be of student age.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

DEC 19 1972 New England Newsclip

Leonard Bernstein led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through Beethoven's Ninth Symphony ~~last night. It was~~ a special preview performance for the Harvard community, and the 2600-plus seats in Symphony Hall were filled. After the BSO completed the "Ode to Joy" under a wrinkled Harvard Banner, the crowd gave Bernstein and his fellow musicians a standing ovation.

Photo Credit—Rick Stafford

TOWN CRIER
WAYLAND, MASS.
W. 4,652

DEC 21 1972 New England Newsclip

Bernstein's Ninth Symphony

Surely one of the best things about living here, as opposed to say West Boondock, is the opportunity to drive for half an hour and hear the likes of Beethoven's radiant 9th Symphony, conducted by Leonard Bernstein and performed by technically skilled and loving musicians. Last Friday night's performance of the 9th in Symphony Hall was worth every minute of icy driving; the hall was packed with people who wanted very much to be there.

The audience was predominantly young - no bejeweled and be-furred dowagers in this group - and they gave the music their courteous attention. Not a program rustled, not a throat cleared or coughed, even during the Adagio. The program began about 20 minutes late, allowing plenty of time for tension to build toward the appearance of the Famed Conductor.

Bernstein in person is a dimension beyond the fatherly teacher of those television Young Peoples Concerts - he strides on stage relaxed yet somehow tense; smiling and nodding that leonine mane of almost white hair in gracious awareness of his charisma.

But once on the podium, with the audience hushed in expectancy, he becomes a coiled spring, his body an extension of his musical memory. He used no score, and wore his white tie and tuxedo like a dancer's leotard, leaping and springing about the stand as though he could transmit his vision of Beethoven's score to two hundred musicians by mere force of will. And he did.

Even during the relatively quiet first movement, Bernstein used the broad gestures most conductors reserve for the finale, until one began to wonder what would be left for the heroic "Ode to Joy." While the instruments probed and murmured the first stirrings of the themes, Bernstein moved about among his musicians, calling forth an entrance here; a response there. The performance was precise and the tone beautiful. The tension was in abeyance briefly in the Adagio movement, when Bernstein's conducting was magestic and sweeping. During the recitative by the cellos and basses he faced those musicians head on, almost privately, exposing his profile to the audience.

But with the opening discord and stormy seven first bars of the fourth movement, the tension was almost palpable, until tenor Dean Wilder and the chorus stood for their statement of Schiller's lines.

Beethoven's use of the human voice in the 9th Symphony was a first, and he spared no pity for the singers. Both his deafness and his real obsession with creating something heroic have been blamed, but for whatever reason his setting of Schiller's poem is difficult singing; like Brahms, he used words merely as a vehicle for his music; not vice-versa.

The soloists were fine, although perhaps because of microphone trouble the contralto was sometimes difficult to hear. But John Oliver's Tanglewood Festival Chorus was marvelous, ~~both in~~ sustaining high and fast passages and in German diction. Some critics contend that the fourth movement is musically an adventure rather than a solution. I have no idea which it is, but listening to it last Friday was magnificent.

The audience was on its feet cheering before the last chord ended, giving a ten-minute standing, foot-stamping ovation. The chorus itself stamped all 100 pairs of feet when Oliver joined Bernstein on stage. And Saturday night they did it all again.

Jean Gogolin

HARVARD CRIMSON
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
D. 19,900

DEC 15 1972 New England Newsclip

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885

DEC 18 1972 New England Newsclip

Beethoven Played as Beethoven

By DAVID NOBLE

When Leonard Bernstein is in sympathy with a piece of music he is conducting, the performance he gives is apt to be impressive. The Beethoven Ninth he presented this weekend with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Tanglewood chorus was impressive.

It was impressive at first because it was not overly shaped. That may sound like odd praise, but the reason Beethoven often is a bore is that most conductors labor to make him sound great, although his true greatness shows when his music is treated like other people's and allowed to flow.

This Bernstein-BSO Ninth flowed, especially in the first two movements, not without expressive shaping and pointing but not with too much. Most impressive, most suggestive of the gigantic depths of this symphony, was the reprise of the first movement. The incredibily evocative changes in detail between the first statement of the themes (in the opening exposition) and their recapitulation here were made plain with hair-raising fluidity and modesty.

Before the third movement, Bernstein paused to let the solo singers used in the finale take the stage. This was a good place to pause: it marked a change in Beethoven's score from classical sonata-form movements to theme-and-variation sets, and it marked a watershed in Bernstein's performance. Up to that point the Ninth had been all Beethoven's; afterward it was still his, but in a Bernstein edition that stepped away from terse sublimity toward dramatic projection on a more human level.

The mark of this "Bernstein edition," as the slow movement unfolded, was a general rise in loudness to one or two levels above Beethoven's markings, as if someone had turned up a volume knob.

Also, there was more fussing with expressive details, though generally in a lyrical direction — it worked, though not on the eerily suggestive plane achieved earlier. The musician who played this movement's florid horn solo made a valuable contribution.

The last movement went through some exaggerated ups and downs in Bernstein's interpretation, but that version had its strong points, effectiveness often among them. The solo singers were not devastating as individual performers, but as a quartet they secured some difficult music remarkably well. The chorus was more reliable than inspired, but also had its moments. The sense of accomplishment the audience had at the end was not an illusion.

Post script: At midnight, just after the first performance of the BSO's Beethoven gala,a different sort of holiday concert was played by the Harvard-Radcliffe Orchestra in Sanders Theater. It included Harvard President Derek Bok narrating Prokofiev's children's fable, "Peter and the Wolf."

In that, and in Kodaly's "Hary Janos" suite, the student performers were most impressive, despite serious rough spots. They give a tantalizing glimpse of what a professional orchestra could do if it were taught postimpressionist style as well as conductor James Yannatos had done with these intelligent young people.

Beethoven birthday series

Bernstein conducts BSO in 'Ninth'

By Craig Smith
Globe Correspondent

Friday's performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with the Boston Symphony conducted by Leonard Bernstein in a special series of Beethoven Birthday concerts was most remarkable.

Bernstein is of course a known quantity, America's most famous classical musician and a special flamboyant personality who's talents range over the whole spectrum of music making. The flamboyance no doubt played some part in the effectiveness of the performance, and the well-known Bernstein charisma, obviously, was partially responsible for the stunning playing that he got from the orchestra.

At the same time it was amazing what a tough, unbeautiful and uncompromising performance he chose. There was no gloss in the knotty wind writing in the development of the first movement. It was all clarity and structure. The tempo shifts in the Adagio were not particularly suave but they were absolutely clear in intention and incidently the tempo ratios always the same, a quality one was also grateful for in his performance of Stravinsky's Oedipus Rex last week.

All in all it seems that Bernstein is in a more self-effacing "music for music's sake" stage of his career than he once was. It is a welcome development, and one which is producing some excellent performances.

It was good that the Ninth was the only piece in the program. One wants to be fresh for the piece and obviously nothing can follow it on the program. The orchestral playing was of the finest quality although it strikes me that the ratio of buzz to pitch in the bassoon is dangerously high, noticeable in the last movement dialogue with the lower strings, and that the oboe is not always in tune with the other winds.

The soloists were all adequate but only tenor Dean Wilder seemed really comfortable in the high tessitura of the writing. The chorus was well-trained but rather young sounding, a quality no doubt inevitable in America, where choruses tend to be of student age.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

DEC 19 1972 New England Newsclip

Beethoven, Bernstein, and the BSO celebrate

By Louis Snyder

Leonard Bernstein

The three B's — Beethoven, Bernstein, and the BSO — gave two bulging Symphony Hallsful a festive anniversary weekend. Since the birthdate in 1770 wavers between Dec. 15 and 16, the Beethoven celebration, in the form of his Ninth Symphony, was celebrated both evenings to wild acclaim.

Two seasons ago, Mr. Bernstein climaxed the orchestra's bicentennial Beethoven festival with a stirring performance of the same work, and it was on that occasion that the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, then recently formed under John Oliver's direction, made its official debut. This sterling group was on hand again in exuberant voice for the choral finale of the Ninth as was a quartet of strong-voiced soloists: soprano Johanna Meier, in her BSO debut; contralto Joanna Simon; tenor Dean Wilder, and basso Ara Berberian.

Mr. Bernstein was again in top form on Saturday evening, and as has been the case with his Symphony Hall appearances over the past few weeks, the orchestra, individually and ensemble, gave him the kind of support any conductor must dream of.

* * *

When such a personage as Ralph Vaughan Williams declared (with a few reservations) that "this Symphony is an unapproachable masterpiece," he wasn't just talking about the fourth movement — the choral setting with soloists of Schiller's "Ode to Joy." While this is the big moment many listeners (and some conductors) are there for, not so Mr. Bernstein. To each of the three preceding movements he gave the full complement of feeling and impact. The second movement — Molto Vivace — has almost never come off with such overwhelming rhythmic effect.

The "Ode to Joy," in the hands of Mr. Bernstein and the orchestra and the throats of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and soloists, achieved its rafter-shaking destination. After a somewhat tentative start on Saturday by Mr. Berberian, he and the singers plunged headlong into that extraordinary vocal and instrumental mix which Vaughan Williams, again, described as one of two examples of great music "which is at the same time serious, profound, and cheerful"

The soloists contended admirably with the treacherous writing Beethoven allotted to them — Miss Meier's strong, soaring voice emerged particularly clearly. At the end there was a great shout from the audience which recognized the titan-sized contributions of everyone, including the titan himself whose name looks down from Symphony Hall's procenium.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

DEC 18 1972 New England Newsclip

Leonard Bernstein led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through Beethoven's Ninth Symphony last night. It was a special preview performance for the Harvard community, and the 2600-plus seats in Symphony Hall were filled. After the BSO completed the "Ode to Joy" under a wrinkled Harvard Banner, the crowd gave Bernstein and his fellow musicians a standing ovation.

Photo Credit—Rick Stafford

TOWN CRIER
WAYLAND, MASS.
W. 4,652

DEC 21 1972 New England Newsclip

Bernstein's Ninth Symphony

Surely one of the best things about living here, as opposed to say West Boondock, is the opportunity to drive for half an hour and hear the likes of Beethoven's radiant 9th Symphony, conducted by Leonard Bernstein and performed by technically skilled and loving musicians. Last Friday night's performance of the 9th in Symphony Hall was worth every minute of icy driving; the hall was packed with people who wanted very much to be there.

The audience was predominantly young - no bejeweled and be-furred dowagers in this group - and they gave the music their courteous attention. Not a program rustled, not a throat cleared or coughed, even during the Adagio. The program began about 20 minutes late, allowing plenty of time for tension to build toward the appearance of the Famed Conductor.

Bernstein in person is a dimension beyond the fatherly teacher of those television Young Peoples Concerts - he strides on stage relaxed yet somehow tense; smiling and nodding that leonine mane of almost white hair in gracious awareness of his charisma.

But once on the podium, with the audience hushed in expectancy, he becomes a coiled spring, his body an extension of his musical memory. He used no score, and wore his white tie and tuxedo like a dancer's leotard, leaping and springing about the stand as though he could transmit his vision of Beethoven's score to two hundred musicians by mere force of will. And he did.

Even during the relatively quiet first movement, Bernstein used the broad gestures most conductors reserve for the finale, until one began to wonder what would be left for the heroic "Ode to Joy." While the instruments probed and murmured the first stirrings of the themes, Bernstein moved about among his musicians, calling forth an entrance here; a response there. The performance was precise and the tone beautiful. The tension was in abeyance briefly in the Adagio movement, when Bernstein's conducting was magestic and sweeping. During the recitative by the cellos and basses he faced those musicians head on, almost privately, exposing his profile to the audience.

But with the opening discord and stormy seven first bars of the fourth movement, the tension was almost palpable, until tenor Dean Wilder and the chorus stood for their statement of Schiller's lines.

Beethoven's use of the human voice in the 9th Symphony was a first, and he spared no pity for the singers. Both his deafness and his real obsession with creating something heroic have been blamed, but for whatever reason his setting of Schiller's poem is difficult singing; like Brahms, he used words merely as a vehicle for his music; not vice-versa.

The soloists were fine, although perhaps because of microphone trouble the contralto was sometimes difficult to hear. But John Oliver's Tanglewood Festival Chorus was marvelous, both in sustaining high and fast passages and in German diction. Some critics contend that the fourth movement is musically an adventure rather than a solution. I have no idea which it is, but listening to it last Friday was magnificent.

The audience was on its feet cheering before the last chord ended, giving a ten-minute standing, foot-stamping ovation. The chorus itself stamped all 100 pairs of feet when Oliver joined Bernstein on stage. And Saturday night they did it all again.

Jean Gogolin

HARVARD CRIMSON
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
D. 19,900

DEC 16 1972 New England Newsclip

44.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202

DEC 22 1972 New England Newsclip

THE PERFORMING ARTS

Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto in D with Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, as soloist in a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Tuesday, Jan. 2, at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall.

Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D will follow.

Michael Tilson Thomas was appointed associate conductor of the BSO in the spring of 1970.

This year he continues to direct the Boston Symphony's Spectrum concerts, which he created. During the past two years, Mr. Thomas has conducted many of the major orchestras in this country and in Europe and Japan. This season he returns for guest engagements with the Israel Philharmonic, the London Symphony, the New Philharmonic, and the New York Philharmonic, with which he begins his first season as music director of the nationally - televised "Young People's Concerts." The young conductor also makes his debut with the Lincoln Center Chamber Music Society, begins his second year with the Buffalo Philharmonic and assumes the position of visiting adjunct professor of music at the State University of New York at Buffalo.

On Friday, Jan. 5, at 2 p.m., Thomas will conduct "Prelude To The Afternoon Of A Fun," "Jeux" Poeme Danse by Debussy and Copland's Symphony No. 3.

The program will be repeated Saturday, Jan. 6, at 8:30 p.m. and Tuesday, Jan. 9, at 8:30 p.m.

* * *

THE LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 8,500

DEC 29 1972 New England Newsclip

Thomas to conduct Boston Symphony

On Friday afternoon, Jan. 5 at 2 p.m., Saturday evening Jan. 6 at 8:30 p.m. and Tuesday night Jan. 9 at 8:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Debussy's Prelude to the afternoon of a faun, Debussy's "Jeux", poeme danse and Copland's Symphony no. 3.

Michael Tilson Thomas was appointed Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony at the beginning of the 1969-70 season, and he replaced William Steinberg at concerts in New York during the fall when Mr. Steinberg became ill.

He conducted more than 30 of the Boston Symphony's concerts during that season, and was appointed Associate Conductor of the Orchestra in the spring of 1970. In May 1970 he made his London debut in concerts with the London Symphony.

During that summer, he conducted at the Ravinia Festival and at the Lincoln Center Festival in New York, as well as at Tanglewood. On the Boston Symphony Orchestra's tour to Europe he conducted concerts in Wuppertal, Hanover, Frankfurt, Rome and Barcelona.

During the past two years, Mr. Thomas has conducted many of the major orchestras in this country, and in Europe and Japan. This season he returns for guest engagements with the Israel Philharmonic, the London Symphony, the New Philharmonia, and the New York Philharmonic, with which he begins his first season as Music Director of the nationally-televised "Young People's Concerts."

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 154,165 SUN. 311-112

DEC 3 1 1972 Buffalo

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS, scheduled to conduct here Jan. 28 and 30 (Mahler's Ninth Symphony and a violin concerto by Mozart), will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two programs this week. Thomas is principal guest conductor of the BSO.

He will have Boston concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist in the Tchaikovsky concerto on a program with Brahms's Symphony No. 2 on Tuesday.

Then on Friday and Saturday he conducts the Boston in Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" and "Jeux," and Copland's Symphony No. 3. All the Boston programs are in Symphony Hall. (The Debussy-Copland program is repeated Jan. 9.)

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993

DEC 21 1972 New England Newsclip

Violin Concerto

On Tuesday, Jan. 2 at 8:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas, Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Orchestra in Tschaikovsky's Violin Concerto in D with Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster of the Orchestra, as soloist. Thomas follows that work with Brahm's Symphony no. 2 in D.

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
W. 6,000

DEC 28 1972 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony

On Friday afternoon, Jan. 5 at 2 p.m., Saturday evening Jan. 6 at 8:30 p.m. and Tuesday night Jan. 9 at 8:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Debussy's Prelude to the afternoon of a faun, Debussy's "Jeux," poeme danse and Copland's Symphony no. 3.

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993

DEC 21 1972 New England Newsclip

sy Prelude

fternoon, Jan. 5 at 2
evening, Jan. 6 at esday night, Jan. 9
ichael Tilson
the Boston
in Debussy's on of a Faun,
e danse and
no. 3.

TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
D. 38,127

DEC 27 1972 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Concert Jan. 4

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform in Providence for the last of its 1972-73 series at the Veterans Auditorium Jan. 4 at 8:30 p.m. under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas.

The concert will include Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," followed by "Jeux," poeme danse, and Copland's Symphony no. 3.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202

DEC 27 1972 New England Newsclip

THE PERFORMING ARTS

Preview of Arts '73: From Bali To Brahms

By NANCY POPKIN
Family Life Editor

* * *

Michael Tilson Thomas, principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the orchestra in Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto in D with Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall. Mr. Thomas follows that work with Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D.

Michael Tilson Thomas was appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony at the beginning of the 1969-70 season. He replaced William Steinberg at concerts in New York during the fall when Mr. Steinberg became ill. He conducted more than 30 of the Boston Symphony's concerts during that season and was appointed associate conductor of the orchestra in the spring of 1970. In May 1970 he made his London debut in concerts with the London Symphony. During that summer he conducted at the Ravinia Festival and at the Lincoln Center Festival in New York as well as at Tanglewood. On the Boston Symphony Orchestra's tour to Europe he conducted concerts in Wuppertal, Hanover, Frankfurt, Rome and Barcelona.

He now continues to direct the Boston Symphony's Spectrum Concerts, which he created. During the past two years, Mr. Thomas had conducted many of the major orchestras in this country, Europe and Japan. This season he returns for guest engagements with the Israel Philharmonic, the London Symphony, the New Philharmonia, and the New York Philharmonic, with which he begins his first season as music director of the nationally televised "Young People's Concerts". He also makes his debut with the Lincoln Center Chamber Music Society, begins his second year with the Buffalo Philharmonic and assumes the position of visiting adjunct professor of music at the State University of New York in Buffalo.

* * *

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514

DEC 27 1972 New England Newsclip

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

DEC 27 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO to present Debussy works

BOSTON — On Friday afternoon, January 5 at 2:00 p.m., Saturday evening January 6 at 8:30 p.m. and Tuesday night January 9 at 8:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy's "Jeux," poeme danse and Copland's Symphony no. 3.

Michael Tilson Thomas was appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony at the beginning of the 1969-70 season, and he replaced William Steinberg at concerts in New York during the fall when Mr. Steinberg became ill. He conducted more than thirty of the Boston Symphony's concerts during that season, and was appointed associate conductor of the orchestra in the spring of 1970. In May 1970 he made his London debut in concerts with the London Symphony. During that summer he conducted at the Ravinia Festival and at the Lincoln Center Festival in New York, as well as at Tanglewood. On the Boston Symphony Orchestra's tour to Europe he conducted concerts in Wuppertal, Hanover, Frankfurt, Rome and Barcelona.

So Mr. Thomas is well known to Boston audiences. This year he continues to direct the Boston Symphony's Spectrum Concerts, which he created. During the past two years, Mr. Thomas has conducted many of the major orchestras in this country, and in Europe and Japan. This season he returns for guest engagements with the Israel Philharmonic, the London Symphony, the New Philharmonia, and the New York Philharmonic, with which he begins his first season as music director of the nationally-televised "Young People's Concerts." He also makes his debut with the Lincoln Center Chamber Music Society, begins his second year with the Buffalo Philharmonic and assumes the position of Visiting Adjunct Professor of Music at the State University of New York in Buffalo.

SARATOGA SPRINGS, N. Y.
SARATOGIAN
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
D. 11,000

DEC 24 1972

45.

1972 filled with history in world of music

BY MARY CAMPBELL
AP Newsfeatures Writer

During 1972, the Metropolitan Opera has had three leaders, Sir Rudolf Bing, 70, who had been general manager since 1950, retired at the end of the 1971-72 season, with a gala farewell concert held in the opera house in April.

Goeran Gentele, 54, who had been head of the Royal Opera in Stockholm and who had been at the Met for a year, observing and planning coming seasons, took over July 1. Then, on a vacation in Sardinia later in July, he and two daughters were killed in a car crash. His wife and a daughter survived. The Met Opera board appointed Schuyler Chapin, 49, whom Gentele had chosen as his chief assistant, as acting general manager.

Sir Rudolf's last new production was a big, elaborate "Otello," designed by Franco Zeffirelli with the title role sung by James McCracken. Gentele's first new production was to have been the opening night "Carmen," for which he planned to do the stage directing. "Carmen" was done on opening night, with Marilyn Horne as Carmen and with everyone following what they believed Gentele's ideas to have been. It was a critical success. The Met also returned with a new production of "Siegfried," starring Jess Thomas.

Henry Lewis, became the first black man to conduct at the Met, in the fall, Sir Rudolf started teaching opera administration at Brooklyn College and Maria Callas, whom he once fired and rehired at the Met taught opera singing master classes at the Juilliard School.

During the first year of the Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington, some 1.6 million persons visited the center. There were 272 concerts in the concert hall, and the theater and opera house were closed only five weeks before the first anniversary in September.

Among the newsmakers of the classical music year was Lilit Gampel, 12, of Los Angeles, who tucked her three-quarter-size violin under her chin and played with a number of major American orchestras and the Vienna Symphony. The prodigy said she plays the violin "because it is fun."

The "find" of the year was Kiri Te Kanawa, a beautiful soprano, still in her 20s, who made a stunning debut as the Countess in Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" at the Royal Opera House in London. The singer is part Maori and from New Zealand.

Recovery of the year was made by pianist Artur Rubinstein, 85. When his American tour was to have started, in Union N. J., Oct. 10, Rubinstein was at his home in Paris with a case of shingles on his face. But he was able to start the tour Nov. 10 in Wabash, Ind. He rescheduled the concerts he missed and will play in America until Jan. 15.

Snafu of the year concerned pianist Garrick Ohlsson, 24, who in 1970 was the first American to win the Chopin Competition in Warsaw. In an interview he referred to his Bosendorfer piano — a make which is expensive and rare in America — as the "Rolls-Royce of pianos." The story was published the morning of his concert at Lincoln Center and that afternoon Steinway yanked the piano he was to play that night off the stage, declaring itself insulted and Holsson barred from using a Steinway on a stage in any city. Lincoln Center provided a Bosendorfer it owns and a quick tuning and the concert went on.

The controversy of the year blew up when Lillian Libman, 59, who had been Igor Stravinsky's personal manager, wrote a book called "And Music at the Close: Stravinsky's Last Years." The book states that Stravinsky, who died during 1971 at 88, had failing eyesight, hearing and attention span during the last three or four years of his life.

Articles by Stravinsky and Robert Craft were suspected of being largely written by conductor Craft, 48, who had been like a son to Stravinsky for 23 years.

Stravinsky's music was heard — 30 pieces in one week — as the New York City Ballet held a Stravinsky Festival in May.

The New York Philharmonic renewed the contract of its music director, Pierre Boulez, who is in the second season of his first three-year contract. Boulez programs more contemporary music than his audience is accustomed to and more than the conservative listeners like. There had been talk that his contract would not be renewed. But Carlos Moseley, president of the Philharmonic, said that Philharmonic concerts had been 98 per cent sold out this fall. And "encounters," in which Boulez took Philharmonic members to Greenwich Village for very informal evenings of modern music, were packed.

The Atlanta Symphony also had a modern-music crisis. In February the board announced that its music director since 1967, Robert Shaw, was fired, because he had programmed a lot of contemporary music and subscriptions had declined from 5,500 per season to 3,300. Concerned persons held meetings and made appeals for Atlanta citizens to subscribe to the symphony. After 4,000 did, Shaw's contract was extended for two years.

The Boston Symphony hired Seiju Ozawa, 36, born in Manchuria, to become its music director when his contract with the San Francisco Symphony expires in 1973.

Leopold Stokowski was 90 in April and two months later resigned as conductor of the American Symphony Orchestra, which he founded 10 years ago, and which — because of his resignation — disbanded. Stokowski has moved from New York to London, to concentrate on conducting and making recordings with the London Symphony.

The opera in San Francisco opened its 50th season, an especially glittering one. It opened with Joan Sutherland in a new production of "Norma," will close with Beverly Sills in a new "Lucia di Lammermoor," and in between is presenting a complete Wagner Ring Cycle and the U. S. premiere of Gottfried von Einmen's "The Visit of an Old Lady."

The Paris Opera reopened after two years closed. The Royal Opera in London in July gave the premiere of a dissonant opera by Peter Maxwell Davies, 37, one of England's leading young composers. Conductor Edward Downes said after the "Taverner" premiere, "I can't recall a similar favorable reception to a new opera in Britain." At the Bayreuth Festival in Germany there was a space-age "Die Walkuere" and what was considered a Communist "Tannhouser."

JAMAICA PLAIN CITIZEN
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 5,400

DEC 28 1972

New England Newsclip

Thomas to conduct Boston Symphony

On Tuesday January 2 at 8:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas, Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Orchestra in Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto in D with Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster of the Orchestra, as soloist. Mr. Thomas follows that work with Brahm's Symphony no. 2 in D.

Michael Tilson Thomas was appointed Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony at the beginning of the 1969-70 season, and he replaced William Steinberg at concerts in New York during the fall when Mr. Steinberg became ill. He conducted more than thirty of the Boston Symphony's concerts during that season, and was appointed Associate Conductor of the Orchestra in the spring of 1970. In May 1970 he made his London debut in concerts with the London Symphony. During that summer he conducted at the Ravinia Festival and at the Lincoln Center Festival in New York, as well as at Tanglewood. On the Boston Symphony Orchestra's tour to Europe he conducted concerts in Wuppertal, Hanover, Frankfurt, Rome and Barcelona.

So Thomas is well known to Boston audiences. This year he continues to direct the Boston Symphony's Spectrum Concerts, which he created. During the past two years, Mr. Thomas had conducted many of the major orchestras in this country, and in Europe and Japan. This season he returns for guest engagements with the Israel Philharmonic, the London Symphony, the New Philharmonia, and the New York Philharmonic, with which he begins his first season as Music Director of the nationally-televised "Young People's Concerts." He also makes his debut with the Lincoln Center Chamber Music Society, begins his second year with the Buffalo Philharmonic and assumes the position of Visiting Adjunct Professor of Music at the State University of New York in Buffalo.

Joseph Silverstein has been Concertmaster of the Orchestra since 1962. Born in Detroit, he studied at the Curtis Institute and later with Joseph Gingold and Mischa Mischakoff. He was a prize winner in the 1959 Queen Elizabeth of Belgium International Competition and later won the Naumberg Foundation Award. Before coming to Boston he played in the orchestras of Houston, Denver and Philadelphia. Mr. Silverstein has established an international reputation as soloist and as first violin of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. In 1967 he led their tour to the Soviet Union, Germany and England. Mr. Silverstein is a faculty member of the New England Conservatory.

ORACLE
ORLEANS, MASS.
W. 15,700

DEC 28 1972

New England Newsclip

Concert in Falmouth

Two principals of the "Aristrocrat of Orchestras" will be presented in St. Barnabas Hall in Falmouth on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 7 at 3 p.m., the second in the Falmouth Music Association's 1972-73 series of musical events. Boston Symphony concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, with principal cellist Jules Eskin and pianist Virginia Eskin will be heard in a program of music for violin, cello and piano.

Joseph Silverstein was named concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ten years ago. A graduate of the Curtis Institute of Music, he came to Boston in 1955 at the age of twenty-three, having previously been a member of the Houston, Denver and Philadelphia orchestras. Principal cellist Jules Eskin, also a graduate of the Curtis Institute of Music, came to the Boston Symphony from the Cleveland Orchestra where for three years he had been principal cellist. Pianist Virginia Eskin, wife of Jules Eskin, has performed extensively with orchestra and in recital throughout the United States and in Europe. Next month she will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall in New York under the baton of Michael Tilson Thomas.

Tickets for the January 7 performance at St. Barnabas Hall are on sale at the Market Book Shop in Falmouth, Putnam's Book Shop, also in Falmouth and, in the mid-Cape, at the Paperback Booksmith in the Cape Cod Mall and the Cape Cod Conservatory, Route 6A in Barnstable Village. Student and military tickets are available at reduced rates and children under twelve are admitted free. Telephone reservations may be made by calling the Market Book Shop at 548-5636.

COURIER
WAREHAM, MASS.
W. 3,500

DEC 20 1972

New England Newsclip

MUSIC PROGRAM FOR VIOLIN, CELLO AND PIANO

To be presented in St. Barnabas Hall in Falmouth on Sunday afternoon, January 7th at 3 p. m., the second in the Falmouth Music Association's 1972-73 series of musical events, Boston Symphony concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, with principal cellist Jules Eskin and pianist Virginia Eskin will be heard in a program of music for violin, cello and piano.

Joseph Silverstein was named concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ten years ago. A graduate of the Curtis Institute of Music, he came to Boston in 1955 at the age of twenty-three, having previously been a member of the Houston, Denver and Philadelphia orchestras. Principal cellist Jules Eskin, also a graduate of the Curtis Institute of Music, came to the Boston Symphony from the Cleveland Orchestra where for three years he had been principal cellist. Pianist Virginia Eskin, wife of Jules Eskin, has performed extensively with orchestra and in recital throughout the United States and in Europe. Next month she will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall in New York under the baton of Michael Tilson Thomas.

Tickets for the January 7th performace at St. Barnabas Hall are on sale in the mid-Cape area at the Paperback Booksmith in the Cape Cod Mall and the Cape Cod Conservatory, Route 6A in Barnstable Village. Student and military tickets are available at reduced rates and children under twelve are admitted free.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

DEC 31 1972

New England Newsclip

By RAYMOND ERICSON

MUSICAL MULTIPLES

Like many other symphony orchestras, the Boston Symphony is trying to find new ways to attract audiences, and it has come up with what it calls Spectrum Concerts. One that was tried out in Boston with considerable success recently was "A Concert of Musical Multiples," and it will be repeated in Carnegie Hall on Jan. 18. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts and speaks about the music, which is by J. C. Bach (Symphony for Double Orchestra), Bartok (Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta), Steve Reich (Four Organs, for rock organ quartet and maracas ensemble) and Liszt ("Hexameron" for six pianos and orchestra). And, it is said, there will be a surprise or two.

Wild contrasts in evidence at BSO concert

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Wild contrast there was between the two halves of the Boston Symphony concert which Michael Tilson Thomas conducted yesterday afternoon, one of being wooed with delicacy, allusion, suggestion, the other of being beaten about the ears, harangued, shouted at. All right. I have given away which side I am on, and I can go on to say that the Good Guy was Debussy ("Afternoon of a Faun" and "Jeux") and that the Bad Guy was Aaron Copland (Third Symphony).

And I am sorry to say that because I love so much of Copland's music. He can be very gentle, he can be rustically energetic in a way only a Jewish boy from Brooklyn could bring off; sometimes he is full of high spirits, sometimes he is grave. Over the years he has written a string of masterful and touching compositions, but this 1946 war surplus symphony of his really is an awful thing.

The language is unmistakable Copland, but I miss the sense that only he himself could have written this music. Too much of it sounds like something that could have been turned out by any composer with facility and a penchant for parody. What is most distressing, though, is its rhetorical stance, its anxious insistence we understand just how important a statement it is making.

There was a lot of that around in the forties. Shostakovich, the arch-bang-banger of the war years, disfigured much of his orchestral music with such bombast, while Schuman and Harris were doing a lot of such tub-thumping over here. It is not a characteristic Copland fault, but having somehow committed himself to writing such a piece — much of which is based on the 1942 "Fanfare for the Common Man," the nutshell version of that ghastly manner — he did it with enormous vigor. I notice that the Boston Symphony has not played it since those first performances under Koussevitzky in '46; perhaps they could not let it rest another 26 years.

It is a noisy piece, and the performance, admirably paced and shaped, rather often spilled over from the enthusiastic to the raucous. Most of the playing in the two Debussy works was very beautiful, both as sensuous, purely orchestral achievement, and as intelligent and knowing deployment of the lovely sounds by the conductor.

As is evident from his fine recording with the BSO of the "Images," Thomas is keenly responsive to the subtle polyphony of textures in Debussy's music, and the playing he got the orchestra to do yesterday in both work, but particularly in "Jeux," that late, elusive, difficult score, was exemplary and quite extraordinary in its clarity.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 67,117
JAN 5 1973
New England Newsclip

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
JAN 6 1973
New England Newsclip

Thomas conducts tonight

Tonight at 8:30 p.m. at Symphony Hall, Michael Tilson Thomas, Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Orchestra in Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto in D with Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster of the Orchestra as soloist. Mr. Thomas follows that work with a Copland Symphony.

Thomas is well known to Boston audiences. This year he continues to direct the Boston Symphony's Spectrum Concerts, which he created. This season he will make guest engagements with the Israel Philharmonic, with which he begins his first season as Music Director of the nationally-televised "Young People's Concerts".

He also makes his debut with the Lincoln Center Chamber Music Society, begins his second year with the Buffalo Philharmonic and assumes the position of Visiting Adjunct Professor of Music at the State University of New York at Buffalo.

Joseph Silverstein has been Concertmaster of the Orchestra since 1962. Born in Detroit, he studied at the Curtis Institute and later with Joseph Gingold and Mischa Mischakoff. He was a prize winner in the 1959 Queen Elizabeth of Belgium International Competition and later won the Naumberg Foundation Award.

Before coming to Boston he played in the orchestras of Houston, Denver and Philadelphia. Mr. Silverstein is a faculty member of the New England Conservatory and Chairman of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

Copland's Symphony No. 3 Heard In Hub First Time Since 1946

By ELLEN PFEIFER
MUSIC CRITIC

Michael Tilson Thomas program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon was a mixture of the well-known — Debussy's "Jeux" and the "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," which Leonard Bernstein conducted only as recently as Thanksgiving weekend — and the rarely heard, in this case, Copland's Symphony No. 3 which Boston audiences haven't heard since it was dropped after the premiere performances in 1946.

The two Debussy works were something of a warm-up for next week's Spectrum Concerts where they will be performed in a "Tribute to Diaghilev." However, there was nothing of the warm-up in the quality of the playing yesterday.

In fact, the performances were superb, with the "Faun" going so beautifully, that even with Bernstein's fine reading still in memory, it was a pleasure to hear it again.

First of all, the orchestra playing was gorgeous. It has been splendid all season with only an occasional exception, but yesterday there was really something quite special about it. And, then, Thomas had everything laid out so clearly, the instrumental colors and melodic lines beautifully balanced, the dynamic levels all right (with some crystalline pianissimo playing), and the atmosphere languid and insinuating, and yet very cool.

The Copland is a work about which I can say all sorts of respectful compliments regarding its craftsmanship, and yet still not really like it or be much moved by it.

Composed between 1944 and 1946, it belongs very much to the world of "Appalachian Spring," although its references to bits of Americana are not quite so direct and specific. In four movements, it has two constructed rather freely and two (the second and fourth) built very tradi- first movement sonata forms.

For my part, the standout of the work is the Scherzo which juxtaposes a bustling, vigorous opening section with against a more retiring, outdoorsy sounding trio. The whole thing closes with great energy and brilliance, a really splashy piece that the BSO throws off with a great sense of fun.

The other movements I find not so immediately attractive —for example, the first movement themes which develop from rather lyrical beginnings into quite dramatic statement are a little disappointing—although the final movement returns to the kind of energetic which distinguished the Scherzo. Thomas provided the same kind of clarity and sense of theatre that he injected into the Debussy pieces.

● Concert Review

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885
JAN 6 1973
New England Newsclip

SUNDAY SUN
LAWRENCE, MASS.
S. 9,002
JAN 7 1973
New England Newsclip

Music Last Night

Boston Symphony Orchestra Ends Its Providence Season

By EDWIN SAFFORD

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, at Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

The spirit of Nijinsky hovered over the first half of the Bostonians' last concert of their Providence season last night. Victorious American bombast dating from 1946 was in charge of the remainder. Programming had Debussy's "Prelude to 'The Afternoon of a Faun'" as well as "Jeux" and the third symphony of Aaron Copland.

To get rid of negative feelings right away, the Copland symphony's honest righteousness left a hollow reaction with this listener. Partly, of course, that had to do with a style of music quite the composer's own and heard both in movie backgrounds, such as "The Red Pony," and in ballet scores, such as "Billy the Kid."

It is a style honored by imitation. You hear it now in just about every film taking place between the Mississippi and the Rocky Mountains.

If that were not enough, and this is not entirely the composer's fault although first class music should be more timeless, the piece is out of joint with the times. It is noble in a Peter Hurd, John Wayne and, alas, White House context, fine for 1946, bitter in 1973.

Will it survive as Debussy has? The future, not a music reviewer, only can tell. Right now such big, positive assurance seems maddening.

Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the Copeland for all its fanfare. He continues to get into things as though feeding a score through physical charge without detracting from the music. On this occasion, as previously, he was far more interesting than the average.

His Debussy reinforced the impression. Reasons for bringing Nijinsky into the discussion are that the eminent dancer choreographed "Afternoon of a Faun" several years following its composition and "Jeux" specifically for its first performance. The first was found difficult for its Grecian urn stylism and eroticism, the second because it got as far from classical ballet as tennis.

Performances of each work were absorbing. Thomas' way of thinking his music out nearly always is. The "Faun," for example, did not depend on lush tonalities so much as its impressionist suggestions. As a result there was a chamber quality which exposed nuance, and you could admire more fully the perspective of Doriot Anthony Dwyer's flute solos.

"Jeux," made up of daubes of orchestral color, some as sensual as scented chiffon, gave strong idea of Debussy's maturity. It is the kind of score which can fly off in individual directions, but the conductor had the entirety nailed down.

The concert was the first in the orchestra's series for this weekend, the rest to be heard in Boston. Before this has shown in certain rough edges and that was the case last night. Nevertheless, with sentiments toward Debussy outweighing Copland, you could reflect on it in agreeable fashion.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
JAN 8 1973
New England Newsclip

Michael T. Thomas To Conduct Symphony

On Thursday at 8:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas, Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Orchestra in Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto in D with Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster of the Orchestra, as soloist. Mr. Thomas follows that work with Copland's Symphony no. 3.

Michael Tilson Thomas was appointed Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony at the beginning of the 1969-70 season, and he replaced William Steinberg at concerts in New York during the fall when Mr. Steinberg became ill. He conducted more than thirty of the Boston Symphony's concerts during that season, and was appointed Associate Conductor of the Orchestra in the spring of 1970. In May 1970 he made his London debut in concerts with the London Symphony. During that summer he conducted at the Ravinia Festival and at the Lincoln Center Festival in New

continued on page 13

MICHAEL T. THOMAS
continued from page 3

York, as well as at Tanglewood. On the Boston Symphony Orchestra's tour to Europe he conducted concerts in Wuppertal, Hanover, Frankfurt, Rome and Barcelona.

So Mr. Thomas is well known to Boston audiences. This year he continued to direct the Boston Symphony's Spectrum Concerts, which he created. During the past two years, Mr. Thomas had conducted many of the major orchestras in this country, and in Europe and Japan. This season he returns for guest engagements with the Israel Philharmonic, with which he begins his first season as Music Director of the nationally-televises "Young People's Concerts." He also makes his debut with the Lincoln Center Chamber Music Society, begins his second year with the Buffalo Philharmonic and assumes the position of Visiting Adjunct Professor of Music at the State University of New York at Buffalo.

Joseph Silverstein has been Concertmaster of the Orchestra since 1962. Born in Detroit, he studied at the Curtis Institute and later with Joseph Gingold and Mischa Mischakoff. He was a prize winner in the 1959 Queen Elizabeth of Belgium International Competition and later won the Naumberg Foundation Award. Before coming to Boston he played in the orchestras of Houston, Denver and Philadelphia. Mr. Silverstein has established an international reputation as soloist and as first violin of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. In 1967 he led their tour to the Soviet Union, Germany and England. Mr. Silverstein is a faculty member of the New England Conservatory and Chairman of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

From dreams to fanfares in Symphony afternoon

By David Sterritt

Symphony Hall did not exactly dissolve in dreams. But conductor and musicians strived hard in that direction, with inimitable aid from Debussy.

Then the concert reached its second half, punctuated with rousing Copland fanfares. And that initial dreaminess seemed all the more alluring in retrospect. It was a compellingly programmed afternoon with the Boston Symphony. Principal guest conductor Michael Tilson Thomas was in charge.

* * *

This careful programming helped the program's overall impact. During the preintermission Debussy, there were some periods of languidness. Not enough to flaw the performance seriously, but felt nonetheless. Copland's Symphony No. 3 was then offered up with a heady garnishment of clashing vigor. In the long run, it was a day of exceptional poetic contrast, where a little early languor mattered little.

The Debussy works were familiar: "Prelude a l'apres-midi d'un faune," and the "poeme danse" of 1912, "Jeux." Mr. Thomas was in a properly impressionistic mood, which carried him all over the podium in unobtrusive glides and swoops.

The sense of missing energy was felt early, though the "Prelude" started well, with the gorgeous flute passages deliciously played. The flute section had some intonation problems later on, but by then the work had picked up and was flowing hauntingly. Diffuseness was more a problem in "Jeux." But it built to an imposingly romantic climax; and the denoument was carried off with a high sense of drama, plus just the right quick humor at the end.

The Copland Third Symphony begins with an arch-shaped "Molto moderato, with simple expression." It was very strong on Friday, confidently mixing gentle lyricism with a gut emotionalism. The only quibble was a little too much careless folksiness in trombone territory. The scherzo movement, Allegro molto, was quick, sharp, clear, exciting, with an even wider emotional range—moving from clarion-call brightness to quiet delicacy. It was consummately played.

* * *

Mr. Thomas failed to make the shifting Andantino so gripping, but showed architectural precision in building it toward the mighty last movement, which follows without pause. This began with imposing assurance during its ornately scored fanfare, based on Copland's 1942 "Fanfare for the Common Man." It moved rousingly through folksy rhythms and melodies, to a crashing conclusion wherein the brass unanimously excelled.

Copland's Third has numerous moments of outright chumminess. It is hard to place face value on the composer's words that "any reference to jazz or folk material in this work was purely unconscious." In any event, one doubts there was much unconsciousness about Mr. Thomas's choice of a friendly, youthful, full-steam approach — which carried at times the vigor of a country dance.

Yet the most gripping moments were those with an inescapably martial quality: a quality transformed by Copland into musical grandeur, and by Mr. Thomas into a barrage of immediate sonic excitement. It was loud, and some of it was obvious, but it was stirring, and, yes, a lot of fun.

Wild contrasts in evidence at BSO concert

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Wild contrast there was between the two halves of the Boston Symphony concert which Michael Tilson Thomas conducted yesterday afternoon, one of being wooed with delicacy, allusion, suggestion, the other of being beaten about the ears, harangued, shouted at. All right. I have given away which side I am on, and I can go on to say that the Good Guy was Debussy ("Afternoon of a Faun" and "Jeux") and that the Bad Guy was Aaron Copland (Third Symphony).

And I am sorry to say that because I love so much of Copland's music. He can be very gentle, he can be rustically energetic in a way only a Jewish boy from Brooklyn could bring off; sometimes he is full of high spirits, sometimes he is grave. Over the years he has written a string of masterful and touching compositions, but this 1946 war surplus symphony of his really is an awful thing.

The language is unmistakable Copland, but I miss the sense that only he himself could have written this music. Too much of it sounds like something that could have been turned out by any composer with facility and a penchant for parody. What is most distressing, though, is its rhetorical stance, its anxious insistence we understand just how important a statement it is making.

There was a lot of that around in the forties. Shostakovich, the arch-bang-banger of the war years, disfigured much of his orchestral music with such bombast, while Schuman and Harris were doing a lot of such tub-thumping over here. It is not a characteristic Copland fault, but having somehow committed himself to writing such a piece — much of which is based on the 1942 "Fanfare for the Common Man," the nutshell version of that ghastly manner — he did it with enormous vigor. I notice that the Boston Symphony has not played it since those first performances under Koussevitzky in '46; perhaps they could not let it rest another 26 years.

It is a noisy piece, and the performance, admirably paced and shaped, rather often spilled over from the enthusiastic to the raucous. Most of the playing in the two Debussy works was very beautiful, both as sensuous, purely orchestral achievement, and as intelligent and knowing deployment of the lovely sounds by the conductor.

As is evident from his fine recording with the BSO of the "Images," Thomas is keenly responsive to the subtle polyphony of textures in Debussy's music, and the playing he got the orchestra to do yesterday in both work, but particularly in "Jeux," that late, elusive, difficult score, was exemplary and quite extraordinary in its clarity.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 67,117
JAN 5 1973
New England Newsclip

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
JAN 6 1973
New England Newsclip

Thomas conducts tonight

Tonight at 8:30 p.m. at Symphony Hall, Michael Tilson Thomas, Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Orchestra in Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto in D with Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster of the Orchestra as soloist. Mr. Thomas follows that work with a Copland Symphony.

Thomas is well known to Boston audiences. This year he continues to direct the Boston Symphony's Spectrum Concerts, which he created. This season he will make guest engagements with the Israel Philharmonic, with which he begins his first season as Music Director of the nationally-televised "Young People's Concerts".

He also makes his debut with the Lincoln Center Chamber Music Society, begins his second year with the Buffalo Philharmonic and assumes the position of Visiting Adjunct Professor of Music at the State University of New York at Buffalo.

Joseph Silverstein has been Concertmaster of the Orchestra since 1962. Born in Detroit, he studied at the Curtis Institute and later with Joseph Gingold and Mischa Mischakoff. He was a prize winner in the 1959 Queen Elizabeth of Belgium International Competition and later won the Naumberg Foundation Award.

Before coming to Boston he played in the orchestras of Houston, Denver and Philadelphia. Mr. Silverstein is a faculty member of the New England Conservatory and Chairman of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

Copland's Symphony No. 3 Heard In Hub First Time Since 1946

By ELLEN PFEIFER
MUSIC CRITIC

Michael Tilson Thomas program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon was a mixture of the well-known — Debussy's "Jeux" and the "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," which Leonard Bernstein conducted only as recently as Thanksgiving weekend — and the rarely heard, in this case, Copland's Symphony No. 3 which Boston audiences haven't heard since it was dropped after the premiere performances in 1946.

The two Debussy works were something of a warm-up for next week's Spectrum Concerts where they will be performed in a "Tribute to Diaghilev." However, there was nothing of the warm-up in the quality of the playing yesterday.

In fact, the performances were superb, with the "Faun" going so beautifully, that even with Bernstein's fine reading still in memory, it was a pleasure to hear it again.

First of all, the orchestra playing was gorgeous. It has been splendid all season with only an occasional exception, but yesterday there was really something quite special about it. And, then, Thomas had everything laid out so clearly, the instrumental colors and melodic lines beautifully balanced, the dynamic levels all right (with some crystalline pianissimo playing), and the atmosphere languid and insinuating, and yet very cool.

The Copland is a work about which I can say all sorts of respectful compliments regarding its craftsmanship, and yet still not really like it or be much moved by it.

Composed between 1944 and 1946, it belongs very much to the world of "Appalachian Spring," although its references to bits of Americana are not quite so direct and specific. In four movements, it has two constructed rather freely and two (the second and fourth) built very tradi- first movement sonata forms.

For my part, the standout of the work is the Scherzo which juxtaposes a bustling, vigorous opening section with against a more retiring, outdoorsy sounding trio. The whole thing closes with great energy and brilliance, a really splashy piece that the BSO throws off with a great sense of fun.

The other movements I find not so immediately attractive —for example, the first movement themes which develop from rather lyrical beginnings into quite dramatic statement are a little disappointing—although the final movement returns to the kind of energetic which distinguished the Scherzo. Thomas provided the same kind of clarity and sense of theatre that he injected into the Debussy pieces.

• Concert Review

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885
JAN 6 1973
New England Newsclip

SUNDAY SUN
LAWRENCE, MASS.
S. 9,002
JAN 7 1973
New England Newsclip

Music Last Night

Boston Symphony Orchestra Ends Its Providence Season

By EDWIN SAFFORD

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, at Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

The spirit of Nijinsky hovered over the first half of the Bostonians' last concert of their Providence season last night. Victorious American bombast dating from 1946 was in charge of the remainder. Programming had Debussy's "Prelude to 'The Afternoon of a Faun'" as well as "Jeux" and the third symphony of Aaron Copland.

To get rid of negative feelings right away, the Copland symphony's honest righteousness left a hollow reaction with this listener. Partly, of course, that had to do with a style of music quite the composer's own and heard both in movie backgrounds, such as "The Red Pony," and in ballet scores, such as "Billy the Kid."

It is a style honored by imitation. You hear it now in just about every film taking place between the Mississippi and the Rocky Mountains.

If that were not enough, and this is not entirely the composer's fault although first class music should be more timeless, the piece is out of joint with the times. It is noble in a Peter Hurd, John Wayne and, alas, White House context, fine for 1946, bitter in 1973.

Will it survive as Debussy has? The future, not a music reviewer, only can tell. Right now such big, positive assurance seems maddening.

Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the Copeland for all its fanfare. He continues to get into things as though feeding a score through physical charge without detracting from the music. On this occasion, as previously, he was far more interesting than the average.

His Debussy reinforced the impression. Reasons for bringing Nijinsky into the discussion are that the eminent dancer choreographed "Afternoon of a Faun" several years following its composition and "Jeux" specifically for its first performance. The first was found difficult for its Grecian urn stylism and eroticism, the second because it got as far from classical ballet as tennis.

Performances of each work were absorbing. Thomas' way of thinking his music out nearly always is. The "Faun," for example, did not depend on lush tonalities so much as its impressionist suggestions. As a result there was a chamber quality which exposed nuance, and you could admire more fully the perspective of Doriot Anthony Dwyer's flute solos.

"Jeux," made up of daubes of orchestral color, some as sensual as scented chiffon, gave strong idea of Debussy's maturity. It is the kind of score which can fly off in individual directions, but the conductor had the entirety nailed down.

The concert was the first in the orchestra's series for this weekend, the rest to be heard in Boston. Before this has shown in certain rough edges and that was the case last night. Nevertheless, with sentiments toward Debussy outweighing Copland, you could reflect on it in agreeable fashion.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
JAN 8 1973
New England Newsclip

Michael T. Thomas To Conduct Symphony

On Thursday at 8:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas, Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Orchestra in Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto in D with Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster of the Orchestra, as soloist. Mr. Thomas follows that work with Copland's Symphony no. 3.

Michael Tilson Thomas was appointed Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony at the beginning of the 1969-70 season, and he replaced William Steinberg at concerts in New York during the fall when Mr. Steinberg became ill. He conducted more than thirty of the Boston Symphony's concerts during that season, and was appointed Associate Conductor of the Orchestra in the spring of 1970. In May 1970 he made his London debut in concerts with the London Symphony. During that summer he conducted at the Ravinia Festival and at the Lincoln Center Festival in New

continued on page 13

MICHAEL T. THOMAS

continued from page 3

York, as well as at Tanglewood. On the Boston Symphony Orchestra's tour to Europe he conducted concerts in Wuppertal, Hanover, Frankfurt, Rome and Barcelona.

So Mr. Thomas is well known to Boston audiences. This year he continued to direct the Boston Symphony's Spectrum Concerts, which he created. During the past two years, Mr. Thomas had conducted many of the major orchestras in this country, and in Europe and Japan. This season he returns for guest engagements with the Israel Philharmonic, with which he begins his first season as Music Director of the nationally-televises "Young People's Concerts." He also makes his debut with the Lincoln Center Chamber Music Society, begins his second year with the Buffalo Philharmonic and assumes the position of Visiting Adjunct Professor of Music at the State University of New York at Buffalo.

Joseph Silverstein has been Concertmaster of the Orchestra since 1962. Born in Detroit, he studied at the Curtis Institute and later with Joseph Gingold and Mischa Mischakoff. He was a prize winner in the 1959 Queen Elizabeth of Belgium International Competition and later won the Naumberg Foundation Award. Before coming to Boston he played in the orchestras of Houston, Denver and Philadelphia. Mr. Silverstein has established an international reputation as soloist and as first violin of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. In 1967 he led their tour to the Soviet Union, Germany and England. Mr. Silverstein is a faculty member of the New England Conservatory and Chairman of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

From dreams to fanfares in Symphony afternoon

By David Sterritt

Symphony Hall did not exactly dissolve in dreams. But conductor and musicians strived hard in that direction, with inimitable aid from Debussy.

Then the concert reached its second half, punctuated with rousing Copland fanfares. And that initial dreaminess seemed all the more alluring in retrospect. It was a compellingly programmed afternoon with the Boston Symphony. Principal guest conductor Michael Tilson Thomas was in charge.

* * *

This careful programming helped the program's overall impact. During the preintermission Debussy, there were some periods of languidness. Not enough to flaw the performance seriously, but felt nonetheless. Copland's Symphony No. 3 was then offered up with a heady garnishment of clashing vigor. In the long run, it was a day of exceptional poetic contrast, where a little early languor mattered little.

The Debussy works were familiar: "Prelude a l'apres-midi d'un faune," and the "poeme danse" of 1912, "Jeux." Mr. Thomas was in a properly impressionistic mood, which carried him all over the podium in unobtrusive glides and swoops.

The sense of missing energy was felt early, though the "Prelude" started well, with the gorgeous flute passages deliciously played. The flute section had some intonation problems later on, but by then the work had picked up and was flowing hauntingly. Diffuseness was more a problem in "Jeux." But it built to an imposingly romantic climax; and the denoument was carried off with a high sense of drama, plus just the right quick humor at the end.

The Copland Third Symphony begins with an arch-shaped "Molto moderato, with simple expression." It was very strong on Friday, confidently mixing gentle lyricism with a gut emotionalism. The only quibble was a little too much careless folksiness in trombone territory. The scherzo movement, Allegro molto, was quick, sharp, clear, exciting, with an even wider emotional range—moving from clarion-call brightness to quiet delicacy. It was consummately played.

* * *

Mr. Thomas failed to make the shifting Andantino so gripping, but showed architectural precision in building it toward the mighty last movement, which follows without pause. This began with imposing assurance during its ornately scored fanfare, based on Copland's 1942 "Fanfare for the Common Man." It moved rousingly through folksy rhythms and melodies, to a crashing conclusion wherein the brass unanimously excelled.

Copland's Third has numerous moments of outright chumminess. It is hard to place face value on the composer's words that "any reference to jazz or folk material in this work was purely unconscious." In any event, one doubts there was much unconsciousness about Mr. Thomas's choice of a friendly, youthful, full-steam approach — which carried at times the vigor of a country dance.

Yet the most gripping moments were those with an inescapably martial quality: a quality transformed by Copland into musical grandeur, and by Mr. Thomas into a barrage of immediate sonic excitement. It was loud, and some of it was obvious, but it was stirring, and, yes, a lot of fun.

UNION LEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
D. 21,008

JAN 9 1973 New England Newsclip

THE N. H. PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA will begin its 14th season with a winter concert at the Practical Arts Auditorium, Manchester, Sunday at 8:15 p. m. The orchestra, conducted by Rolland Tapley of the Boston Symphony, will present Brahm's 2nd Symphony and Marche Slav by Tschaikowsky. Featured guest artists from the Boston Symphony are Marylou Speaker, violinist, right, and Lawrence Wolfe, bass, who will perfrom "Duo de Concert" by Bottesini, an interesting and intricate duet for the smallest and largest string instruments.

UNION LEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
D. 21,008

JAN 17 1973 New England Newsclip

A Review

Orchestra Opens 14th Year

By PHOEBE BOURDEAU

The N.H. Philharmonic Orchestra opened its 14th season at the Practical Arts Auditorium in Manchester with works by Brahms, Bottesini and Tschaikowsky in a performance which can best be described as a crescendo mark: It began weakly and ended triumphantly.

The first half of the concert was devoted to the Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Opus 73, which has three sections: Allegro non troppo, adagio non troppo, and allegro con spirito. The outstanding feature of this performance was that it was, precisely, "non troppo."

The intonation in the violin section was poor. In fact, the only cohesiveness recognizable in this performance was the ability of the entire violin section to play in flat unison. Tempi was lost somewhere between the conductor's attempt to indicate it and the ability of the orchestra to react accordingly. The horns, especially, seemed to lumber along to the "beat of a different drummer" than that so valiantly proffered by conductor Rolland Tapley.

The wonderful romanticism of sweeping lines and suspensions one hopes to hear in Brahms' music fell into the trap of being dragged along rather than buoyed up. There were glimpses, however, of great vigor and intensity in the orchestra and especially in the adagio non troppo. Rich and vibrant tones emitted from the cello section.

Perhaps a little more rehearsal time would have been profitable in carrying this work past the "Let's get together and play a little Brahms tonight" brand of spontaneity.

Duo de Concert

Undoubtedly the exciting portion of the evening was the Duo de Concert by Bottesini with guest artists from the Boston Symphony Orchestra: Mary Lou Speaker, violin, and Lawrence Wolfe, bass.

These splendid young artists took this technically elaborate but showy bit of Italian sentimentality and made us love it—and them.

Miss Speaker is a tall, willowy beauty with a queenly but sensitive approachability. Her performance was outstanding enough for this writer to predict her future as one of the outstanding women violin virtuosa of our age.

The Bottesini requires intricate bowings, fingerings and "tricks" among which are pianissimos so highly pitched and delicate as to all but escape hearing. Miss Speaker executed all this with the ease and graceful dynamism of a great artist and a certain casual air which is her own brand of audience rapport.

PHOEBE BOURDEAU

Lawrence Wolfe's contribution was necessarily less elaborate, but his skill was certainly evident in his masterful manipulations of that most unwieldly of instruments, the bass violin. At one point he had the appearnace of climbing over his instrument in a rapidly decorative passage of the Bottesini.

The regrettable part about this performance was that the orchestral string pizzicati were a bit too prominent in their accompaniment to the solists and that Mr. Wolfe didn't play all of the Jacob Ruckland "Valentine" as an encore.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 130,857

JAN 16 1973 New England Newsclip

Free Concert Tomorrow

Louis Leguia, cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear in a free one-hour concert of Classical music including the Hartford premiere of a sonata by Vincent Frohne, tomorrow at 1 p.m. in Hilles Gallery at the Wadsworth Atheneum.

Recently returned from a series of 20 recitals in Europe, Leguia has performed in numerous recitals in the U.S. and Canada and has recorded and made broadcasts in Montreal and London.

The former student of Pablo Casals and Andre Navarra in France, Arthur Van den Bogaerde and Kurt Reher in Los Angeles.

Leguia has also studied under Leonard Rose in New York, Gabor Rejto in Los Angeles and Gaspar Casado in Italy. He has been a member of the Boston Symphony since 1963 and is a member of the faculty of the Boston Conservatory of Music.

Other selections on his Atheneum program will include selections from Johann Sebastian Bach's "Suite III," Gunther Schuller's "Fantasy Op. 19" and Zoltan Kodaly's "Sonata Op. 8."

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
S. 199,160

JAN 14 1973 New England Newsclip

Cello Concert To Be Given At Atheneum

Louis Leguia, cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present a free one-hour concert of classical music, including the Hartford premiere of a sonata by Vincent Frohne, Tuesday at 1 p.m. in Hilles Gallery at the Wadsworth Atheneum.

Recently returned from a series of 20 recitals in Europe, Leguia has also given numerous recitals in the United States and Canada and has recorded and made broadcasts in Montreal and London. He has been a member of the Boston Symphony since 1963 and is a member of the faculty of the Boston Conservatory of Music.

His program will include selections from Johann Sebastian Bach's "Suite 111," Gunther Schuller's "Fantasy Op. 19", and Zoltan Kodaly's "Sonata Op. 8."

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 130,857

JAN 5 1973 New England Newsclip

Band To Have Guest

VERNON — The high school band is going to have company when it rehearses for a competition in Boston later this month. Armando Ghitalla, first trumpet with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will prctice with the band at the Middle School Jan. 16.

Ghitalla will play with the high school concert band when they compete Jan. 22 at a convention sponsored by the National Association of Music Educators. It is believed he will be the only guest musician with any of the bands at the competition.

Vernon

The band will present a 30-45 minute program of music.

The Vernon Center Middle School Band was the only other band from Connecticut selected in the audition of school bands from 13 states.

Some 85 students participate in the high school band. The director is Samuel Goldfarb.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT MASTER TO PERFORM—The Portland Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Paul Vermel, will present a concert, Monday, Jan. 22, at the Lewiston High School Auditorium, at which Joseph Silverstein, above, Concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be featured violinist. The concert will be sponsored by the Bates College Concert Series, and the Maine Arts and Humanities Commission.

JOURNAL
LEWISTON, MAINE
D. 14,019

JAN 19 1973 New England Newsclip

PSO Concert In Lewiston Next Monday

The Portland Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Paul Vermel, will present a concert Monday, Jan. 22, beginning at 8 p.m., at Lewiston High School Auditorium, with Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the featured violinist.

The program is under the sponsorship of the Bates College Concert Series and The Maine Arts and Humanities Commission, and tickets will be available at the door.

The program for the evening will include "Serenade to Await the Moon," by William Bergsma, Beethovens' "Symphony II," and "Violin Concerto," by Sibalius.

Mr. Silverstein has appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Pops on numerous occasions. He is presently a member of the New England Conservatory of Music Chairman of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

In 1959, he was the only American to place in the top ten of the prestigious Queen Elizabeth of Belgium International Competition.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

JAN 16 1973 New England Newsclip

Silverstein Replaces Ailing Solo Violinist

By RICHARD CONWAY

In announcing that Boston Symphony Orchestra concertmaster Joseph Silverstein will replace the ailing Kyung-Wha Chung as soloist for tonight's concert at the auditorium, Springfield conductor Robert Gutter has to be guilty of some kind of understatement in saying that "we are extremely pleased and fortunate to have Joseph Silverstein with us on such short notice. He is not only a recognized artist in his own right, but an outstanding concertmaster as well."

Gutter also emphasized that the scheduled program remains unchanged.

Silverstein's reputation is enormous, and it covers many different areas. The Boston concertmaster is not only an excellent soloist and orchestral musician, he is particularly sensitive to chamber ensemble playing. We have heard many fine performances of the Symphony String Trio and Quartet at Tanglewood during the summer season.

Silverstein is chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, and last year was named assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony. He holds an honorary doctorate from Tufts University.

The violinist makes as much sense when he talks as when he plays. I remember an interview I had with him two years ago. We discussed the fact that many people were calling the symphony orchestra nothing more than a museum piece. What he said then bears repeating:

"Let me put it this way. I say yes, it is a museum piece. We have a very great permanent collection. And we have traveling exhibits. And we have exhibits of great artists.

"We also have a very broad audience base.

"I, myself, am a great devotee of contemporary music. I spend a good deal of time looking at new music, and I attend most of the concerts of new music at the contemporary music festival at Tanglewood.

"But I must say that I can find nothing more boring than a whole concert of contemporary music. In the whole galaxy of musical composition, there are maybe four or five composers who can stand an All-Them program. And even then you have to carefully select works from different periods of their career."

Silverstein went on to say that a piece of music by Schoenberg, Webern, or Berio made more sense when compared with other works from other stylistic periods. He added that there is a difference in the degree of concentration needed in listening to the various styles.

"One can tune in and out of a Brahms symphony and still make sense of it. But there are so many important events in a nine minute work by, say, Schoenberg, that it takes more intense listening than a 40-minute symphony by Brahms."

It is the great variety of riches possible in a symphony concert that excites Silverstein, like wandering through the many rooms of a museum. "To me that's a total musical experience."

It will be nice to have Joe Silverstein in Springfield tonight.

UNION LEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
D. 21,008

JAN 9 1973 New England Newsclip

THE N. H. PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA will begin its 14th season with a winter concert at the Practical Arts Auditorium, Manchester, Sunday at 8:15 p. m. The orchestra, conducted by Rolland Tapley of the Boston Symphony, will present Brahm's 2nd Symphony and Marche Slav by Tschaikowsky. Featured guest artists from the Boston Symphony are Marylou Speaker, violinist, right, and Lawrence Wolfe, bass, who will perfrom "Duo de Concert" by Bottesini, an interesting and intricate duet for the smallest and largest string instruments.

UNION LEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
D. 21,008

JAN 17 1973 New England Newsclip

A Review

Orchestra Opens 14th Year

By PHOEBE BOURDEAU

The N.H. Philharmonic Orchestra opened its 14th season at the Practical Arts Auditorium in Manchester with works by Brahms, Bottesini and Tschaikowsky in a performance which can best be described as a crescendo mark: It began weakly and ended triumphantly.

The first half of the concert was devoted to the Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Opus 73, which has three sections: Allegro non troppo, adagio non troppo, and allegro con spirito. The outstanding feature of this performance was that it was, precisely, "non troppo."

The intonation in the violin section was poor. In fact, the only cohesiveness recognizable in this performance was the ability of the entire violin section to play in flat unison. Tempi was lost somewhere between the conductor's attempt to indicate it and the ability of the orchestra to react accordingly. The horns, especially, seemed to lumber along to the "beat of a different drummer" than that so valiantly proffered by conductor Rolland Tapley.

The wonderful romanticism of sweeping lines and suspensions one hopes to hear in Brahms' music fell into the trap of being dragged along rather than buoyed up. There were glimpses, however, of great vigor and intensity in the orchestra and especially in the adagio non troppo. Rich and vibrant tones emitted from the cello section.

Perhaps a little more rehearsal time would have been profitable in carrying this work past the "Let's get together and play a little Brahms tonight" brand of spontaneity.

Duo de Concert

Undoubtedly the exciting portion of the evening was the Duo de Concert by Bottesini with guest artists from the Boston Symphony Orchestra: Mary Lou Speaker, violin, and Lawrence Wolfe, bass.

These splendid young artists took this technically elaborate but showy bit of Italian sentimentality and made us love it—and them.

Miss Speaker is a tall, willowy beauty with a queenly but sensitive approachability. Her performance was outstanding enough for this writer to predict her future as one of the outstanding women violin virtuosa of our age.

The Bottesini requires intricate bowings, fingerings and "tricks" among which are pianissimos so highly pitched and delicate as to all but escape hearing. Miss Speaker executed all this with the ease and graceful dynamism of a great artist and a certain casual air which is her own brand of audience rapport.

PHOEBE BOURDEAU

Lawrence Wolfe's contribution was necessarily less elaborate, but his skill was certainly evident in his masterful manipulations of that most unwieldly of instruments, the bass violin. At one point he had the appearnace of climbing over his instrument in a rapidly decorative passage of the Bottesini.

The regrettable part about this performance was that the orchestral string pizzicati were a bit too prominent in their accompaniment to the solists and that Mr. Wolfe didn't play all of the Jacob Ruckland "Valentine" as an encore.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 130,857

JAN 16 1973 New England Newsclip

Free Concert Tomorrow

Louis Leguia, cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear in a free one-hour concert of Classical music including the Hartford premiere of a sonata by Vincent Frohne, tomorrow at 1 p.m. in Hilles Gallery at the Wadsworth Atheneum.

Recently returned from a series of 20 recitals in Europe, Leguia has performed in numerous recitals in the U.S. and Canada and has recorded and made broadcasts in Montreal and London.

The former student of Pablo Casals and Andre Navarra in France, Arthur Van den Bogaerde and Kurt Reher in Los Angeles.

Leguia has also studied under Leonard Rose in New York, Gabor Rejto in Los Angeles and Gaspar Casado in Italy. He has been a member of the Boston Symphony since 1963 and is a member of the faculty of the Boston Conservatory of Music.

Other selections on his Atheneum program will include selections from Johann Sebastian Bach's "Suite III," Gunther Schuller's "Fantasy Op. 19" and Zoltan Kodaly's "Sonata Op. 8."

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
S. 199,160

JAN 14 1973 New England Newsclip

Cello Concert To Be Given At Atheneum

Louis Leguia, cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present a free one-hour concert of classical music, including the Hartford premiere of a sonata by Vincent Frohne, Tuesday at 1 p.m. in Hilles Gallery at the Wadsworth Atheneum.

Recently returned from a series of 20 recitals in Europe, Leguia has also given numerous recitals in the United States and Canada and has recorded and made broadcasts in Montreal and London. He has been a member of the Boston Symphony since 1963 and is a member of the faculty of the Boston Conservatory of Music.

His program will include selections from Johann Sebastian Bach's "Suite 111," Gunther Schuller's "Fantasy Op. 19" and Zoltan Kodaly's "Sonata Op. 8."

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 130,857

JAN 5 1973 New England Newsclip

Band To Have Guest

VERNON — The high school band is going to have company when it rehearses for a competition in Boston later this month. Armando Ghitalla, first trumpet with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will prctice with the band at the Middle School Jan. 16.

Ghitalla will play with the high school concert band when they compete Jan. 22 at a convention sponsored by the National Association of Music Educators. It is believed he will be the only guest musician with any of the bands at the competition.

Vernon

The band will present a 30-45 minute program of music.

The Vernon Center Middle School Band was the only other band from Connecticut selected in the audition of school bands from 13 states.

Some 85 students participate in the high school band. The director is Samuel Goldfarb.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT MASTER TO PERFORM—The Portland Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Paul Vermel, will present a concert, Monday, Jan. 22, at the Lewiston High School Auditorium, at which Joseph Silverstein, above, Concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be featured violinist. The concert will be sponsored by the Bates College Concert Series, and the Maine Arts and Humanities Commission.

JOURNAL
LEWISTON, MAINE
D. 14,019

JAN 19 1973 New England Newsclip

PSO Concert In Lewiston Next Monday

The Portland Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Paul Vermel, will present a concert Monday, Jan. 22, beginning at 8 p.m., at Lewiston High School Auditorium, with Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the featured violinist.

The program is under the sponsorship of the Bates College Concert Series and The Maine Arts and Humanities Commission, and tickets will be available at the door.

The program for the evening will include "Serenade to Await the Moon," by William Bergsma, Beethovens' "Symphony II," and "Violin Concerto," by Sibalius.

Mr. Silverstein has appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Pops on numerous occasions. He is presently a member of the New England Conservatory of Music Chairman of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

In 1959, he was the only American to place in the top ten of the prestigious Queen Elizabeth of Belgium International Competition.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

JAN 16 1973 New England Newsclip

Silverstein Replaces Ailing Solo Violinist

By RICHARD CONWAY

In announcing that Boston Symphony Orchestra concertmaster Joseph Silverstein will replace the ailing Kyung-Wha Chung as soloist for tonight's concert at the auditorium, Springfield conductor Robert Gutter has to be guilty of some kind of understatement in saying that "we are extremely pleased and fortunate to have Joseph Silverstein with us on such short notice. He is not only a recognized artist in his own right, but an outstanding concertmaster as well."

Gutter also emphasized that the scheduled program remains unchanged.

Silverstein's reputation is enormous, and it covers many different areas. The Boston concertmaster is not only an excellent soloist and orchestral musician, he is particularly sensitive to chamber ensemble playing. We have heard many fine performances of the Symphony String Trio and Quartet at Tanglewood during the summer season.

Silverstein is chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, and last year was named assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony. He holds an honorary doctorate from Tufts University.

The violinist makes as much sense when he talks as when he plays. I remember an interview I had with him two years ago. We discussed the fact that many people were calling the symphony orchestra nothing more than a museum piece. What he said then bears repeating:

"Let me put it this way. I say yes, it is a museum piece. We have a very great permanent collection. And we have traveling exhibits. And we have exhibits of great artists.

"We also have a very broad audience base.

"I, myself, am a great devotee of contemporary music. I spend a good deal of time looking at new music, and I attend most of the concerts of new music at the contemporary music festival at Tanglewood.

"But I must say that I can find nothing more boring than a whole concert of contemporary music. In the whole galaxy of musical composition, there are maybe four or five composers who can stand an All-Them program. And even then you have to carefully select works from different periods of their career."

Silverstein went on to say that a piece of music by Schoenberg, Webern, or Berio made more sense when compared with other works from other stylistic periods. He added that there is a difference in the degree of concentration needed in listening to the various styles.

"One can tune in and out of a Brahms symphony and still make sense of it. But there are so many important events in a nine minute work by, say, Schoenberg, that it takes more intense listening than a 40-minute symphony by Brahms."

It is the great variety of riches possible in a symphony concert that excites Silverstein, like wandering through the many rooms of a museum. "To me that's a total musical experience."

It will be nice to have Joe Silverstein in Springfield tonight.

"How sweet it is," when its music played by Armando Ghitalla, left, who is first trumpeter with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Ghitalla joins Samuel Goldfarb, right, in a rehearsal session with the Rockville High School band which will be playing in Boston Monday at the Music Educator's National Conference. Ghitalla will be guest soloist at the conference. (Herald photo by Buceivicius.)

Vernon

Bands Win Festival Spot

By Barbara Richmond
(Herald Reporter)

The Rockville High School band and the Middle School band have been singled out to play at the Music Educators National Conference Eastern Division Convention to be held Monday at the Prudential Building in Boston and will have as guest soloist, Armando Ghitalla, who plays first trumpet in the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Several months ago both bands made tapes and submitted them for consideration. Both bands have been singled out for many other honors in the past. Samuel Goldfarb, supervisor of instrumental music in the Vernon school system, directs the high school band and Edwin DeGroat, directs the Grade 7 and 8 band at the Middle School.

Both Goldfarb and DeGroat studied under Ghitalla when he was a visiting lecturer at Hartt College of Music in Hartford.

This week Ghitalla took time out of his busy schedule to come to the Middle School and rehearse with the Rockville High School band for next Monday's Boston appearance.

Ghitalla has a long list of accomplishments to his credit. He has performed with the R.C.A. Victor recording orchestra, has been first trumpet with the New York City Opera and Ballet Company and with the Houston Symphony Orchestra. He was also trumpet soloist with the Paul LaValle Band of America and the Boston Pops Orchestra under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. He performed at a Town Hall (New York) recital in 1958 and at a Carnegie Hall recital in 1960.

In addition to his first trumpet duites with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Ghitalla is an associate in trumpet at Boston University, the New England Conservatory and the Tanglewood Institute.

Although his first love is music, Ghitalla has other interests too. A man of many facets, he also finds time to devote to drawing, carpentry and cooking.

Goldfarb is a visiting lecturer in music at the School of Fine Arts, University of Connecticut, was founder and conductor of the Hartt Youth Symphonic Band and has studied under many famous musicians. He served as associate instructor in the Brass and Music Education departments of the Hartt College of Music, for 15 years, as well as being a faculty member of the West Hartford and Wethersfield Summer Music Programs.

Goldfarb was also a member of the 724th Air Force Band and of the 43rd Infantry Division Band during which time he appeared as cornet soloist on tour. He was with the Hartford Symphony Orchestra from 1952-1954. He has also been on the staff of advisory specialists of the Connecticut Music Educators' Association as well as having served on the planning commission of the national association.

In 1965 Goldfarb was selected as one of the 10 most outstanding music directors in the United States, by the School Musician Magazine and in 1967 he was chosen Alumnus of the Year of the Hartt College of Music.

DeGroat is a graduate of Hartt College and holds degrees in music and music education. He has been a performer and trumpet soloist with numerous musical organizations in this state and Massachusetts and Rhode Island. He has been a faculty member of the Hartford Conservatory for five years as an instructor in trumpet. He plays first trumpet with the Hartford Civic Orchestra.

DeGroat has also been an adjudicator for the New Hampshire Music Educators solo and ensemble festival, and has guest conducted and given many clinics on the brass instruments. Under his direction the Middle School band has been honored several times.

There's no discrimination in the bands as there are just about as many female members or maybe a few more, than there are male members. The entire flute section is made up of girls as is the B-flat clarinet section. But the girls are not afraid to tackle any of the instruments. Two girls are in the trombone section; one in the French horn group, a few play trumpet and one plays the string bass.

NEWS-TIMES
DANBURY, CONN.
D. 31,285
JAN 19 1973
New England Newsclip

JOURNAL INQUIRER
ROCKVILLE, CONN.
D. 7,800
JAN 19 1973
New England Newsclip

Noted band plays at school

RIDGEFIELD — The Rockville (Conn.) High School Band, under conductor Samuel Goldfarb, has given two assembly performances at Ridgefield High School.

Noted since 1961, the band has performed at the Eastern Conference of the Music Educators national convention in 1968, and this year will perform in Boston. The Boston concert will feature Armand Ghitella of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as soloist for the group.

Goldfarb spent part of the visit observing a rehearsal of the Ridgefield High School Band and advised its conductor, Joseph Celli, on musical techniques.

Samuel Goldfarb

Photo by Joseph G. Saternis

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S Armando A. Ghitalla was rehearsing in Vernon this week for his appearance Monday with the Rockville High School Band at the Prudential Center in Boston. Conducting is Samuel Goldfarb, supervisor of instrumental music in Vernon School system. Everyone appearing Monday in Boston for Eastern Division Conference of National Music Educators.

ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
CITIZEN ITEM
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 8,900
JAN 11 1973
New England Newsclip

Joseph Silverstein

BSO Concert Master To Perform in City

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

The Worcester County Music Association will present the New Worcester Orchestra in the opening concert of its third season at 8 p.m. Feb. 14 at the Auditorium.

Arthur Winograd will conduct.

Soloist will be Joseph Silverstein in Violin Concerto No. 1 in G minor, Opus 26 by Bruch. Orchestral program is Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" Overture. K. 492 and Symphony No. 2 in D major, Opus 43 by Sibelius.

Season tickets are available at the office of the Worcester County Music Association, Memorial Auditorium, Worcester 01608. Prices for the season's three concerts are $13.50, $11 and $8.25. Members of the Music Association receive a 10 per cent discount on season tickets and choice locations.

Tickets for individual concerts will be on sale at Steinert's, 308 Main St., as of Feb. 1. They are $5, $4 and $3. The Auditorium box office will be open at 6 p.m. the night of the concert

This will be Silverstein's second appearance as soloist with the Worcester Orchestra. In 1963 he performed with violist Joseph DePasquale in Mozart's Symphonic Concertante with the Worcester Orchestra, conducted by Harry Levenson.

Silverstein has been concert master of the Boston Symphony since 1962.

Born in Detroit, Silverstein studied at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, and later with Joseph Gingold and Mischa Mischakoff who retired as concert master of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra in 1967.

Silverstein was a prize winner in the 1959 Queen Elizabeth of Belgium International Competition, and a year later won the Naumberg Foundation Award.

Before coming to Boston in 1955, (he was then 23) Silverstein played in the orchestras of Houston, Denver and Philadelphia.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
S. 106,767
JAN 28 1973
New England Newsclip

MESSENGER
MARBLEHEAD, MASS.
W. 5,146

JAN 11 1973 New England Newsclip

BSO helpers

Two Marbleheaders, Mrs. Erick Kauders and Mrs. Garrett D. Bowne III, are helping support Boston Symphony Orchestra fund-raising efforts which include guided tours of Symphony Hall (call 1-266-1348 for more information) and bus service from Vinnin Square to Friday afternoon concerts (call 631-4338 for information).

And Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Corn Point Road, will chair the Symphony and Pops' Musical Marathon 24 hours a day from March 8 to 12 over WCRB.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
TRIBUNE
TW. 38,344 (N)

JAN 9 1973

Boston Symphony Elects First Black Trustee

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS —It was recently announced by Talcott M. Banks, President of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that Archie C. Epps III was elected a member of the Board of Trustees.

Epps, Dean of Students in Harvard College, is a native of Lake Charles, Louisiana. After receiving his AB degree from Talledega College in Alabama, he went to Harvard for graduate studies and was awarded a graduate degree in religion in 1961.

Dean Epps has been a Teaching Fellow in Middle Eastern Studies, and is now tutor in Leverett House. From 1964 to 1967 Dean Epps was Assistant Conductor of the Harvard Glee Club, and is now adviser to the Leverett Opera Society. He was Assistant Dean of Harvard College in 1970 as Dean of Students in Harvard College.

ARCHIE C. EPPS

He edited The Speeches of Malcolm X at Harvard, which was published in 1968 with a long essay on Malcolm X's thoughts and rhetoric. The articles which he has written for journals dealt with subjects relating to Afro-American History.

Epps has been affiliated with the Boston Symphony Orchestra through his position as Overseer of the Orchestra.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202

JAN 15 1973 New England Newsclip

THE PERFORMING ARTS

* * *

"Know your orchestra!" say a sextet of North Shore women who head the local branch of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Council of Friends. Mrs. Edwin T. Green and Mrs. Walter Watson II have been coordinating back stage tours with the cooperation of co-chairmen Mrs. Erick Kauders of Marblehead and Mrs. Nelson Darling of Swampscott. The tours include visits to the BSO musical library, ancient instruments collection and radio broadcast control rooms.

Mrs. Garrett C. Bowne III of Mablehead organized a bus service which provides convenient transportation from Swampscott to Friday morning concerts at Symphony Hall.

The Council also sponsors the Friday "stage door" concert lectures.

Mrs. George R. Poor, 18 Gregory St., Marblehead, may be contacted for information regarding tours.

* * *

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Chamber Players will perform works by Dvorak, Danish composer, Carl Nielsen and William Sydeman Sunday, Feb. 4, at 4 p.m. at Sanders Theatre. The Chamber Players comprise the symphony's 12 principal players.

The program will consist of Nielsen's Woodwind Quintet Sydeman's Duo for Trumpet and Percussion and Dvorak's Piano Quartet in E flat.

NEWS
SALEM, MASS.
D. 29,244

JAN 10 1973 New England Newsclip

Friends of BSO offer tours of Symphony Hall

SALEM — Local women are lending their talents to events and happenings which not only offer financial support for the world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, but also help the public to be more informed about the orchestra as people and as a vital part of the community.

Mrs. Erick Kauders of Marblehead and Mrs. Nelson Darling of Swampscott are co-chairmen of the local branch of the Council of Friends of the BSO, which encompasses Salem, Lynn, Marblehead and Swampscott.

Mrs. Edward L. Peirson of Salem, a member of the council, has been initiating the public to the fascinations backstage at Symphony Hall. Those interested may participate in the half-hour tours behind the scenes of the world's first concert hall designed with perfect acoustics.

The informative program includes a brief history of Symphony Hall, visits to the Ancient Instruments Room, radio and broadcast control rooms, offices and maintenance area, musical library, TV and projection booths, recording facilities and other areas seldom open to the public.

Mrs. Garrett O. Bowne III of Marblehead has organized a bus service which leaves Vinnin Sq. regularly on Friday mornings of Boston Symphony concerts. All who attend the concerts are invited to make use of the convenience. More information concerning the trips may be obtained from Mrs. Bowne or Mrs. Frederick Mayo of Swampscott, bus treasurer.

Other events sponsored by the council are the Friday Stage Door Lectures. Lectures by members of the orchestra and a box lunch provide an interesting interlude. A booklet, "Know Your Orchestra," which contains a short biography and a picture of each member, also is available.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885

JAN 28 1973 New England Newsclip

Chamber Concert: A Might Have Been

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

Considering the array of musical talent on the program Sunday afternoon at Jordan Hall, it is amazing how uninteresting the Boston Symphony Chamber Players concert proved to be.

Featured performer for the afternoon was Phyllis Curtin whose recitals I find almost invariably moving but on this occasion the story was a good deal of boring music which good performances couldn't help or good music boringly performed.

Ms. Curtin began with two Bach arias and as often happens with opening Bach selections they sounded too much like a warm-up.

• Concert Review

She did not have the vocal flexibility or lightness appropriate for the selections and, unusually for her, she seemed not able to project the mood of the works, the sense of the words. Ryan Edwards provided some clunky realizations at the harpsichord.

The Shostakovich Romances for Soprano, Violin, Cello, and piano (Joseph Silverstein, Jules Eskin, and Edwards) followed in a cycle of seven poems by Alexander Block.

The texts themselves were pretty silly — for example, "What does storm mean in life when your roses bloom and gleam for me?" — and Shostakovich's settings rather obvious, derivative, and too much alike, most of them of an ominous and darkly intense mood.

A Villa-Lobos Suite for voice and violin (Silverstein) closed the first half and certainly it made the Shostakovich look good by comparison.

One of those cute peasanty things, it has a lot of folksy things for the violin part and is mostly mindless vocalise for the singer.

After intermission there was an almost completely uninflected performance of Schubert's "Auf dem Strom" for voice, piano and horn (Charles Kavaloski) that was played (like the two preceding groups) with the piano lid closed and the piano sound consequently muffled. Also, a mid-program encore for Ms. Curtin of Chabrier's "L'invitation du Voyage" (with bassoonist Sherman Walt).

Stravinsky's "L'histoire du Soldat" suite completed the longish program and was characterized by little wit, slowish tempi, almost no jauntiness or brilliance.

ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
CITIZEN ITEM
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 8,900

JAN 18 1973 New England Newsclip

Chamber Players at Sanders

On Sunday, Feb. 4 at 4 p.m., the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will perform chamber music in Sanders Theater. The program features Carl Nielsen's Woodwind Quintet, William Sydeman's Duo for trumpet and percussion and Dvorak's Piano Quartet in Eb. The Harvard University Department of Music and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are co-sponsors.

The Chamber Players comprise the twelve principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They have toured Europe twice, the Soviet Union, the Virgin Islands, and, under the sponsorship of the Massachusetts Council on the Arts, make a yearly tour of the Commonwealth. Last September, they made a tour of Colombia, South America. Several of their numerous recordings for RCA Victor and Deutsche Grammophon have received awards including the Grammy, given their first recording, for the most outstanding chamber music performance of 1967.

Single tickets for the Boston Symphony Chamber Players are priced at $1.50, $2.50 and $3.50 and are available at Symphony Hall, the Boston University Ticket Office, the Harvard Coop and the TCA ticket office at MIT as well as at Sanders Theater on the day of the concert. The Chamber Players will next perform at Sanders Theater on Sunday March 11 at 4 p.m.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

JAN 19 1973 New England Newsclip

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS seek to swirl melodies as graceful and delicate as the arch they fill. They play at Jordan Hall Sunday at 3.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

JAN 14 1973 New England Newsclip

PHYLLIS CURTIN, soprano, will appear again with a BSO group—this time, the Boston Symphony Chamber Players—at Jordan Hall Jan. 21 at 3 p.m.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885

JAN 28 1973 New England Newsclip

PHYLLIS CURTIN will appear with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players at Jordan Hall on Jan. 31 at 3 p. m

MESSENGER
MARBLEHEAD, MASS.
W. 5,146
JAN 11 1973
New England Newsclip

BSO helpers

Two Marbleheaders, Mrs. Erick Kauders and Mrs. Garrett D. Bowne III, are helping support Boston Symphony Orchestra fund-raising efforts which include guided tours of Symphony Hall (call 1-266-1348 for more information) and bus service from Vinnin Square to Friday afternoon concerts (call 631-4338 for information).

And Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Corn Point Road, will chair the Symphony and Pops' Musical Marathon 24 hours a day from March 8 to 12 over WCRB.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
TRIBUNE
TW. 38,344 (N)
JAN 9 1973

Boston Symphony Elects First Black Trustee

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS —It was recently announced by Talcott M. Banks, President of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that Archie C. Epps III was elected a member of the Board of Trustees.

Epps, Dean of Students in Harvard College, is a native of Lake Charles, Louisiana. After receiving his AB degree from Talledega College in Alabama, he went to Harvard for graduate studies and was awarded a graduate degree in religion in 1961.

Dean Epps has been a Teaching Fellow in Middle Eastern Studies, and is now tutor in Leverett House. From 1964 to 1967 Dean Epps was Assistant Conductor of the Harvard Glee Club, and is now adviser to the Leverett Opera Society. He was Assistant Dean of Harvard College from 1964 until his appointment in 1970 as Dean of Students in Harvard College.

ARCHIE C. EPPS

He edited The Speeches of Malcolm X at Harvard, which was published in 1968 with a long essay on Malcolm X's thoughts and rhetoric. The articles which he has written for journals dealt with subjects relating to Afro-American History.

Epps has been affiliated with the Boston Symphony Orchestra through his position as Overseer of the Orchestra.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202
JAN 15 1973
New England Newsclip

ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
CITIZEN ITEM
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 8,900
JAN 18 1973
New England Newsclip

Chamber Players at Sanders

On Sunday, Feb. 4 at 4 p.m., the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will perform chamber music in Sanders Theater. The program features Carl Nielsen's Woodwind Quintet, William Sydeman's Duo for trumpet and percussion and Dvorak's Piano Quartet in Eb. The Harvard University Department of Music and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are co-sponsors.

The Chamber Players comprise the twelve principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They have toured Europe twice, the Soviet Union, the Virgin Islands, and, under the sponsorship of the Massachusetts Council on the Arts, make a yearly tour of the Commonwealth. Last September, they made a tour of Colombia, South America. Several of their numerous recordings for RCA Victor and Deutsche Grammophon have received awards including the Grammy, given their first recording, for the most outstanding chamber music performance of 1967.

Single tickets for the Boston Symphony Chamber Players are priced at $1.50, $2.50 and $3.50 and are available at Symphony Hall, the Boston University Ticket Office, the Harvard Coop and the TCA ticket office at MIT as well as at Sanders Theater on the day of the concert. The Chamber Players will next perform at Sanders Theater on Sunday March 11 at 4 p.m.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
JAN 19 1973
New England Newsclip

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
JAN 14 1973
New England Newsclip

PHYLLIS CURTIN, soprano, will appear again with a BSO group—this time, the Boston Symphony Chamber Players—at Jordan Hall Jan. 21 at 3 p.m.

THE PERFORMING ARTS

* * *

"Know your orchestra!" say a sextet of North Shore women who head the local branch of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Council of Friends. Mrs. Edwin T. Green and Mrs. Walter Watson II have been coordinating back stage tours with the cooperation of co-chairmen Mrs. Erick Kauders of Marblehead and Mrs. Nelson Darling of Swampscott. The tours include visits to the BSO musical library, ancient instruments collection and radio broadcast control rooms.

Mrs. Garrett C. Bowne III of Mablehead organized a bus service which provides convenient transportation from Swampscott to Friday morning concerts at Symphony Hall.

The Council also sponsors the Friday "stage door" concert lectures.

Mrs. George R. Poor, 18 Gregory St., Marblehead, may be contacted for information regarding tours.

* * *

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Chamber Players will perform works by Dvorak, Danish composer, Carl Nielsen and William Sydeman Sunday, Feb. 4, at 4 p.m. at Sanders Theatre. The Chamber Players comprise the symphony's 12 principal players.

The program will consist of Nielsen's Woodwind Quintet Sydeman's Duo for Trumpet and Percussion and Dvorak's Piano Quartet in E flat.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS seek to swirl melodies as graceful and delicate as the arch they fill. They play at Jordan Hall Sunday at 3.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885
JAN 23 1973
New England Newsclip

PHYLLIS CURTIN will appear with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players at Jordan Hall on Jan. 31 at 3 p. m

NEWS
SALEM, MASS.
D. 29,244
JAN 10 1973
New England Newsclip

Friends of BSO offer tours of Symphony Hall

SALEM — Local women are lending their talents to events and happenings which not only offer financial support for the world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, but also help the public to be more informed about the orchestra as people and as a vital part of the community.

Mrs. Erick Kauders of Marblehead and Mrs. Nelson Darling of Swampscott are co-chairmen of the local branch of the Council of Friends of the BSO, which encompasses Salem, Lynn, Marblehead and Swampscott.

Mrs. Edward L. Peirson of Salem, a member of the council, has been initiating the public to the fascinations backstage at Symphony Hall. Those interested may participate in the half-hour tours behind the scenes of the world's first concert hall designed with perfect acoustics.

The informative program includes a brief history of Symphony Hall, visits to the Ancient Instruments Room, radio and broadcast control rooms, offices and maintenance area, musical library, TV and projection booths, recording facilities and other areas seldom open to the public.

Mrs. Garrett O. Bowne III of Marblehead has organized a bus service which leaves Vinnin Sq. regularly on Friday mornings of Boston Symphony concerts. All who attend the concerts are invited to make use of the convenience. More information concerning the trips may be obtained from Mrs. Bowne or Mrs. Frederick Mayo of Swampscott, bus treasurer.

Other events sponsored by the council are the Friday Stage Door Lectures. Lectures by members of the orchestra and a box lunch provide an interesting interlude. A booklet, "Know Your Orchestra," which contains a short biography and a picture of each member, also is available.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885
JAN 23 1973
New England Newsclip

Chamber Concert: A Might Have Been

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

Considering the array of musical talent on the program Sunday afternoon at Jordan Hall, it is amazing how uninteresting the Boston Symphony Chamber Players concert proved to be.

Featured performer for the afternoon was Phyllis Curtin whose recitals I find almost invariably moving but on this occasion the story was a good deal of boring music which good performances couldn't help or good music boringly performed.

Ms. Curtin began with two Bach arias and as often happens with opening Bach selections they sounded too much like a warm-up.

• Concert Review

She did not have the vocal flexibility or lightness appropriate for the selections and, unusually for her, she seemed not able to project the mood of the works, the sense of the words. Ryan Edwards provided some clunky realizations at the harpsichord.

The Shostakovich Romances for Soprano, Violin, Cello, and piano (Joseph Silverstein, Jules Eskin, and Edwards) followed in a cycle of seven poems by Alexander Block.

The texts themselves were pretty silly — for example, "What does storm mean in life when your roses bloom and gleam for me?" — and Shostakovich's settings rather obvious, derivative, and too much alike, most of them of an ominous and darkly intense mood.

A Villa-Lobos Suite for voice and violin (Silverstein) closed the first half and certainly it made the Shostakovich look good by comparison.

One of those cute peasanty things, it has a lot of folksy things for the violin part and is mostly mindless vocalise for the singer.

After intermission there was an almost completely uninflected performance of Schubert's "Auf dem Strom" for voice, piano and horn (Charles Kavaloski) that was played (like the two preceding groups) with the piano lid closed and the piano sound consequently muffled. Also, a mid-program encore for Ms. Curtin of Chabrier's "L'invitation du Voyage" (with bassoonist Sherman Walt).

Stravinsky's "L'histoire du Soldat" suite completed the longish program and was characterized by little wit, slowish tempi, almost no jauntiness or brilliance.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

JAN 14 1973 New England Newsclip

pose a variation on the March from Bellini's "I Puritani," and play it before the guests of the Princess.

*

It has been the general assumption that the affair took place, most likely at the Liszt-Thalberg encounter. But Lewenthal thinks differently. He has looked through every source, every bit of published information that he could get his hands on, and has been unable to find any reference to this stupendous event. Certainly it would have made the headlines had it ever taken place. Lewenthal concludes that not even the Princess Belgioioso could get six such temperaments together under one roof. She did get after them, however, to submit the variations for which they had been commissioned, and those were published. Lizst liked the work. He played it as a solo, orchestrated it (or had it orchestrated) for piano and orchestra, and even worked up a two-piano arrangement of it. There is on record an account of a performance of the two-piano version that Liszt played with Clara Schumann, who hated him. What pressure, what kind of plasma, could have c[illegible]

of Virtuosos: It Should Be a Ball

tained these two antipodal forces?

It is a pity that the original concert never came off (assuming that Lewenthal is correct in his conclusion). Imagine Horowitz, Serkin, Richter, Rubinstein, Michelangeli and Bolet in a salon, smiling at each other with their fists clenched, ready to show the audience who is really the King. The pianists that the Princess sought to bring together in 1837 were their equivalents. Liszt and Thalberg were, by consensus, the two greatest living pianists. Chopin was admired perhaps even more by the connoisseurs, but he seldom played in puplic; and, physically weak as he was, his pianism was a series of delicately flexible nuances. Herz was the idol of the Parisian salon — a glittering, elegant, superficial pianist with a thrilling bag of tricks. Czerny, who taught and composed more than he played, was a pupil of Beethoven, the teacher of Liszt, and a solid pianist of the German school. Pixis also was a representative of the German school, though his long residence in Paris had made him a salon favorite. He must have been another one of those well-drilled pianists whose scales sounded like marbles rolling down the keyboard.

Jack Mitchell

Michael Tilson Thomas, who brings the Boston Symphony to Carnegie in a "Spectrum Concert" Thursday

More ideas about programing than an IBM man

*

The music? It is a pièce d'occasion, a fun piece, that was not intended to be taken seriously. It exploits every aspect of piano technique. Liszt showed off his octaves. Chopin, characteristically, wrote a quiet, nocturne-like variation. Herz provided a glittering finger-twister. And so on. A whiff of a vanished age comes to life. This was, like so much art of the period, entertainment art, supplied at least by transcendent professionals. And therein lies the interest. Musical archeologists can reconstruct style and technique from a work like the "Hexameron." And today the public can relax and enjoy it as a wonderful period piece, accepting it for what it is.

The Princess never worked up anything equivalent. Her full name was Maria Cristina Beatrice Teresa Matilde Camilla Julia Margherita Laura Barbiano, Principessa de Belgioioso d'Este. She was a liberal who worked with Garibaldi and Mazzini for Italian independence, and thus was known as the Revolutionary Princess. Born in 1808, she settled in Paris in 1830 and immediately made her salon the center for every musician in Paris as well as such writers as Dumas, Gauthier, de Musset, Hugo and Mrs. Trollope.

Her musical salons were given on Wednesday evenings, while Saturdays were reserved for writers, politicians and theologians. "Guests," writes Lewenthal, "were admitted by a turbanned, bearded Negro looking like a Magus from a Veronese painting. They were conducted through a Gothic oratory decorated with skulls and crossbones in which guests were sometimes allowed to 'surprise' the Princess at her devotions."

*

Her books included works on Catholic dogma, a history of the House of Savoy and one named Oriental Harems and Scenery. She was thin, intense, brilliant and eccentric. She embalmed her last lover, dressed him in evening clothes, and kept the cadaver in her house. In 1849 she had to flee Europe because of her revolutionary activities and she set up as —of all things—a farmer in Asia Minor. She lost her money and was all but destitute. But there is a happy ending. Her properties were restored, and in 1871 she died peacefully in her villa at Lake Como. There should be a biography of her: none is available in English. How about it? Raymond? Gloria?

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 117,499

JAN 7 1973 New England Newsclip

Thomas Conducts Boston Concerts

BOSTON — Michael Tilson Thomas, founder and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Spectrum Concerts conducts two different concerts of commissions by the great ballet impresario Serge Diaghilev on Friday and Saturday evenings, January 12 and 13 at 8.30 p.m.

Part one, on Friday evening, features soloists Susan Larson, soprano; Jan Curtis, mezzo - soprano; Alexander Stevenson, tenor; Mark Pearson, bass; and the New England Conservatory Chorus under the direction of Lorna Cooke de Varon. Mr. Thomas opens the program with Debussy's Prelude to the afternoon of a faun, follows it with Debussy's "Jeux," poeme danse, and Prokofiev's Scythian Suite and closes the concert with Stravinsky's Les noces.

Saturday evening the New England Conservatory Chorus again performs with Mr. Thomas and the Boston Symphony in Strauss' Joseph's Legend, Satie's Parade and Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe.

Michael Tilson Thomas was appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony at the beginning of the 1969-70 season, and he replaced William Steinberg at concerts in New York during the fall when Mr. Steinberg became ill.

He conducted more than thirty of the Boston Symphony's concerts during that season, and was appointed associate conductor of the orchestra in the spring of 1970. In May 1970 he made his London debut in concerts with the London Symphony.

So Mr. Thomas is well known to Boston audiences. This year he continues to direct the Boston Symphony's Spectrum Concerts, which he created. During the past two years Mr. Thomas has conducted many of the major orchestras in this country, and in Europe and Japan.

This season he returns for guest engagements with the Israel Philharmonic, the London Symphony, the New Philharmonia, and the New York Philharmonic with which he begins his first season as music director of the nationally - televised "Young People's Concerts."

He also makes his debut with the Lincoln Center begins his second year with the Buffalo Philharmonic and assumes the position of visiting adjunct professor of music at the State University of New York at Buffalo.

The Boston Globe
(EVENING)
D. 195,032

JAN 15 1973

'Les Noces' winds up Symphony's concert

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

MICHAEL STEINBERG

At one of the first concerts I reviewed for The Globe, Leon Kirchner conducted Stravinsky's "Les noces" (The wedding). It was the most exciting performance of it I had ever heard, and, nearly nine years later, there are two things about it that I remember with special delight. One was its startling verbal clarity; the other, more trivial, was the pleasure in those days of black-and-white concerts of the Faberge Easter egg effect of the solid-color dresses, no two alike, on the women in the ad hoc Harvard-Radcliffe chorus.

"Les noces" wound up Friday's Boston Symphony Spectrum concert conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas — the first of two programs of music associated with Sergei Diagilev and the Russian Ballet — and it was disappointing. Perhaps one word in 10 could be understood, and, trivially, most of the colors and textures on stage were unpleasing. Then, just for continuity, having complained about the clunkiness of the four Baldwin pianos in Kirchner's performance, I found that the one Friday suffered from the same thing (the term "blunt instrument" took on new meaning for me that night).

The pianos were front and center in a fan-shape, with the solo singers in the angle made by the two middle instruments. That put them behind the pianos as well as in the middle of them, and that is how the words came to be simply swallowed up. It was a competent quartet — Susan Larson, Jan Curtis, Alexander Stevenson, Mark Pearson — and one that, given better placement on stage, could have been thoroughly effective. Even as it was, the issue of words aside (a big aside. I admit), Larson was stunning, with shining sound, the rhythmic articulation of a percussion instrument, and, especially given the risk she took by being so percussively Stravinskian, extraordinarily pure intonation. And, trivially, her appearance was stylish and handsome.

The chorus was from the New England Conservatory and prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon. Its singing was precise, but somehow not very present or vivid. The pianists — Newton Wayland, Luise Vosgerchian, Christopher Kies, Yasuo Watanabe — were excellent, and so were the BSO percussion players. Thomas's conducting was intelligent and energetic, but the performance, being so non-verbal, gave the piece an oddly abstract quality It was, in fact, just a little bit boring.

There were many empty seats. One reason would be that much of the student audience with which Spectrum has had its biggest success was at Frans Brueggen's free concert in Sanders. It is also true that it would take special devotion to "Les noces" to induce a regular BSO subscriber to buy a ticket to hear Debussy's "Faun" and "Jeux" repeated from last week, or Prokofiev's Scythian Suite from the beginning of the season. What becomes of the claim that Spectrum is special?

What remains special is the presentation, and much of that is questionable. For example, the inelegance of the shirtsleeves uniform with its studied chumminess suggests that the alleged sickness of our concert life is misunderstood in Symphony Hall. Incidentally, most of the young audience was more formally dressed and would have injoyed the music no less if the orchestra had been, too.

I am probably not alone in my growing irritation with Michael Thomas's introductory chatter at these concerts. He plays it too much for laughs, and when, as before "Jeux," he was serious and provided musical illustrations with the orchestra, he was too quick and impatient for clarity. When he came out after intermission and said, "There's not much to say about 'Les nices," there was applause in the balcony. Clearly, Spectrum wants reconsidering.

JAN 10 1973

Symphony offers Debussy

BOSTON — Michael Tilson Thomas, founder and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Spectrum Concerts conducts two different concerts of commissions by the great ballet impresario Serge Diaghilev on Friday and Saturday evenings Jan. 12 and 13 at 8:30 p.m. Part one, on Friday evening, features soloists Susan Larson, soprano; Jan Curtis, mezzo-soprano; Alexander Stevenson, tenor; Mark Pearson, bass; and the New England Conservatory Chorus under the direction of Lorna Cooke de Varon. Mr. Thomas opens the program with Debussy's Prelude to the afternoon of a faun, follows it with Debussy's "Jeux", poeme danse, and Prokofiev's Scythian Suite and closes the concert with Stravinsky's Les noces. Saturday evening the New England Conservatory Chorus again performs with Mr. Thomas and the Boston Symphony in Strauss' Joseph's Legend, Satie's Parade and Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe.

Michael Tilson Thomas was appointed Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony at the beginning of the 1969-70 season, and he replaced William Steinberg at concerts in New York during the fall when Steinberg became ill. He conducted more than thirty of the Boston Symphony's concerts during that season, and was appointed Associate Conductor of the Orchestra in the spring of 1970. In May 1970 he made his London debut in concerts with the London Symphony. During that summer he conducted at the Ravinia Festival and at the Lincoln Center Festival in New York as well as at Tanglewood. On the Boston Symphony Orchestra's tour to Europe he conducted concerts in Wuppertal, Hanover, Frankfurt, Rome, and Barcelona.

Thomas is well known to Boston audiences. This year he continues to direct the Boston Symphony's Spectrum Concerts, which he created. During the past two years Thomas has conducted many of the major orchestras in this country, and in Europe and Japan. This season he returns for guest engagments with the Israel Philharmonic, the London Symphony, the New Philharmonia, and the New York Philharmonic with which he begins his first season as music director of the nationally-televised "Young People's Concerts." He also makes his debut with the Lincoln Center Chamber Music Society, begins his second year with the Buffalo Philharmonic and assumes the position of Visiting Adjunct Professor of Music at the State University of New York at Buffalo.

50

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

JAN 14 1973 New England Newsclip

A Battle of Virtuosos: It Should Be a Ball

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS, who has more ideas about programing than an IBM systems man, is coming to Carnegie Hall on Thursday with the Boston Symphony and an affair that he calls a "Spectrum Concert." This is a fancy name for a program that is built on unusual combinations of instruments. It opens with an Overture for Double Orchestra by Johann Christian Bach, and proceeds to Bartók's Music for Strings, Percussion and Celeste, Steve Reich's "Four Organs" for rock organ quartet and maracas ensemble (try to top that one!) and ends with Liszt's "Hexameron" for six pianos and orchestra.

The J. C. Bach work is a rarity, though it probably will not contain any musical surprises. Johann Christian was a polite composer in the galant style and was not out to rock the boat. The Bartók work is, of course, well known. The Reich will be a first New York performance, and with that combination of instruments anything can happen. And then there is the "Hexameron," which will be receiving a first New York performance in its setting for pianos and orchestra. It has been previously heard here, however. Raymond Lewenthal resurrected it as a piano solo, and only last season Eugene List and his cohorts, at a Carnegie Hall "monster concert" at midnight, played it en masse—first the solos, ending with six pianists joining in for the finale.

*

Raymond Lewenthal, who has done such pioneer work in the romantic revival, heads the group of six in the Thursday concert. Virginia Eskin, Marilyn Neeley, Craig Sheppard, Peter Basquin and Antonio Barbosa are the other pianists. It should be a ball. The "Hexameron" is an unusual work, the joint effort of six of the most famous pianists of the 1830's, and as such is a compendium of piano styles of the day. And it has a fascinating background.

For years it was taken for granted that the work was played at the salon of Princess Belgioioso. Every Liszt biographer said so, and this writer, for one, took them on faith. But Lewenthal, who has researched the period thoroughly (he knows more about the romantic period than anybody around) has different ideas. Much of the following information about the "Hexameron" is cribbed shamelessly from Lewenthal's program notes for his "Hexameron" recording (RCA Victor LSC 2895).

There is no doubt that the Princess was the progenitor of the piece. She was an aristocrat who was one of those supremely talented women, like George Sand, who knew music well (she could play the piano and sing), was a published writer, collected famous names in all fields and held the most brilliant salon in Paris. It was she who brought together Liszt and Sigismond Thalberg in one of the most famous of all musical encounters. Who was the greater pianist? Each tried to outplay the other in a pianistic duel held at her salon on March 31, 1837. Then she tried to conclude the evening with an even greater coup. She wanted to bring together Liszt, Thalberg, Johann Peter Pixis, Henri Herz, Carl Czerny and Frédéric Chopin. The idea was that each was to compose a variation on the March from Bellini's "I Puritani," and play it before the guests of the Princess.

*

It has been the general assumption that the affair took place, most likely at the Liszt-Thalberg encounter. But Lewenthal thinks differently. He has looked through every source, every bit of published information that he could get his hands on, and has been unable to find any reference to this stupendous event. Certainly it would have made the headlines had it ever taken place. Lewenthal concludes that not even the Princess Belgioioso could get six such temperaments together under one roof. She did get after them, however, to submit the variations for which they had been commissioned, and those were published. Lizst liked the work. He played it as a solo, orchestrated it (or had it orchestrated) for piano and orchestra, and even worked up a two-piano arrangement of it. There is on record an account of a performance of the two-piano version that Liszt played with Clara Schumann, who hated him. What pressure, what kind of plasma, could have contained these two antipodal forces?

It is a pity that the original concert never came off (assuming that Lewenthal is correct in his conclusion). Imagine Horowitz, Serkin, Richter, Rubinstein, Michelangeli and Bolet in a salon, smiling at each other with their fists clenched, ready to show the audience who is really the King. The pianists that the Princess sought to bring together in 1837 were their equivalents. Liszt and Thalberg were, by consensus, the two greatest living pianists. Chopin was admired perhaps even more by the connoisseurs, but he seldom played in public; and, physically weak as he was, his pianism was a series of delicately flexible nuances. Herz was the idol of the Parisian salon — a glittering, elegant, superficial pianist with a thrilling bag of tricks. Czerny, who taught and composed more than he played, was a pupil of Beethoven, the teacher of Liszt, and a solid pianist of the German school. Pixis also was a representative of the German school, though his long residence in Paris had made him a salon favorite. He must have been another one of those well-drilled pianists whose scales sounded like marbles rolling down the keyboard.

Jack Mitchell

Michael Tilson Thomas, who brings the Boston Symphony to Carnegie in a "Spectrum Concert" Thursday
More ideas about programing than an IBM man

*

The music? It is a pièce d'occasion, a fun piece, that was not intended to be taken seriously. It exploits every aspect of piano technique. Liszt showed off his octaves. Chopin, characteristically, wrote a quiet, nocturne-like variation. Herz provided a glittering finger-twister. And so on. A whiff of a vanished age comes to life. This was, like so much art of the period, entertainment art, supplied at least by transcendent professionals. And therein lies the interest. Musical archeologists can reconstruct style and technique from a work like the "Hexameron." And today the public can relax and enjoy it as a wonderful period piece, accepting it for what it is.

The Princess never worked up anything equivalent. Her full name was Maria Cristina Beatrice Teresa Matilde Camilla Julia Margherita Laura Barbiano, Principessa de Belgioioso d'Este. She was a liberal who worked with Garibaldi and Mazzini for Italian independence, and thus was known as the Revolutionary Princess. Born in 1808, she settled in Paris in 1830 and immediately made her salon the center for every musician in Paris as well as such writers as Dumas, Gauthier, de Musset, Hugo and Mrs. Trollope.

Her musical salons were given on Wednesday evenings, while Saturdays were reserved for writers, politicians and theologians. "Guests," writes Lewenthal, "were admitted by a turbanned, bearded Negro looking like a Magus from a Veronese painting. They were conducted through a Gothic oratory decorated with skulls and crossbones in which guests were sometimes allowed to 'surprise' the Princess at her devotions."

*

Her books included works on Catholic dogma, a history of the House of Savoy and one named Oriental Harems and Scenery. She was thin, intense, brilliant and eccentric. She embalmed her last lover, dressed him in evening clothes, and kept the cadaver in her house. In 1849 she had to flee Europe because of her revolutionary activities and she set up as —of all things—a farmer in Asia Minor. She lost her money and was all but destitute. But there is a happy ending. Her properties were restored, and in 1871 she died peacefully in her villa at Lake Como. There should be a biography of her: none is available in English. How about it? Raymond? Gloria?

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 117,499

JAN 7 1973 New England Newsclip

Thomas Conducts Boston Concerts

BOSTON — Michael Tilson Thomas, founder and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Spectrum Concerts conducts two different concerts of commissions by the great ballet impresario Serge Diaghilev on Friday and Saturday evenings, January 12 and 13 at 8.30 p.m.

Part one, on Friday evening, features soloists Susan Larson, soprano; Jan Curtis, mezzo - soprano; Alexander Stevenson, tenor; Mark Pearson, bass; and the New England Conservatory Chorus under the direction of Lorna Cooke de Varon. Mr. Thomas opens the program with Debussy's Prelude to the afternoon of a faun, follows it with Debussy's "Jeux," poeme danse, and Prokofiev's Scythian Suite and closes the concert with Stravinsky's Les noces.

Saturday evening the New England Conservatory Chorus again performs with Mr. Thomas and the Boston Symphony in Strauss' Joseph's Legend, Satie's Parade and Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe.

Michael Tilson Thomas was appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony at the beginning of the 1969-70 season, and he replaced William Steinberg at concerts in New York during the fall when Mr. Steinberg became ill.

He conducted more than thirty of the Boston Symphony's concerts during that season, and was appointed associate conductor of the orchestra in the spring of 1970. In May 1970 he made his London debut in concerts with the London Symphony.

So Mr. Thomas is well known to Boston audiences. This year he continues to direct the Boston Symphony's Spectrum Concerts, which he created. During the past two years Mr. Thomas has conducted many of the major orchestras in this country, and in Europe and Japan.

This season he returns for guest engagements with the Israel Philharmonic, the London Symphony, the New Philharmonia, and the New York Philharmonic with which he begins his first season as music director of the nationally - televised "Young People's Concerts."

He also makes his debut with the Lincoln Center begins his second year with the Buffalo Philharmonic and assumes the position of visiting adjunct professor of music at the State University of New York at Buffalo.

ces' winds up Symphony's concert

MICHAEL STEINBERG

ducted by Michael Tilson Thomas — the first of two programs of music associated with Sergei Diagilev and the Russian Ballet — and it was disappointing. Perhaps one word in 10 could be understood, and, trivially, most of the colors and textures on stage were unpleasing. Then, just for continuity, having complained about the clunkiness of the four Baldwin pianos in Kirchner's performance, I found that the one Friday suffered from the same thing (the term "blunt instrument" took on new meaning for me that night).

The pianos were front and center in a fan-shape, with the solo singers in the angle made by the two middle instruments. That put them behind the pianos as well as in the middle of them, and that is how the words came to be simply swallowed up. It was a competent quartet — Susan Larson, Jan Curtis, Alexander Stevenson, Mark Pearson — and one that, given better placement on stage, could have been thoroughly effective. Even as it was, the issue of words aside (a big aside. I admit), Larson was stunning, with shining sound, the rhythmic articulation of a percussion instrument, and, especially given the risk she took by being so percussively Stravinskian, extraordinarily pure intonation. And, trivially, her appearance was stylish and handsome.

The chorus was from the New England Conservatory and prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon. Its singing was precise, but somehow not very present or vivid. The pianists — Newton Wayland, Luise Vosgerchian, Christopher Kies, Yasuo Watanabe — were excellent, and so were the BSO percussion players. Thomas's conducting was intelligent and energetic, but the performance, being so non-verbal, gave the piece an oddly abstract quality It was, in fact, just a little bit boring.

There were many empty seats. One reason would be that much of the student audience with which Spectrum has had its biggest success was at Frans Brueggen's free concert in Sanders. It is also true that it would take special devotion to "Les noces" to induce a regular BSO subscriber to buy a ticket to hear Debussy's "Faun" and "Jeux" repeated from last week, or Prokofiev's Scythian Suite from the beginning of the season. What becomes of the claim that Spectrum is special?

What remains special is the presentation, and much of that is questionable. For example, the inelegance of the shirtsleeves uniform with its studied chumminess suggests that the alleged sickness of our concert life is misunderstood in Symphony Hall. Incidentally, most of the young audience was more formally dressed and would have injoyed the music no less if the orchestra had been, too.

I am probably not alone in my growing irritation with Michael Thomas's introductory chatter at these concerts. He plays it too much for laughs, and when, as before "Jeux," he was serious and provided musical illustrations with the orchestra, he was too quick and impatient for clarity. When he came out after intermission and said, "There's not much to say about 'Les nices," there was applause in the balcony. Clearly, Spectrum wants reconsidering.

JAN 10 1973

Symphony offers Debussy

BOSTON — Michael Tilson Thomas, founder and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Spectrum Concerts conducts two different concerts of commissions by the great ballet impresario Serge Diaghilev on Friday and Saturday evenings Jan. 12 and 13 at 8:30 p.m. Part one, on Friday evening, features soloists Susan Larson, soprano; Jan Curtis, mezzo-soprano; Alexander Stevenson, tenor; Mark Pearson, bass; and the New England Conservatory Chorus under the direction of Lorna Cooke de Varon. Mr. Thomas opens the program with Debussy's Prelude to the afternoon of a faun, follows it with Debussy's "Jeux", poeme danse, and Prokofiev's Scythian Suite and closes the concert with Stravinsky's Les noces. Saturday evening the New England Conservatory Chorus again performs with Mr. Thomas and the Boston Symphony in Strauss' Joseph's Legend, Satie's Parade and Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe.

Michael Tilson Thomas was appointed Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony at the beginning of the 1969-70 season, and he replaced William Steinberg at concerts in New York during the fall when Steinberg became ill. He conducted more than thirty of the Boston Symphony's concerts during that season, and was appointed Associate Conductor of the Orchestra in the spring of 1970. In May 1970 he made his London debut in concerts with the London Symphony. During that summer he conducted at the Ravinia Festival and at the Lincoln Center Festival in New York as well as at Tanglewood. On the Boston Symphony Orchestra's tour to Europe he conducted concerts in Wuppertal, Hanover, Frankfurt, Rome, and Barcelona.

Thomas is well known to Boston audiences. This year he continues to direct the Boston Symphony's Spectrum Concerts, which he created. During the past two years Thomas has conducted many of the major orchestras in this country, and in Europe and Japan. This season he returns for guest engagments with the Israel Philharmonic, the London Symphony, the New Philharmonia, and the New York Philharmonic with which he begins his first season as music director of the nationally-televised "Young People's Concerts." He also makes his debut with the Lincoln Center Chamber Music Society, begins his second year with the Buffalo Philharmonic and assumes the position of Visiting Adjunct Professor of Music at the State University of New York at Buffalo.

HARVARD CRIMSON
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
D. 19,900

JAN 17 1973 New England Newsclip

Profile

Michael Tilson Thomas

THE INEVITABLE DOOM of American musical life has been discussed with morbid relish by almost everyone concerned for years now. Composers, still suffering from the complications of the turn-of-the-century stylistic crisis, lament the unwillingness of audiences and orchestras to accept unfamiliar music. Conductors skillfully transfer the blame from orchestras to players, whose reticence and unionization undermine effective rehearsal of the unknown; but they, too, indict reactionary audiences and patrons. Professional players are often delightfully unaffected in their views—remarks like "I'd rather be at home driving splints under my fingernails" are a typical response to the rehearsal of particularly trying new works. The critics, still dazed by the mystifying complexity of dry post-Webern serialism, can rarely muster the cogency to suffuse their obfuscating verbiage with any genuine perspicuity. And audiences themselves are sullenly apathetic, compared to their predecessors who rioted at the premiere of Le Sacre du Printemps.

It can be said, without fear of premature optimism, that a few people are taking positive steps to bridge the chasms separating the various functions taking part in musical events. Most conspicuously promising in this respect among young conductors is Michael Tilson Thomas, who is clearly using his remarkable prominence beneficially. Even in his pre-Boston Symphony days, Thomas performed a remarkable amount of unusual music—his four years in Los Angeles, for example, included premieres of Stravinsky, Boulez, Stockhausen, Dahl, and Foss.

As Associate Conductor of the BSO, Thomas iniated the Spectrum Concerts, the most progressive step toward more interesting and realistic programming yet taken by the orchestra. And as Musical Director of the Buffalo Philharmonic, he has made more impressive progress in renovating the nineteenth-century museum status of the 'modern' orchestra.

"My object there (in Buffalo) is to present the complete music of Western civilization. We're setting up a series where people in the orchestra appear in chamber concerts, smaller concerts, in which they have the chance to prepare their own groups...and there are also some groups working with electronic music, immediately within the orchestra; and I'm getting a group of people interested in old music...

"I've divided the year there between two kinds of concerts—Kaleidoscope concerts and Criterion concerts. Criterion is straight down the line, standard rep, you can buy a ticket with no fears at all. And Kaleidoscope is, um...far out music from the eleventh century to the day before yesterday. And amazingly enough, lots of people come to those concerts...It partially has to do with the way the concerts are run—a kind of 'dissection-concert,' really a kind of dialogue between the audience...and they can ask questions,and the piece is taken apart and put back together...much more relaxed. People are turned on by the adventure of it, the uncertainty of it."

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS, the taste that refreshes.
—Kathleen Emlich

THOMAS' MOST RECENT such adventure in Boston was last weekend's Salute to Serge Diaghilev, the legendary Russian impressario of the arts, who, among other things, presented the first performance of Stravinsky's Le Sacre in 1913, with choreography by Nijinsky. Though he confessed that, because of a lot of schedule conflicts, Friday's program (L'apres-midi d'un faune and Jeux by Debussy; Scythian Suite 'Ala and Lolli' by Prokofiev; and Stravinksy's Les Noces) was not one of his more daring adventures, Thomas was justifiably excited about it: "...the figure of that man is monumental. It's just unbelievable the number of things he brought off!...The world needs more impressarios, not more composers and players (you've got plenty of good people)—especially now, the media situations are so complicated..."

Notwithstanding the laudable purposes, the fascinating theme of the program, and the enthusiasm and ability of the man who engineered it, Friday's Salute was less exciting than I had hoped. Presumably to avoid any overtones of pedantry, Thomas is quite casual in his commentary on the pieces; and the rambling result is often less than illuminating. Debussy's Jeux was the most complex work presented; and, as Pierre Boulez, who 'discovered' the work, lucidly notes, "Jeux marks the advent of a musical form which, instantly renewing itself, involves no less instantaneous mode of listening." Thomas excerpted several logical examples in attempting to facilitate the comprehension of this difficult genre of continuous musical development; but they were quite short, weakly described, and besides, the orchestra got lost in one of them. My impression that this particular 'dissection' had little meaning for anyone not acquainted with the score was verified later by several other members of the audience.

The actual performance of Jeux was exemplary—exceedingly clean in texture and rhythmic accuracy, and appropriately tensile in overall structural concept. Unhappily, Afternoon of a Faun was treated in much the same way. Despite the barrage of controversy concerning impressionism, by which the piece is usually described (Boulez, for instance, feels justified in saying that modern music "awakes with the premiere of L'apres-midi d'un faune..."), I find it impossible to dissociate from it the hazy, sensuous atmosphere traditionally ascribed to the Mallarme poem from which the title is taken. Tilson Thomas' performance was devoid of any impressionistic aspects.

THE SCYTHIAN SUITE was jovially described by Thomas as Prokofiev's attempt at a barbaric Russian ballet, in response to Le Sacre. Diaghilev rejected the score, and it is not too hard to imagine why. I cannot help but predict its future renown as music for a rousing John Wayne movie.

—Kathleen Emlich

"There is little to say about Stravinsky's Les Noces," began Thomas after intermission, which prompted applause from an audience evidently not turned on by this particular adventure. The performance of Diaghilev's favorite Stravinsky piece was undermined by some fundamental problems, the most distressing of which was that scarcely a word of either the chorus or soloists could be heard. Both the intricate rhythms and texture of the composition were imprecisely handled, resulting in a generally mediocre performance.

The difficulties of Friday's concert, however, are far less significant than the progressive trend of Thomas' musical inclination. By the range of his tastes, his education, his inherent abilities, and the esteem now accorded him, Tilson Thomas is uniquely qualified to transform the symphony orchestra into a flexible nucleus for the continuing expansion of the musical spectrum. It is a creative project which he takes seriously. And, he assured me, he is having no difficulty in financing his novel programs. Why then, I naturally wanted to know, did so many others adamantly maintain that unconventional programming was unfeasible?

"Because they are lazy."

—Stephen E. Hefling

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885

JAN 12 1973 New England Newsclip

BSO Fetes Diaghilev Successes, Flops

By ELLEN PFEIFER
MUSIC CRITIC

Sergei Diaghilev was neither composer, performer, artist, nor choreographer, yet, in the worlds of music, art and dance, there are few 20th Century figures more important or more legendary, few names that have provoked such endless fascination.

There is really no generic term for what it was that he did — "impressario" or "artistic director," for example, seem not inclusive enough. The art which he pursued was that of recognizing genius in those around him, tapping it and thereby creating some of the most spectacular artistic productions of his time.

At first, his activities were limited to the organization of great art exhibits and new music concerts in both Russia and Paris. Later, however, he concentrated on the multifaceted production of ballet, calling upon the most gifted artists, musicians, dancers and choreographers to collaborate in projects that frequently become milestones in the history of performing arts.

Along the way, Diaghilev "discovered" Stravinsky, Nijinsky, Balanchine, Fokine, and Bakst, and either commissioned or gave first productions to works such as "The Rite of Spring," "Firebird," "Daphnis and Chloe," and "Jeux."

At the season's second series of Spectrum Concerts, Friday and Saturday nights, Michael Tilson Thomas and the BSO will offer a salute to Diaghilev by way of performances of seven musical works which he introduced or commissioned. Works which were immediate successes like Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," those that had mixed reviews like "Jeux," and some distinct flops like Strauss' "Josephslegend" will be included.

Thomas' own fascination with Diaghilev was inspired partly by Stravinsky who, although "he was very little impressed by anybody, was impressed by Diaghilev beyond anyone else." Even when Stravinsky was living in L. A., at the age of 87, Diaghilev's name came up with incredible frequency," Thomas said recently. And, he added, that Stravinsky is buried in Venice, a site he chose so he could lie next to Diaghilev.

Undoubtedly the greatest attribute of Diaghilev was his "superb taste," Thomas said. "He also had a very winning and powerful personality which he used for getting funding. He imagined projects and collaborations and once he had an idea, he was ruthless in carrying it out. He was not above using any means — artistic, financial, press, blackmail, or sex–for getting things done.

"He must have been much like Balakirev (a second rate composer who was artistic advisor to the Russian five) who had the same kind of huge artistic talent, but not the technical discipline to do things himself."

Thomas explained that although Diaghilev was ostensibly involved with the production of ballets, many of the scores he used were not really successful as ballets even though they might have been recognized as musical masterpieces. Part of this was due to the "conventional dance language of the "Ballets Russe" which was not always appropriate for the music.

The "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faum" which Thomas will perform at the concert Friday night, "was, of course, a big success. Part of the reason for this was Nijinsky's costume, the construction of which Diaghilev is said to have supervised personally. Apparently, it was strategically padded."

On the other hand, "Jeux" was not successful in the ballet medium. "It was premiered the same season as "Sacre" and was eclipsed by it. It was also Debussy's most advanced score and maybe too sophisticated for the audiences."

Prokofiev's "Ala and Lolli, Scythian Suite," was commissioned by Diaghilev and later rejected as not being interesting enough. "Maybe it was because Diaghilev already had one big barbaric Russian work in the repertory that year," Thomas surmised.

" 'Les Noces' was Diaghilev's favorite piece by Stravinsky," Thomas said, "and it's also my own favorite of the early works." The texts in Russian dealt with that Russian peasant dream world and that must have been very nostalgic for Diaghilev who had realized by that time that he would never leave Paris to go back to Russia.

"The piece has not one extra note in it, no padding at all. There are no snake dances (and Thomas hummed a sinuoue pseudo Orietntal tune as illustration) in it as there are in 'Sacre.'

Richard Strauss little-known "Josephslegend," which the BSO does on Saturday night, "was a giant flop" in its first production. "It was a gigantic enterprise and Diaghilev poured money into it, but it didn't work. Maybe because there are directions on every page that say something like 'three Veiled Women step down from platform and remove two veils' or 'there is an expression of rapturous transfiguration on his face.' It's written like a screenplay. It deals with all sorts of interior states of spirituality which are almost impossible to project in dance.

artists, he was very solicitous. He made Nijinsky's career possible. Nijinsky was the product of a hot-house environment and didn't have to deal with reality until after his marriage (and his subsequent falling out with Diaghilev). All he had to do was perfect his craft, thanks to Diaghilev. Very few people have done that."

52

Ballet Scores Performed

An Evening of Amusement, Exploration

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

For the second night of his Salute to Diaghilev Saturday (the second in this year's Spectrum series), Michael Tilson Thomas chose ballet scores which, in their first productions, were only qualified successes or outright bombs, and of which only one ever achieved real recognition. There was Strauss' "Josephslegende," a monster-ballet; Satie's "Parade," a true piece of experimental music-theatre; and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," a work whose music has eclipsed whatever choreography was devised for it.

• Music Review

And if the evening was not one for (always) great music, it was nevertheless one for amusement and for some interesting exploration of a fascinating artistic era.

Listening to the Strauss, I was reminded of a colleague's comment about the composer's "Symphonia Domestica," and that it was a magnificent bit of compositional fakery.

The "Josephslegende" seems to me some of Strauss' less inspired fakery. It just doesn't come off this time, and even the disposition of means doesn't really convince me. Also like the "Domestica," there's a good deal of overwriting and where the Baby's Bath scene is overwhelming (it has been said to outdo all the gods in Valhalla) but still works as music, the "Josephslegende" boxing match comes off sounding like a Napoleonic war set to very cheap movie music.

Satie's "Parade" was supposedly the first cubist ballet and, although considered very avant garde in its time, sounds not nearly as angular or stark as one might imagine a cubist ballet score.

Perhaps the most futuristic device is the random interruption by "extra-musical" sounds from such unconventional instruments as typewriters, sirens, whistles and "amplified mud-puddle." This was all part of the pre-Cagian ideas of Jean Cocteau who was interested in noises at the time he and Satie collaborated on the score. In any case, it all sounds pretty ricky-ticky with some rag-time, some marches, and some cabaret sentimentality.

Thomas produced an appropriately dead-pan sardonic mood to the work as well as restoring some of the original instrumentation (that is, performing on typewriter what had been taken over by "real" instruments like snare drum).

Thomas performed "Daphnis and Chloe" in its entirety except for one small cut, and for all the wonderful sections like Danse Guerriere, Lever du Jour and the Bacchanale, I find that there are a number of bare spots in the whole work—points where interest just isn't sustained. Nevertheless, it is an extraordinary work—with amazing shadings of color, and an atmosphere at once perfumed and remote.

The BSO performed it quite beautifully although with dynamic levels usually about one marking louder than that notated. There was an explosive Danse Guerriere and some lovely flute solos by Doriot Anthony Dwyer in Part III.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525
JAN 25 1973
New England Newsclip

In Concert

Spirited Wedding Dance

By Peter M. Knapp

Tuesday night's program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting, consisted of music heard at the recent Spectrum concerts devoted to a salute to Serge Diaghilev.

There was an exception. In tribute to the late President Lyndon B. Johnson, the orchestra played the second movement Allegretto from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, replacing Erik Satie's "Parade."

The rest of the program included Stravinsky's "Les Noces" and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," which I had heard at the second of the Spectrum Diaghilev programs and decided to skip this time. In this particular case the concept of Spectrum as a sounding-board for music not heard during the regular Symphony season seems to have gone astray, but perhaps it has something to with the BSO's scheduling and rehearsal time.

For Openers

Whatever, the programming of "Les Noces" for the first half of a Boston Symphony program was an event of some note, for despite its half-century of age, it is more rugged than the usual Symphony Hall concert opener. The audience seemed to like it, judging from the enthusiastic applause (it would have been interesting to observe the response to the Satie, had it been played, with its sirens, guns, typewriter and amplified mud puddle sound effects).

Perhaps only Stravinsky could have written "Les Noces," a work of astonishing precision — mathematically complex yet tightly compressed and unified. Certainly it was as bold a composition for its time (1914-23) as Satie's whimsical, cubist "Parade", not least in its scoring for four pianos, percussion, four vocal soloists and chorus.

Here, Stravinsky abandoned the earlier lush orchestration of the big ballet scores and even the greater coloristic range of the chamber-scaled pieces for a leaner, homogeneous instrumental array ideally suited for his essentially percussive vision of a Russian peasant wedding—a ballet-cantata, or as Stravinsky styled it, "Russian choreographic scenes with song and music."

Communication Gap

It is a terribly demanding work for all involved — with its changing metrical patterns, the shifts in stresses, the problems of timing, the vocal effects and verbal articulation required.

Tuesdays performance under Thomas' direction was orderly and spirited, with crisp, well-defined rhythms, yet with few of the words (English) coming through. Perhaps placing the soloists out front instead of behind the pianos would have helped. But the inability to comprehend the text consistently, except during some of the quieter passages, was a frustrating comunications problem, like one of the scrambled telephone conversations you may have encountered lately.

Joining the BSO's percussionists in this performance were the New England Conservatory Chorus, pianists Newton Wayland, Luise Vosgerchian, Christopher Kies and Yasuo Watanabe, soprano Susan Larson, mezzo Jan Curtis, tenor Alexander Stevenson and bass Mark Pearson. Of the solo quartet, dressed in approximations of Russian peasant costume, Miss Larson was outstanding for the security and daring of her percussive delivery, and at no loss of intonation.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885
JAN 15 1973
New England Newsclip

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525
JAN 16 1973
New England Newsclip

In Concert

Diaghilev in Spectrum

By Peter M. Knapp

The second of this season's Spectrum concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conceived and conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, consisted of a two-part musical salute to Serge Diaghilev.

Surely the choice of this theme reminds us of the incredible explosion of creativity that took place in Paris before the First World War, a period so rich in cultural and intellectual ferment as to be hardly equalled. And such reminders also confirm the creative barrenness of our own age.

Diaghilev (1872-1929), the Russian impressario of the Ballet Russe, provided the outlet for much of this creativity, of course. He not only supplied ideas, advice and money for the new fusion of dance, music, art and literature in the Ballet Russe, he also had the courage to present the far-out — one of history's great musical catalysts.

Bad With The Good

In his two-evening survey of some of the music commissioned by Diaghilev, Thomas chose not only some acknowledged triumphs, but also some of the curiosities and failures. Friday night's program included Debussy's "Prelude a l'apres-midi d'un faune" and "Jeux", Prokofiev's Scythian Suite "Ala and Lolli", and Stravinsky's "Les Noces." Saturday evening's program, which I heard, consisted of excerpts from Richard Strauss' "Josephslegende", Erik Satie's "Parade" and a suite from Maurice Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe."

Whether it was the cold weather or the program, Saturday's audience was subdued and there were many empty seats. There was an ovation after the Ravel, but the response to the Strauss and the Satie was more polite than enthusiastic. And justifiably so, because the main reason for programming these pieces is for their curiosity value rather than their intrinsic worth.

"Josephslegende" (1914), a Hofmannsthal-Strauss-Fokine collaboration, had its success in Paris, but were it not by Richard Strauss this pretentious, stylistically erratic score would remain entombed in the archives. Indeed, the Viennese press caustically opined, during Strauss' tenure at the Opera, that if "the Lord was with Joseph, he definitely was not with the 'Josephslegende.' "

From the excerpts presented Saturday night, the score sounds like a soundtrack for "Sinbad and the Three Caliphs" — a pompous pot-pourri of Straussian ideas, heavy on polyphony, chattering brass and booming percussion. Forget it.

The Satie piece has come down to us as a notorious example of outrageous whimsy. A Cubist ballet of 1915 put together by Cocteau, Satie and Picasso, it must have sounded voguishly daring in its time — Thomas called it a "light, flat, spaced-out piece of the Twenties."

But for all its whimsy, satire, abrupt changes and surprises — including such devices as sirens, guns, typewriter and even "amplified mud puddle" — "Parade" sounds like what it is — yesterday's faded shocker.

By contrast, "Daphnis et Chloe" (premiered 1912) has worn well despite its over-familiarity as a Symphony Hall program-ender. (Charles Munch practically made it the BSO anthem.) This time, Thomas chose a longer suite, revealing much more of the score than the suite No. 2 which is usually performed, and the New England Conservatory Chorus added the "loo's" and the "oo-ah's" to the orchestral fabric.

Not all of Ravel's score maintains the mastery and interest as, say, in "Lever du jour," but much of it is beautiful in its own right, sensuous in its instrumental blendings and exotic harmonies and evoking that dreamlike quality of impressionism. The performance, too, was satisfying, fluent yet controlled and with fine solo flute, French and English horn contributions.

Legendary music—plus amplified mud puddle

Boston Symphony plays Satie, Ravel, R. Strauss

By David Sterritt

It was to be an evening of ballet music, of recalling great old experiments, if evoking Paris in its artistic heyday.

Officially, it was Part 2 of "A Salute to Diaghilev" — played by the Boston Symphony in its imaginative Spectrum series, conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas.

As the casually dressed orchestra warmed up, audience members glanced through photograph-peppered programs. They saw deliciously florid Leon Bakst costumes, for "Josephslegende" and "Daphnis et Chloe." A cubist man, and a cubist horse, by Picasso for Satie's "Parade." Nijinsky and Ravel playing a piano duet from "Daphnis." And other images of artistic greats, recapturing a legendary era.

Diaghilev was that era's consummate impresario. Many of his projects have passed into artistic history. Saluting him was a made-to-order idea for the Spectrum series. He worked with a host of bold and daring talents. Their works still speak with remarkable directness, especially to today's younger audiences.

The tribute's first part was devoted to Debussy, Prokofiev, and Stravinsky. I heard Saturday night's Part 2, an ear-dazzling evening of Richard Strauss, Satie, and Ravel.

Mr. Thomas's informal spoken remarks introduced Strauss's "Josephslegende," composed in 1914 at Diaghilev's request. The conductor mentioned the brilliance of orchestral sound which Strauss favored. This quality was much in evidence during the BSO's performance.

Mr. Thomas led forcibly. Yet he never reached too far for effects, never strove to bring out what wasn't naturally there. Arching over all was a ringing clarity which dominated even the most dense, jaggedly jazzy passages.

The score for "Parade" has become increasingly familiar, with the recent mini-revival of Satie's music. Mr. Thomas introduced the piece, describing it variously as flat-surfaced, "deadpan," and "spaced out."

He also took pride in pointing out its sound effects, which were all included — guns, lottery wheel, typewriter, siren, et al. Even the "amplified mud puddle" which Satie calls for, though no one seems quite sure how it was amplified back in his day.

There was a little ponderousness to "Parade" at times, but it was played with gusto and humor. The amplified water-swishing caused no problem for 1973, only someone left the amplifiers on too long in the percussion section — causing cymbal crashes and tambourine rattles to be unnecessarily amplified, too. Yet Satie, Cocteau, and Picasso would probably have approved the gentle audacity that was always in evidence.

The program's largest work followed intermission, a suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe." The New England Conservatory Chorus, directed by Lorna Cooke de Varon, joined the BSO.

* * *

Dynamics are of obvious importance in a piece which begins with a whispered bass tone, then builds in almost no time to a thunderous tutti. Mr. Thomas properly emphasized dynamic ebb and flow throughout his exploration of the work's dramatic range.

The conductor used the chorus well, treating it as another well-balanced orchestral force. Playing was firm, particularly in the horn and violin sections. And the lushest, broadest moments came off nicely, avoiding all hints of schmaltziness.

Mr. Thomas, and his effortless way with moderns, can be commended for another fascinating evening.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
JAN 15 1973

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER &
RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 312,885
JAN 15 1973
New England Newsclip

In Spectrum Series

BSO Focuses on Diaghilev

By DAVID SATZ

Michael Tilson Thomas led two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Spectrum series this weekend at Symphony Hall.

Mr. Thomas set the tone for Friday's concert with the selection of five works relating to the career of Serge

• Music Review

Diaghilev, and with introductory monologues (in lieu of printed program notes) covering the memorable non-musical points about these works. There were a few dutiful "musical examples" showing some incidental features of Debussy's "Jeux," and not incidentally showing the comtempt some members of the orchestra seemed to feel for the superficial "analysis" of the work.

I suspect that it was the idea of analysis rather than its superficiality that they didn't like; but in such introductions there is typically little or nothing one can say to help increase the undestanding of the music.

The Spectrum series seems aimed at that segment of the public which has come to feel that serious music is beyond their grasp. But most musical institutions, including the Boston Symphony, have been falling farther and farther behind the contemporary development of the art.

In one sense the Spectrum series is a chance for some degree of reform on the part of the orchestra, such as the policy of presenting younger performers as assisting artists. But the emphasis of the concert programs is on the sensational (or the once-sensational) rather than the relevant. Partly this is contrived to reflect glory on our time, in contrast to bygone days when audiences and critics reacted short-sightedly to now sacrosanct classics such as the Rite of Spring.

There is also some degree of implied recognition that the Symphony's base of community support is growing thinner and more feeble with age. Perhaps this concert format is a way of providing a substitute for the long-playing record — complete with (spoken) liner notes.

The audience, however, gave signs of distress at the amount of commentary in the already rather lengthy program, which included unspecial performances of the Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun and Jeux by Debussy; the Scythian Suite of Prokofieff; Stravinsky's arrangement of the Volga Boatman song, and Le Boatman song, and Les-Noces.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 165,925

JAN 18 1973

New England Newsclip

The Boston At Bushnell

(Reprinted From Yesterday's late editions).

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, was presented in the Bushnell Symphony Series at the Memorial auditorium Tuesday night. The program:

Symphony No. 7 — Beethoven
Symphony No. 3 — Copland

It would be choosing among great blessings to try to say what visiting orchestra holds the palm in the esteem of Bushnell audiences, but certainly the Boston Symphony must come near ranking the rest in popular favor.

